Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), emphasized that volunteers would come in only at the "express invitation" of local groups and would work on projects to assist migratory farm families, youngsters in city and rural slums, the disabled, the mentally ill and the mentally retarded.

Republican Senators John Tower (Tex.) and Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) —normally found on opposite ends of the GOP political spectrum—joined in offering an anti-discrimination rider to the National Service Corps bill which was tabled, 49-41. Mansfield twitted the Republicans about the "very interesting" sponsorship. On final passage, Javits voted for the bill, Tower against it.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was preparing to vote on a one-year extension of the Mexican farm labor program.
- The House Ways & Means Committee neared completion of its tax bill, providing a two-step, top-to-bottom reduction in income tax rates for individuals and corporations.

By a one-vote margin, the committee rejected a Republican proposal to cancel the second step of the tax cut if the national debt exceeded a specified ceiling. As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the committee had not yet acted on the Administration proposal to eliminate the 4 percent tax credit on dividend income.

- A House Judiciary subcommittee met behind closed doors to vote on civil rights legislation—including a labor-supported proposal to include a strong fair employment provision in the Administration's omnibus rights bill.
- In a sharp setback to a program strongly urged by Pres. Kennedy, the House Commerce Committee voted a deep 70 percent slash in a bill to establish a series of local mental health centers. The Senate had passed a 10-year, $848 million measure by a 72-1 vote, but 12 Republicans and three Democrats on the House committee joined forces to outvote 12 committee Democrats and cut the bill to $238 million.
- The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee opened hearings on pay raises for government employes. Civil Service Commission Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., urged approval of an additional round of "comparability" increases recommended by the Administration to go into effect next January. Postal and other government union leaders are scheduled to testify later.
- The House approved, 221-175, an extension of the temporary $309 billion national debt limit. The margin was considerably larger than the nine votes by which an earlier debt ceiling bill had been passed.

Pay Increases Urged For Top U.S. Officials

A 12-man presidential advisory panel has recommended substantial increases—ranging up to $25,000 a year—in the salaries of cabinet members, Supreme Court justices, senators, representatives, and other high government officials.

The panel was headed by Clarence B. Randall, former board chairman of the Inland Steel Co., and included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Stating that salaries paid for top government appointive positions should be well above those paid the highest career civil servants, the panel's report nevertheless observed that the pay of top appointees "need not, and cannot, be fixed meaningfully at rates comparable with the higher ranges of executive compensation in business and industry."

It cited a survey of leading executives of 1,157 corporations which showed median salaries in seven categories ranging from $53,000 a year for life insurance executives to $91,000 for officials of manufacturing companies.

Declaring that the cost of its recommendations would not exceed $20 million a year, the panel urged that these new pay rates be made effective next January through legislation:

- For Cabinet members, $50,000 a year, up from the present $25,000.
- For members of Congress, $35,000 a year, up from $22,500.
- For the Vice President, the Speaker of the House and Supreme Court justices, $60,000, up from $35,000, with the Chief Justice continuing to receive an additional $500.
- For the Deputy Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of State, $45,000; for other under secretaries, $40,000, and for assistant secretaries, $35,000.
- For administrative assistant secretaries, chiefs of major bureaus and top staff members, $33,000.
- For the heads and board members of small agencies, $30,000.
- For appeals court judges, $45,000, up from $25,500, and for district court judges, $35,000, up from $22,500.

The panel also recommended that the expense allowances of the Vice President and the Speaker be increased from $10,000 to $15,000 and that senators and representatives be permitted to deduct $5,000 of their salaries from taxable income to offset living expenses.

It urged Congress to increase "very substantially," the number of trips it permits its members to make at the government's expense each year.

PRESIDENTS of a major union and a major company joined in urging expansion of the manpower training program at hearings held by a House Labor subcommittee. Left to right: Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists; Pres. John I. Snyder, Jr., of U.S. Industries, Inc., and Subcommittee Chairman Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.).

U.S. Report Underscores Lag in Jobs

Non-farm payroll employment improved in July for the sixth straight month, the Labor Dept. has reported, but the gain in this period has failed to dent the unemployment problem.

The July improvement was in the form of a much less than usual decline in jobs over the month.

The detailed job report for July showed a drop of 257,000 jobs since June whereas a decline of nearly 400,000 is usual at this time of year.

An earlier summary report, based on census surveys, showed a seasonal drop of half a million in unemployment to a total of 4.3 million in July. The drop was among teenagers who had found work by July. But, the later report again noted, unemployment was 300,000 higher than a year ago. The seasonally adjusted jobless rate held high at 5.6 percent.

"The more favorable (June-to-July) performance this year was the result of a relatively large employment pickup in construction, along with better-than-seasonal job changes in both trade and services," the detailed report said.

Construction gained 109,000 jobs to a total of 3 million. Trade, at 11.8 million and service, at 8.1 million, remained almost unchanged. Compared to a year ago, trade was 219,000 higher and service 242,000 higher.

The usual sharp summer drop of 320,000 was recorded for state and local government, to a total of 6.8 million. This group, made up mainly of non-teaching staff and non-contract personnel, accounted for most of the job decline in July.

Overall, the decline of 257,000 jobs in July left the number of workers on non-farm payrolls at a total of 56.6 million. Gains since the first of the year have been "over a million greater than seasonal," the report noted, and have been spread throughout industry.

In spite of this improvement, "we haven't gotten any significant reduction in unemployment," observed Robert Stein, chief of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Division of Employment and Labor Force Analysis.

The report also showed an expected seasonal decline of 12 minutes in the factory workweek to 40 hours 36 minutes.

Labor, Industry Urge Broader Training Act

Labor and management joined in urging expansion and improvement of the Manpower Development & Training Act in a statement by a tripartite advisory council and in a unique joint congressional appearance by a union president and a prominent industrialist.

Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists told a House subcommittee that technological changes have been so rapid that "no American worker can prepare for a job with the assurance—or even the expectation—that he will work at that job for any appreciable period of time."

Accompanying him at the hearing was John I. Snyder, Jr., president and board chairman of U.S. Industries, Inc., developers and makers of automation machinery. Snyder told the subcommittee that the existing federal program "must be enlarged in scope, broadened beyond its present form, and accelerated beyond its present pace."

Snyder and Hayes are co-chairmen of the Foundation on Automation & Employment, set up by U.S. Industries with the cooperation of the IAM, to search out solutions to human problems caused by automation. The House subcommittee, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), has before it Administration-supported proposals to expand the Manpower Training Act.

The proposals earlier won the endorsement of a 26-member labor-management-public advisory council to the Dept. of Labor, which called on Congress to make these changes in the manpower law:

- Postpone a requirement in existing law requiring states to pay half the cost of training programs starting next July 1. Unless the deadline is put off, most programs will be forced to shut down.
- Authorize workers who can not qualify for existing training programs because they can't read or write to be given special literacy training.
- Lower the minimum age for training allowances from 19 to 16 and permit up to 15 percent of the training allowance fund to be used for youth. The present ceiling is 5 percent.
- Provide increased funds to carry out these added programs.

Labor members of the Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security, which made the recommendations, are:

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; Pres. Joseph H. Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO; Pres. Karl F. Feller of the Brewery Workers; Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers; Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers; Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO and Hayes.

In his testimony before the Holland subcommittee, Hayes said the 1961 training law was "a good start" but events have proved that "it is already quite inadequate."

He noted that "changing technology is displacing 1.8 million workers in American industry each year" and at the same time more young people are coming of age and entering the labor market.

If only half of the nation's 4.5 million unemployed could be retrained and put to work, Hayes said, they could produce $50 billion more each year in goods and services.

Snyder emphasized that his company feels "a deep sense of responsibility towards people displaced by the automation machinery it produces. But the problem, he said, is a national one requiring "the fullest kind of cooperation between government, industry and labor."

Without such cooperation, he warned, "we as a nation will pay an awful price for our inaction."

Coast Unemployment Increases in June

San Francisco—The unemployment rate in the San Francisco-Oakland area rose to a seasonally adjusted 5.6 percent in July, up from 5.3 percent in June and 5.1 percent a year ago.

At the same time, employment moved up to an all-time record high of 1.215 million.

AFL-CIO News

Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year

Vol. VIII — Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. — Saturday, August 24, 1963 — No. 34

Meany Makes New Appeal For Rights Bill With FEP

A $250,000 CHECK representing advance gifts from eight AFL-CIO affiliates is presented by Pres. George Meany to Philip Klutznick, campaign chairman for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation. The presentation kicked off labor's campaign to raise funds for the foundation by a committee headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan (standing to the left of Meany). Seated at left is AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. Standing with Keenan is Hyman Bookbinder, foundation director.

Equal Opportunity Called 'Vital Issue'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has issued a strong appeal to the House Judiciary Committee to include guarantees of fair employment practices in the omnibus civil rights bill, now nearing completion in a subcommittee and scheduled soon for consideration by the full Judiciary group.

Meany, in a letter to all committee members, declared that no aspect of civil rights is more important than FEP and pointed out that "without equal opportunity for employment, minority groups will find themselves unable to enjoy many of the other opportunities we seek to guarantee them."

He specifically called on the committee to incorporate the text of the FEP bill introduced by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) and approved recently by the House Education & Labor Committee.

The Administration's package civil rights program did not include an FEP measure, but in his accompanying message to Congress Pres. Kennedy gave strong endorsement to FEP bills already pending in both House and Senate.

In his testimony last month during the Judiciary subcommittee's hearings on civil rights, Meany stressed that equal employment opportunity is "the vital issue, the chief among equals," needed to give real meaning to other rights.

"The plain fact," he declared, "is that Negro workers as a whole, North or South, do not enjoy anything approaching equal employment opportunity."

Kennedy Rejects Quotas

At his news conference Aug. 20, Kennedy reiterated his view that "a fair chance" for employment should be given to "everyone who is qualified," but in response to a question he rejected the idea of job quotas based on race to correct past discrimination against Negroes.

"We are too mixed, this society of ours, to begin to divide ourselves

(Continued on Page 12)

House Vote Nears on Foreign Aid

As the House headed toward a vote in its annual battle over foreign aid authorizations, the AFL-CIO issued a strong appeal to preserve the $4.1 billion program reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee for the fiscal year that began last July 1.

In a letter to all House members, Andrew J. Biemiller, the federation's legislative director, declared that the proposed authorizations already are "below the bedrock minimum for an effective program to preserve and extend freedom in other nations and for a reasonable contribution toward winning the cold war."

In preliminary votes, Republicans passed two amendments to restrict operations of the Development Loan Fund—a foreign aid instrument invented during the Eisenhower Administration — but lost on other amendments designed to cut appropriations for the fund.

A feature of the voting was the abstention of many southern Democrats, who have historically supported foreign aid programs from the teller counts on GOP amendments. Some observers viewed their refusal to participate in the votes as a kind of political fallout from other controversial issues, including the Kennedy Administration's activity in the civil rights field.

A major GOP effort to cut the $4.1 billion total recommended appropriation and final action on the aid program were expected momentarily as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Tax Bill Near

Meanwhile, the House Ways & Means Committee neared completion of its work on the tax-cut bill, a House Judiciary subcommittee completed hearings on the omnibus civil rights bill and the Senate Commerce Committee began drafting a separate public accommodations measure.

It was doubtful, however, that any of the bills—all key elements in the Administration's economic and civil rights programs—would reach the floor before Labor Day.

In other congressional action, the Senate passed, 57-31, and sent on to the White House a measure extending the current $309 billion legal ceiling on the national debt through Nov. 30.

In his appeal to House members, Biemiller noted that the $4.1 billion in aid approved by the Foreign Affairs Committee is $800 million below Pres. Kennedy's original request, $400 mil-

(Continued on Page 12)

Union Posts Reward In Engine Killings

Cleveland—The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen have offered a $2,500 reward for information resulting in the arrest and conviction of the killer of a fireman and an engineer as they sat in the cab of an Indiana Harbor Belt Railroad engine at Hammond, Ind., on Aug. 3.

BLFE Pres. H. E. Gilbert in posting the reward noted that the fireman, Paul Overstreet, 45, had been a member of the Brotherhood since 1941 and belonged to Hammond Lodge 685. The engineer, Roy M. Bottorff, 61, was a BLFE member during the time he worked as a locomotive fireman, Gilbert said.

AFL-CIO Stand:

House Urged to Kill Senate 'Bracero' Bill

The House should stand firm on its previous refusal to extend the dying Mexican farm labor import program, rejecting the Senate's belated effort to revive the program, an AFL-CIO spokesman has said.

"Every reason the AFL-CIO gave previously in asking Congress to kill the labor-import (bracero) program is still valid," Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared in commenting on Senate passage of a one-year extension of the plan.

"The bracero import program was adopted solely as an emergency measure to meet a Korean war shortage of U.S. farm labor, and it has been extended 'temporarily' too many times to the detriment of U.S. farm workers, who are among the least well paid and the most exploited of American workers."

The House voted last May to kill the program, turning down a bill designed to extend it for two years beyond its present expiration date of Dec. 31, 1963. Biemiller said at the time that he hoped the House vote marked "the beginning of the end" of second-class citizenship for U.S. farm workers and urged Congress to turn to legislation to "assure our own farm workers of jobs and to assure growers that competent labor will be available."

Senate passage of a substitute watered-down one-year extension of the bracero program "should not persuade the House to reconsider its wise action in killing the plan," the federation spokesman said.

"On the contrary, what is needed is action on bills to recruit U.S. farm workers and bring them to the areas of need," he added.

The Senate passed its one-year extension bill by a 63-24 vote only after adding a stiff new requirement that U.S. growers must offer domestic farm workers work guarantees and fringe benefits equal to those given braceros brought in by contract from Mexico. The vote on the amendment was 44-43.

So closely divided was the Senate over the issue of protective conditions for U.S. workers that three votes on amendments and procedures resulted in identical 45-45 ties. Once the key amendment was added, its supporters split between those who were now willing to accept a one-year extension and those still strongly opposed to any continuation.

As passed by the Senate, the bill would require farmers desiring to contract for Mexican workers first to offer domestic workers "workmen's compensation or occupational insurance coverage, housing, transportation, and work period guarantees comparable to that provided foreign workers."

With these new conditions, the bracero program would be extended to Dec. 31, 1964.

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) opened the drive for reforms in the program with an amendment that included, in addition to the language finally adopted, a provision directing the Secretary of Labor to

(Continued on Page 4)

Arbitration Issue Snags Rail Talks

A new deadlock in the long railroad work rules dispute has shifted attention back to Congress in efforts to achieve a solution before Aug. 29, the deadline the carriers have set for imposition of rules changes that would cut off the jobs of thousands of diesel firemen and other crew members.

Pres. Charles Luna of the Trainmen, speaking to newsmen after the latest mediation efforts ended in failure, laid responsibility for the break-off to a shift in position by the carriers.

The impasse came as a major concession by the five operating rail unions had boosted hopes for a voluntary settlement. In a sharp break with tradition, the unions agreed to a proposal by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to submit to binding arbitration the key questions of firemen on diesels and the makeup of train crews, the so-called "crew consist" issue.

The parties, however, were unable to agree on the precise terms of reference to the arbitration or its timing.

After further mediation efforts, including a meeting with rail labor and management and a Senate Commerce subcommittee, Wirtz said the differences separating the unions and the carriers had so far

(Continued on Page 12)

Wage-Hour Pay Hikes Go to 2.6 Million Sept. 3

About 2.6 million workers will return to their jobs with pay increases of up to 10 cents an hour following the long Labor Day weekend as the federal minimum wage in most industries rises to $1.25 an hour effective Sept. 3.

The second phase of the 1961 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act also means that on the same day about 3.6 million other workers, brought within the scope of the act for the first time two years ago, will begin to draw time and one-half for overtime work beyond 44 hours a week.

The newly covered workers, most of them in the retail and service trades, were given the protection of a $1 an hour minimum wage—but no maximum work week—in the first stage of the FLSA amendments, Sept. 3, 1961.

This year the schedule for these workers calls for a 44-hour ceiling on their workweek, but no increase in the pay floor.

The rest of the timetable will bring them to a $1.15-an-hour minimum wage and a 42-hour maximum workweek on Sept. 3, 1964, and to parity with other cov-

(Continued on Page 3)

JAPANESE BATTLE FLAG displayed by Iron Workers Dist. Rep. Daniel S. Wambolt is to be returned to its original owner's widow as a result of the friendship that developed between Wambolt and Kenichi Fujii, general secretary of a department store union in Japan, while both held fellowships in the Harvard Trade Union Program. Wambolt acquired the flag during the American invasion of Morotai Island in the South Pacific in September 1944.

Japanese Widow to Get Husband's Battle Flag

Cambridge, Mass.—A World War II Japanese battle flag—a trophy of the American invasion of Morotai Island—will be returned to the widow of its original owner as a result of a friendship formed here by two unionists attending the Harvard Trade Union Program.

Possessor of the shell-torn banner was Daniel S. Wambolt of Rockland, Mass., an Iron Workers district representative, who picked up the flag on Morotai's Red Beach while serving with the U.S. 31st Division's invasion forces in September 1944.

Last year, while at Harvard on a State AFL-CIO fellowship, Wambolt met Kenichi Fujii, general secretary of the union representing employes of the Iwataya department stores in Japan, and the two became friends.

While visiting Wambolt's home last Thanksgiving Day, Fujii expressed the belief that the flag had been presented to the outstanding soldier of a regiment, in accordance with Japanese custom, and that if the soldier had subsequently fallen in battle his family would undoubtedly treasure the flag.

Wambolt offered to return the flag to the family, if it could be located, and when Fujii returned to his own country he began the search.

A front-page story in the Asaki Press about the flag and its capture drew the attention of Mrs. Jatsu Sawade, who was able to identify it from names and good-luck slogans it bore as one which had been presented to her husband by his regiment. She had been notified that he had been killed in action.

Wambolt is sending the flag to the American embassy in Tokyo where Fujii will present it to Mrs. Sawade later this month.

The Iron Workers representative was president of his union's Riggers Local 609 in 1949-50 and later was named president of the East Coast Dist. Council of Riggers.

Fire Fighters' Rights Upheld in California

Sacramento—The right of fire fighters and all other public employes to join bona fide labor unions has been upheld in a unanimous decision by the Supreme Court of California.

The court, in ruling for Los Angeles Fire Fighters' Local 748, reversed a decision of last March by the 2d District Court of Appeals in the same city, which had held that a state law guaranteeing union rights did not apply to Los Angeles because it is a chartered city.

The state law, enacted in 1960, guarantees the right of firemen to join a union, discuss grievances and working conditions with municipal authorities and prohibits cities from interfering. The statute also prohibits firemen from striking or recognizing a picket line—a rule already existing in the constitutions of the Fire Fighters and the local.

The court held that a law with "statewide concern" takes precedence over local laws or codes. Its ruling limits "home rule" for charter cities by that definition.

Pres. William V. Wheatley of Local 748 said the decision is of major importance to all public employes. The union, he said, has been battling with the city of Los Angeles for more than three years for the "basic rights guaranteed by the legislature."

Favorable decisions had been won previously in other courts by Fire Fighters' locals in Palo Alto and Merced County, Calif. Palo Alto also is a chartered city.

Council Cites 'Paramount Importance':

All-Out Drive Urged to End Mounting School Dropouts

Unity House, Pa.—Reducing the school dropout rate is a matter of "paramount importance" to the nation's well-being and to full employment, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in calling for an all-out drive to keep young people in school.

The council specifically urged all young people to go back to the classrooms in September and continue their education at least through high school. It called on educators to intensify efforts to keep young people in school by re-evaluating programs to make certain they realistically meet the students' needs.

Congress and state and local governments can play their roles in the campaign to stem the tide of dropouts by providing the resources needed by the educational system and specifically by a greatly expanded program of federal aid to education, it declared.

The labor movement, the council pledged, will continue its "unremitting fight to make sure that jobs will be available for all who are willing and able to fill them."

The council noted that more than 30 percent of students who enroll in ninth grade drop out before finishing high school and that in cities such as Washington and Cleveland the rate is 50 percent.

"In neighborhoods largely made up of low-income and minority groups, the rate approaches 100 percent," the council said.

Government studies disclose that "more than 28 percent of the dropouts are jobless" and this does not include an even greater number who are not working and not even looking for work, the statement said. Dropouts are not confined to the less intelligent, the council noted, adding that surveys indicate 54 percent of the dropouts are of average intelligence or better.

Impasse Sighted

Full employment, the council concluded, will be even harder to achieve if millions of young persons lack the basic education required to meet the "ever-rising specifications of an automated economy."

In other actions the council:

- Urged the House Labor Committee to open a broad-scale investigation into the practices of private employment agencies covering fees and charges, misrepresentation of job opportunities, the listing of "exploitive job offers," and tie-ins between agencies and employers intended to exploit referred workers.

The council noted the support of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce for the private fee-charging agencies' attack on the public employment service and declared the chamber would be better advised to help the agencies by insisting they follow fair business practices "and eliminate the excessive fees, gouging kickbacks that have been shown to flourish."

A well-equipped and staffed public employment service is indispensable to the best placement, training and utilization of the nation's manpower, the council asserted.

- Called for prompt enactment of bills carrying out Pres. Kennedy's program for changes in the nation's immigration policies that would eliminate "unequal standards" for potential immigrants.

Formula Stresses Skills

The President's program, the council observed, would substitute for the national origins system a formula keyed to skills, family relationships and the priority of applications. This program, covering a five-year period of transition, is "moderate and fair," the council declared.

- Hailed the workers of British Guiana "for their courageous and successful resistance to the attempts of Premier Jagan to destroy the freedom of the democratic labor movement of that country and pledged the AFL-CIO's continued support for the trades union council there.
- Condemned constitutional violations in Haiti by the Duvalier regime and reaffirmed the "worker's basic right to freedom and to enjoy the full fruits of his labor." Continued political repression and widespread corruption are robbing workers of their rights on the island, the statement said.
- Reaffirmed its support for resistance by Cuban workers to Premier Castro's attempt to "silence the Cuban labor movement," and declared its "strongest condemnation" of the "tragic betrayal" of the nation's "promising popular revolution." Everything that Cuba's progressive trade union movement had achieved has been abolished by the Castro regime and the regime is now instituting work norms and lower wage scales, the council noted.
- Deplored the continuation of "an authoritarian regime in Paraguay" and the stagnation of the nation's economic and social progress.
- Urged passage of a Senate bill to make Oct. 12, Columbus Day, a federal legal holiday. This would constitute, the council said, a long overdue tribute to "the discoverer of America" and would mark "the true birthday of the New World."
- Voted funds for the Truman Library, the League for Industrial Democracy and the New York Shakespeare Festival for its tour of southern high school areas.

Complaints Off Sharply Under Disputes Plan

Unity House, Pa.—A sharp decline in the number of complaints and the continued success of early mediation efforts highlighted AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's report to the Executive Council on the federation's internal disputes plan.

In the seven and one-half month period of 1963 covered by the report, only 54 complaints were filed compared to 155 for the entire year 1962.

Of the total of 209 cases filed since adoption of the plan in December 1961 123, or 60 percent, have been resolved by mediation and 18 cases are still in the mediation process.

Impartial Umpire David Cole has made determinations in 55 cases and in 40 of them found that the constitutional provisions governing internal disputes were violated.

The Executive Council subcommittee set up to handle appeals has denied 19 of the appeals submitted to it and referred one to the full council.

Eleven complaints of noncompliance with the determinations of the impartial umpire were received by the subcommittee, which achieved compliance in six cases and found noncompliance in four. One case is pending.

The Journeymen Stonecutters Association and the National Maritime Union are in noncompliance in two cases each and sanctions required by the plan are in effect against them.

The council discussed and approved recommendations of a special subcommittee on revision of the plan to be put before the federation's New York City convention in November for final action.

ACWA Wins Plant After 15-Year Try

New Bedford, Mass.—The Bristol Clothing Co., Inc., a 15-year holdout against union organizing drives, has recognized the Clothing Workers and agreed to a three-year contract raising wages and benefits by 35 cents an hour.

The initial contract calls for 17-cent hikes in the wage rates and 18 cents in fringe benefits including seven paid holidays, paid vacations up to three weeks and other standard features of ACWA contracts in the men's and boys' clothing field.

Also provided are insurance, welfare and retirement benefits; a union shop, dues checkoff, and use of the union label.

The ACWA organizing campaign was started at the request of Bristol employes. Management agreed to negotiate a contract after a card check showed a majority of the 100 employes at the boys' clothing plant had authorized the union to represent them.

The drive was conducted by ACWA Business Agent Diana Nunes and Organizer Emanuele Vitale.

Home Peace Corps Booklet Distributed

Los Angeles—The Los Angeles County Federation of Labor has sent to its affiliates a brochure prepared by the President's Study Group on a National Service Program, sponsor of a proposed new service group of youth.

NAMED Illinois director of labor by Gov. Otto Kerner (D.), John E. Cullerton will assume his new duties Sept. 1. Cullerton, executive director of the Chicago Joint Board, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and of Chicago area COPE, also is a Chicago AFL-CIO executive board member. He succeeds Robert R. Donnelly of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who resigned for health reasons.

'Callous Indifference' Charged:

Union Hits Armour On Plant Closings

Chicago—Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers has accused Armour & Co. of "callous indifference" to the needs of laid-off employes and charged that its widely publicized joint committee on automation is a "public relations fraud."

The big meat packing firm, Helstein charged, has closed at least one plant a year in a steady program of job slaughter and abolished nearly 30,000 jobs while its profits spiraled upward. For the first half of its present fiscal year, Armour profits rose 7.4 percent to about $7.5 million, he said.

Publicity 'Gimmick'

The union is convinced that the Armour Automation Committee, set up in 1959 with representatives from management, the UPWA and the Meat Cutters to "study" the effect of automated plants on workers, has become a "fraud perpetrated upon the American public" and Armour "obviously has regarded this committee as a publicity gimmick," said Helstein, who added:

"It might have been expected that an employer truly concerned with the plight of thousands of employes already displaced, and thousands more slated for a like fate, would have come into the Automation Committee with a frank discussion of its plans and a meaningful search for ways and means of cushioning the harsh impact of those plans and promoting maximum retention of employment" for its workers.

Instead, the UPWA president declared, Armour launched a four-point program that has caused distress and concern to its employes, as follows:

- Armour practices "complete secrecy and evasion" in building new replacement plants. In place of joint discussion of mutual problems there is "concealment" followed by chance discovery.
- In the older plants Armour has "indulged a ghoulish desire for profits" by playing on workers' fear of shutdowns in an effort to undercut contract terms. The firm has "engaged in a subversion of the collective bargaining process" by forcing employes in some plants, as at St. Joseph, Mo., to accept weakened standards for fear of a closedown.
- Armour has made clear its intention to staff new plants with new employes "without accumulated rights, on lower pay scales, and if possible without union representation or contract protection."
- In transferring workers, Armour has "played cynical cruel games with its employes." In some cases it has offered transfers to plants already slated for shutdown. Some employes have moved at management's insistence only to find themselves "in a state of layoff from the first day of their arrival in a strange community."

Pretext for Firings

Helstein asserted also that Armour is using the relocation of plants to discharge as many of its present employes as possible.

He cited these instances: at West Point, Neb., Armour has rejected the union's plea that 71 jobs at a new plant be made available to some of the 1,100 Armour workers who lost their jobs in a plant closing at Sioux City, Ia., only 40 miles away; at Kansas City, Armour is demanding that workers give up all contract protection if they move from an older plant to a small new sausage plant four miles away.

The UPWA represents 10,000 workers in more than a dozen Armour plants. The current contract expires in September.

In Alaska, It Seems, Race Just Isn't Very Important

Sorting out American workers by their ethnic backgrounds is a job for anthropologists, not trade unions, a Carpenters local in Anchorage, Alaska, has told the government.

Replying to a questionnaire from the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity which asks all unions for the number of American Indians, Negroes, Orientals, Puerto Ricans and Spanish Americans in each local, Carpenters Local 1281 of Anchorage replied:

"This local union does not have, nor has it ever had, any interest in an individual's ethnical background, his religion or political beliefs. Our organization is composed of a very composite group, perhaps reflecting almost all of the major racial strains of the world.

"We are unable to completely fill out the form on an honest basis as we are not anthropologists and we do not know when a member ceases to be a Negro, an Indian, an Oriental, a member of a minority group or any of the other designations in the form. For example, the treasurer of this local union, to the best of his knowledge, is part Negro, part Indian, part Jewish, part Irish and has perhaps a little Swedish blood. Another of our officers is roughly in the same category. We do not desire to dissect the poor devils and put part of them in each one of these columns.

"We have many members who apparently have negroid blood. In fact, some of the experts state that there is only one person in 1 million in the world today that does not have negroid blood. We have a number of Alaskan aboriginals with Eskimo and Indian blood mixed with Russian, Scandinavian, Chinese and other so-called races whose sexual urges resulted in cross-breeding. We also have a number of members who came from the Hawaiian Islands. It appears that their ancestors were both promiscuous and prolific. We have at least one member from the British West Indies, ancestry unknown to us. We have one member from Cuba who speaks Spanish, looks like a Norwegian and drinks like an Irishman. We have several members newly arrived from European countries with names that God could not pronounce and whose ethnical origin is unknown to us.

"Fortunately, we are a long way from Governors Wallace and Barnett and a man's race is none of our business. To quote Mark Twain, 'We do not allow one part of a man to out-vote the other 15 parts,' as they do in the deep South."

Court Upholds Union Aid in 'Comp' Cases

Columbus, O.—Union representatives may continue to help members process workmen's compensation claims as a free service under a recent decision by the Ohio Supreme Court.

The court ruled that a private firm of non-lawyers in Cleveland could no longer handle compensation claim cases for a fee. To do so, it said, would be treading on the jurisdiction of lawyers.

However the court, along lines suggested in a "friend of the court" brief submitted by the State AFL-CIO, specifically narrowed its decision to apply only to services provided for a fee.

The effect was to leave unchallenged the common practices of local unions in helping members prepare workmen's compensation claims and, where necessary, representing them before the Bureau of Workmen's Compensation and the state's Industrial Commission.

The Supreme Court ruling held that only attorneys may give "advice or services if a fee for such advices or services is to be received from or charged against the one having such a claim."

In narrowing the issue to services for which a charge is made, the Supreme Court suggested that a lower court injunction preventing the Cleveland firm from continuing to handle compensation claims be modified to specify that the ban was limited to services performed for a fee.

Base Pay To Rise 10c For 3.6 Million

(Continued from Page 1)

ered workers at a $1.25-an-hour minimum and 40 hours maximum as of Sept. 3, 1965.

Workers in industries covered by the wage-hour law before the amendments went into force had their minimum wage increased from $1 an hour to $1.15 in 1961, with the pay floor scheduled to rise to $1.25 an hour this year. Of the approximately 24 million workers in these industries, the Labor Dept. estimates that about 2.6 million currently are paid less than $1.25 an hour and thus will benefit from this year's increase.

The 3.6 million newly covered workers include 2.2 million in retail and service work, 1 million in construction, 100,000 seamen, 93,000 in suburban and interurban transit, 86,000 employed by gasoline service stations, 33,000 in fish processing, and 30,000 telephone operators.

The total also includes about 100,000 previously exempt jobs in firms where other workers were already covered and which do $1 million or more in annual sales.

While the amendments were hailed by labor as the greatest advance in wage-hour protections since enactment of the FLSA in 1938, they nevertheless left large groups of low-paid workers uncovered, excluding among other firms hotels, motels, restaurants, hospitals, nursing homes, auto and farm implement dealers, seasonal amusement operations, movies and small retail establishments.

Touted Hospital Plan Hikes Cost for Aged

One of the loudest arguments against social security old-age hospital insurance is beginning to backfire on opponents of the Kennedy Administration's plan, as contained in the King-Anderson bill.

The recent development of statewide "over 65" health plans by pools of commercial insurance companies was hailed by King-Anderson foes as proof that private enterprise could do the job and a government program was unnecessary. The argument, however, ignored the high premiums.

Now, the first such statewide plan, Connecticut 65, has announced that its premium rates are not enough and has applied to the state insurance commissioner to raise them from the present $17 to $21 for combined basic and major medical coverage, an increase of more than 23.5 percent.

The resulting $42 monthly cost for a husband and wife would be nearly a fifth of the median income of the nation's elderly couples.

In addition, an older plan—Fund/65-Plus $10,000, offered by the Fireman's Fund—also has announced a rate increase, effective Aug. 1, because of a "substantial increase in benefit payments" and "other factors of increasing cost." The monthly rate for the basic Fund/65 plan would remain at $6.50, but the premium for combined coverage would go from the present $11 to $15.75, more than doubling the cost of the major medical portion.

Increases Detailed

Connecticut 65, in seeking increases of $2 each in present premiums—$10 a month for major medical and $7 for basic coverage—also proposed a $3 increase in daily benefits, now $12 under the basic plan and $15 under the major medical plan (against an average daily hospitalization cost of $35 for the country). Another change would increase maximum major medical coverage for a lifetime from $10,000 to $15,000.

The big reason for seeking the rate hike, however, was that the high incidence of sickness, accidents and hospitalizations among elderly persons had contributed to a deficit of $555,000 for the first 15 months of the plan's operation at the old premium levels.

Connecticut 65, run by a pool of 32 companies, also is seeking to abandon a lower premium plan providing reduced major medical coverage for $7.50 a month or combined coverage for $14.50. An official explained that while claims experience had actually been more favorable than on the higher-premium plan, there were "misunderstandings" because some purchasers thought they were entitled to more benefits than the lower-cost plan provided.

A recent Washington Post article by Eve Edstrom pointed to another inconsistency in the arguments against King-Anderson. Many of the statewide plans, the article noted, are appealing to sons, daughters and other family members to enroll their aged relatives in the plans.

Foes of the social security approach, the Post article noted, "have said it is unfair to burden today's workers with social security taxes to pay for the care of the nation's 17.5 million aged. Yet not only are some sons and daughters picking up the tab for the new insurance policies but it appears that other means to subsidize the plans will be necessary to maintain their solvency."

Timber Pact Extended To Additional 40,000

Portland, Ore.—The 30.5-cent an hour wage settlement negotiated by the Woodworkers and the Lumber & Sawmill Workers with "Big Six" employers has been accepted, subject to referendum, for an additional 40,000 workers by the Timber Operators Council.

Members of the two unions employed by TOC firms in California, Oregon and Washington are voting to accept or reject the settlement, with ballots due for counting Aug. 27.

The agreement follows the pattern set by the unions and the six big employers recently and signals the end of a dispute that triggered a strike against two of the Big Six early in June. The pattern, approved by an overwhelming majority of Big Six employes, provides:

- Wage hikes of 15 cents an hour this year, another 6 cents next year, and an additional 6 cents in 1965.
- Adjustments averaging 2 cents an hour for skilled worker classifications.
- A formula under which travel time will be paid to loggers from camp to bush at an additional average cost of 1.5 cents per hour.

A handful of Woodworkers—boom men and rafters—stayed on strike after the general settlement and a few locals of the Lumber & Sawmill Workers, affiliated with the Carpenters, also were holding out, but settlements were expected soon.

A strike against the U.S. Plywood Corp. and the St. Regis Paper Co. began the woods exodus June 6. Some 29,000 workers were on strike or locked out at the peak of the movement. The unions have called the settlement a "tremendous victory" for the workers.

Job Shifts Rare, Survey Shows

The average American man who has a job has worked for the same employer for about 5.5 years, according to a Labor Dept. survey which showed that most workers change their employment rarely.

The average job tenure for women was three years, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said the study showed. About 20 million of the 66 million workers employed in January 1963, or 30 percent, had held the same jobs for more than 10 years, with 6.5 million in the same jobs since before World War II.

Wirtz said the survey showed that generally men had more job seniority than women, and that with both sexes tenure increased with age. Men 25 to 34 years old averaged 3.5 years in their current jobs, he said, compared to 8 years at age 55 to 64. For women, the averages were 2 years in the younger group and 8 years in the older.

Detroit NLRB Chief Is Granted Leave

Thomas Roumell, regional director of the National Labor Relations Board in Detroit, has been granted leave of absence to become director of the Michigan Employment Security Commission.

NLRB Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman said Jerome H. Brooks, regional attorney in Detroit for the past three years, will serve as acting regional director effective Sept. 1.

FIRST PLACE WINNERS in the annual apprentice contest held by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters at Purdue University receive congratulations from Peter T. Schoemann (right), president of the union. The victors and their classifications, from left, are Lawrence T. Shepard, Local 669, Washington, D. C., sprinkler fitter; Roland A. Besserud, Local 130, Chicago, plumber, and Gerald Dowling, Local 420, Philadelphia, pipefitter-steamfitter.

Cuts In Unemployment Benefits Make '63 'Worst Year' For Jobless

Legislatures in 12 states this year cut back jobless benefits in the face of the continuing unemployment crisis, making 1963 "the worst year for the unemployed" since the start of the compensation program in 1937, an AFL-CIO spokesman declared in a network radio interview.

This new state trend, developing in the face of a 150-percent rise in long-term unemployment over the last five years, makes all the more urgent the need for passage of the McCarthy-King bill to extend the duration and improve the levels of jobless benefits under federal standards, said Raymond Munts, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

Munts was interviewed by Joseph Gambatese of Nation's Business and Dick Preston of Scripps-Howard Newspapers on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program carried by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Munts noted that in recent years the tendency among legislatures has been to revise unemployment compensation benefits every few years by adding about $4 to the maximum benefit level and several weeks to the benefit period while tightening eligibility requirements.

"But this year presents a different picture," he observed. "This is the first year that weekly benefit amounts have been cut and the number of weeks reduced" even while "the trend to eliminate some unemployed workers by tighter qualifying requirements continues."

In the spring and summer of 1963, he noted, eight states reduced either the weekly benefit amount or the duration of benefits—or both—and some of these, plus four others, eliminated a number of the unemployed from the law's protection. Only two states—North Dakota and Arkansas—made permanent improvements in their benefit ceilings, and in both there were offsetting cutbacks, he said.

Munts suggested that many factors contributed to the trend, including conservative election victories in some states last fall, the decline in reserves since World War II, continued under-financing of the program, and the lack of understanding among rural legislators.

Problem Complex

"It is a very complex problem," he said. "Many states admit that they have been under-financing the program in order to attract industry, so competition between states is another contributing factor."

He pointed out that one purpose of the Administration bill to expand and extend the jobless benefit program, introduced by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.), is to "shore up" the financing by increasing the taxable wage base to $5,200 a year from the $3,000 ceiling that has stood since 1939.

The McCarthy-King bill, he noted, also would:

- Provide up to 26 additional weeks of federally-financed benefits for the long-term unemployed after they have exhausted the first 26 weeks of benefits under state programs. This would be underwritten by an increase in the net federal tax of three-tenths of 1 percent.
- Establish minimum standards for state benefits of at least 50 percent of wages at the start and rising to about two-thirds of wages, limiting the credits available to states which do not comply.
- Provide for equalization grants—"a kind of re-insurance program"—to states with especially high benefits.
- Expand coverage to include about 3 million workers employed by small firms and non-profit organizations previously exempt.

Asked if the result of the bill would be to make jobless insurance a "federal program," Munts declared:

"The program now is federal in a very fundamental sense. We wouldn't have it if the federal government had not levied a nationwide unemployment tax. . . . I think that standards or requirements of competence should go with handouts of federal funds."

Munts suggested that the trend toward cutbacks of state benefits "will further aggravate the growing feeling of national unrest" in the current civil rights crisis.

"The frequency and persistence of long-term unemployment, particularly among Negroes facing job discrimination, is serious enough," he observed, "but it becomes a social calamity when jobless benefits are also choked off. Employers may want a cheap unemployment insurance program, but society is going to have to pay in one way or another."

He noted that "some of the worst unemployment insurance laws are in those states with a high proportion of Negroes," but added:

"Wherever they live, Negroes are hurt more than whites by the shortcomings in jobless pay simply because they are out of work more often than whites and for reasons beyond their control. . . .

"Some day we will properly use the powers of government to obtain fair and full employment. Meanwhile, from the workers' point of view, whether white or colored, job opportunity is indissolubly linked with wage insurance.

Publishers' Aid Sought For Kingsport Strikers

The Intl. Allied Printing Trades Association has called on the 1,500 members of the American book publishing industry to assist in settling a strike of five unions against the Kingsport Press in Kingsport, Tenn., and to help raise the standards of the industry.

Association officers, in an open letter to the book publishing industry, pointed out that 1,600 employes have been on strike since Mar. 11 against the "archaic labor policies" of the firm's management.

Asserting that most publishers today "accept their employes as important partners" and their bargaining reflects this thinking in increased wages, reduced hours and improved benefits, the letter said "this is not so with the management of the Kingsport Press."

Association Pres. James H. Sampson and Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud said the unions involved intend to give extensive publicity to "this struggle of the workers for fair treatment."

Since publishers would be interested in the direction such a publicity campaign might take, they said, the unions "invite discussion" and "welcome any suggestions or influence" toward solution of "this conflict of present-day thinking as opposed to that of the industrial dark ages."

Unions affiliated with the association are the Printing Pressmen, Bookbinders, Typographers, Stereotypers and Photo Engravers. The strikers at Kingsport are from the Machinists and all the other listed unions except the Photo Engravers.

Anti-Bias Stand Reiterated:

Pipe Trades Reject Apprentice Quotas

The Plumbers, their employers and joint committees on apprentice training "subscribe wholeheartedly" to recent policy statements by building trades presidents on non-discriminatory employment policies but will "accept no dictation from any government agency" on standards not based on the qualifications of applicants for training, they said in a statement.

The statement, approved by five signatories at a meeting in Lafayette, Ind., where officers of the groups attended the 10th National Apprenticeship Contest last week at Purdue University, said the union and its employers have been conducting an apprentice training program for 38 years and that the program always has been a voluntary one, with the sole admission standard the qualifications of prospective trainees without regard for race, color or creed.

The signers, asserting that Dept. of Labor Apprenticeship regulations announced last month would force them to adopt racial quotas in their training programs, said:

"We maintain only one standard for admission of apprentices—qualification. That is the way it will remain. We reject any imposition of quotas based on racial or population percentages by any government agency or private pressure group.

"We consider quotas undemocratic, unreasonable, unwarranted and unworkable. Compulsory quotas would destroy the educational and training program we have built up during the past 38 years and plunge our industry into chaos."

The "joint policy statement" was issued by the general executive board of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; the National Joint Plumbing Apprenticeship Committee; the executive committee of the National Association of Plumbing-Heating-Cooling Contractors; the National Joint Steam Fitters-Pipe Fitters Apprenticeship Committee; and the National Mechanical Contractors Association.

Race Bias Denied

Pointing out that the union never has excluded minority groups from membership or apprenticeship, the statement continued:

"We have never asked or kept any record of an applicant's or member's race, color or creed. There is only one standard for entrance . . . and that is the man's qualifications.

"We do not believe in rejecting an applicant because of his race, color or creed and we likewise cannot be expected to admit an applicant because of his race, color or creed. We reiterate, the sole standard, the only fair standard, is the applicant's qualifications."

The statement said the union "subscribed wholeheartedly" to the program for non-discriminatory employment policies adopted June 21 by the presidents of unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

On Aug. 8, a special joint committee of the Construction Industry Joint Conference, representing unions and employers, adopted a supplementary statement of policy to which the union said it also subscribes. The policy, with rules of procedure under which aggrieved applicants for apprenticeship could appeal, provides that in most branches of the industry, each local joint apprenticeship committee, would establish an appeals Board comprised of a labor and employer representative, and a third public person jointly selected by them.

This declaration, providing for "continuing informal consultation with the Secretary of Labor and other government officers," was accepted by Sec. W. Willard Wirtz Aug. 9 as a "constructive step," the statement said, adding "He agreed to meet and consult with the CIJC committee, of which Pres. Peter Schoemann is a member, regularly on the second Friday of each month.

"We believe that such consultation and cooperation can be quite helpful—if exercised," it observed. "We note, however, that the government's standards for contractor compliance have been suspended pending further review, whereas the apprenticeship regulations . . . already have been issued as an official set of government regulations, despite our protests.

"We believe this was a short-sighted act. We are convinced that it will be impossible for most joint apprenticeship committees in most trades to comply with these regulations."

The statement signers emphasized their determination to "go on operating our apprenticeship system as we have before" even though penalties are imposed. Local joint apprenticeship programs which do not comply with the new regulations can be de-registered.

Risk Accepted

"This is a risk we must face, painful as it is to be afflicted with sanctions by a government agency we helped to create," the statement went on. "We also face another risk—that sanctions will prevent our employers from engaging in federally financed construction and our members from being employed on such projects. We have calculated this risk and we have no other choice than to take it. We are convinced that our program is fair and just and successful.

"We will not submit to any government attempt to ruin it by destroying its integrity."

House Urged To Defeat 'Bracero' Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

set up a program to ensure that an adequate number of domestic workers would be available for next year's crops.

When this failed on a 45-45 tie, he dropped that clause and won 44-43 approval of the balance of the amendment.

All-out supporters of continuing the bracero program complained bitterly that the amendment would, as Sen. Gordon Allott (R-Colo.) put it, "make the bill practically worthless." They expressed the hope that the House will adopt an extension bill without the added reforms.

AID Orders Hit $175.4 Million

Procurement orders financed under the foreign aid program during the first seven months of 1963 totaled $175.4 million, according to a summary by the Agency for Intl. Development, and went to firms in 47 of the 50 states.

Orders worth $1 million or more were placed in 25 states, the summary showed, and covered a wide variety of industrial and farm products needed by developing nations. The purchases are financed by U.S. loans or grants, with procurement directed to U.S. suppliers.

The largest share of the orders, $35.4 million, was placed in New York State. Hawaii, Nevada and North Dakota received no orders.

Civil Rights Moment of Decision in '63

Bipartisan Support Necessary To Obtain Kennedy Legislation

Enactment of an effective civil rights program in 1963 is a top priority on the agenda of Congress because of a general agreement that it is essential to give meaning to American traditions of freedom, dignity, justice and opportunity for all our citizens.

In line with these traditions and in line with increasing protests and demonstrations against racial discrimination throughout the United States—particularly in Birmingham, Ala., in May 1963—Pres. Kennedy sent Congress both a special message and the draft of a strong, comprehensive civil rights bill. The AFL-CIO is also renewing the drive of organized labor in support of strong, effective civil rights action.

The broad civil rights program Kennedy proposed on June 19 is in line with long-standing AFL-CIO policy and with the policies of the former AFL and the former CIO before merger.

In 1939 Pres. Roosevelt set up a civil rights section in the Justice Dept. Civil rights planks have appeared in the platforms of both major political parties since 1944. In 1948 Pres. Truman submitted a 10-point civil rights program—including a Fair Employment Practices proposal—which failed to get approval in Congress.

In 1957 Congress enacted the first civil rights legislation since 1875. The law created the Civil Rights Commission, made possible establishment of a new Civil Rights Division in the Justice Dept., and authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctions against denial of voting rights.

In 1960 Congress enacted another civil rights law which authorizes judges to appoint referees to help qualified Negroes register and vote, and sets criminal penalties for bombing, bomb threats, and mob obstruction of court orders. In recent years, the fight for civil rights has centered on changing the Senate's filibuster protection, Rule 22, to cut off southern filibusters against civil rights legislation.

Kennedy Program

In his message to Congress on "Civil Rights and Job Opportunities," the President called for action on:

VOTING RIGHTS — The basic American right to vote in free elections is too often denied, particularly in the South. The President called for guarantees of equal voting rights in federal elections by permitting court-appointed voting referees in areas where less than 15 percent of the Negroes are registered and where a voting suit is pending in the courts, by abolishing discriminatory literacy tests, and by speeding action on voting rights suits in federal courts.

In some political jurisdictions, different tests are applied unfairly to different people trying to register to vote. The Administration proposal would forbid such discriminatory tests and establish a presumption of literacy for people who have completed a sixth-grade education.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS — Denial of equal access to public accommodations is clearly unfair. The Kennedy Administration bill cites the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment and invokes the powers of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution to prohibit discrimination in public accommodations such as hotels, motels, restaurants, stores, movie theaters, and other places of public entertainment.

Retail stores and eating places would be covered if they "substantially affect" interstate commerce.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION — The Administration bill would authorize court action by the Attorney General to speed school desegregation. It would also authorize technical and financial assistance to school authorities engaged in desegregation voluntarily or as a result of court action.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS — To help ease tensions, to help solve interracial disputes through counciliation and cooperation, the President proposed a new independent community relations service. He also called for a four-year extension of the Civil Rights Commission with expansion of its functions to serve as a clearing house on civil rights information, advice, and technical assistance.

FEDERAL FUNDS — The President asked authority for the U.S. government to withhold federal grants, loans, or any other kind of financial assistance from any activity or program in which racial discrimination occurs. This would apply to federal-state-local grant programs and to federal contractors and subcontractors.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES—Kennedy endorsed "equal employment opportunity" legislation, often called an FEP proposal because of its similarity to the Truman Fair Employment Practices proposals. Such legislation to prevent discrimination in hiring would apply to employers, to employment agencies and to labor unions.

The Administration bill would give permanent legal status to the Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, now operating by executive order with Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson as chairman. This committee seeks to break down racial barriers in hiring practices of federal agencies and federal contractors.

The President made it clear that economic growth is necessary to equal job opportunities for all — Negroes and whites. He also outlined steps needed to upgrade workers' skills through education and training for available jobs.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified July 17 in general support of the Kennedy omnibus civil rights bill before a House Judiciary subcommittee and suggested several strengthening amendments.

Meany Testified

On voting rights, Meany declared that a sixth-grade education should be conclusive rather than presumptive proof of literacy — otherwise voter registration of qualified Negroes would be challenged and delayed indefinitely.

He reiterated AFL-CIO support for federal registrars in areas of flagrant registration abuses and endorsed a bill proposed by Rep. Samuel S. Stratton (D-N. Y.) to reduce the congressional delegations of states denying voting rights. (The letter was not included in the Administration proposals.)

On denial to Negroes of access to public accommodations—"service that is available to others, regardless of their character, as long as they are white"—"it is an incredible and intolerable state of affairs," Meany declared.

On school desegregation, Meany said the Attorney General should have authority to initiate court action without waiting for written complaints, as is provided in the administration proposal.

"Such suits are beyond the financial means of most private individuals," he said. "And there are places in this country, shameful though it is, where a Negro could file such a suit only in the face of inevitable economic reprisals and at the real peril of his life."

After supporting the Community Relations Service and the Civil Rights Commission, Meany expressed "unqualified support" for the Kennedy request for authority to withhold federal funds from programs in which discrimination occurs.

"There is nothing unfair about this," he said. "Those who take the federal government's money are simply required to obey the federal law."

In commenting on Kennedy's "equal employment opportunity" proposals, Meany repeated AFL-CIO concern about high unemployment and AFL-CIO support for FEP legislation.

"First, we need the statutory support of the federal government to carry out the unanimously adopted principles of the AFL-CIO," he declared.

"Second, we want federal legislation because we are tired of being the whipping-boy in this area."

Sanctions Urged

He insisted that sanctions and penalties should be imposed against discriminating employers as well as against discriminating labor organizations.

In the Senate, Kennedy's omnibus civil rights bill was introduced by Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and a bipartisan group of 46 Senators. This omnibus bill, S. 1731, was referred to the Dixiecrat-dominated Senate Judiciary Committee, a graveyard for civil rights bills.

However, Mansfield and Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) sponsored another bill, S. 1732, embodying only the public accommodations section of the omnibus bill, which was referred to the Senate Commerce Committee, of which Magnuson is chairman.

A number of FEP proposals —including S. 773 by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), S. 1210 by Sen. Clifford Case (R-N. J.) and S. 1937 by Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.)—were referred to the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee. Clark's Labor subcommittee held hearings in July on these proposals, but the full Labor Committee, headed by Chairman Lister Hill (D-Ala.), may never be given a chance to approve FEP legislation.

In the House Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, introduced the Administration's omnibus civil rights bill, H.R. 7152, and completed subcommittee public hearings early in August.

On July 22 the House Education & Labor Committee approved an "equal employment opportunity" FEP bill, H.R. 405, sponsored by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.). Celler, Roosevelt and other House liberals agreed they would try to add such an FEP provision to the omnibus rights bill.

Biptarisan Support Needed

Bipartisan support will be necessary to get the omnibus civil rights bill through the Rules Committee to the floor of the House for a vote. Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) heads the committee consisting of 10 Democrats and five Republicans. Five of the Democrats are from states south of the Mason-Dixon line; how the Republican members will vote is still unrevealed.

If the Rules Committee fails to report the civil rights bill out for floor action, supporters may press a "discharge petition"—which requires signatures of a majority of the 435 House members—to bring the bill to a vote without Rules Committee approval.

Without broad bipartisan support on the floor of the House and the Senate, effective civil rights legislation in 1963 is doomed. In the Senate, Southerners hope to talk civil rights legislation to death. To stop such a filibuster, two-thirds of all senators voting—67 of the full 100 senators—must vote for "cloture."

The AFL-CIO is urging its affiliates and friends to write and wire their congressmen to vote for the omnibus civil rights bill and to write and wire their Senators to vote for "cloture" and to vote for the omnibus civil rights bill.

Fact Sheets On Key Issues

The AFL-CIO News is publishing on this page another in a series of Fact Sheets on key issues before the 88th Congress.

This Fact Sheet is on civil rights. Previous Fact Sheets covered tax policy, federal spending and unemployment.

Reprints of these Fact Sheets are available from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Kennedy Sees Rights Basically a Moral Issue

"We are confronted primarily with a moral issue. It is as old as the scriptures and is as clear as the American Constitution. The heart of the question is whether all Americans are to be afforded equal rights and equal opportunities, whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated.

"If an American, because his skin is dark, cannot eat lunch in a restaurant open to the public, if he cannot send his children to the best public school available, if he cannot vote for the public officials who represent him, if, in short, he cannot enjoy the full and free life which all of us want, then who among us would be content to have the color of his skin changed and stand in his place?

"Who among us would then be content with the counsels of patience and delay? One hundred years of delay have passed since Pres. Lincoln freed the slaves, yet their heirs, their grandsons, are not fully free.

"They are not yet freed from the bonds of injustice. They are not yet freed from social and economic oppression, and this nation, for all its hopes and all its boasts, will not be fully free until all its citizens are free.

"We preach freedom around the world, and we mean it, and we cherish our freedom here at home, but are we to say to the world, and much more importantly to each other, that this is a land of the free except for the Negroes; that we have no second-class citizens except Negroes; that we have no class or caste system, no ghettoes, no master race except with respect to Negroes?

". . . We face, therefore, a moral crisis as a country and as a people. It cannot be met by repressive police action. It cannot be left to increased demonstrations in the streets. It cannot be quieted by token moves or talk. It is a time to act in the Congress, in your state and local legislative body and, above all, in all of our daily lives."

—Pres. Kennedy, June 11, 1963.

Meany Urges Backing For Civil Rights Fight

"The bedrock of every religion throughout the world is the brotherhood of man. Trade unions were founded on the principle that every man must unite with his fellow man so that each may achieve freedom and justice.

"It is the American ideal that each man shall be judged on his own ability. The idea of equal opportunity is woven throughout the fabric of our history, throughout the Declaration of Independence and throughout the Constitution.

"The history of our country is a history of continual striving toward this ideal.

"That history shows that agitation for civil liberties brought our Bill of Rights, that agitation for a voice in the government brought women's suffrage, that agitation for individual rights over property rights brought recognition of the rights of labor to organize and bargain collectively.

"Now we are at another crossroads. Another group of our citizens is agitating for equal opportunities for Negroes.

"We must not turn our backs on our record of democratic progress. We must assure each of our citizens equal opportunity in our American society."

—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, July 25, 1963.

Consumer Gouge

NO MATTER WHAT the language, "fair trade" or "quality stabilization" legislation to give manufacturers absolute power over retail prices on branded or trademarked articles means higher prices for consumers.

At a time when the national consciousness has been awakened to consumer protection legislation—prescription drugs, packaging, interest rates, etc.—a measure that could possibly cost consumers more than $14 billion a year in higher prices is quietly moving through the legislative machinery.

The House Commerce Committee has voted out a bill called a "quality stabilization" measure that is nothing more than a new version of a "fair trade" bill, or as properly described in testimony by the AFL-CIO, "a federal resale price maintenance bill." The measure is now before the House Rules Committee.

A Senate Commerce subcommittee is currently holding hearings on a similar measure, designed, its proponents say, to aid small business. Analyses of the "fair trade" approach by labor, consumer and federal agencies opposed to the measure disclose that the full impact of such legislation would be to injure and weaken small business while extracting higher prices from consumers.

As to consumers, a Justice Dept. survey shows that in states with "fair trade" laws consumers pay from 19 to 27 percent higher prices than consumers in states without such laws.

The net result, therefore, would be to benefit manufacturers who produce branded products as well as private label goods in their factories under the same conditions and cost factors. The current state of business and industry profits—zooming to all-time highs for 1963—makes the case finally that higher consumer prices and injury to small business are too great a cost to pay to insure higher profit margins.

Why Profits Are Jumping

AN ENTERPRISING REPORTER for the New York Herald Tribune has come up with a basic explanation of the record-shattering profits being racked up by American industry: "labor costs are going up only two-thirds as fast as productivity."

Bigger profits are ahead, says Joseph R. Slevin, national economics editor of the Herald Tribune.

"The earnings picture is favorable because productivity is rising much more rapidly than labor costs," he explains. "The official hourly earnings figures indicate that wage costs have been going up less than 3 percent in manufacturing while productivity has been rising at the much faster 4.5 percent pace."

Slevin describes the output of American industrial workers in the past three years as "going up at the fastest pace since the end of World War II and it is showing no signs of slackening off."

The "hunch is," he notes, "that much of it is due to the huge investment that American industry has been making in technologically advanced equipment. More machines are turning out more goods—faster—with the result that the output volume is rising sharply for each worker on the payroll."

The productivity figures, he writes, jumped just under 4.5 percent in 1961, climbed another 4.5 percent in 1962 and are continuing to climb at the same rate this year. The average productivity increase rate during the 1947-57 decade was 2.8 percent and it was 3.4 percent for the five years that ended in 1961.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, August 24, 1963 No. 34

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

'You're Still a Wolf'

Government of Law or Men?:

How to Eat Your Cake, Etc., As Southern Conservatives Do

ONE OF THE FAVORITE cries of American conservatives is that the United States is a "government of law, not of men."

The statement is almost invariably used as an argument against liberals and liberal causes where property rights might possibly be subordinated to human rights. The "law" then becomes a majestic concept that must never be tampered with.

Liberals, of course, accept the majesty of the law willingly enough. The strange twist that is developing is that many of the very conservatives who love to cite the "law's majesty" are now furiously working to subvert that same "law" when it doesn't please them.

Take civil rights. In one breath southern conservatives are denouncing Negroes for "taking the law into their own hands" in their sit-downs and similar demonstrations. Yet these same southern conservatives are publicly defying the supreme law of the land against racial discrimination as laid down by the Supreme Court.

It is not merely rank and file citizens who are doing this. It is being done by governors, legislators, and in some cases, even lower courts which prefer to reflect the thinking of southern voters rather than the law as interpreted by higher courts.

Or take the case of Gov. Wallace of Alabama, who not only has sought to defy the Supreme Court through exclusion of Negroes from the state university, but now is threatening to defy the court on the issue of public observance of religion in the state's public schools. Wallace knows very well that the spectacle of a governor going to jail for saying a prayer in a public school is a demagogue's delight. Either he won't go to jail at all, as is likely, or he'll become a martyr and get himself reelected.

What is of infinitely deeper significance is the open defiance of the law. Is the governor picking and choosing those laws that he will obey or refuse to obey, and picking the laws that he wants other people to obey?

What is especially tragic in this situation is the all but complete silence on the part of leading southerners in Congress, the universities and even the churches in the face of such open undermining of the American legal system. Only here and there are there scattered voices recognizing that defiance of the law by public officials can only serve to open the floodgates of law defiance on a hundred other fronts.

Justice Arthur J. Goldberg, in a recent speech before the American Bar Association, sounded this solemn note of warning:

"The judicial process assumes peace. It rests upon unreserved acceptance of and compliance with the decisions of courts of last resort. Democratic government cannot endure if the law is defied by those in or out of authority."

GOLDBERG pointed out that the Supreme Court is not immune from criticism and that the Constitution itself can be amended if the American people so desire. But, until the Constitution is amended, to defy or obstruct the decision of the nation's highest court "is to deny the law itself."

"It is too late in our history to deny that the Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, is the supreme law of the land," he concluded.

When Pres. Roosevelt sought to "pack" the Supreme Court, the nation's conservatives—and even its liberals—rose in wrath against any attempt to tamper with the court and its crucial role in American life. Yet today these same conservatives would all but destroy the court by creating a monstrous "Court of the Union" composed of the chief justices of the 50 states to rule on issues affecting the federal government and the states.

It is perfectly clear, too, that the proponents of such a new high court would be supporting today's court if only it were issuing decisions to their liking.

Yet five states—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, South Carolina and Wyoming—have voted in favor of the "Court of the Union" idea as a means of preserving their own unjust legislative apportionment systems.

The ABA has gone on record as opposing the "Court of the Union" proposal as well as other constitutional amendments that would help destroy the American government as we know it. The votes weren't as overwhelming as perhaps they should have been, but the ABA's president summed it up clearly when he said:

"The rule of the law cannot mean one thing to a governor of a state who has taken a solemn oath to uphold the Constitution and another to a group of citizens."

Either we believe in a government of law or we don't. We can't have it both ways.

Morgan Says:

News Sometimes Makes Sense Even If the Dog Days Are Here

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

WE ARE IN THE MIDDLE of what city editors used to call the Dog Days, that intolerable period of summer heat which is supposed to drive other crazed people, along with mad dogs and Englishmen, into the noonday sun where they do all sorts of balmy things to inspire the feature writers but nothing important to affect history.

Morgan

One particular day, however, was a day like white wine, sparkling bright and cool and there were even overtones of sanity in the news. There were, naturally, glaring exceptions. The House Commerce Committee, which cut more than 70 percent of the funds from a bill to combat mental illness, ought to have its head examined, if any. And there is no ironclad guarantee, of course, that humanity won't finally wind up in a padded cell, or a cushioned bomb shelter—which may be the kind of security that those citizens who demand "foolproof" safeguards for everything are looking for.

But though it is true, as that eminent writing sociologist Harry Overstreet says, that the press has a vested interest in catastrophe, we in the trade ought, now and then, to give equal time to good news and there is a heartening if modest spate of it.

To begin with, potential relief for that area where we are proverbially hurt the most, the pocketbook, Congress is making more serious motions toward a tax cut and may even enact one, despite the skeptical forecasts by Ev and Charlie—possibly reflecting a fleck of jealousy on the lapel of the Republican leadership which is inclined to claim possessively that tax relief is a legislative exclusive with the GOP, not something to be monkeyed with by those big, reckless spenders, the Democrats.

The common man may not get as much of a tax cut as he is entitled to but a mighty blow has been struck on his behalf in New York. Despite heavy pressure from real estate and other private interests, the city Planning Commission has voted to set side 260 acres for a waterfront park at a place called Breezy Point, on a peninsula a little beyond Coney Island. "It is a great victory for the people," chimed the New York Times editorially. "And, except for the people, it would not have been won. . . . The power of public opinion . . . proved that you can fight City Hall."

It is not impossible to hope, the way the Senate hearings on the test ban treaty are going, that the atmosphere over Breezy Point and other parks in this and other lands may be just a little sweeter, just a little freer of radioactive fallout, than it might be if testing went on uncontrolled.

There are even some fascinating indications that political fallout from the radical right is being partially deactivated. The American Bar Association, in convention in Chicago, slapped down reactionaryism in its own ranks and condemned three irresponsible measures that would weaken the Supreme Court and tend to Balkanize the federal union. And in a man-bites-dog switch, a state judge, instead of attacking the nation's highest tribunal, had high praise at the ABA convention for recent Supreme Court decisions strengthening constitutional protections for those suspected of crime.

AS IF THIS weren't enough heady stuff, it is additionally indicated that the sale of some patent-medicine cure-alls against communism, purveyed from the pulpit and other rostrums, is falling off. The "Christian Crusade" of an Oklahoma preacher named Billy James Hargis has been sharply hit by hard times and has had to lay off nearly half its 50-man staff.

In reassuring defiance of racist Ross Barnett, governor of Mississippi, the state college board rejected any move to delay the graduation of Negro James Meredith from Ole Miss.

Perhaps the happiest Dog Day item of all involves a New Yorker with the unusual name of William Jacobus vanden Heuvel who, as a special assistant to Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy, almost single-handedly devised and put through a plan to open schools for some 1,700 Negro children in Prince Edward County, Va.

The county simply closed all its public schools in 1959 rather than desegregate them. White children were provided private instruction which the Negroes did not want and could not afford. The vanden Heuvel plan will be financed by private funds, too, but it has a biracial board of trustees, the faculty will be racially mixed and the ultimate goal still is a desegregated public school system.

The acme of racial amity appears to have been achieved in Africa at the University of Nigeria where a 20-year-old Brooklyn College man was elected vice president of the student body with a campaign slogan which ran: "Vote for the Fat White Boy." God's in His Heaven and though all's not completely right with the world, things could be worse.

Washington Reports:

Harriman Predicts Soviet Union Will Live Up to Test Ban Treaty

UNDERSEC. OF STATE Averell Harriman, who negotiated the nuclear test ban treaty with Soviet Russia, declared he believes the Soviet Union "has reasons for wanting to maintain this treaty."

"I may be wrong in that, but they keep the treaties that are in their interest to keep, and this is one of them."

Harriman made the statement in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on nearly 700 stations.

The former governor of New York, who was ambassador to the Soviet Union in the time of Stalin, asserted that although the Soviet Union could conceivably carry on tests in the outer atmosphere, "that would be enormously expensive."

"The general opinion," he said, is that such tests "would cost so much that they would not be worthwhile, particularly since they can test underground."

Harriman gave it as the opinion of scientists that U.S. development of anti-missile missile could continue.

"We have an adequate nuclear warhead, in the opinion of scientists I have talked to," he said. "We can continue to develop the anti-missile missile. Whatever disadvantage we may have as a result of the test ban, the Soviet Union would have the same, and there is no indication they are ahead of us in this."

HARRIMAN ASSERTED that the safeguards outlined by the Chiefs of Staff have been accepted by the Administration; continuation of underground testing "if Congress will appropriate the money; secondly, maintenance and expansion of our methods of detecting nuclear explosions which might be in violation of the treaty, keeping our laboratories alert to developments for testing in the outer atmosphere, if the treaty breaks down; and keeping our testing facilities in being so that we can move rapidly should the treaty break down."

Harriman said "the treaty would be inoperative, and we would be free to test at once," in case of a Soviet violation. He asserted also that nuclear weapons could be used "in case of aggression."

"Khrushchev wants to communize the world, and we want to see a free world; there is no compromise on that," he said. "But he has indicated since Cuba that he doesn't want to involve his country in nuclear war. He knows his country would be destroyed."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE "EV AND CHARLIE" SHOW is going to have direct competition, from now on, in formulating and announcing Republican attitudes on major issues of the coming presidential campaign. A new Critical Issues Council, named by the Republican Citizens Committee of the U.S., plans to conduct studies and publish reports dealing with defense policy, fiscal and financial policy, space operations and the nature of the Communist menace.

The Republican Citizens Committee was unwelcome to House and Senate GOP leaders when it was announced July 4, 1962, from former Pres. Eisenhower's farm near Gettysburg. It was unwelcome, equally, to the Republican National Committee headed by Rep. William E. Miller of New York.

The Critical Issues Council is likely to be even less welcome to Republican congressional leaders, whose long years in the opposition role have given them the ingrained belief that they are —or at least ought to be—the sole authorized interpreters of the Republican doctrine.

To a very real degree the congressional leaders do enunciate GOP policy, because policy is established effectively through the votes of Republican members of Congress rather than by after-thought declarations from self-appointed "citizens'" committees.

* * *

STILL, THE NEW CRITICAL ISSUES COUNCIL is clearly an "Eisenhower team" operation and has the blessing of the former President.

Its chairman is the general's brother, Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president of Johns Hopkins University. Its membership includes former Eisenhower Administration Cabinet members, agency heads, military advisers.

There are three onetime Cabinet members—Robert B. Anderson of Treasury, Marion B. Folsom of Health, Education & Welfare, James P. Mitchell of Labor. Lewis L. Strauss, former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, is a member, and so is Arthur F. Burns, Eisenhower's first chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

The entire operation—the overall committee and the Critical Issues Council—seems a direct heir of the Citizens Committees for Eisenhower-Nixon, which played a major role in fund-raising for the 1952 and 1956 presidential campaigns. It seems a direct descendant of the groups which successfully produced the nomination of Eisenhower in 1952 over the late Sen. Robert A. Taft.

The objective is almost undoubtedly to broaden Republican appeal to voters by making end runs around Sen. Dirksen and Rep. Halleck, the GOP floor leaders whose weekly press conferences have become known as the "Ev and Charlie" show. And the ultimate objective, of course, is to exert a powerful influence on the selection of the Republican nominee to run against Pres. Kennedy next year.

* * *

SUPERFICIALLY, the GOP Critical Issues Council bears a resemblance to the Democratic Advisory Council that functioned during the latter years of the Eisenhower Administration. But there is one major difference making the comparison something less than real.

The Democratic Advisory Council was set up deliberately by the late Paul Butler, chairman of the party's National Committee. It functioned as adjunct to but nevertheless within the party's official machinery.

It bore an official stamp of approval from powerful elected national committeemen and committeewomen from many states who were totally unwilling to allow national policy for the Democrats to be created solely by congressional leaders.

Some Democratic members of Congress resented Butler's Advisory Council, but other distinguished members of both House and Senate chose to work with the group rather than against it. In National Committee circles, the opinion exists that without Butler's Advisory Council the groundwork could not have been laid for a liberal Democratic platform and candidate in 1960 and a Kennedy victory over Nixon.

W. AVERELL HARRIMAN, Undersecretary of State, left, declared that the nuclear test ban treaty developed after Pres. Kennedy forced Soviet Premier Khrushchev to take "his offensive weapons out of Cuba." The statement was made in an interview by Harry W. Flannery on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Warning: September Is a Month For Keeping an Eye on Food Bills

By Sidney Margolius

SEPTEMBER IS A MONTH to watch your food bills. Especially this year, food prices are a serious problem. Meat currently is in seasonal short supply, prices of eggs and milk are rising, and though this is the season of heavy supplies for a number of fresh fruits and vegetables, even their tags in general are bigger than last fall's.

What's disturbing about the present rise in meat prices is that last winter, when livestock prices dropped, consumers did not get the full benefit by a long shot. Prices of steers plummeted 15.9 cents per retail pound, but store prices fell only 6.9 cents. This has been the pattern every time there has been a decided price swing. In five years of studies by the U. S. Agriculture Dept., its Farm Index shows, steer prices went up relatively more in the season of abundant supply (winter) than they dropped in the short-supply season (late summer and autumn).

U. S. Agriculture Sec. Orville Freeman has urged retailers to give consumers a reasonable break when wholesale prices fluctuate. But actually you and other families who know this situation can exert even more influence than the government itself to persuade retailers to temper their prices by the way you buy.

We especially recommend these policies to keep down food bills in this autumn of high prices:

- Use poultry often and imaginatively. Broilers have been cheap. Supermarkets have been featuring them at practically wholesale cost. Too, in September, supplies of turkeys increase and prices drop.
- Watch out for high prices of sliced luncheon meats. Some specialty luncheon meats now sold in supermarkets can be surprisingly expensive. They used to be considered a cheap food. But nowadays if you calculate the full cost of those four and six-ounce packages, you will see that some actually come to $1 to $2 a pound. Even ordinary bologna, with its added water content, often costs close to $1 a pound. Look at the weight markings, too.

As one revealing example, a comparison by New York State Extension Service showed that beef tongue sliced luncheon-style and cellophane-wrapped in small packages costs $2.10 a pound. In contrast, you could buy smoked tongue to cook yourself at exactly half the cost.

Or if you don't want to cook, you can make money just slicing. You can buy a cooked tongue unsliced for 35 percent less than the sliced. The difference in cost of just one pound will pay for a knife.

Thus you can save by preparing your own fillings for sandwiches and lunch boxes from poultry, some of the less-expensive fresh meats, eggs, (still relatively inexpensive) and tuna fish.

But for children, use the school lunch program if available in your town (if not, ask your board of education why not). On the average, nationally, school lunches cost only 27 cents, and you can't prepare an equivalent complete lunch at this price.

- Use variety meats more. If your family likes them (they also can be dressed up and combined with other foods), you will find especially good values in beef liver, kidneys and veal heart.
- In buying fresh fruits and vegetables, look for the irregularly-sized, smaller items offered at lower prices. The large, uniform, unblemished apples, tomatoes, pears, etc., command a premium for appearance but offer nothing additional in nutrition or flavor. In fact, there is some evidence that the smaller tomatoes are richer in vitamin C.
- Take advantage of the September canned-goods sales at the supermarkets to stock up. Canned corn and tomato products are especially cheap this year—cheaper than they will be in the coming year because production has been cut back.

BACK-TO-SCHOOL CLOTHES: Recent reductions in prices of children's shirts, blouses, trousers and dresses made of blends of synthetic and natural fibers are especially helpful. A shirt or slacks of polyester fiber blended with cotton or rayon costs more than all-cotton or rayon. But the difference (50 cents to $1 on slacks, for example) is worth it in extra wear, let alone the easier launderability and dirt-resistance of the synthetic blends.

This is also true for work clothing. For example, tests by Iowa State University textile specialists found that work pants of a blend of polyester and rayon gave service for 11 months; pants made of cotton reinforced with nylon provided 5 to 8 months of wear; and all-cotton pants wore for three months.

In shirts and blouses the price difference between polyester-and-cotton blends and all-cottons has narrowed to less than a dollar.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: In addition to broilers and turkeys relatively good main-dish buys this month include chuck steak and roast, often featured in supermarket specials. Pork and veal are expensive. Canned tuna is cheap now because of heavy inventories piled up by the recent (but limited) scare; grated type is least costly. In eggs, your best buys at this season are pullets and mediums.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

From Soup to Nonsense:

You Need a Guide These Days To Tell a Kid from a Grownup

By Jane Goodsell

TELLING THE DIFFERENCE between children and grownups gets more difficult all the time. The old guideposts simply don't apply nowadays, and you really have to look at people to tell who's at the chin-chucking stage and who isn't.

The way things used to be, it was easy to gauge age levels. A person who wanted to show you his coloring book was, ipso facto, a child. Anybody who offered you a cigarette was an adult.

Today, adults are ga-ga over coloring books and kids still in dental braces are smoking. Indeed, in the hypochondriacal circles I move in, hardly anybody smokes but kids. The adults have all given it up. Instead, they're guzzling lemon drops and chewing gum and nibbling peanuts; and one grey-haired bifocaled gentleman of my acquaintance sucks on a baby pacifier as a substitute for the oral satisfaction he once derived from Lucky Strikes.

Sex, which by and large used to be an adult diversion, has become a way of life for the kiddies who go steady before they've mastered long division, and get married and have babies before they're out of the acne stage.

Adults, on the other hand, have taken over the kids' fun and games. They're swapping Tom Switfties, playing the Marienbad match game and sending away for the Royal Canadian Air Force exercise book.

FINGERPAINTING is very popular nowadays, but not with the kids. It's grownups who are smearing themselves with goo in painting-for-therapy classes.

Youngsters are much too serious-minded for such infantile frivolity. Besides, they're busy attending club meetings, building electronic computers, experimenting with eye shadow, and adding to the population explosion.

Seniors' Film Dramatizes Case for King-Anderson

The National Council of Senior Citizens has announced the release of a new film dramatizing the case for the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital insurance for the aged through the social security system.

Titled "For All of the Rest of Your Life," the professionally produced 16-mm film runs for 13.5 minutes and presents a number of case illustrations of what social security old-age hospital insurance could mean to individuals and their families.

The film also shows Pres. Kennedy addressing the NCSC convention in Washington last June and depicts the caravan of more than 1,500 senior citizens who, during the convention, went to Capitol Hill to register their support for King-Anderson with their senators and representatives.

Copies of the film are available for showing by unions and other civic groups from the National Council of Senior Citizens, Inc., 1627 K St., N. W., Washington, D. C., or through a number of local and state affiliates and field representatives of the NCSC.

Executive Council Acts:

Job Agencies Hit, House Probe Asked

Text of AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on public employment service adopted Aug. 15, 1963.

CONTINUING ATTACKS on the public employment service are doing a dangerous disservice in undermining public confidence in a necessary and indispensable function of our federal and state governments.

Since 1933 millions of people have benefited from the job counselling, guidance, and placement services provided by the U.S. Employment Service. As taxpayers and citizens they have used these services without direct cost to themselves.

Now the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is giving its full weight to backing the efforts of private fee-charging agencies to restrict and curtail operations of the public employment service. This is directly against the interest of workers and employers who use the service, and directly opposed to the needs of our economy which depends on efficient manpower utilization through a free, open, and informed labor market.

This grab for business and profit-making at the expense of job-seekers is made in the name of more "private enterprise" and an end to government "monopoly."

Since only 20 percent of all job placements are made by public and private agencies combined, the charge of monopoly is ridiculous. There is much opportunity for private effort without accusing the government of trespassing.

The Chamber of Commerce would be better advised to help the private agencies by insisting that they follow fair business practices and eliminate the excessive fees, gouging, and kickbacks that have been shown to flourish.

The AFL-CIO urges the House Committee on Education & Labor to open a broad-scale investigation under the authority of proposed House Joint Resolution 607 into the following practices of the private employment business: Fee charges that take from two weeks to a month's pay; registration fees that are charged even where no service is rendered; misrepresentation of job opportunities and listing of exploitive job offers; immediate billing of full fees on short-term jobs; and tie-ins between the employment agencies and employers that are intended to exploit the workers referred.

American workers, whether they work for wages or salaries, whether they are unemployed or employed, whether they are physically well or partially disabled, and whether they have had job experience or are just getting out of school, all should be able to choose counselling, guidance, and placement help when they need it without having to commit their future earnings for the privilege.

The nation has an obvious interest in the best training, placement and utilization of its manpower in an age of rapid technological development. The services of a well-equipped and staffed public employment service are indispensable to meeting that objective.

Largest Free World Party:

Communists Control Indonesia's Unions

By Arnold Beichman

Djakarta—The largest Communist Party in the free world is in Indonesia, an archipelago empire of more than 3,000 islands.

The PKI, its Indonesian initials, claims a membership of 3 million, controls the largest national labor organization, SOBSI, finances a large number of newspapers and magazines, controls others through normal Communist penetration tactics and further controls a variety of front organizations—peasant, youth, women—with an estimated membership of 10 million.

Most important of all, it enjoys the benevolent support of Indonesia's lifetime Pres. Sukarno, who has denounced "the anti-Communist phobia" as a social crime and whose operating slogan is "Na-Sa-Kom." This acrostic derives from three Indonesian nouns meaning nationalism, religion and communism.

Thus, Communist leaders enjoy high government rank along with non-Communist officials. However, under Indonesia's system of "guided democracy" authoritarianism, Sukarno is the dictator who decides everything.

Chairman of the PKI is 35-year-old Dwipa Nusantara Aidit, who on my visit to Djakarta, Indonesia's dusty capital, had been in Moscow, Havana, back to Moscow and on Aug. 6 took a PKI delegation to visit the Berlin Wall, which he described as follows:

"I consider this anti-fascist wall as the wall of freedom because it demonstrates the positive wishes of the people to defend their independence and the independence of the socialist camp."

CP Chiefs in 'Outer Cabinet'

Aidit and the PKI first deputy chairman, M. H. Lukman, both hold the title of minister without portfolio in an "outer cabinet" with which Sukarno consults. His inner presidential cabinet contains no known Communists although the PKI and its fellow-traveling supporters are demanding representation. However, despite their seeming exclusion from the inner Sukarno councils, Aidit and Lukman were appointed to a Committee of Thirteen last March to prepare recommendations of "basic strategic principles" for solving Indonesia's economic crisis. Aidit was later appointed to a Committee of Seven to help prepare Sukarno's Economic Declaration Mar. 28.

It is frequently difficult to determine where Sukarno and the PKI differ. Some observers here feel that Sukarno "uses" the PKI far more than they "use" him. They argue that despite Indonesia's bankruptcy, its inability to feed a population of 100 million people, its fantastic inflationary spiral and consequently meaningless wage scales, that the PKI has avoided any conflict on the industrial front, although it can call strikes at will. The reason given for such timidity is that the armed forces are strongly anti-Communist and are merely waiting for a chance to take a crack at the PKI.

Yet the PKI policy may not be timidity at all. It is nothing new for Communist parties to shun strikes as a political tactic when they are satisfied that a government's foreign policy serves the interests of Soviet foreign policy. There is little question that in Sukarno's case, Indonesian foreign policy satisfies Moscow's basic requirements. However, since there is a Sino-Soviet ideological split, Sukarno has seen to it that Peiping is not ignored. Currently, Indonesia is engaged in organizing an international "Asian-African" labor congress to be held before the end of the year with Communist China as one of the sponsors. This follows an "Asian-African" journalists' conference from which Soviet, but not Chinese, journalists were barred from active participation.

Behind 'Games'

In addition, the financial angel of the Sukarno version of the "Olympic Games" to be held here in November is Communist China. This carnival is called "Games of the New Emerging Forces" or Ganefo. It will include as participants athletes and other figures from the USSR, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany, China, North Vietnam and North Korea.

Thus, Sukarno is satisfying the Moscow wing of the PKI and the reportedly growing Peiping wing as well, a striking example of "neutralism" in what might otherwise be an embarrassing situation.

After all, the USSR and Soviet bloc countries supply economic credits to Indonesia and in the last few years have equipped this otherwise impoverished country with planes, tanks, submarines and warships plus training estimated to cost $1 billion. Indonesia is today the most powerful country, militarily, in Southeast Asia with an army of 350,000 men, a navy of 25,000 men, a marine corps of 13,000, and an air force with 400 pilots and 17,000 enlisted men. Estimates as to how much of Indonesia's budget goes to arms and the men vary between 50 and 75 percent.

Indonesia's recently adopted austerity program, demanded by the Intl. Monetary Fund and the U.S. government, is bringing some stability to the country. Whereas last spring the currency unit, the rupiah, was selling at 1,500 to the U.S. dollar with a legal rate of 45 to the dollar, it is now worth 900 as against a new quasi-legal rate of 315. How long even this stability will last depends on American generosity.

Hunger Probable

The Indonesian people are going to go hungry this winter because rice production has fallen. Even if it hadn't, life would be difficult because Indonesia imports 1 million tons of rice annually, making her the world's largest rice importer. To add to the people's burdens, rice production in normally exporting nations like Burma, Thailand and the U.S. has also fallen.

Meanwhile prices of other essentials have gone through the roof—a liter of kerosene, used in cooking, used to be 3 rupiahs; it is now 25 rupiahs. A plate of fried rice in a restaurant in 1961 was 30 rupiahs; it is now 200 rupiahs. An Indonesian friend purchased an auto battery on a Monday in August for 17,000 rupiahs. The same battery in the same store four days later was 21,000 rupiahs.

What this has done to wages can be imagined. A high civil servant's wage today is worth, in real purchasing power, $10 to $15 a month. This means that in a country with devastating unemployment and underemployment, one or two jobs are not enough to live on and "moonlighting" follows the inflationary spiral. The extra second or third job may on occasion border on corruption or fixing government officials but this is the price of "guided democracy."

(First of two articles.)

WHEN THE FAMILY of Thomas J. Gilligan, Jr., an intern of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, came to pick up passports for their two-year assignment to Chile, they found themselves the center of attention. Frances Knight, director of the Passport Office, held the youngest member of the Gilligan family, while Edward Lyerly, deputy administrator of the Bureau of Security & Consular Affairs, presented Mrs. Gilligan with the 1 millionth passport issued during the fiscal year ending last June 30—an all-time record. Gilligan will do labor research and teach labor economics at the University of Chile.

AIFLD Graduates Lead Revolt Toppling Honduran Labor Reds

La Ceiba, Honduras—A democratic revolt sparked by two graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development has brought complete victory to anti-Communist union forces in the nation's largest trade union here.

In an election supervised by the Honduran Ministry of Labor, Communists in control of the Standard Fruit Workers' Union for more than five years were swept out of office and their places won by pro-democratic candidates.

Leaders of the hard-fought internal struggle among the banana workers were Andres Victor Artiles and Santiago Pinedo Puerto, who were graduated with the first institute class in 1962 and returned to their homeland to put into practice the lessons they had learned in parliamentary democracy.

The ensuing struggle against the Marxists became rugged. The two men were denounced and harassed by the Communist press and radio, and Artiles' wife and children were attacked on the streets and beaten. They persisted in urging the banana workers to exercise their trade union rights.

Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi of AIFLD said Latin America has "thousands of workers like the Honduran union members who want to build a free, democratic future for themselves." Andrew C. McLellan, AFL-CIO inter-American representative, added that the work of the institute graduates was "one of the most courageous efforts I have encountered in my 15 years in Latin America."

The story started when the two union men got home from the Washington classes and began organizing a delegation to attend the annual union convention.

The 31 democratic delegates clashed head-on with the Red bloc of 32 delegates over a resolution declaring that Honduras workers should take over the government by armed insurrection.

Reds Foiled

The Communists, unwilling to take a chance with only one vote to spare, used parliamentary tricks to confuse the non-Red forces. Near adjournment, they introduced a "surprise" resolution—to affiliate with a proposed new Marxist union federation. The free union forces stayed for two more days of day and night meetings, finally walked out at 2:30 a.m. in a solid bloc to break the required quorum.

With the first congress declared invalid, the free union forces had time to organize for a special session and won a solid majority of the votes to oust the Marxist officers. The election was supervised by the labor ministry at the request of Ramon Villeda Morales, president of the republic.

The union, with almost 6,000 members, has a dues checkoff system and money in the treasury. Red leaders first won control of the union and then used it as a base for organizing a national Soviet-leaning labor federation. The first institute graduates finished their training just in time to thwart the drive, McLellan observed.

Graduates of Institute Effective in Homelands

Graduates of training schools sponsored by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, together with members of the staff, have returned to Latin America to play leading roles in developing at least four worker training programs in their homelands.

In Brazil, 160 trade unionists received two weeks of training at seminars taught by AIFLD graduates, and the Brazilian labor movement launched a workers' institute in Sao Paulo with 30 students who will study for three months, with technical assistance provided by the AIFLD on a contract basis.

Dr. J. V. Freitas Marcondes, formerly of the Sao Paulo University faculty, is director of the Sao Paulo institute, and AIFLD Rep. Gilbert Richmond is assistant.

The 160 union leaders attended seminars at Belem, Recife, Belo Horizonte and Curitiba. They were taught by 32 graduates of the AIFLD's third course, which ended last May at commencement exercises in Washington, D. C. Subjects included collective bargaining, parliamentary procedure, trade union history, and Communist strategy and tactics.

Other AIFLD programs:

The institute has been given the responsibility for ail AID-financed workers' education programs in Central America beginning next July 1, and $100,000 has been allocated for expenses by the AID Regional Organization for Central America & Panama (ROCAP). AID is the Agency for Intl. Development.

In Mexico, the AIFLD is preparing to participate in labor education programs of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), including an ORIT-sponsored conference on worker education next January in Mexico City.

In Ecuador, 35 workers from Manabi province attended a two-week seminar in union administration and programs, jointly sponsored by the AIFLD and the labor movement. Later, students requested a new and longer course.

Discussions have been held also about worker education training sponsored by the AIFLD and free labor in Uruguay, Institute Dir. Serafino Romualdi reported.

Jobless Claims Dip in Penna.

Harrisburg, Pa.—Continued claims for unemployment compensation during the week ended Aug. 9 dropped to the lowest weekly level since October 1957, according to State Sec. of Labor & Industry William P. Young.

Continued claims totaled 132,141, a drop of 745 from the previous week. However, initial claims increased by 292 to 23,795, largely because of temporary layoffs in bituminous coal mining, construction, textiles and shoes, and indefinite layoffs in primary and fabricated metals.

Young said 116,991 checks for more than $3.5 million were issued to claimants during the week.

REHEARSAL SCENE shows union musicians familiarizing themselves with the score of the AFL-CIO film, "In Common Bondage," in advance of the final taping. Shown standing, from left, are Joel O'Brien, the producer; M. S. Novik, AFL-CIO radio and television consultant, and Paul Taubman, who composed the music and is conducting. The players include Bassoonist Theodore Gompers, seated at right with back to camera, wearing a coat. He is a grand-nephew of Samuel Gompers.

'In Common Brotherhood':

New Film Depicts Labor's World Role

". . . For it is an inescapable fact that freedom for all, in every land; freedom for all, regardless of nationality or religion or race, is the only avenue to the common brotherhood that is the ultimate objective of mankind."

So Pres. George Meany concludes the new AFL-CIO film, "In Common Brotherhood," and with it his explanation of the powerful emotional and practical urges that drive the American labor movement to do what the movie depicts—carry the message of freedom to workers in all parts of the world.

The film, showing the AFL-CIO's activities in many countries, is intended for Labor Day showing. The screen play was written by David Davidson and the musical score by Paul Taubman, with Joel O'Brien producing.

'We Believe in Freedom'

In Meany's epilogue, the AFL-CIO president recalled that American labor is anti-Communist "because we believe in freedom." All totalitarian governments are alike—Communist or fascist—and "we are equally opposed to all of them," he went on. But the AFL-CIO goes beyond opposition to communism, he said, for "our goals are positive."

"We help people build free societies, democratic institutions, stable, democratic governments, all based on their own circumstances and their own desires," Meany said. "We are not trying to create carbon copies of the AFL-CIO."

The value of a world "dominated by the principles of freedom," he said, "cannot be measured in dollars and cents."

"Our country is spending about 5 percent of its budget on foreign aid," Meany continued, "and much of it is recovered through the purchase of goods and materials in the United States.

"The AFL-CIO is spending nearly 25 percent of its income" in aiding labor movements abroad, "without the hope, the expectation or the desire of collecting a single cent in return," he said.

"We know that our commitment to freedom is endorsed by union members," he said. "We are sure that this same commitment is endorsed by an overwhelming majority of the American people."

Opens With Kennedy

The film opens with Pres. Kennedy, earlier this summer, telling a union convention in Berlin, "I am not a stranger to trade union meetings, and therefore I feel most at home here today. . . ."

The title of the movie comes from a phrase that Kennedy voiced later in the same speech, when he referred to individual welfare and dignity and the desire of becoming a person "in the highest sense of the word," and added:

"These are the inspirations we share with the people of the world. They weld us together in common brotherhood. . . ."

Some of Meany's speech on the same occasion also is given, including his pledge to the people of East Germany that "we will never forsake the goal" for which they fought so valiantly—"a free and united Germany . . . . We will never rest until this goal is attained."

The film shows a wide range of labor activities in all parts of the world, ranging from a meeting of the Intl. Labor Conference in Geneva and graduation exercises of the Institute for Free Labor Development in Washington, with Kennedy speaking, to photos of the leaders of developing nations with American labor leaders, of peasants at work in countries all over the world, of trade unionists organizing, bargaining, celebrating . . . and always learning.

One scene shows Maida Springer, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, helping a training school—for tailoring students—equipped by the Ladies' Garment Workers in Philadelphia—get under way in Kenya.

AND IN UGANDA, the camera crews went to "The College on the Equator," given to the labor movement by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, to record "Solidarity Forever" being sung in Swahili.

NMU Extends Atlantic-Gulf Pact 4 Years

New York—The National Maritime Union and an employers' group have agreed on a four-year contract extension with strengthened employment security, pensions, vacations and union security.

In a settlement aimed at easing the effects of automation and mechanization on 25,000 union members, the NMU and operators of 370 American-flag passenger and freighter ships in the Atlantic and Gulf Coast service agreed to these contract improvements:

- Payment by shipowners in the American Merchant Marine Institute of additional amounts needed to increase pension fund payments to $125 a month next year, and to $150 the following year.
- Pensions after 20 years of service regardless of age, effective June 16, 1965.
- Vacation benefit increases as of June 1965 to 60 days after one year of service with any number of employers. Present vacations are 60 days after a year with a single employer, 30 days after a year with more than one employer.
- Wage reopenings in April 1966 and April 1968 with disputes referred to Theodore W. Kheel, union-industry arbiter, for final and binding arbitration if agreement is not reached by the parties within 30 days.
- Payment of the equivalent of union dues as a service fee by seamen who do not join the union within 30 days after employment by a member shipowner.

The current agreement has two more years to run. Its term will be extended from June 15, 1965, present expiration date, to June 15, 1969, if union members approve in a forthcoming referendum.

The pact just reached obligates AMMI employers to increase the present pension contribution of 25 cents per man per day to 50 cents after June 16, 1965, to help absorb the impact of automation on vessel crewmen.

The present 25-cent payment has provided a fund for supplemental unemployment benefits and severance pay. Disposition of the increased employment security fund will be decided by a joint labor-management committee, it was agreed.

Wirtz Warns Job Trend Reflects Industrial Lag

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in releasing a new manpower report showing sizable job gains in the public sector in the past five years, warned this trend makes clear the need for "a broad frontal assault" on lagging economic growth in private industry.

Of a job rise of some 2.4 million in non-farm employment between 1957 and 1962, the report showed, less than 1 million were added by the private sector.

The study, entitled "Manpower Requirements and Employment Trends in Government," is Manpower Report No. 9 in a continuing research series being carried out by the Labor Dept.'s Office of Manpower, Automation & Training.

"While we may take some satisfaction from the indication suggested in this report that we are improving the quality and extent of our public services," Wirtz observed, "we cannot afford to ignore the fact that job growth in a free economy is essentially a matter of private economic expansion.

"Public sector expansion must itself eventually suffer in the face of a stagnant rate of private growth."

Of the growth since 1947 in public service jobs, 88 percent occurred in state and local government. For the 1957-62 period, these state and local public service jobs made up one-half of the nation's total non-farm job gain.

State and local government jobs have risen three and a half times as fast as all non-farm jobs since 1947—from 3.6 million to about 6.8 million in 1962, the report said. The reasons: rapid population growth, the shift from farm to city, the concentration in suburban areas, the need to provide services for the swelling numbers of younger and older persons.

One of every eight jobs in the U.S.—13 percent—is now in local, state or federal government, the report said. In the non-farm wage and salary area, one of every six persons works for the public. More than 1 of every three professional and technical workers in 1962—some 3 million out of 8 million—are employed in the public sector.

Federal jobs have remained virtually unchanged since 1947 as a percentage of non-farm employment—from 4.3 percent in 1947 to 4.2 percent in 1962. In numerical terms, this category rose from 1.9 million to 2.3 million.

NRLB Tells Employer Talk Isn't Bargaining

An employer who talked about "the necessity" for a wage increase at a United States Gypsum Co. plant but had not, after 20 negotiation meetings, made a wage offer to the Machinists was not really seeking agreement, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Voting 4-0, the board directed the big material supply firm to stop refusing to bargain with IAM Dist. 15 at its New Brighton plant on Long Island, N. Y., and to stop threatening employes with discharge or other reprisals for union activity.

In an order signed by all members except Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, the board concluded that management was "seeking ways to avoid agreement" when it prolonged bargaining until after the union's certification as bargaining agent had expired and then demanded proof of its right to represent the workers.

Dist. 15 was certified as the bargaining agent late in 1959, submitted its first contract proposal Jan. 26, 1960, and by Nov. 29 that year had been unable to reach an agreement. Two weeks later the company demanded "positive evidence" that the union still had a majority and on Mar. 10, 1960, put into effect a wage increase—with the union's consent but without having negotitated it.

The board, finding bad faith in management's refusal to make a firm wage offer even after the union had reduced its proposals, noted that "once the certification year had passed" the company "found no impediment to granting the increase that it had refused to offer" earlier, purportedly because it did not wish to bargain "piecemeal" on wages alone.

"Similarly," the board observed," in questioning the union's majority status near and after the end of the certification year, the respondent [Gypsum] was clearly expressing an unwillingness to bargain with the union.

"While such conduct may be excused where evidence exists that an employer has a good-faith doubt of the certified union's continuing majority, no such showing appears here."

It is not sufficient, the board pointed out, to cite a union's failure to hold meetings or to collect dues. It said similar guidance had been given to United States Gypsum in 1950 when the NLRB ordered the firm to stop interfering with the Cement Workers Local 63, by refusing to bargain on grievances and by granting a unilateral wage increase.

GO with the UNION LABEL
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Goal—Unity With Chemical Workers:

OCAW Convention Initiates New Move Toward Merger

By Eugene A. Kelly

Chicago—Ground rules looking toward merger of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers with the Chemical Workers to produce one big union representing nearly 300,000 workers were approved here by a nearly unanimous vote of delegates to the OCAW's 7th convention.

No delegate spoke against the resolution, which would, if approved by the Chemical Workers, give conventions of both unions an opportunity to vote up or down a constitution governing the merged union and a merger procedure. In more than five years of discussion the two unions have never come that close to a vote on specific propositions for merger, though their conventions have said repeatedly they favor amalgamation.

The merger machinery proposal was one of four offered by OCAW officers to strengthen the union during what Pres. O. A. Knight called the "critical times ahead" because of shrinking employment due to automation and job elimination.

The officers also called for: an increase from $2 to $2.60 per month in the per capita tax paid to the international union to finance a larger staff, increased organizing efforts, and mounting expenses; election of district directors to serve also as executive board members; and authority for the president to order the amalgamation of local unions where more than one exists in one community and unification would increase efficiency.

After sharp debate the convention, with more than 700 delegates attending, rejected a change in the present method of electing district directors. The officers withdrew their support of the forced-amalgamation proposal but both matters may reach the floor again before adjournment.

Joint Body Proposed

The merger resolution calls for establishment of a joint committee comprised of six representatives of each union, plus a neutral chairman mutually agreed on; charges the merger committee with drawing up by May 1, 1964, or at a later date set by the neutral chairman, two basic documents—a constitution for the amalgamated union, and an agreement on procedure with a merger time table and details of putting the merger into effect. It provides that in case of failure by union members to agree, the neutral chairman shall cast the deciding vote to guarantee that a specific proposal will be submitted to conventions of the two unions.

The resolution provides that not less than 90 days and not more than 180 days after the merger documents are distributed, each union simultaneously shall convene a regular or special convention, with delegates voting for or against the merger terms without amendment, in a city and at a time mutually agreed on. If both unions vote favorably, merger would then proceed under the terms provided in the merger documents.

Delegates acted on this resolution, submitted by Knight, Vice Presidents Elroy D. Swisher and B. J. Schafer, and Sec.-Treas. A. F. Grospiron, and passed a companion measure stating that OCAW realizes the merger "is an objective that would greatly further the interests" of union members. It provides that the merger committee "not be bound by pre-determined positions."

In his report to the convention, Knight said automation and technological-mechanical improvements have provided some employers with the opportunity to reduce work forces and "reinstitute the old stretchout system." Asserting that such layoffs create a problem in almost every plant in the U.S., he said the results have been "disastrous" to workers.

At the Standard Oil Plant in Whiting, Ind., oldest and largest refinery in the Midwest, the "youngest man in the labor gang has 15 years of seniority," said Knight, who added that labor has only one way to slow down the trend—by striking.

Members Hailed

Voicing a tribute to union members who stayed out for as long as a year or more in recent strikes against Shell, Mobil and other industry giants, Knight said employers have a deadly weapon against workers—a system of underground pipelines by which oil and petroleum products can be pumped from a plant being picketed to another miles away and "you can't picket an underground line."

These problems, he said, require new bargaining techniques, more members, and better training of local officers, bargainers and arbitration team members.

Citing the need for increased union income, Knight reminded the convention that OCAW officers and representatives have not had a wage increase since 1957, and office employes only one.

Among scheduled convention speakers were AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Al Barkan; Richard J. Leonard, assistant to International Union Dept. Pres. Walter P. Reuther; and Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

The final order of convention business was the election of officers for two-year terms. Knight, in the top office for 23 years, has no announced opposition.

Record Membership Reported by Teachers

New York—A 22,000 gain in membership, to an all-time high of more than 82,000, was reported to the 800 delegates to the 47th annual convention of the Teachers meeting here. AFT Pres. Carl J. Megel gave New York City Local 2 credit for almost half of the increase, with the rest being spread across the country.

In addition to New York City, he enumerated collective bargaining contracts or elections recently won by locals in Gary, Ind.; Plainview-Old Bethpage, N. Y., and vocational teachers in Milwaukee, Wis. He said that two-thirds of the teachers in Chicago and Detroit have petitioned for elections through their AFT-affiliated unions.

Other organizing drives are under way in Boston, Philadelphia, Newark, Cleveland, Chicago West Suburban, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Los Angeles, and Dearborn, Mich.

Megel pointed out that the success of the organizing drives, plus the many advances being made by organized teachers, proves that "the soundness of our affiliation with the AFL-CIO cannot be compromised."

A featured speaker on opening day was Calvin E. Gross, superintendent of New York City schools. He welcomed the new militancy of the teachers, but cautioned the city's teachers and the school system. He said:

"Up to now teachers have been too complacent, too docile, too willing to let themselves be put upon. I personally welcome the new show of vigor and the muscle which has now become apparent in many parts of our profession. But I would also counsel the use of wisdom and foresight and the careful exercise of responsibility as we work out together new ways of rebuilding school systems which have lost their former excellence."

Other speakers were Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council, and Pres. Raymond Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Van Arsdale offered the support of his organization if New York City teachers are forced to strike on Sept. 9, and called the Condon-Wadlin act (New York state law which prohibits strikes by public employes) a process of "intimidation and coercion." The labor council at a recent meeting unanimously voted to support the Teachers' local in the event of a strike.

Support was also offered by Corbett, who likewise condemned the Condon-Wadlin Act.

"We believe that collective bargaining turns into collective begging if the basic right to strike granted to every free worker is taken away from him," he added.

A resolution supporting the New York City local was scheduled to be presented to the delegates. It was unanimously approved by the resolutions committee.

The convention reiterated its stand for civil rights and invited the segregated Southern American Teachers Association, comprised of Negroes, into the AFT. In extending the invitation, Megel quoted AFT integration polices and recalled the 1956 expulsion of non-integrated southern locals from AFT ranks.

George H. Fowler, chairman of the New York State Commission for Human Rights, praised the AFT position on civil rights and suggested that today's schools teach required courses in human relations to prepare children for a place in our democratic society.

He attacked segregated school systems and schools in which there is de facto segregation. Such separation, he said, makes more difficult the teacher's task "in orienting youngsters at the earliest possible age as to what democracy truly means."

Although elections of officers are not scheduled for this convention, delegates to the AFL-CIO convention were to be chosen. Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) was scheduled to speak and Nicholas Zonarich, IUD Director of organization, was listed for a major address on collective bargaining techniques for teachers.

Detroit Cab Drivers Vote for Seafarers

Detroit—Victory for the Seafarers in an election among City Cab Co. drivers will be followed, the union said, by a drive to organize all other Detroit taxi drivers.

The tally in an election supervised by the National Labor Relations Board was SIU 100, no union 59, with 10 other votes challenged.

REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER was the greeting when Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea (right) of the Brewery Workers hailed his brother, Rev. Hugh J. Gildea, C.Ss.R., at the union's convention in Cincinnati. Father Gildea delivered the opening invocation and delighted the delegates by reading a blessing for beer from the Roman Catholic ritual.

Equality on Job Pledged By Brewery Workers

Cincinnati—Delegates to the 37th biennial convention of the Brewery Workers here unanimously passed a strong civil rights resolution, pledging equal job opportunities in the industries served by the union.

As Pres. Karl F. Keller pointed out, the resolution was a reaffirmation of the organization's belief in equal rights inasmuch as such a pledge is already contained in the union's constitution.

Delegates heard William L. Kircher, assistant regional director of the AFL-CIO, urge union members to do volunteer organizing so that they can strengthen their groups, a strength which will be reflected in power at the bargaining table.

Kircher also said that the labor movement is too prone to criticise itself. He recounted the progress made by labor since the 30's and said that there is enough outside criticism without those within the house of labor sniping at each other.

He lauded the Brewery Workers as "good neighbors," saying that while Cincinnati is the national headquarters of the union, it takes on local responsibilities and participates fully in local affairs. He particularly singled out William P. Sheehan, former Brewery Workers' business agent, for his work since becoming secretary-treasurer of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO Council.

In other actions, the 250 delegates to the four-day convention:

- Changed the convention date from August to October, but defeated a recommendation to extend the present two-year schedule to three years.
- Narrowly defeated a proposal for 50 cents a month additional dues from each member for the defense fund, but allocated 20 cents per month from the present per capita to the same fund.
- Increased salaries of international officers, department heads, and regional directors by $500 per year.
- Re-elected Feller, who has been president since 1948, by a four-to-one vote over Albert Fotino, of Peekskill, N. Y.
- Re-elected, by acclamation, Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea and Director of Organization Thomas L. Rusch.
- Elected three new vice presidents to become members of the executive board: Thomas Owens, Boston; Frank Kostron, St. Louis; Regis Chenot, Philadelphia.
- Reduced the number of international officers by abolishing the post of director of legislation upon the retirement of Joseph E. Brady. His duties will be assumed by Feller, Gildea, Rusch, and staff members.
- Voted Cincinnati as permanent convention city unless a local union in some other city seeks the convention.

Lunch Time? —NLRB Makes The Man Pay

Titusville, Pa.—Paying his employes for lunch periods he took away from them will cost employer Noel Poux almost $800.

And refusing to rehire Harold Peterson, shipping department employe at Skyline Industries and union negotiator, will cost another $719.

Poux agreed to the payments through a National Labor Relations Board stipulation settling unfair labor practice charges brought by the Steelworkers after an election, a strike and stalled negotiations. He agreed also to resume bargaining and to stop threatening employes, spying on them, dealing with a company union or demanding that the USWA post an "indemnity" bond before bargaining.

Union Rep. Al Keefer said some employes complained they were not getting enough time to eat lunch. When Poux heard about it he took away the free lunch periods of some 42 production workers. Among those who will get back compensation, with interest at 6 percent, are several strikebreakers.

IUOE Instructors Get Nuclear Training

Oak Ridge, Tenn.—Fifteen instructors employed by local unions of the Operating Engineers are undertaking a special 11-day training course at the Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies, which is sponsored by 32 southern universities.

The group is studying the principles of nuclear energy, fundamentals of reactor operation, uses of radioactive isotopes in construction and industrial operations, and the hazards involved in radiation exposure and atomic accidents. They are expected to pass on what they learn to journeymen and apprentices employed in atomic power plants and in industries using radioactive materials and isotopes.

$14 Billion Price Rise:

Quality Stabilization Hit as Price-Fixing

The AFL-CIO has expressed sympathy and concern for the plight of small, independent retailers but vigorously insisted that the Quality Stabilization bill, now before a special subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee, would make things worse instead of better.

In testimony prepared for the Senate group, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared that the price-fixing proposal would exact a penalty of $14 billion or more a year from consumers in the form of price increases.

Furthermore, he observed, it would tend to squeeze out small merchants who could not afford to carry inventories of both the price-fixed, name-brand merchandise and lower-priced "private" or "house" brands.

Biemiller pointed out that business failures in the period 1946 through 1961 were consistently higher in states having price maintenance ("fair trade") laws. The more comprehensive the law, the higher the failure rate, he said.

The AFL-CIO "simply cannot put much stock" in the claim that manufacturers need to dictate resale prices to "prevent deterioration" of the products, he continued, declaring:

"Good products, which consumers want, do not need artificial price supports."

The argument is exploded in any case by the prevalence of "private" labels, he noted. These come about when the maker of a brand-name product supplies quantities of the same product to retail outlets—supermarket chains, for example—for marketing under a different name and at a lower price. The product is identical, Biemiller observed; only the name—and the price—are different.

While stressing AFL-CIO opposition to the whole concept of price maintenance, Biemiller took particular exception to specific provisions of the Senate measure. Among these he listed:

- The "unconscionable" failure to exempt prescription drugs, which frequently carry "needlessly exorbitant prices even under present conditions."
- The total inadequacy of the provisions which supposedly would limit price-fixing to items that are in "free and open competition" with unbranded goods.
- The lack of safeguards for the public, such as review and approval of fixed prices before they are put into effect.

Even if the bill were changed to cover these points, however, the AFL-CIO would still oppose it, Biemiller emphasized.

"We suggest that the Congress explore less dangerous and dubious routes to the preservation of small business than the one under consideration in this bill." he said.

"Such measures might include, for example, strengthening of Federal Trade Commission powers to deal with genuinely predatory price cutting, and we feel certain that constructive programs in such fields as tax benefits, loan programs, encouragement of pooled purchasing arrangements, and other means of improving competitive capacity of small business could be developed or strengthened."

STEEL MAKERS ABROAD are dumping their products in the U.S. and taking away the jobs of American workers by selling at "unfair" prices, Pres. Kennedy was told at a White House conference by Roger Blough (left), chairman of the board of the U.S. Steel Corp., and Pres. David J. McDonald (center) of the Steelworkers.

Meany Renews Appeal For FEP in Rights Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

on the basis of race or color," Kennedy observed.

The question the President responded to had pointed out that some Negro leaders are seeking "special dispensation for the pain of second-class citizenship" over past decades, particularly job quotas by race. The President said he doubted if this "is the generally held view" of the Negro community, adding:

"What I think they would like is to see their children well educated so that they could hold jobs and have their children accepted and have themselves accepted as equal members of the community . . . . The past is going to be with us for a good many years in uneducated men and women who lost their chance for a decent education."

On the specific question of quotas, the President said: "I don't think quotas are a good idea. I think it is a mistake to begin to assign quotas on the basis of religion or race or color or nationality."

Rather than quotas, he urged a "fair chance for everyone" by looking over the employment rolls, the areas where people are being hired and making sure that everyone is treated equitably. "But not hard and fast quotas," he declared.

Meany took a similar position in his testimony before the House Judiciary subcommittee. He said he was firmly opposed to demands of some Negro spokesmen for "superseniority" and superior hiring preferences for Negroes as "a form of penance" to correct and atone for past injustices.

The common goal, Meany stressed in his testimony, should be "justice, not vengeance." This is especially true, he added, "when vengeance would be exacted from those whose only guilt was the color of their skin. We are against that sort of thing for Negroes; we are against it for whites as well."

Fresno Local Wins 48 Cents in Benefits

Fresno, Calif.—Benefits totaling 48 cents an hour have been won by some 300 members of Sheet Metal Workers Local 252 in a new three-year contract with Fresno employers.

Kefauver Seat Goes To Walters

Nashville—Herbert S. Walters, a conservative Democrat, was named by Gov. Frank G. Clement to fill the Senate seat left vacant by the death of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Walters will hold office until the next general election in November 1964, when he must either retire or seek election for the remaining two years of Kefauver's six-year term.

Clement himself is considered a likely candidate for the Democratic nomination at that time.

Walters, who in the past has been described as a "Byrd Democrat," announced that he will support Pres. Kennedy's nuclear test ban treaty and that he favors tax reduction this year. On civil rights, also a major issue in the Administration program, he was noncommittal.

Walters is a long-time Democratic national committeeman from Tennessee and head of a major construction firm. He opposed Kefauver in the late senator's first primary contest in 1948 and remained on the sidelines in Kefauver's next two winning campaigns for renomination and re-election.

Kefauver's death means that both of Tennessee's Senate seats will be at stake in the 1964 election. Sen. Albert Gore's second six-year term expires with the end of the 88th Congress.

House Nearing Vote On Foreign Aid Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

lion less than his modified proposal and $200 million below the recommendations of the Clay Committee.

He pointed out, moreover, that further cutbacks in the program could swell the nation's severe unemployment, which has exceeded 5 percent for more than five years, because 80 percent of commodity procurement money under the aid program is spent in the United States and thus creates jobs.

Earlier, at his news conference, the President issued an opening statement urging approval of the full amount of foreign aid authorizations as "vital to the security and well-being of the United States and the free world."

Support for Security

"This program is not an abstract set of numbers," Kennedy declared, "but a set of concrete and continued actions in support of our national security.

"No party or group should call for a dynamic foreign policy and then seek to cripple this program."

The logjam of remaining work confronting Congress had congressional leaders talking in terms of getting the congressional troops "out of the trenches by Christmas."

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Okla.), after a weekly leadership conference with the President, pledged "our very best" efforts to win passage of both the civil rights and tax bills before the end of the year.

Earlier Mansfield had indicated that Senate consideration of the rights measure might not begin until late September, and he noted that consideration of the tax bill would come much later, with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) predicting at least two months of hearings.

The majority leader said the Senate would have other important matters up for consideration, including the test ban treaty, which he said he hoped would reach the floor shortly after Labor Day, a House-passed bill for federal aid to medical and dental schools, foreign aid, the rail bargaining crisis and a number of departmental appropriations bills.

8-24-63

Arbitration Issue Snags Rail Rule Talks

(Continued from Page 1)

proved "impossible to reconcile."

He scheduled no further meetings, but asked both sides to continue efforts toward a voluntary settlement.

Meanwhile, Sen. Warren G. Magnuson, chairman of the Commerce Committee, emerged from the mediation talks with the announcement that he was scheduling a closed-door session of the committee to take up proposals for settlement procedures. Among these was Pres. Kennedy's plan to refer the issues to the Interstate Commerce Commission for resolution while a strike is banned for a two-year period.

Also up for discussion, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were three other plans:

- The amendment sponsored by Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.) embodying AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's proposal that Congress set up a special watch-dog committee while bargaining continues.
- A proposal that Congress itself set up an arbitration panel.
- A proposal that an arbitration panel be set up whose decision would be subject to ICC approval and would be binding if not rejected by the ICC within 10 days.

Any approach giving authority in the case to the ICC amounts to "compulsory arbitration," the rail unions feel.

Magnuson said that legislation in one form or another probably would reach the Senate for a vote on Aug. 26, leaving three days for the House to act before the rules change deadline.

The rail unions have said they would have no recourse but a strike if the carriers follow through with their threat to put the changes into effect unilaterally.

Luna said the deadlock had been brought about when management reversed a position it had argued for many months—that all issues in the dispute be settled together.

This, he noted, was the aim of the five labor organizations in holding that the arbitration of the firemen and crew consist issues take place along with negotiation of all other issues, with all terms to be effective simultaneously.

For the railroads now to insist on arbitration first, negotiations later, indicates that they had always intended to push the dispute to Congress for settlement, Luna declared.

He expressed the concern of the brotherhoods that management would drag its feet in negotiations on the lesser issues, having no incentive to bargain after settlement of the key issues through arbitration.

In agreeing "in principle" to voluntary arbitration of the firemen and crew consist matters, the unions had issued a joint statement stressing that their acceptance of Wirtz's arbitration proposal was "predicated" on three conditions:

- Agreement with management on the terms of arbitration.
- Agreement on procedures to resolve other issues.
- Ratification of the settlement plan "under the constitutional and statutory requirements" of the unions.

Meany Urges Test Ban Treaty Approval

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, August 31, 1963 | No. 35

Congress Votes Arbitration Of Key Rail Dispute Issues

SenateRatification Urged for Test Ban

Ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty "is in the best interests of the country" despite its limitations and a realistic reading of the Soviet Union's aggressive and imperialistic motives, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Congress.

Appearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as the first public witness, the federation president said the treaty can serve "as a step toward lessening world tension and improving the prospects for world peace" only to the extent "that we have no illusions about the enemy threatening us and are united and strong enough to deter and defeat any aggression which he might consider."

Queried by Committee Chairman J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) as to whether he had any reservations on the treaty, Meany replied:

"No. We don't think it [the treaty] is the millenium but we have no reservations about it."

Meany placed in the committee's record the resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier in August urging ratification of the treaty, and he cited pertinent sections in his testimony.

"We of the trade union movement are realists," he told the committee. "We hate war. We are for peace, but not at any price—never at the price of losing our freedom, never at the cost of submitting to communism or any other type of tyranny."

The road to peace and freedom, he declared, "lies in the determination, unity and strength of our

(Continued on Page 12)

Unions Join In Rights Assembly

Organized labor was heavily represented among the over 200,000 Americans who gathered before the Lincoln Memorial in a historic demonstration for "jobs and freedom."

The vast outpouring in Washington of rank and file citizens from every walk of life reflected a growing consensus that the time has come to make a reality of equal opportunity for all.

Placards, caps and armbands identified trade union delegations from the Auto Workers, Clothing Workers, Meat Cutters, Ladies' Garment Workers, Building Service Employes, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, Steelworkers, Transport Workers and numerous other unions. Up to 50,000 of the marchers were estimated to be trade union members.

Pres. Kennedy met with march

(Continued on Page 5)

THE AFL-CIO has "no reservations" about the test ban treaty, Federation Pres. George Meany told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in urging ratification of the pact. As long as the U.S. has no illusions about the Soviet threat and maintains its strength, the treaty can serve as a step toward lessening tensions, he said. With Meany is AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Bill Sets 90 Days For Ruling

A seven-man board of arbitration created by Congress and approved by the President will hand down the final and binding decision in the four-year-old railroad dispute within the next 90 days.

The joint congressional resolution, signed by Pres. Kennedy hours before the railroads planned to put into effect unilaterally new work rules that would have triggered a nationwide strike, forbids both a strike and any change in the rules for six months.

The President said the "virtual unanimity" of the vote "is the firmest assurance that free collective bargaining is not being eroded." The action by Congress, he added, implements "what is essentially a private and voluntary decision."

The five rail unions termed the "enactment of compulsory arbitration . . . regrettable" and "a backward step in the preservation of the rights of workers." The railroads praised Congress for "its timely and constructive handling of this crucial legislation."

Congressional action came quickly after negotiations between the railroads and the five operating unions deadlocked on the procedures for submitting the dispute to voluntary final and binding arbitration.

The Senate and the House voted overwhelmingly for the creation of the seven-man board and limiting of binding arbitration to the employment of firemen and train crew size, leaving other issues to be negotiated by labor and management. Pres. Kennedy's proposal to send

(Continued on Page 3)

Contribution Called 'Indispensable':

Kennedy Salutes Labor on Holiday

A call to all America to join in working for a four-point program aimed at strengthening the nation was issued by Pres. Kennedy in a Labor Day message hailing the "indispensable contribution" of the U.S. trade union movement "to the vigor of our democracy and to the advancement of the ideals of freedom around the earth."

The fact that "we can take satisfaction on this Labor Day in the health and energy of our national society," the President declared, "must not distract us from the things we have yet to achieve."

The President's message was the highlight of a Labor Day week-end marked by statements of national and international union spokesmen and by the traditional parades, picnics and other community gatherings.

In his statement Kennedy proposed this program:

"First, we must accelerate our effort against unemployment and for the expansion of jobs and opportunity."

To combat unemployment the economy must be strengthened by enactment of the Administration's tax program, he said, and "measures designed to help the communities, industries and individuals bypassed by prosperity" must be continued and enlarged.

"Second, we must accelerate our effort to strengthen our educational system."

He expressed the hope that Congress will pass legislation to buttress the nation's educational system and called on parents "for the sake of the future" to have their children return to school this fall.

"Third, we must accelerate our effort to offer constructive opportunities to our young people."

With one out of every four persons in the labor force between the ages of 16 and 21 unemployed, he said, the proposed youth conservation corps and the home town youth corps offer "especially promising ways" of improving their skills.

"Fourth, we must accelerate our effort to achieve equal rights for all our citizens—in employment, in education, in voting and in all sectors of our national activity."

The President added that the gains of 1963 "will never be reversed" because "they lay a solid foundation for the progress we must continue to make in the months and years to come." This year, he asserted, "marks a long step forward toward assuring all Americans the opportunities for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness pledged by our forefathers in the Declaration of Independence."

"As we make progress in these four areas, we make progress to-

(Continued on Page 4)

Senate Democrats Seek Restoration of Aid Cut

Senate Democratic leaders promised a full-scale fight to restore major slashes in the foreign aid authorization bill in the wake of a stinging denunciation of House reductions in the program by Pres. Kennedy.

Echoing a presidential charge that Republican leaders had made a "shocking and thoughtless partisan attack" on the long-established aid program, Senate Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) said Administration forces would seek to restore the full $585 million the House cut from the $4.1 billion spending authority recommended by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The House vote, coming after foreign aid supporters had beaten down most previous amendments, showed 156 Republicans and 66 Democrats, most of the latter southern Democrats, lining up to cut the program to $3.5 billion. Only 16 Republicans joined 172 Democrats in opposing the reduction.

Meanwhile the Senate Foreign Relations Committee ended hearings on the proposed nuclear test-ban treaty and prepared for executive sessions after hearing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany join in strongly urging ratification.

Swift approval by the committee was anticipated after thorough hearings in which members of the Senate Armed Services and Joint Atomic Energy Committees participated.

As both House and Senate

(Continued on Page 12)

Labor Day Radio Broadcasts Set Up

Special Labor Day radio broadcasts will be made over the major networks Sept. 2 by four AFL-CIO officials. They are:

National Broadcasting Co.—Pres. George Meany, 10:30 p.m., EDT.

Mutual Broadcasting System—Sec.Treas. William F. Schnitzler, 9:15 p.m., EDT.

American Broadcasting Co.—Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, 10:45 p.m., EDT.

Columbia Broadcasting System—Vice Pres. Al J. Hayes, 8:15 p.m., EDT.

Meany Lauds Eric Johnston, Dead at 66

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany voiced his "deepest personal regrets" at the death of Eric A. Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Association of America and former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the U. S.

"Eric Johnston was among the first business spokesmen to recognize the need for labor-management cooperation in the interests of national progress," said Meany. "He was also among the first to recognize the need for government leadership in the creation and maintenance of a healthy economy."

Johnston's understanding of the world scene and the aspirations of other peoples was indicated by his membership on the board of trustees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, Meany said, adding that "even today there are not enough voices like his to speak primarily for the broad interests of democracy."

Johnston, 66, died Aug. 22 in a Washington hospital where his condition had grown steadily worse since he was admitted June 17 with symptoms of a slight stroke.

His death ended more than three decades of business and community leadership and government activity that included missions for presidents of the U.S.

He was a member of the National Labor-Management Advisory Committee, Inter-American Economic Development Commission, Economic Stabilization Board, War Manpower Commission and War Mobilization & Reconversion Commission; and served as administrator of the Economic Stabilization Agency in 1951 and as chairman of the Intl. Development Agency from 1952 until his death.

Surviving are his widow, with whom he had lived in Washington, and two daughters, Mrs. William Carlin Fix and Mrs. Herbert Butler, both of Spokane. Meany was among the honorary bearers at memorial services in Washington. Burial was in Seattle, Wash.

SUPPORT for Hotel & Restaurant Workers, on strike since Apr. 18 for a first contract with Hotel Hilton in El Paso, is shown on the picket line by two officers of the Texas AFL-CIO, in town for a conference of the state central body's Permanent Committee on Latin-American Affairs. Left to right, State AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Felix Nakovic; Hilton Strike Capt. Arturo Rivera of Culinary Local 628; striker Manuel Correa and State Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans of Austin. The conference, last of three preceding the AFL-CIO state convention, called for action on low wage scales caused by competition from transient workers and an end of "slave labor" treatment of Mexican-Americans in border towns.

Virginia Labor Backs Liberties and Rights

Norfolk, Va.—Unanimous support for a broad program of civil rights and liberties was voted by the Virginia State AFL-CIO here at its eighth annual convention.

The 500 delegates, with almost 250 visitors in the audience at the all-union and integrated Golden Triangle Motor Hotel, approved a report of the convention civil liberties committee.

The report:

- Endorsed Pres. Kennedy's efforts to eliminate "all discriminatory and unfair practices which undermine and weaken our standard of living and sap our vitality as a nation."
- Listed among union objectives the desegregation of public facilities and schools; the securing of equal job opportunities; and the establishment of biracial community units in Virginia. It suggested withholding federal funds on projects where racial discrimination exists.

Boyd E. Payton, Textile Workers Union of America, headed the civil liberties committee.

The delegates reelected Pres. Harold B. Boyd, Vice Pres. Julian F. Carper and Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow and raised their salaries to $9,000 a year.

They adopted a memorial resolution of tribute to the late James L. McDevitt, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, and commended Gov. Albertis S. Harrison (D) for his efforts at bringing new industry into the state.

The convention agreed to intensify the work of COPE units in getting out the vote at elections and urged approval by the state legislature of the proposed U.S. constitutional amendment abolishing the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting.

In other resolutions the delegates opposed any action by the legislature to permit a slate of "independent" presidential electors; supported uniform registration laws for elections; called for establishment of a state minimum wage of not less than $1.25 an hour; and endorsed resolutions for a shorter workweek for firemen and the right of the Fire Fighters to organize.

Following a speech by Vice Pres. Richard Parrish of the Teachers, members of a delegation which donated its services to teach 1,600 schoolless children in Farmville, Va., this summer, delegates and visitors donated $276 toward expenses of those who worked in Prince Edward County.

Record 51.5 Million In Schools This Fall

Fall enrollment in the nation's schools and colleges will increase for the 19th consecutive year to a new record high, estimated at 51.5 million by the U.S. Office of Education. This will be an increase of 3.4 percent over last fall's enrollment.

Almost 58 percent of the school-age population was enrolled in some type of school last fall. Fifteen years previously the figure was 42.3 percent, the Office of Education said. Other highlights of its report:

- An estimated 64 percent of all pupils entering the fifth grade in 1954-55 graduated on schedule in 1961-62. Twelve years ago the percentage was 50.5.
- Americans aged 25 or over had, by March, 1962, completed an average of 11.4 grades compared with 8.4 for the same age group in 1940.
- Expenditures for education on all levels were estimated at $32 billion for the 1962-63 school year, representing about 7 percent of the national income as against 3.7 percent in 1929-30. The $32 billion figure includes $19.5 billion for public schools, $3.5 billion for private schools, $5.1 billion for public colleges and universities and $3.9 billion for the private colleges.

New Records in 1963

The anticipated record-breaking enrollment for 1963 includes 35 million from kindergarten through Grade 8; 12.1 million in grades 9 through 12; 4.4 million in higher education for degrees.

Available teachers total 1.8 million in public and private schools, 345,000 in colleges and universities—one teacher for every 12.7 college pupils and every 26 school pupils.

IUD Convention Called Nov. 7-8

A call for the fifth convention of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has been sent to its 59 affiliated unions and its chartered councils by the officers, Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey.

The two-day biennial gathering will be held in Washington, D. C., Nov. 7 and 8, following meetings of the department's committees.

Delegates will be asked to review department organizing, collective bargaining, legislation and service programs, and also will "examine the position of our unions" as to work jurisdiction, boycotts, the operation of the AFL-CIO no-raiding agreement and the IUD's own internal disputes agreement, Reuther and Carey said.

Johnson Keynote Speaker:

Texas Votes Funds For COPE Activity

Houston—The Texas AFL-CIO convention has approved a special assessment to beef up its COPE program and the strongest civil rights program in the history of the labor movement in the Lone Star state.

The assessment will be 5 cents per member each month for 20 months. It is designed to raise at least $120,000 toward political education activities.

"Now we will be able to put our money where our mouths are and move out on our aggressive programs," State AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown said.

The convention, by overwhelming vote of its more than 900 delegates, adopted a program calling for action against racial discrimination by labor, management, the legislature and Texas Gov. John Connally.

In his keynote address, Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson recalled the days when organized labor struggled for recognition of its grievances and asked the State AFL-CIO to support "the next group now appealing to the conscience of America."

"Although labor enjoys a respected position now, I can remember a short 30 years ago, when in some places a peaceful picket was the object of more disaffection than a peaceful demonstrator today," Johnson said.

"Nonetheless the national sense of fairness and the rightness of justice and decency prevailed to protect the working man."

Economic Programs

Turning to the nation's economic affairs, Johnson saw the need for "more jobs, better jobs, more products to make and sell, more consumers wanting to buy, more companies wanting to invest. . . ."

He ticked off parts of the Kennedy Administration's program which, he said, "Leap to the heart of your problems":

- "A tax reduction bill . . . would generate more funds for corporate investment and consumer spending.
- A vocational retraining program for displaced workers.
- A medicare program that is really only the minimum that needs so desperately to be done for our aged.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough, another convention speaker, defended the U.S. Employment Service against what he labeled an "outrageous" attack by Life magazine.

"Life infers that the agency's budget represents . . . a commitment to tap the U.S. Treasury and infers that these U.S. Employment Service monies are spent" for political advantages first and public welfare second, he said.

Actually, money for the Service comes from a special tax under the federal unemployment tax act, not from the Treasury, he noted.

"The record of 321 million placements in the last 30 years attests the integrity of the employment service, set up solely in the public interest to provide job market services," Yarborough said.

Another speaker, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, called for the united labor movement to remember its origins and to apply the lessons of its own history to today's crises.

Schnitzler said right-wing backers of three proposed amendments to the U.S. Constitution actually wished to undermine the Constitution and the federal judiciary.

He warned that the amendments would allow the chief justices of state supreme courts to overrule decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, take away federal court jurisdiction over state reapportionment cases, and allow state legislatures to pass federal constitutional amendments.

He noted, also, that embezzling by bank officials is increasing while financial skulduggery by labor officials remains infinitesimal.

"Don't imitate the bankers of America," he told delegates. "You'll all be in jail."

Utah Labor Sets Up Rights Committee

Salt Lake City—The Utah AFL-CIO has authorized Pres. John R. Schone to name a civil rights committee of five executive board members.

The committee will support labor's efforts to end discrimination because of race, creed or color in union membership, employment opportunities, housing or public service and will report on compliance by locals with national AFL-CIO policy, the state body said in a resolution adopted at its seventh annual convention.

J. M. Rourke Appointed COPE Deputy Director

Joseph M. Rourke, veteran Connecticut labor and political leader, has been appointed deputy director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education by Federation Pres. George Meany.

Rourke will fill the post held by Alexander E. Barkan until earlier this month when he was named COPE director to succeed the late James L. McDevitt.

A member of Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 90 since 1928, Rourke served as secretary-treasurer of the Connecticut Federation of Labor since shortly after the end of World War II and in the same post after the AFL-CIO merger. He resigned July 1 to join the IBEW staff.

Rourke is currently concluding his third successive term in the Connecticut House of Representatives and previously had served three terms in the state Senate. He also was a New Haven alderman for three terms.

He served as business agent of Local 90 from 1935 to 1943.

JOSEPH M. ROURKE

Arbitration Ordered in Rail Dispute

Congress Calls For 90-Day Time Limit

(Continued from Page 1)

the dispute to the Interstate Commerce Commission for final ruling was discarded for the new board approach.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had urged creation of a joint congressional committee to supervise continued bargaining by both sides without recourse to final and binding arbitration by a government agency.

President May Pick

The seven-man board will be composed of two persons representing the unions, two for management and three public representatives to be picked by the other four members. If they cannot agree on the selections, the President will select the three public members.

The joint resolution—passed by the Senate 90 to 2 and by the House on a non-recorded standing vote of 286 to 66—has a life of 180 days.

Arbitration of the two main issues must start within 30 days and a decision reached in another 60 days. The ruling, binding for two years, would become effective 60 days later with 30 more days provided before the unions would be permitted to strike over any secondary issues.

The 60-day period between the deadline for the decision and its effective date was designed, congressional debate showed, with the intent that the unions and railroads reach agreement on those issues not subject to binding arbitration.

These issues include modifications of the existing pay structure, extension of runs beyond present division lines, combination yard and road crews, fringe benefits and other matters involved in a new contract.

The approach voted by Congress, a number of senators and representatives pointed out during debate in both houses, provides for compulsory arbitration of an interstate labor dispute for the first time in U.S. history.

The congressional decision to act came late last week after hopes of a voluntary agreement on arbitration evaporated when the unions and railroads were unable to agree on the precise terms of reference to the arbitration or its timing.

The Senate Commerce Committee voted out a measure to set up the seven-man board and included all issues in the arbitration award.

The House Commerce Committee a few days later approved a similar measure with the major difference that only the two issues of changes affecting diesel firemen and other train crew members, and the size of train crews would go to final arbitration. The other issues, under the House committee bill, would have been left to negotiation.

Amendment by McGee

An amendment offered by Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) to apply the same approach to the Senate committee bill carried on a vote of 75 to 17. The bill's original life of 150 days was extended to 180 days.

An amendment offered by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) to have the dispute decided by a tripartite board functioning under the ICC was defeated 75 to 15. Another proposed by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), to provide for seizure in event of a national emergency strike and applied directly to the rail dispute, won only three supporting votes.

The House's only vote was the 286 to 66 standing tally on the House committee bill, slightly amended to bring it into line with the Senate measure. Then, to speed passage and a presidential signature, the House passed the Senate bill intact and sent it to the White House.

FIRE PROTECTION of communities always suffers when fire and police operations are consolidated, the Fire Fighters warned at a Washington meeting. IAFF Pres. William D. Buck, left, presided at a two-day session of the union's committee to combat consolidation, established by convention action. Vice Pres. Raymond Fogarty, Baltimore, is fourth from the left.

Merger Plan Voted By Photo Engravers

Miami Beach, Fla.—Delegates to the convention of the Photo Engravers voted overwhelming approval of a proposal to merge with the unaffiliated Lithographers.

The tally, taken on a roll call after lengthy floor discussion, was 89 to 20, with two delegates abstaining.

The proposal had been offered by the union's executive council and went before the delegates with the endorsement of the convention officers' report committee and the backing of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The next step for the Photo Engravers will be a referendum vote on the proposition. It will be held about Dec. 1, according to Pres. William J. Hall. Meanwhile the proposal will be acted on by the Lithographers' convention, scheduled to open Sept. 9 in Montreal. Constitutional conventions of both unions, in case of referendum approval, will take place no later than June 1, 1964.

The Photo Engravers have about 20,000 members and the Lithographers about 40,000.

Delegates to the Photo Engravers' convention also discussed their pension and welfare program and re-elected Hall and Sec.-Treas. Ben G. Schaller without opposition.

Speakers included Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union, Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer of the Stereotypers and Intl. Rep. Walter Barber of the Bookbinders, and three employer representatives—Robert Birdseye of the American Photo Engravers Society; Miles Petrone of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, and Jack Roser of the Gravure Technical Association.

A VETERAN of more than 50 years of service to the union and liberal movements, John W. Edelman, dean of labor lobbyists, is retiring at the age of 70 as legislative representative of the Textile Workers Union of America.

J. W. Edelman Retires from TWUA Job

John W. Edelman, dean of labor lobbyists in Washington and for the past 20 years legislative representative of the Textile Workers Union of America, has retired at 70, after more than 50 years of service to labor and liberal causes.

An outstanding authority on the legislative process, he was also a recognized specialist on public housing and played a major role in the enactment of a wide range of laws including the Norris-LaGuardia Act, unemployment compensation, and consumer protection. He drafted a bill originally designed for textile workers which helped in formulating the Roosevelt Administration's first Fair Labor Standards Act.

Edelman was born in Belleville, N. J. He was taken to England as a child and at the age of 14 was the country's youngest branch secretary of the Independent Labor Party. He worked on newspapers in London and was active in aiding woolen and farm workers before returning to the U.S. in 1916.

After army service during World War I, he joined the staff of the Hosiery Workers and was that union's research director from 1926 to 1937. He also had worked on newspapers in Springfield, Mass.; Camden, N. J., and Reading, Pa., and in 1924 served as Pennsylvania manager of Sen. Robert LaFollette's presidential campaign.

He wrote a report on old age pensions for Gov. Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania and was the leading figure in setting up the Carl Mackley houses in Philadelphia, sponsored by the Hosiery Workers and the first of many low-cost housing projects backed by labor unions.

Edelman was the first eastern Pennsylvania regional director of the former CIO and was an early member of the Newspaper Guild. He helped direct strikes of Hosiery Workers in Reading, rayon workers in Elizabethton, Tenn., and cotton workers in Danville, Va.

He was a leader in establishing both the Labor Housing Conference and the Public Housing Conference, and was active in the National Consumers League and the National Policy Committee.

He will continue to live in Arlington, Va., with his wife, Kate Van Eaton Edelman, a former social worker.

The TWUA's new legislative director is William M. DuChessi, the union's COPE director.

Oil Union Convention Votes Per Capita Rise

Chicago—Pres. O. A. Knight and three other officers of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers easily overcame election opposition to win new terms here at a convention which raised per capita dues to finance expanded organizing efforts.

Some 700 delegates, after days of debate, voted to increase the monthly dues payments by locals to the international union from $2 to $2.55 and allocated 40 cents of the increase to operating expenses and 15 cents to the defense fund.

With more funds in sight, effective with December dues payments, the OCAW's seventh biennial convention voted salary raises for the officers and staff members—their first since 1957 or, in some cases, 1959. Knight will get a $2,500 annual raise to $17,500. Boosts of $1,500 go to Vice Presidents Elwood D. Swisher and Ben J. Schafer, Sec.-Treas. A. F. Grospiron and the nine district directors. Staff representatives will get an extra $1,000 on Jan. 1.

In major convention speeches, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) called for a Senate investigation of management use of supervisors as a strikebreaking force, and AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan asked all union members to "get into the fight" against John Birch Society followers and the radical right.

The delegates authorized Knight to name a committee of six to draw up a constitution and a timetable for a proposed merger with the Chemical Workers. A separate resolution affirmed that the best interests of both unions would be served by a merger of the two into one "large, strong and more effective" union.

A Chemical Workers' spokesman said his union's attitude on merger talks is "highly favorable" and that a committee would be named as soon as official word is received of the OCAW convention action.

Eight executive board members were re-elected and one new one was chosen — Kenneth Koch of Toledo, O., instead of William Miller, Argo, Ill.

The convention resolved to "redouble its efforts" in the field of political action; recommended that each local establish a year-around COPE unit; and heard Grospiron report that 30 local unions had achieved a 100 percent record on COPE collections in the past year.

Passed without opposition was a resolution directing OCAW officers to seek use of AFL-CIO internal disputes machinery to resolve jurisdictional disputes with affiliated unions that cross strike picket lines.

Barkan, in a report on political activity, cited a "boast" by Americans for Constitutional Action that 162 congressmen and 26 senators "follow the John Birch line" and said labor is in a "strategic position to fight them." He exhorted the delegates to move "onward to victory in '64."

Morse said that "big industry" is developing effective strikebreaking weapon by building up a supervisory force composed of "technicians with supervisory labels" who are "not supervisors at all." He said he would ask for a study by counsel for the Senate Labor Committee and a report for discussion by the Subcommittee on Labor, possibly as the "basis for a resolution."

Recent OCAW strikes have been prolonged by oil industry use of supervisors to operate struck plants, Morse said. "I saw it in the maritime industry," also, during the recent East Coast dock strike, he added.

Urging the delegates to recognize that there are "some issues you don't settle" on the picket line, he said legislation is needed "but not the type of legislation some people are talking about."

Better Pensions Won on Tankers

New York—The National Maritime Union has agreed on a contract extension with tanker-ship operators represented by the Tanker Service Committee with emphasis on an increase in employer payments to pension and automation funds.

The committee, whose members have 192 deep-sea tanker ships, agreed to extend the existing contract with the NMU by four years. That brings to 39,000 the number of seamen's jobs affected by improved pensions, vacation pay and other contract benefits.

Earlier the union had agreed on a similar contract extension with operators of 370 American-flag passenger and freighter ships in the Atlantic and Gulf Coast service. Slated for talks next are five firms operating 17 collier vessels.

A MAJOR EVENT of 1963 for labor was the White House meeting at which AFL-CIO union leaders pledged full support for the President's civil rights legislation and called for an end to all forms of discrimination. In the picture, Kennedy addresses an audience of about 300.

Parades, Speeches and Outings Highlight Labor's Own Holiday

(Continued from Page 1)

ward improving both the strength of our national society and the quality of our national life," Kennedy concluded.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in his Labor Day statement stressed the need of stimulating the economy to provide more jobs. He emphasized the importance of cutting income taxes, extending wage-hour coverage, providing "in general, better pay for all," and urged an increase in government spending for public works.

"Unless and until our country meets this acute problem of unemployment," he continued, "it cannot deal effectively with a most vital phase of the civil rights struggle—the fight for equal opportunity. Unless there are jobs available, equality of opportunity—regardless of race, creed or color—is meaningless. . . .

"America must be a land of opportunity—not for most of its people but for all of them. Where there is no work, there is no hope. Jobs for all is very much more than a slogan—it is basic to the fulfillment of the American ideal and to the worldwide strengthening of human freedom."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler hailed "one long-needed step" the nation has taken "in the fight against discrimination"—enactment of the equal pay for women law.

While deploring discrimination against women, he declared that "the abuses perpetrated against Negroes are infinitely worse and more widespread" and that it is "entirely proper" that most of the emphasis has been centered on racial bias.

"As so often proves to be the case," he concluded, "doing the right thing will pay dividends in many other ways. The AFL-CIO will, as always, continue to fight for what is right, knowing that what is right is also best for workers and for the nation."

The largest parade was expected to be that in New York, where a Labor Day march is held every other year. The New York City AFL-CIO committee in charge predicted it will be "the most dramatic and exciting ever," but no effort was being made to surpass the 1961 high mark of 200,000 marchers. Beginning at 10 a.m., it was to move up Fifth Ave. from 26th St. to 60th St., with the last marchers scheduled to pass the reviewing stand no later than 6 p.m. The parade two years ago lasted 11 hours.

Parades also were planned in, among other places, Boston, Chicago, East St. Louis, Atlanta, Decatur, Ill. and Decatur, Ala.; Tuscaloosa and Sheffield, Ala., and Lake County, Ind.

Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers was scheduled to speak at the West Virginia Centennial Labor Day observance at Wheeling. Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was to address a Boston breakfast following a Labor Day Mass. Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers was listed to address a rally in Denver touching off the Mile High United Fund drive.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller was to speak in Madison, Wis.; Tilford E. Dudley, in charge of the AFL-CIO Speakers Bureau, in Galesburg, Ill., and William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., in Honolulu as representative of Meany and Haggerty. Pres. James G. Patton of the Farmers Union will speak at a statewide farmer-labor rally in Henryetta, Okla.

The Rhode Island AFL-CIO sponsored a statewide family picnic at Lincoln; Cincinnati organized labor built its observance around the slogan, "Let's Keep Labor in Labor Day." In Los Angeles, ceremonies honoring labor were to be held between the games of the Dodgers-Houston doubleheader. At Cloquet, Minn., a three-day celebration was to climax in a parade and picnic.

Other communities that planned picnics, rallies, barbecues or other outings include Worcester, Mass.; Syracuse, N. Y.; Council Bluffs, Clinton and Ottumwa, Iowa.; Odessa, Tex.; Rockford, Ill.; Duluth, Minn., and Polk County (Des Moines), Iowa, where a Labor Day Exposition was to be held.

Greetings From Abroad

Greetings on North American labor's holiday came from the trade union movements of other countries.

Gen. Sec. Seiki Amaike of the Japan United Congress of Labor (Dohmei-Kaigi) "hailed" the growth and "constructive influence which your unions have exerted in the interest of peace, democracy and raising living standards for the masses of the people" and declared that Japanese workers, "committed to the highest ideals of the free world," look forward to continued friendly relations with U.S. workers.

The free labor movements of Latin America and the Caribbean area, through a message from Sec. Gen. Arturo Jauregui of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), expressed solidarity with North American workers "in their struggle to achieve full employment, higher living standards for the workers, civil rights, total racial integration and equal rights for women workers; to achieve the development of new projects which will stimulate employment and the reduction of weekly working hours."

Labor Day statements came from many sources. The day reminded Sec. of Defense Robert S. McNamara of "the great and continuing contribution of the American worker to our nation's strength."

"National security is dependent not only on machines but also on the working man and woman—the most precious resource of our country," he added. "The American worker can look with pride upon his essential role in the production-military team that has made our nation strong and keeps it secure. This team will and must continue its accomplishments in the vital days ahead."

Pres. Raymond D. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO called on union members to "accept the new dimensions of labor's responsibility" and to "recapture the dedication, the sense of mission and the crusading spirit that once animated the labor movement."

Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the Calif. AFL-CIO asserted that labor "must seek greater unity of purpose and action than we have ever attained before" if it is to meet "vast" challenges "with the same spirit of brotherhood and moral purpose that has cemented our efforts in the past."

Rail Labor Message

Chairman George E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association expressed the Labor Day wish that "labor and management can join together in providing this needed industry with more aptitude, more zeal and more cooperation" because "united, we can give our country the best railroad transportation in the world."

Pres. David Archer of the Ontario Federation of Labor, addressing himself primarily to Canadian workers, declared "there is no reason why we should not look forward to the future with confidence."

"The future can only be hampered," he said, "if we allow a few selfish people in management, companies or unions to place their own self-interest above that of the country's good. The trade union must assume its traditional role of exposing those who would sell us short to further their own self-interest."

Labor Day traditionally marks the start of Union Label Week, the annual reminder of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to union members to look for the union label, union shop card and union service button when buying. This year special emphasis is placed on the Labor Day safety campaign.

July Index at 107.1:

Food, Gasoline Push CPI to Record High

Paced by "substantial increases" in food and gasoline prices, the government's consumer price index jumped sharply by one-half of 1 percent in July to a new high.

The July increase combined with the four-tenths of 1 percent rise in June to make the sharpest two-month hike in the past four years.

The July index at 107.1 will bring cost-of-living allowances based on quarterly reviews to more than 1 million workers, primarily in the auto, aerospace, farm and construction equipment industries. The increases will range from 1 to 3 cents an hour.

The sizable increase in consumer prices between June and July and a seasonal cutback on the factory workweek during the month resulted in a drop in factory workers' take-home pay and real earnings.

Take-home pay decreased by 40 cents in July to $87.78 for a worker with three dependents but was still $2 above the year-ago figure. Real earnings showed a substantially greater reduction than spendable earnings, dropping 76 cents to $81.26, and only 70 cents higher than a year ago.

The July 1963 index was 1.5 percent higher than a year earlier primarily because of higher prices for food, housing, medical care and tobacco.

Between June and July of this year food prices jumped 1.1 percent, mostly because of sharp increases in pork and fresh vegetables. On a year-to-year comparison, food prices averaged 2.3 percent higher primarily because of hikes of 8 percent for fruits and vegetables, nearly 2 percent for bread and more than 4 percent for eggs.

The retail price of sugar dropped in July but remained 35 percent above a year earlier.

Prices for most major types of goods and services advanced over the month, with transportation costs up four-tenths of 1 percent, due primarily to higher gasoline prices, partially offset by declines in new car prices. Tobacco products were up four-tenths of 1 percent in the month and were 3.9 percent higher than a year ago.

In addition to the auto-aerospace cost-of-living wage increases, an additional 25,000 workers, mostly in trucking, will pick up from 1 to 8 cents an hour, and another 16,000 workers will receive 2.5 to 4.5 cents an hour based on reviews of city indexes, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Teachers' Convention Backs New York Local

New York—If this city's teachers are forced to strike on Sept. 9 when school is resumed, they will have the support of the American Federation of Teachers, their parent union.

By an overwhelming vote, the 800 delegates to the 47th annual AFT convention here took this action at their closing session. This marks the first time the national organization has acted to support a threatened strike by an affiliate.

In speaking in favor of the resolution, Charles Cogen, local president, declared that the impending strike, and the two past ones, were on "moral issues."

The strike of Nov. 7, 1960, he said, had been brought about because of "broken promises" made by a now-replaced school board when the teachers were fighting for the principle of collective bargaining. The strike on April 11, 1962, was forced on the teachers when they were being used as a "political football" between the city administration and the state government, he continued.

"And the threatened strike," he said, "is also a moral issue, not a bread-and-butter item."

Cogen's organization, AFT Local 2, is the collective bargaining agent for the city's 43,000 teachers. In the event of a strike, the school board has said that it would invoke the state's Condon-Wadlin Act, which forbids strikes by public employes, and provides severe penalties.

This possibility was also voiced by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), a featured speaker. He told the convention that he admired the militancy of the teachers, but advised them to abide by the state's law and said that mediation of the dispute might be the solution. Cogen disagreed with Javits about both strike action and mediation, declaring that a walkout would be used only as a last resort and that mediation would be a weak substitute if "something could be worked out through collective bargaining."

Other actions by the convention expressed support of the then pending Aug. 28 civil rights demonstration in Washington; urged setting up teachers' conferences to help efforts to desegregate schools; supported fair employment practices, and took a strong stand against forced participation in religious exercises.

A sharply worded resolution took to task school administrators who designate teachers' organizations to which their staff members must belong. These administrators, with the support of state education authorities, name non-union organizations, thereby making it difficult for the AFT to make any headway. A committee of AFT members was formed to investigate the situation.

Prouty Appointed To URW Post

Denver—Appointment of Keith Prouty, for the past five years research director of the Connecticut AFL-CIO, as research director of the Rubber Workers was confirmed at a meeting of the URW executive board here.

Prouty, 42, has been a member of URW Local 338, New Haven; Local 93, West Haven, and Local 45, Naugatuck. His interest in trade unionism dates back to the time he served as a 21-year-old deckhand on an oil tanker.

A native of Evanston, Ill., he was graduated in economics by Dartmouth College

Farm Leader Backs $1.25 Minimum Wage

Kalamazoo, Mich.—A state minimum wage of $1.25 an hour for a 40-hour week would be a boon to Michigan's economy, Pres. Ernie Sawyer of the Michigan Farmers Union testified at a hearing held by the Special Legislative Committee on Minimum Wages.

'In Common Brotherhood:'

Showings Scheduled For Labor Day Film

The television film, In Common Brotherhood, depicting the worldwide activities of the AFL-CIO and its efforts in helping build free labor movements in other countries, will be shown on nearly 70 local TV stations on Labor Day or the days immediately preceding. Thereafter the 16-mm. film will be available for use by other stations, union conventions and local meetings.

A list of stations that have scheduled showings in connection with the Labor Day weekend follows:

CITY-STATE	STATION	DATE	TIME
*Birmingham, Ala.	WAIQ	Sept. 2	8:30 p.m.
*Birmingham, Ala.	WBIQ	Sept. 2	8:30 p.m.
*Birmingham, Ala.	WCIQ	Sept. 2	8:30 p.m.
*Birmingham, Ala.	WDIQ	Sept. 2	8:30 p.m.
Tucson, Ariz.	KVOA	Aug. 31	after ball game
Los Angeles, Calif.	KABC	Sept. 1	11:15 p.m.
*Sacramento, Calif.	KVIE	Sept. 2	7:30 p.m.
San Diego, Calif.	KOGO	Sept. 1	1:30 p.m.
*San Francisco, Calif.	KQED	Sept. 2	7:30 p.m.
Denver, Colo.	KLZ	Aug. 31	9:30 p.m.
Hartford, Conn.	WTIC	Sept. 2	10:30 p.m.
New Haven, Conn.	WNHC	Sept. 1	11:30 a.m.
Washington, D. C.	WTOP	Sept. 2	6:00 p.m.
*Tampa, Fla.	WEDU	Sept. 2	3:30 p.m.
		Sept. 4	9:30 p.m.
Miami, Fla.	WTVJ	Aug. 31	3:30 p.m.
Atlanta, Ga.	WSB	Sept. 1	12:30 p.m.
Chicago, Ill.	WGN	Sept. 2	9:30 p.m.
Moline, Ill.	WQAD	Sept. 1	2:00 p.m.
Indianapolis, Ind.	WISH	Sept. 1	4:00 p.m.
Louisville, Ky.	WHAS	Aug. 31	5:00 p.m.
Wichita, Kan.	KAKE	Sept. 2	7:00 p.m.
New Orleans, La.	WDSU	Sept. 1	11:00 a.m.
*Boston, Mass.	WGBH	Sept. 2	10:30 p.m.
Boston, Mass.	WHDH	Sept. 1	5:00 p.m.
Springfield, Mass.	WWLP	Sept. 1	12:00 noon
Baltimore, Md.	WBAL	Sept. 1	3:30 p.m.
Detroit, Mich.	CKLW	Sept. 1	9:00 p.m.
Detroit, Mich.	WXYZ	Aug. 31	4:00 p.m.
Kalamazoo, Mich.	WKZO	Sept. 3	4:00 p.m.
Duluth, Minn.	KDAL	Sept. 2	12:00 noon
*St. Paul, Minn.	KTCA	Sept. 2	8:30 p.m.
Kansas City, Mo.	WDAF	Sept. 2	1:00 p.m.
*St. Louis, Mo.	KETC	Sept. 10	9:30 p.m.
		Sept. 13	8:30 p.m.
St. Louis, Mo.	KSD	Sept. 1	4:00 p.m.
*Lincoln, Neb.	KUON	Sept. 2	10:00 p.m.
Albuquerque, N. M.	KOAT	Sept. 2	10:15 p.m.
Albany, N. Y.	WAST	Sept. 1	3:00 p.m.
Binghamton, N. Y.	WNBF	Sept. 2	10:30 p.m.
New York, N. Y.	WNYC	Sept. 2	4:00 p.m.
New York, N. Y.	WOR	Aug. 31	7:00 p.m.
Rochester, N. Y.	WHEC	Sept. 1	4:30 p.m.
Syracuse, N. Y.	WHEN	Check local listing
Utica, N. Y.	WKTV	Sept. 1	5:00 p.m.
Schenectady, N. Y.	WRGB	Aug. 31	4:30 p.m.
Charlotte, N. C.	WSOC	Aug. 31	5:00 p.m.
Dayton, O.	WHIO	Sept. 1	1:30 p.m.
Cleveland, O.	WEWS	Sept. 1	10:30 p.m.
Columbus, O.	WTVN	Check local listing
Youngstown, O.	WKBN	Aug. 31	4:30 p.m.
*Oklahoma City, Okla.	KETA	Sept. 2	9:00 p.m.
*Tulsa, Okla.	KOED	Sept. 2	9:00 p.m.
*Corvallis, Ore.	KOAC	Aug. 30	8:30 p.m.
Portland, Ore.	KGW	Sept. 1	5:00 p.m.
*Portland, Ore.	KOAP	Aug. 30	8:30 p.m.
Philadelphia, Pa.	WFIL	Sept. 2	1:45 p.m.
*Pittsburgh, Pa.	WQED	Sept. 2	8:45 p.m.
Harrisburg, Pa.	WTPA	Sept. 2	1:30 p.m.
Lancaster, Pa.	WGAL	Sept. 2	4:30 p.m.
Chattanooga, Tenn.	WTVC	Sept. 1	2:00 p.m.
Memphis, Tenn.	WHBQ	Sept. 1	1:00 p.m.
Dallas, Tex.	WFAA	Sept. 1	12:30 p.m.
Houston, Tex.	KPRC	Sept. 1	10:15 p.m.
San Antonio, Tex.	WOAI	Sept. 2	5:00 p.m.
Salt Lake City, Utah	KUTV	Sept. 2	6:30 p.m.
Harrisonburg, Va.	WSVA	Sept. 2	10:30 p.m.
Portsmouth, Va.	WAVY	Aug. 31	1:00 p.m.
*Seattle, Wash.	KCTS	Aug. 30	9:00 p.m.
*Yakima, Wash.	KYVE	Aug. 30	9:00 p.m.
Milwaukee, Wis.	WISN	Sept. 3	6:30 p.m.

* Educational station.

EVEN IF THINGS DO GO WILD!
Don't forget
UNION LABEL WEEK
SEPT. 2-8
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

WASHINGTON CIVIL RIGHTS DEMONSTRATION Aug. 28 saw these delegations from, top to bottom, Building Service Employes, Ladies' Garment Workers, Steelworkers, among the union groups marching up Constitution Ave. to the Lincoln Memorial.

Unions Join in Dramatic March To Urge Support for Rights Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

leaders following the demonstration and pledged that his Administration would maintain efforts for its civil rights bill and "also proposals to broaden" job-creating and training programs.

"This nation can afford to achieve the goals of a full employment policy—it cannot afford to permit the potential skills and educational capacity of its citizens to be unrealized," he declared.

A. Philip Randolph, director of the march, and Auto Workers' Pres. Walter P. Reuther were the ranking labor representatives present. Randolph is president of the Sleeping Car Porters; both are AFL-CIO vice presidents.

Action This Year

Randolph said the group was "looking forward" to bipartisan support of the pending civil rights measure and to strengthening amendments, such as a fair employment law and injunctive powers for the Justice Dept. in rights cases.

"It is our belief that it is possible to get civil rights legislation enacted in this Congress," he said.

Reuther said the task ahead was "to take the tools" to be provided by civil rights legislation and use them on the "day-to-day job of fighting discrimination."

Dr. Martin Luther King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, stirred the gathering. It had assembled, he said, "to remind America of the fierce urgency of now . . ."

The 10 civil rights leaders who met early in the day with Democratic and Republican congressional leaders and later with the President at the White House pressed for the following program:

- A comprehensive civil rights bill from the present Congress, including such items as access to public accommodations, adequate and integrated education, protection of the right to vote, better housing and authority for the attorney-general to seek injunctions on behalf of individuals whose constitutional rights are violated.
- A federal Fair Employment Practices Act barring discrimination in employment.
- A massive federal program to train and place unemployed workers.
- Withholding of federal funds from all programs in which discrimination exists.
- A stronger executive order prohibiting discrimination in all housing programs supported by federal funds.
- A boost in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour; the minimum is scheduled to rise to $1.25 on Sept. 3.
- Extension of the federal wage-hour law to cover millions still unprotected.
- Desegregation of all public schools in 1963.
- A reduction in congressional seats where citizens are denied the right to vote.

DELEGATIONS JOIN THE MARCH from the Auto Workers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Labor Day 1963

FREE TRADE UNIONS are an integral part of the fabric of American society. Without them the dignity and freedom of American workers, their standard of living, could not have been attained.

Yet at this Labor Day, 77 years after the founding of the American Federation of Labor, there is at best a grudging acceptance of trade unions by much of American business and industry. In many cases—and in some areas of the country—unions are bitterly and brutally opposed.

In the nearly 20 years since the end of World War II the nation has witnessed an almost unrelenting attack on unions and unionism. There has been a constant stream of proposals for repressive and punitive legislation. There is a persistent propaganda that permeates the mass media, creating a false and distorted picture of the organizations formed by American workers collectively to advance their's and the nation's well-being.

The attacks on the labor movement from those who fear labor's goal of social justice for all Americans can, perhaps, be explained in social and economic terms. But it is difficult to understand those who rail at unions for their "loss of idealism," their supposed "stagnation" and loss of "militancy."

Organized labor has always been and is today in the forefront of the battle for progress, for a better tomorrow. In Congress, in the state legislatures, in the cities, it is the people's lobby, the only organized group speaking for all the people, seeking to advance broad social and economic programs that benefit all Americans.

It is because the trade union movement is in the vanguard of the never-ending battle for freedom and social justice that it is under attack from those who cling to the power stemming from narrow self-interest, from those who place their personal gain above that of the nation.

* * *

THE SOCIAL REVOLUTION that is inherent in the civil rights struggle parallels labor's own battle for social justice. The two are inseparable.

They are particularly inseparable on the basic economic level, for a high level of employment and economic activity is the key to wiping out not only the bitter, degrading taste of racial discrimination but the outrageously high rate of joblessness among Negroes and the minority groups.

For the past six years organized labor has been almost alone among the various groups in American life in pinpointing and campaigning for measures to overcome the high, persistent unemployment—the key to decent incomes and living standards for all workers, including Negroes.

American business and industry as represented through its organizations—the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce—has fought labor at every turn on its economic program, just as it has opposed fair employment practices legislation and union efforts to write anti-discrimination clauses into contracts.

There are many facets to the civil rights struggle, including the drive by labor to stamp out all traces of discrimination in trade union ranks. But the key, the instrument that can give meaning to equal opportunity, is a full employment society where all who seek work can find work.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, August 31, 1963 No. 35

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Specter at the Gate

Religious Groups Speak Out:

Labor Day Statements Stress Ethical Responsibility of Church

THE ETHICAL responsibility of churches and their members for improving the economic and social welfare of all Americans was stressed in Labor Day statements by Jewish, Catholic and Protestant denominational bodies.

The National Council of Churches, in a Labor Sunday statement of an observance dating from 1910, advises Protestant worshipers that economic systems which do not serve human beings adequately must be "overhauled, adjusted or remade" to meet the needs of living persons.

The theme of this year's observance is: "A Christian's calling—to seek a decent and secure living for all men."

The message strikes out against "the scandal of discrimination — giving Negroes half the chance of white persons in getting jobs, denying them employment by discriminatory practices by trade unions and employers, and giving them substantially less for doing the same service."

The council, calling on member communions and individual church congregations to engage in serious study of "the meaning of the Christian faith for our economic situation," observes that "man was not made for economic systems, but economic systems were made for men."

The statement, issued through the council's Dept. of the Church & Economic Life, was to be read in thousands of Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches Sept. 1. It emphasizes the theme that "the basic social imperative for Christians today is to apply God's commandment that we love our neighbors as ourselves to the facts and problems of a world of potential abundance."

Noting that amid this abundance there are frustrating problems on which Christians must work, the council lists unemployment, poverty, and discrimination in employment on the basis of sex and race as crucial issues which followers of Christ must help remove.

THE HEAD of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference calls attention to the overriding problem of equal employment opportunity.

"The ultimate success of the crusade for interracial justice," says Msgr. George G. Higgins, "will largely depend on the willingness of labor and management to adopt and effectively enforce a universal policy of equal job opportunity for Negro workers in every industry and trade."

This is the "master key" to the solution of the total problem of race relations, he says, and adds:

"Complete economic justice for the Negro is not likely to be achieved until there is economic prosperity for all our citizens."

The statement, pointing out that Negroes in many occupations still are "last hired and first fired," says labor, management and government should take steps to protect the rights of other minorities also, such as Americans of Mexican, Puerto Rican, Indian and Asiatic descent.

It calls for specified action by the three groups, including these on the legislative front: a permanent federal Fair Employment Practices Committee with broad powers; FEPCs in each state to fight job discrimination and the Youth Employment Opportunity bill, now before Congress. Action should be taken also to help reduce unemployment, the conference holds.

THE SYNAGOGUE Council of America, observing that Judaism has always championed the rights of the laborer, extends greetings to working men and women and adds:

"Labor groups must continue to lend the weight of their tremendous power to bolster the forces working for peace and brotherhood."

It is a travesty, the council states, for discrimination to exist within labor and it hails the efforts of the "leadership of great and goodly men" to have the labor movement reflect the loftiest ideals of American life and the highest level of ethics in executing its program.

The labor movement, the statement says, must stand in the forefront of those working for civil rights for all regardless of religion, color or national origin.

Asserting that the challenge of automation can be a great blessing or "serve as a trigger for a tragic era," the council greets labor as a partner sharing with other elements in our society the building of a "heavenward-aspiring civilization" and "a major factor in making the good things of the earth more fully available to all God's children."

Morgan Says:

Congressional Fight on Aid Prudence or Shortsightedness?

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

LET US BEGIN on the solemn premise that foreign aid has become about as popular as having a rich uncle bequeath his fortune to the family drunk. The feeling has grown that it is an unwarranted waste of funds on undeserving, ungrateful and possibly un-American recipients who in all likelihood squander the money on questionable, uncapitalistic enterprises.

Morgan

Let us go further and declare that some foreign aid funds have been wasted on preposterous projects that never should have been started and that there are some aid bureaucrats, in the field and in Washington, who are more interested in perpetuating little empires of their own than in planning assistance programs that will be, sooner or later, self-liquidating.

Then let us examine the situation a little more closely in an effort to determine whether there hasn't been, on the basis of isolated mistakes and excesses, an injustifiably reckless disenchantment with the concept of aid, and a growing unreasoned impulse to chuck the baby out with the bath instead of rectifying errors and protecting the colossal investment we have already made in foreign assistance. In other words, is the performance now occupying the center of the stage in the House in which congressmen are busy hacking away at the body of the foreign aid bill an exercise in patriotic prudence for which the taxpayer should be everlastingly grateful, or is it one of the most shortsighted and puny-minded little dramas enacted on Capitol Hill in recent memory?

Let us take aid to India. A particularly spectacular controversy is swirling over this item, the most explosive aspect of which is an Indian request for funds to help build a big steel mill at Bokaro, 150 miles northwest of Calcutta.

Anti-Administration forces in Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, have plucked a basketful of juicy reasons to be against it. The project is huge. Its initial segment would cost nearly a billion dollars with the U.S. ponying up more than $500 million in foreign exchange on a loan basis over a period of years, India raising the rest at home. It would be the largest undertaking Washington has ever supported with aid funds anywhere. Our potential commitment may be scaled down but would still rival the $400 million the Soviets are supposed to be sinking into Egypt's Aswan dam over a decade. The mill would be government-owned, not run by private enterprise.

Beyond this smack of socialism, some congressmen are opposed to aid to India because, even though he is out of the picture now, they remember and resent the hateful image of Prime Minister Nehru's one-time confidant, Krishna Menon; because they suspiciously resent the fact that Nehru, despite Chinese aggression against him, still clings to a vestige of non-aligned neutralism and because Nehru is aggressively stubborn in his dispute over Kashmir with Pakistan.

Paradoxically enough, the size of Bokaro was recommended not by Marxists but by experts of U.S. Steel, who surveyed the project at Washington's request, doubled the outlay government officials had envisioned on the grounds it would be more economical in the long run.

AS FOR THE suspicion of socialism, retiring Ambassador John Kenneth Galbraith, himself a noted economist, has observed that a pragmatic combination of public and private ownership—such as in Scandinavia, Britain, Canada and New Zealand—has been quite compatible with personal liberty. Why should we run the risk of losing India, he asks in a recent Washington Post article, by denouncing public ownership as dogmatically and as narrowly as the Communists denounce private ownership?

Lose India? Who said we had her? We don't, of course, in the sense of an ally clearly aligned with the West. But where would the West and Asia be if India fell before the military or the political pressure of the Chinese? The great difference between the most populous experiment in democracy, it has been said, and the most populous experiment in Communism is that the Indians have been able to draw on outside resources and the Chinese—except for Soviet help which is now suspended—have not.

Nobody questions the need for the Bokaro mill. Indian industrialists, who can't afford to build it themselves, are begging for it. India, desperate for steel, now spends nearly $200 million a year on steel imports. Savings on that outlay for only three years would offset the foreign exchange required for the big plant. The need grows as India's population multiplies by 10 million persons a year. On its merits how can the Bokaro plan be faulted? Ah well, myopic congressmen bent on sabotaging foreign aid with emasculating amendments will find a way.

Washington Reports:

Electricity from Nuclear Energy Seen Major Source of Power

THE UNITED STATES will have nuclear energy for peaceful uses as a power source by 1970, according to Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), ranking majority member of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy and Rep. Craig Hosmer (R-Calif.), senior minority member of the committee.

The congressmen, interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program carried on almost 700 radio stations, said this additional source of electricity will be needed in many parts of the country. At present, electrical power developed from the atom has been too expensive for use except in countries that do not have coal, water, oil or other sources.

Holifield asserted that three plants authorized by the committee will determine the means of reducing the cost of nuclear power. The three will be the Southern California Edison Co. reactor at Camp Pendleton, Calif.; the Los Angeles Dept. of Water & Power reactor at Malibu, Calif.; and the Connecticut Yankee Atomic Power Station at Haddamneck, Conn.

Each of the plants, he pointed out, must make its findings available to other U.S. companies interested in nuclear power.

Holifield explained that the Malibu reactor will be 500,000 kilowats, that at Pendleton 400,000 kilowatts, and the New England installation 450,000 kilowatts. The largest reactor in the U.S. at present has a power of only 185,000 kilowatts.

"THEY WILL RUN, in round figures, around $100 million for capital investment," he explained. "About $15 to $16 million of that, in each case, will be government money."

Hosmer said that if this kind of development continues, "by the year 2,000, Americans will be spending $2 billion less than they would have to pay for electricity produced otherwise. This will mean a huge saving in fuel bills." At least half of the U.S. electricity may come from the atom at that time, he said.

The plants were set up in California and New England, Holifield said, because they are high-cost power areas as a result of having to import the fuel. Nuclear plants have the advantage, as far as Los Angeles and other cities are concerned, of not creating pollutants in the atmosphere as oil and coal do, he added.

"There is another great potential for these reactors and that is in producing fresh water from the sea," Hosmer declared. In California, which has water problems, "we will probably have to go nuclear to produce fresh water."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE 3RD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT of Tennessee, the late Estes Kefauver's district when he served five terms in the House, is now represented by W. E. Brock, a Republican elected last year after a conservative Democrat had been knocked out in a primary contest. Brock inserted in the Congressional Record a columnist's personal "exclusive" that Kefauver, in his last days, had become very apprehensive about the "monopoly power" of unions and in a "dramatic reversal" had "secretly and carefully planned" a major investigation by his Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee.

The columnist, Charles Bartlett, is responsible for his own report, of course. A Tennessean himself and a longtime reporter here, he naturally knew Kefauver well—as did many other reporters who have covered both the Senate and Kefauver's campaigns for the presidential nomination.

To this longtime friend of the senator, for example, it would have seemed far more natural for Kefauver to be concerned about job displacement from automation and about employment disqualifications arising from inadequate education than about the alleged union abuses theorized by a Chicago lawyer whose views Bartlett cited as a source of Kefauver's concern.

The lawyer's views are far more exaggerated and extreme, for example, than any that would have been admired by the late Sen. Robert A. Taft, to this reporter's certain knowledge.

The interest in the Bartlett column by Brock, the Chattanooga Republican who hopes to keep his House seat, is in any case something less than totally objective. By inserting the report in the Record, Brock got a chance to praise Kefauver, thus reaching even into the grave for his coattails, and one supposes that a reprint from the Congressional Record may become a Brock campaign document next year.

* * *

AS IT HAPPENS, a statement by Charles A. Caldwell, the senator's administrative assistant, indignantly repudiates Bartlett's report. Three days after Kefauver's death, Caldwell points out, Sen. Morse of Oregon placed in the Record the text of a speech given by Kefauver only last June 27 at the Retail Clerks convention in Chicago.

Said Kefauver on that occasion: "It sounds simple, easy and extremely reasonable to say that we will just put the unions under the anti-trust laws and there are some bills before the Judiciary Committee for the purpose. I don't think that the public generally recognizes what that would mean.

"The anti-trust laws were not made to apply to a man's labor. A man's labor, his activity and work, is not a commodity in commerce. That has always been the history and the attitude that we have taken.

"If you simply applied the anti-trust laws to labor, that would mean two people could not get together in a concert of action for the purpose of trying to get better working conditions or better wages. I don't want any part of that insofar as I am concerned. The labor movement is not going to be destroyed by placing it under the Sherman or Clayton anti-trust laws."

It would have been a "dramatic reversal" indeed if, between June 27 and Aug. 10, when Kefauver died, he had so sensationally changed his spots.

* * *

IN HEARINGS ON THE TEST-BAN TREATY, a few senators expressed more faith in the Joint Chiefs of Staff than in the civilians in the State and Defense Depts. and White House.

Yet civilians operate the country in things military in an infinite number of ways. The military departments in this fiscal year argued for more than $67 billion in defense funds—even after "careful scrutiny" on orders of the Budget Bureau to hold to the minimum. Defense Sec. McNamara in a personal review slashed the total by more than $13 billion.

"Safeguards" recommended by the Joint Chiefs and other technical experts are perfectly appropriate, but the role of the expert in our system should not be confused with that of responsible political officials.

NUCLEAR POWER for peaceful use is moving closer toward realization in the U.S. as the result of three new reactors being installed, said Rep. Craig Hosmer (R-Calif.), left, and Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.) in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Meany on Labor Day:

'Where There Is No Work, There Is No Hope'

AS WE IN THE LABOR MOVEMENT make our traditional Labor Day yearly inventory of our progress—and our prospects for the future—one problem stands out above all the rest. It is the state of the national economy.

By some measurements the nation is prosperous. Business profits are at a record high level. More automobiles were produced and sold this year than ever before in our history. Wages and salaries have risen steadily—but modestly; consumer prices have risen only slowly—but this is not the full picture.

Let us begin with unemployment. We have time and again pointed out that more than 5 percent of the American labor force cannot find jobs. Year in and year out, we find ourselves pointing to a danger which others want to ignore or try to brush aside.

As we have so often noted, the labor force is growing at least 50 percent faster in this decade than it has in the past. And at the same time, the elimination of jobs through automation and other technological changes proceeds at an ever-faster pace.

The facts are no less shocking because they are familiar. But what is even more shocking is the lack of any meaningful action or any visible sense of urgency outside the ranks of labor itself. After nearly six years, there is an attitude in some quarters that we are "learning to live with" a jobless rate of 5 percent—or even 6 percent.

This is intolerable. We in the AFL-CIO have pointed out, time after time, that behind the statistics, behind the percentages—are people. Fellow Americans, heads of families, forced through no fault of their own to suffer the misery and despair which inevitably follow in the wake of unemployment. It is a national disgrace to imply that this country can or has to "live with" these circumstances.

This has been a good year in the automobile industry. Yet it has provided employment for a little more than 550,000 workers. Compare this with 1955 when more than 700,000 workers on the payroll turned out some 200,000 fewer cars and trucks. This is the pattern everywhere—not only in factories, but in transportation, in mining, in banks, in retail stores and in offices.

The one basic way to break out of this pattern—which, if left alone, is a sure blueprint for disaster—is to have a greater growth in the national economy. If expanding enterprises were to replace the shrinking ones, if new products were developed and the demand for older ones showed a sharp increase, then new jobs would be created. By and large, this has not happened.

In view of the facts, it is logical to ask why has there been no new upward surge in the rate of unemployment. The explanation is that the Administration in Washington—though it has not asked for all the measures proposed by the AFL-CIO—has been able nevertheless to put in motion a considerable number of programs to stimulate economic growth.

To put it another way—by running very hard at the pace jointly established by the Administration and Congress, the economy has barely managed to stay in the same place. Even this much—and it is far from enough—is more than we can expect in the future, unless both the Administration and Congress do more to help.

THE GREATER NEED is greater purchasing power in the hands of the average consumer. This means lower income taxes, primarily for those in the low and medium tax brackets. This means higher wages, in particular another extension of coverage under the wage-hour law and, in general, better pay for all. This means an expansion in what the economists call the "public sector" of the economy. More money for school construction and teachers' salaries, for public works, for hospitals, highways and housing. This means greater protection—financial protection—under social security, led by a federal program of hospital insurance for the aged.

This also means, before long, a reduction in the basic work week to 35 hours. The plain truth is that simple arithmetic—and we will gladly provide the figures for anyone who doubts it—proves that all the other measures mentioned above, and all the other comparable programs proposed until now, will still fall short of bringing about full employment in the United States.

Persistent large-scale unemployment is at the root of the nation's most serious economic difficulties. Without basic improvement in our unemployment situation, without a considerable reduction in joblessness, in the number of unemployed, there can be no solution of the economic imbalance in our country.

More than that, unless and until our country meets this acute problem of unemployment, it cannot deal effectively with a most vital phase of the civil rights struggle—the fight for equal opportunity. Unless there are jobs available, equality of opportunity—regardless of race, color or creed—is meaningless.

Unemployment, especially among Negro workers, is not due solely to discrimination based on color. We must provide adequate training for this vital sector of our society so that it can take its place among our most skilled. This will promote good will and cooperation throughout our nation.

The country must have more jobs in order to speed up in progress in extending civil rights as well as ensuring a healthy national economy. In short, without a healthy economy, there can be no truly healthy civil rights situation.

OUR DOMESTIC situation is inseparable from our international position. Joblessness aggravates race discrimination and race discrimination weakens our economy. To the extent that we overcome joblessness and race discrimination, we succeed in making our economy healthy and ensure its future growth. Without such strengthened economy, our country cannot be in the best position to assure its national security and fufill its worldwide responsibilities in the promotion of human freedom, wellbeing and world peace.

Our country can never mobilize its full strength when talented Americans—young and old—find their way barred by economic obstacles too great to surmount, and when millions of Americans face chronic unemployment.

When American labor raises its voice today for jobs for all Americans—Negro and white Americans alike—it pleads for the most urgent need of millions of our citizens and serves the best interests of our entire nation—at home and abroad.

We fight against joblessness and discrimination not only as workers devoted to social justice and freedom—we also fight as patriotic Americans dedicated to furthering the ideals which have inspired our nation at its finest moments and enabled our people to build the United States into this place of pre-eminence as a powerful democracy dedicated to liberty and peace.

On this Labor Day, I address myself to all the working people of our land. I speak to the workers who are not yet members of our trade unions no less than to those already in our ranks. I speak also to Americans of every other economic grouping—farmers, professional managers, businessmen—I sincerely plead that you all support and fight against unemployment and discrimination.

By vigorously supporting our fight for an America free from unemployment and all discrimination, every American regardless of his or her walk of life will be promoting America's most vital interests. None of us can ever have any higher or more urgent interests than the best interests of all the American people.

America must be a land of opportunity—not for most of its people, but for all of them. Where there is no work, there is no hope. Jobs for all is very much more than a slogan—it is basic to the fulfillment of the American ideal and the world-wide strengthening of human freedom.

Schnitzler on Labor Day:

An Ancient Injustice Is Being Corrected

THIS LABOR DAY finds our country deeply engaged in a great, comprehensive effort to secure equal rights and equal opportunity for all Americans.

We in the AFL-CIO stand proudly in the forefront of that effort; and we will continue to do so until all forms of discrimination are obliterated from American life.

It is too early to predict with any degree of certainty what Congress will do with respect to the civil rights legislation it is now considering. There are reasonable grounds to expect good results. But as the AFL-CIO has often said, one bill or one series of bills is not likely to guarantee total results. The battle will go on, and we will wage it with all the resources at our command.

Most of the emphasis and nearly all the attention with respect to equal rights and equal opportunity has been centered on racial discrimination. This is entirely proper, since the abuses perpetrated against Negroes are infinitely worse and more widespread than those directed at other groups. Yet this is not the only form of discrimination.

Another form—which, except for a few interested organizations such as the AFL-CIO and those victimized by it, has attracted little public notice—is discrimination against women.

Hearings conducted by Congress in 1962 produced startling proof that in a wide range of occupations—in factories, in offices and in the service trades—women workers were paid considerably less money than men in the same establishment, doing the same jobs.

The worst differentials, of course, were found in non-union enterprises. But there were far too many instances where even collective bargaining had failed to overcome the practice.

In April of this year, after carefully reviewing the evidence, the President's Commission on the Status of Women—headed, until her death, by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt—formally endorsed federal legislation to establish by law the principle of equal pay for comparable work. As a member of the commission, I joined in that report.

THIS IS ONE AREA of discrimination in which a legislative victory has already been won. A bill providing equal pay for women was enacted by Congress and signed by the President early in June.

It is not a perfect bill. On behalf of the AFL-CIO, I had urged a stronger and more effective one. But at least the principle has been established, and an enforcement procedure created and assigned to the Dept. of Labor.

The law's provisions go into effect next January. They will have far-reaching effects, for the number of women in the nation's work-force is large and growing. It is estimated that by 1970, 30 million American women will be gainfully employed. Even today, there are more than 2.5 million women in AFL-CIO unions.

Thus, even at this stage, the nation has taken one long-needed step in the fight against discrimination. Like the much greater strides that remain to be taken, this will correct an ancient injustice. But like the measure still pending, it also will have a healthy impact on the economy by raising the wages of millions of working women.

As so often proves to be the case, doing the right thing will pay dividends in many other ways. The AFL-CIO will, as always, continue to fight for what is right, knowing that what is right is also best for workers and for the nation.

Text of ICFTU Greetings:

Major Challenges Face World Unions

ON LABOR DAY the international trade union movement traditionally sends its greetings to the workers of North America. The free workers of the world know that they can rely in their struggles upon their brothers in North America whose trade union movements have achieved such proud standards for the workers. But the battle is far from won. Both on the home front and on the international scene the trade union movement is faced by major challenges.

The goal of full employment which is still the foremost aim in North America has not yet been achieved. The retraining of workers displaced by increasing automation is one of the key problems to which the trade unions are applying their specialist knowledge and authority. In Canada the trade unions are engaged in a vigorous campaign for a national labor code which would establish basic national standards and protect basic labor rights.

These issues are also closely linked with the drive for the full implementation of civil rights and racial integration in the United States, a drive in which the trade unions are playing a leading role. Thanks to the unequivocal stand taken by the trade unions on the full equality of American Negro citizens "here and now", they have been able to play their full part in the continuing campaign of the international free trade union movement for racial equality everywhere. This action was given its full effect in the repeated interventions of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions before the Intl. Labor Organization and the United Nations against the apartheid policy of the South African government.

Another important social achievement in the United States, the enactment of equal pay for women in most trades and industries, will not fail to have important repercussions on the international field. A valuable contribution to trade union education was provided by the Canadian Labor Congress which in June this year opened the Canadian Labor College in Montreal.

The international free trade union movement, voicing the longings of the workers of the world for peace, is pursuing its steady campaign to achieve universal controlled disarmament. A first step has been made in that field as a result of the signing of the treaty banning nuclear tests in the atmosphere, at sea and in space.

The ICFTU greets the workers of North America on this Labor Day, proud in the knowledge that it is assured of their solidarity in its fight for bread, peace, freedom and social justice for all.

Industrial Union Dept. Says:

Cause for 'Cautious Optimism' Seen in Eased World Tensions

(The following is extracted from the Labor Day statement of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.).

THE Industrial Union Dept. extends warm fraternal greetings to the working people of the free world and to their unions on this holiday of U.S. labor. We greet all peoples with good will and pledge our solidarity in the struggle to extend and strengthen freedom everywhere.

On this Labor Day, there is cause for cautious optimism. The test ban treaty negotiated with the Soviet Union is being viewed by the world as a small but positive step toward peace and relaxation of international tensions.

The world now has before it the possibility of peaceful competition and the hope of arms reduction. While true peace is still a distant goal, we can no longer ignore the need to consider alternatives to armaments.

Arms reduction offers to American labor great hope for higher living standards, elimination of domestic poverty and greater leisure. Needed now are private and government plans and programs to fill any gap left by arms reduction. Labor's program for greater educational opportunity, increased public works and more services to the American people is an essential part of any domestic planning for a more peaceful world.

The civil rights fight has aroused the conscience of all men of good will. Until that fight is won, the American Dream will not have come true and all of us will carry a great burden of guilt. Industrial labor hails the civil rights struggle and the nonviolent tactics employed. It pledges full support both for effective legislation and its implementation.

The major domestic economic problem is jobs for the American people. Despite general prosperity for many, more than 5.5 percent of the nation's labor force remains unemployed. Unless the economy is adequately stimulated, we may again face the problem of recession this coming winter. High unemployment plus an economic slowdown could produce an explosive situation. Needed now is a tax cut that will stimulate consumer demand.

UNDER PRESENT circumstances, automation has become a threat to jobs and individual security. If the promise of this new technique is to be fulfilled, part of today's high productivity must be translated into greater leisure. Because of the ability to produce ever more goods and services with less manpower, this nation now has a unique opportunity to meet the pressing needs evident in the public sector.

We urge every member of every IUD union to write to his congressman supporting a people-oriented tax cut, old age hospital care, expanded public works, aid to education, civil rights legislation, the President's foreign aid program, and the test ban treaty.

Labor Day 1963 still sees labor's basic job of organization uncompleted. Emboldened by present complacency, anti-labor congressmen are demanding added punitive anti-labor legislation. Our answer to those who would destroy the National Labor Relations Act by stripping the Labor Board of its power to rule on unfair labor practice charges must be greater determination to organize.

Union members must stand on guard against the radical right who would induce national hysteria so that democracy will be replaced by anarchy and the nation will be reduced to an impotent confederation. Labor's strength must be mobilized to defeat the far right at the polls wherever it asserts itself. With faith in the democratic values of our society, we can move forward to a new liberalism.

Building Trades Dept. Says:

Construction Industry Lagging Behind Nation's Growing Needs

(The following is excerpted from the Labor Day message of Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.).

ON THIS LABOR DAY we find that the nation's construction deeds are not measuring up to its needs. There is an unfortunately sharp contrast between current construction activity and the potential. Construction activity at midyear had reached a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $64 billion. As high as that level was, unemployment in the building trades still ranged from 7 to 30 percent, dependent upon conditions in each major locality.

It cannot be said that the construction industry is lagging behind the general economic upturn in the country. On the contrary, the spurt in building activity this year has helped to stimulate and give solid support to the overall business recovery.

But we still are not building enough homes for our rapidly increasing population. We haven't begun to make up the enormous deficit in schools, hospitals, modern airports and community facilities.

All this will take money. Most of it will have to come from government sources. Local and state governments continue to plead poverty, while Congress is becoming increasingly obstinate in refusing to appropriate federal funds for what the majority of conservative-minded lawmakers consider local and state responsibilities.

Unless there is a sharp cut in the number of conservatives in Congress as a result of next year's elections, we will probably face interminable delays in getting started on the nation's most important unfinished business—building up the real strength of our country.

A CONSIDERABLE amount of progress has been made in this year in reducing discrimination against minority groups in the fields of education, public accommodations, government service, voting and industrial employment.

This cause was furthered on June 21 when the general presidents of the 18 national and international unions affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Dept. issued an important statement calling upon local unions to adhere to a policy of non-discrimination on the grounds of race, creed, or color in connection with union membership, job referrals and apprentice candidates. This action was followed up by directives issued by the separate internationals to their own local unions.

On August 9, a joint labor-management committee of the Construction Industry Joint Conference went to see Sec. of Labor Wirtz. We presented detailed criticism of the proposed federal [apprenticeship] regulations in writing. We also submitted an additional proposal.

This proposal called for advance consultation and cooperation with the joint committee by the Labor Dept. before any attempt to invoke sanctions in any particular case. We also offered a supplementary three-point program to implement the four-point policy statement adopted by the general presidents. This provided that local joint apprenticeship committees should choose apprentices on the basis of qualifications only, that if any other standard had been used it should be revised accordingly and that an appeals board would be set up to review any individual complaint of discrimination.

Sec. Wirtz accepted both our proposal and offer. He considered it, as we did, of constructive advance. He agreed to meet regularly once a month with our committee to consider all relevant matters.

This was an important forward step. It probably will not end all problems, but it should solve many. Labor and management working together represent the strongest civilian force in America and the government should, indeed, welcome their cooperation.

Pres. Jodoin's Message:

CLC Urges Realism In Jobless Approach

The following is excerpted from the Labor Day statement of Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress.

LABOR DAY IS MORE than a holiday—it is a time for rededication of the labor movement in its efforts on behalf of all workers. The fact that on this day many workers and their families enjoy a time of relaxation takes nothing from this serious purpose of our movement.

At the same time we are very conscious that a great many Canadians are still deprived of the opportunity to work because of unemployment.

Labor Day marks the turn of the season and brings with it the approach of a period when unemployment rates traditionally rise. There has been a growing awareness of the seriousness of this situation; but there has not been a realistic approach to finding a solution.

This, however, is only one of several forms of unemployment from which we have been suffering. There is the unemployment which results from structural changes in our economy. Where such situations arise there should be special assistance to industries which show hope of continuing. If an industry finds itself doomed by changing conditions, then adequate provision must be made for retraining or relocating workers, of perhaps both.

In some parts of the country we are faced with particular situations in an area or a community. Tax incentives alone are inadequate to meet the needs of such situations. These problems call for a program related to the economic resources of the area and designed on a long-term basis to provide people with work at decent wages.

The need now is for a bold, imaginative and realistic approach.

A great deal has been heard during the past year about new developments in labor-management relations. It is likely that even more will be heard during the next year.

The Canadian Labor Congress is quite prepared to play its full role in the development of better relationships. We do this while retaining to the full our right to press for what we believe to be just and right for the people.

There will not be the slightest easing of our efforts to obtain proper wage rates, to establish good working conditions, and to advance social benefits. We are convinced that through such efforts a free trade union organization can make a great contribution to the future of Canada, just as it has in the past.

Liberal-Right Fight Crystallizes:

Presidential Campaign Seen '64 Highlight Crises In Sight For Labor

By Alexander Uhl

AS LABOR DAY 1963 fades, both the United States and the labor movement with it will enter a period crucial for all Americans.

Next year is a presidential election year. For three years the Kennedy Administration has wrestled with huge problems—preservation of peace, the cold war with communism, Castro in Cuba, foreign aid, a Latin America threatened by revolution, unemployment, the desperate need for better American educational facilities, the need for public works, tax reduction and reform, hospital insurance for the aged through social security . . . the list is endless and labor's vital interest in every item is just as endless.

The 1964 elections are important in themselves. They call once more upon the nation to choose up sides, to vote for or against liberals, middle-of-the-roaders, conservatives and reactionaries.

But the 1964 elections have even deeper meaning than normal—more perhaps for organized workers than for any other segment of the population. For the first time in many years, the battle between the extreme right wing and liberals has been crystallized. The American right wing—with the Birchites far out in right field—is seeking to take over the Republican Party and line it up as firmly as possible with reaction in the South.

They have rallied behind Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), whose hostility toward liberal causes in general and organized labor in particular is well known. Behind their hostility to every liberal measure that has been enacted since the earliest days of the New Deal lies a determination to weaken unions and union causes.

They will make their big pitch next year. Organized labor will be faced with the job of spearheading the fight against them.

'Program Ominous'

The Goldwater program for labor is ominous. He wants to put unions under the anti-trust laws; he wants special taxation on unions; he would strengthen injunction powers against unions; he would make the open shop compulsory. In brief, he would tip the scales as far as he could toward management.

A year or so ago the Goldwater "boom" could be taken lightly. It no longer can. Day after day, it becomes increasingly clear that the extremists of the right wing are determined to bull their way to a Goldwater nomination in 1964.

Nor does 1964 promise any improvement on the job front. The U.S. now has passed the 70 million job figure, yet unemployment continues stubbornly high. There are no indications that during the 1960s the American economy will produce the 12 million new jobs that will be needed to absorb the record-breaking number of young people entering the labor market.

More vital to labor is the fact that while automation grows daily, no real answer in terms of the magnitude of the problem yet has been found to the job losses that keep piling up. Industry for the most part keeps turning its back on the problem with the soothing promise that new jobs will be created despite the objective evidence that they are not. Neither has industry faced up to the responsibility that it must assume for discarding thousands of men and women who frequently have given their lives to the service of one company.

CALIFORNIA GOV. Edmund "Pat" Brown (D) won re-election handily in one of 1962's decisive political elections by sinking former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon (R). The picture shows Brown on the campaign trail speaking to a group of Machinists at a Sterling Electric Co. plant.

More than ever, labor's call for a shorter work week will necessarily become more urgent in the year ahead.

The civil rights battle already has had a strong impact on organized labor, an impact that is certain to grow as apprenticeship programs and fair employment programs become more widespread. The willingness of organized labor to face up to the urgency of the civil rights struggle during 1963 was a highwater mark in what has become a revolution. Even greater statesmanship will be required in the year ahead as thousands of Negroes seek equality on the job front.

Other Jobs Ahead

Many other jobs remain to be done in the year ahead. Education is still lagging. Huge slum areas in hundreds of cities need wiping out. The health needs of the nation in general and of our retired oldsters in particular need to be met through the social security system.

A lagging Congress has failed to face up to these needs despite the urging of organized workers. More than ever, genuine liberals must be returned to Congress in 1964 if the labor-liberal program is ever to be enacted.

Labor, too, has a tremendous stake in foreign policy, what goes on among the emerging nations of Africa and Asia and among the restless people of Latin America.

The "cold war" still rages, a war to which the American labor movement is deeply committed. No one has been more vigorous in denunciation of the "Wall of Shame" erected by the Communists in Berlin than the AFL-CIO. The federation has promised its full support in the fight to maintain the freedom of West Berlin and West Germany.

The importance of that promise was symbolized by the presence of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the workers of free Berlin at the same time that Pres. Kennedy made his historic appearance there.

Organized labor is deeply committed to aiding the workers of the new African nations to build their own free democratic unions. The fight to keep communism from infiltrating their unions will be a major one in 1964 as the African nations become increasingly industrialized.

Already the Intl. Labor Organization has become a battleground between the free western labor movement and the Communist-dominated labor unions of the east.

In 1963 the Communists sought to use the racial separatist program of South Africa as a means of stirring African emotions to undermine the ILO. The movement failed, but undoubtedly it will be resumed in 1964, when once again it will be fought by the AFL-CIO.

Meanwhile, Castro sits in Havana not merely a beachhead for communism in the western hemisphere, but an active source of propaganda and violence against long-exploited Latin American nations which now are groping their way toward freedom and economic prosperity. Labor has a big stake and a role to play in keeping communism out of them.

'Greatest Contribution'

One of the AFL-CIO's greatest contributions in this battle was creation of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, a project in which American industry is co-operating.

The year 1964 will see further growth of this program under which promising young Latin American labor leaders are trained both in the United States and in their native countries to assume the responsibilities of a free trade union movement.

The program, which had its birth in 1957 in an experimental project by the Communications Workers, has now been taken over by the AFL-CIO itself and has grown steadily to the point where it has become a significant influence in the Latin American labor movement.

A FLOAT at the third annual Labor Day parade in New York City 79 years ago tied together labor's fight against slavery in the cotton fields to slavery in the sweatshop. In the drawing, bewhiskered marchers are shown with signs marking the slogans of the day—"Down With Oppression" and "By Honest Means We Obtain Our Rights" and "An Injury to One The Concern of All."

Unsolved Problems Still Plague Unions

By Harry Conn

ORGANIZED labor 1963 has been a difficult year on many fronts. At the collective bargaining table thousands of labor-management agreements were signed without any fanfare, but in some industries, especially the railroads, aerospace, publishing, lumber and shipping, lengthy disputes were required to protect hard-earned gains. Major agreements were also reached in steel, rubber and in various crafts.

In organizing the trade union movement showed an upswing for the first time in recent years. The percentage of victories in National Labor Relations Board elections reached 57 percent from a low of 51 percent in 1961. The AFL-CIO initiated a pilot organizing project in Los Angeles in which internationals pooled their resources under the Dept. of Organization. A second drive is now under way in the Baltimore-Washington area.

In legislation little progress has been made in Congress.

Among the top priority items on labor's legislative program, only the equal pay amendment has been signed into law.

Tax reduction, needed to give the economy a push, is still in the House Ways & Means Committee. Hospital care for the aged awaits hearings by the same committee. Youth employment has passed the Senate and the House Labor Committee but is blocked by the House Rules Committee. Federal aid to education has been scattered to a number of committees. Shorter work week legislation hasn't passed beyond the hearing stage. Repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act hasn't gotten to any hearing. Accelerated public works, rejected by the House, passed the Senate, and is again before the House. The mass transportation bill is also held up by House Rules. Civil rights hearings are still in progress.

On the state legislative front relatively little progress is being made in needed improvements in workmen's compensation and jobless benefits. Many states made their programs worse rather than better.

'Work' a Prime Issue

The so-called "right to work" gimmick remains a prime issue and Wyoming became the 20th state to place the anti-labor statute on the books. It is being contested in the courts, however.

Unions in the publishing industry have been successful in many areas of the country in pushing for state and local statutes to ban the importation of strikebreakers.

The year 1963 was also a year of anniversaries: 100th for the Locomotive Engineers. . . 90th for the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen . . . 75th for the Machinists . . . 60th for the Hod Carriers & Laborers . . . 50th for the Dept. of Labor and 40th for the banks of the Clothing Workers.

New presidents took over a number of unions: Charles Luna replaced W. P. Kennedy, who retired as head of the Railroad Trainmen . . . George Harrison of the Railway Clerks became chief executive and Les Dennis assumed the post of president . . . W. A. (Tony) Boyle became president of the unaffiliated Mine Workers on the death of Thomas Kennedy . . . John Griner was elected president of the American Federation of Government Employes as James Campbell retired . . . George Rollins replaced George Russ as head of the Insurance Workers . . . Adolph Benet succeeded Andrew J. Janaskie as president of the Hosiery Workers . . . Thomas Gleason replaced Capt. William Bradley as head of the Longshoremen.

In elections to public office last November, labor helped achieve victories in the Senate contests as the already heavy Democratic margin was increased by four. The Republicans gained four seats in the House; normally the party out of the White House gains an average of 39 seats. . . . A highlight of the election was labor-supported Gov. Pat Brown's crushing victory over former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon in Brown's quest for a second term. . . . Labor-backed candidates lost, however, in Michigan where Romney won; in Pennsylvania where Scranton won; in Ohio where Rhodes won. . . . Rockefeller was re-elected in New York. Democrats, with labor support, won in New Hampshire and Vermont. . . . It took four months before labor-supported Lt. Gov. Karl Rolvaag was declared winner in Minnesota's governorship race.

Supreme Court Active

The Supreme Court made news in a number of its labor decisions. It outlawed a Missouri anti-strike public utility law, it left largely unresolved the question of union dues. Under a union shop in a railroad case, where monies were used for non-collective bargaining purposes, it upheld the agency shop unless specifically banned by the states.

Just before last Labor Day Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg was named to the Supreme Court and Undersec. W. Willard Wirtz was named as his successor to the cabinet post.

The greatest personal loss during the year, for many trade unionists, was the death of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

Difficulties in Indonesia:

Democratic Unions Trapped by Reds

By Arnold Beichman

Djakarta—Although Communist Party power and popular influence keep growing in Indonesia, there seems little question that the people in the large Moslem majority are non-Communist.

Among the literate and educated there is a strong feeling of anti-communism which finds little public expression. No social or political stigma attaches to an Indonesian Communist or fellow-traveler, but an open anti-Communist who campaigned actively against the PKI (Communist) operation would run grave risks because Pres. Sukarno actively supports the PKI as part of his National Front.

Indonesia's trade union movement (illustrates) how knowledgeable anti-Communists must accept Communist "united front" offers under government pressure. The national labor federations were ordered into a "united front" called the Joint Directorate of Labor, headed by Labor Minister Ahem Erningpradja. Within this directorate is SOBSI, the Communist labor organization with a claimed membership of 3 million, and the anti-Communist, ICFTU affiliate Gasbiindo, or Federation of Indonesian Islamic Workers.

Other federations include KBKI, Sarbumusi and Sobri, non-Communist in political orientation.

Nevertheless they are all working together, however reluctant some of them may be to do so, under government decree to persuade Afro-Asian countries to come to a labor conference in Indonesia. Co-sponsoring this convention will be Communist China, which is anxious to establish an international labor "front" of its own to counter the Moscow-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

This conference can only help the Indonesian Communists to grow even more influential, whether it is successful or not in bringing representative Asian-African unions together. But there is nothing the non-Communist organizations can do when Sukarno so orders.

Since the Communist SOBSI federation is the best organized and financed, a government-decreed national labor front gives the Reds entry into other federations which they might not otherwise find so easy.

Parley Attacked

The proposed Afro-Asian meeting has been sharply attacked by Sec. C. V. Devan Nair, of the unaffiliated Singapore National Trades Union Congress as endangering the "non-alignment" policies of other organizations. Devan Nair lashed out at the conference on three counts:

- "The invitation to China and the cold-shouldering of trade union organizations in Soviet Central Asia threatens to involve this conference not only in the cold war, but also in the cold war within the cold war brought about by the Sino-Soviet rift."
- "The presence of China at the conference would almost certainly result in an initiative to set up a third labor international under China's hegemony."
- "The sponsorship of the conference by the government of Indonesia is clearly intended to advance the interests of Indonesian foreign policy."

Were a democratic Indonesian trade unionist to speak out in this fashion or even to evidence the slightest agreement with the Singapore labor position, it likely would be his last act as a union official. Some of Indonesia's outstanding political and intellectual leaders are now in jail or under house arrest for opposing Sukarno policies, particularly his pro-communism.

With the continuing enfeeblement of non-totalitarian labor groups in Indonesia, the military forces have undertaken to create another labor center with workers in the government-seized Dutch enterprises such as insurance companies, hotels and plantations. In May 1961, it registered as a national union what is now called SOKSI and in December 1962 held its first national convention.

SOKSI, or the Central Organization of Indonesian Socialist Workers, is headed by Lt. Col. Suhardiman and though it claims 3 million members, is believed to have 600,000. This army-sponsored federation is fighting the Communist SOBSI federation. It has its own Djakarta newspaper which attacks Communist leader Aidit and SOBSI by name with magical immunity and, by indirection, the PKI itself.

Attracting Workers

In no sense can SOKSI be called a labor union, although some bona fide unions—railroad workers, teachers, government employes—which were unaffiliated to the other national centers have joined forces with SOKSI.

One reason for this alliance is that SOKSI distributes oil, sugar, salt, cooking oil and other government-rationed necessities which its army officials, who run these state enterprises as manager-employers, receive for their workers. Such control must act as a powerful inducement upon other unions.

Since SOKSI is not a real labor organization, it has begun to penetrate other sectors of the community, particularly peasants and small landholders where until now the PKI had a virtual monopoly.

Observers believe that Chief of Staff A. H. Nasution is apprehensive about PKI strength, particularly among workers and peasants, and is seeking a counter against the PKI National Front, which SOKSI refuses to join although it enjoys Sukarno favor.

It is a measure of the confused (and unconfused) situation in Indonesia today that in discussing trade unionism one must deal with the Communists as well as the armed forces. One ignores the Ministry of Labor which is tied down by lack of funds. Sukarno signed a decree May 22 which permits fines or imprisonment of anybody instigating strikes or lockouts in an industry which he defines as "vital." Nasution is in charge of enforcing that law. Compulsory arbitration keeps walkouts down to the minimum if any can actually be said to occur.

Unionism Can't Prosper

It is difficult to see how trade unionism can prosper so long as it suffers from government's heavy hand, a government-encouraged Communist labor front and a government-tolerated army labor front, an ever-declining standard of living and mass unemployment and underemployment and the stifling of the right to protest and genuine organization.

That there is even a smattering of real trade unionism in this impoverished country is as much a miracle as a blade of grass growing in the crack of a city sidewalk. But under Sukarno's "guided democracy" one-man rule, there is little likelihood that it will ever bloom.

U.S., Canada Labor Lauded for ILO Aid

Geneva—Thanks for the "steadfast support" given by the labor movements of the United States and Canada to the aims and activities of the Intl. Labor Organization were voiced by ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse in a Labor Day message.

"Your support," he said, "is a source of strength to the ILO in its endeavors to encourage the growth of strong and free labor unions and to promote sound labor relations in the developing countries.

"This is a task to which the ILO is giving increasingly high priority within the framework of its technical assistance program."

Mississippi Runoff Won By Johnson

Jackson, Miss.—Lieut. Gov. Paul B. Johnson won the Democratic nomination for governor in a runoff primary here over former Gov. J. P. Coleman. The almost complete unofficial count gave Johnson 251,187, Coleman 188,936.

Johnson, a 47-year-old Hattiesburg attorney, campaigned on a straight-out segregationist and anti-Kennedy platform. He led the first primary Aug. 6 with 157,718 votes to 136,534 for Coleman and 107,253 for a third-running candidate, Charles Sullivan. The latter then announced his endorsement of Coleman in the runoff race.

The Democratic winner will run against Republican Rubel Phillips in the Nov. 5 general election. Phillips is a former Democrat who is telling voters that the Republican Party offers a better alternative to the Kennedy Administration than "states' rights" Democrats.

Coleman apparently paid the penalty for backing Kennedy electors in the 1960 primary against a slate of "independent" electors supported by Gov. Ross Barnett and Johnson. In the latest campaigns, Johnson political advertising heavily stressed anti-Kennedy themes while Coleman was pictured as a "quiet segregationist."

Film Lines Give Actors $500 Extra

Responding in Italian to a Roman Catholic litany in a scene filmed for the motion picture "The Cardinal" constituted acting, not "extra" work, an arbitrator has ruled.

As a result, 15 performers will receive an additional $500 each for their work in the feature film, produced by Otto Preminger.

The producer had contended that the 15 players were extras and that their responses to the litany, in a scene filmed at St. John's Church in Stamford, Conn., should be regarded as "omnies," an industry term for atmospheric words.

Herman Gray, attorney for the Screen Actors Guild, elicited testimony at the arbitration hearing, however, that Preminger's assistants had instructed the 15 players in the proper responses to the litany, which had to be memorized because they were in Italian and employed some words not commonly used in ordinary Italian speech.

'Mature Bargaining' Called 'Crying Need'

A "growing tendency" to utilize the techniques of "mature negotiation" in attempting to solve the problems of industrial relations is welcomed by William E. Simkin, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, in an article in the August issue of the American Federationist.

"Just as citizens are fearful of surviving a nuclear war," he writes, "they seem to be growing steadily more impatient and intolerant of the economic consequences and disruptions that mark modern industrial warfare. People everywhere are growing more interdependent upon each other.

"The crying need of the times, therefore, in dealing with problems of every character . . . is for reasoned solutions and compromises."

Writing in the AFL-CIO's monthly publication, Simkin points out that the services of the agency he heads are available to conciliate between labor and management just as the United Nations fills a comparable role on a global scale.

"Our sole aim is to promote labor-management peace," he writes. "We have no axe to grind for anyone. We provide a free service of voluntary mediation. Our job is to listen and help disputants reach their own solutions.

Encourage Bargaining

"We do not inhibit free collective bargaining; we encourage it. We explore problems and suggest possible areas of compromise. We attempt to persuade but, unlike the courts or the National Labor Relations Board, we have no power of compulsion. We operate on the theory there is an answer to every problem. It's our job to help find it."

In urging unions and employers to take advantage of his agency's "impartial help," Simkin stresses the importance of early requests for assistance. The mediators can function best, he points out, when informed well in advance on issues and problems that "could develop later into hardened attitudes and almost inevitable work stoppages."

Many unions and employers regularly brief the service in advance of bargaining, he writes, "with full confidence in the integrity and trust that is a recognized trademark of the men" in the service.

"Time is an important element in solving labor-management difficulties," he asserts. "If disputants can get an early start in exploring issues before them, they have a bit of extra insurance toward coming up with a more reasoned and acceptable settlement."

Simkin gives hearty approval to the various procedures established in different industries looking toward "thorough and leisurely" discussion of problems. He singles out for endorsement the recent statement of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that labor and management should not meet only to do battle every two or three years, but should meet during the term of a contract to discuss and seek solutions of their problems.

'Eager to Help'

The FMCS, he adds, "is eager to help employers and unions establish such consultative arrangements."

He expresses concern over what he sees as a "rising trend" in rejections of tentative contract settlements, particularly by union members. However, he says he believes union democracy should be encouraged and concedes that union members should reject any proposed settlement if they are "genuinely convinced it is inadequate."

Labor Relations Units Established by Wirtz

A major reorganization of the Labor Dept. to group all of its functions in the labor-management relations area under a single administration has been announced by Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Assistant Sec. James J. Reynolds will head the new Labor-Management Services Administration, which will consist of five units. Deputy Assistant Sec. Nelson Bortz will have responsibility for day-to-day administration of the programs.

Wirtz said the reorganization "will marshal and make available to labor and management findings of research and other resources needed to improve collective bargaining and labor-management relations."

One of the new units—the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports — will combine all the department's compliance machinery under both the Landrum-Griffin Act and the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act of 1961. Previously, reports required from unions and management under the two laws were received by separate offices.

At the same time, Wirtz announced the retirement of John L. Holcombe, who has been commissioner of the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports, effective shortly after Aug. 21. Holcombe had been asked to accept the directorship of one of the five newly created units, Wirtz said, but decided to retire after 29 years of government service.

The new, combined reports office will be headed by Frank M. Kleiler, who has been director of the Office of Welfare & Pension Plans.

Directors so far have not been named for the other four units, which are:

- The Office of Industrial Relations Services, which "will provide assistance to employers, unions and groups of employes in meeting the problems caused by major economic adjustments, technological change, changes in the patterns of collective bargaining, and job assignments."
- The Office of Labor-Management Relations Policy Development, which "will provide policy advice to the secretary based on studies of collective bargaining development, economic, social and legislative needs. Also, it will coordinate the research activities of all bureaus and offices of the department in the labor-management relations area."
- The Office of Federal Employe-Management Relations, which will perform the functions delegated to the secretary under the President's executive order granting bargaining recognition to unions of federal employes.
- The Office of Administration & Management for the Labor-Management Services Administration, which will be responsible for all administrative matters, including financial and personnel management, for the five offices.

Meany Urges Test Ban Treaty Approval

Senate Asked to Act Favorably on Pact

(Continued from Page 1)

country and its democratic allies to discourage, deter, and if need be, defeat Communist aggression."

"If this test ban treaty would weaken, in the least, the will or capacity of the western democracies to achieve these aims, we would oppose it," he emphasized.

Turning to some of the arguments offered against the treaty, Meany made these points:

- Soviet superiority in nuclear weapons on the basis of its last round of testing is not clear. If the Soviets had developed an anti-missile missile, Khrushchev "would not have backed away" in Cuba last October. If the Soviet Union is in a stronger position than the U.S., on the basis of the record "Khrushchev would not desist from kicking us around."
- Rumors of secret agreements between the U.S. and the USSR are indications of "cynical mistrust" of the President that is wholly out of keeping in light of the President's record in dealing with the Communists.
- The treaty is basically the same as the draft first offered the Soviet Union by the Eisenhower Administration in 1959 and again by Kennedy in August 1961. Both times Khrushchev rejected the proposals. The present treaty is an improvement on the earlier American proposals because it allows each signatory to renounce it without previous consultation with the other signers. This would allow the U.S. to move promptly in face of "Soviet perfidy."
- American labor "cannot warn too strongly" against "wishful thinking or dangerous illusions" that the Soviet rulers have become "truly peaceful." The treaty "does not bring us anywhere in sight of a world free from the terrible perils of Communist subversion and Soviet imperialist aggression. In fact, I am tempted to remind you that it was Karl Marx who once, very aptly, said that the Russian bear is never as dangerous as when he embraces you."

Ratification will strengthen the country's "moral and political position in the international arena," Meany declared, urging a build-up of defense and "much stronger foundations for Atlantic unity." He added:

"If the U.S. should reject this limited test ban treaty, our efforts to achieve these great goals will be badly handicapped."

Meany warned finally, "as we welcome the prospects for a reduction in atomic fallout, let us be on guard against political propaganda fallout from the sundry Soviet maneuvers for peace—on Communist terms. Communist political fallout can be lethal, as the loss of national independence by European nations in the last two decades painfully demonstrates."

JAPANESE STEELWORKERS received a daylong briefing on operations of the AFL-CIO as part of the government's labor leader exchange program. The Tekko Roren team is shown here with Harry Goldberg, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs (seated at head of table), and Ernest S. Lee, executive assistant to the director of the department.

Shortage of Physicians Seen Growing Worse

Federal aid to medical schools and students is imperative to meet a doctor shortage "that is growing steadily worse," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The shortage cannot be "dealt with effectively" except by federal assistance, Clinton M. Fair, AFL-CIO legislative representative, told a Senate Labor subcommittee.

The House in April passed a measure containing federal funds for construction of medical schools and facilities and providing loans for medical students.

Fair cited figures released by the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare disclosing that in 1962 the U.S. slipped from 10th to 11th place in infant mortality rates among countries with populations of more than 300,000. Since 1950, he said, the U.S. has reduced its infant mortality rate by about 13 percent compared to five nations with rates then lower than the U.S. rate which had reduced these deaths from 20 to 40 percent.

"Public health experts tell us that infant mortality rates are the health index that is most sensitive to differences in the quality of medical care," he continued. "When we in the U.S. . . . lag behind 10 other nations . . . it is perfectly clear that not all Americans are receiving the benefits of the excellent care that the medical profession of this country is able to provide.

"The gap between the best kind of care that is available in this country and the care that large numbers of people actually receive will grow larger, rather than diminish, unless we increase our supply of practicing physicians. That cannot be done without federal aid to medical education."

Fair urged the subcommittee to give serious consideration to a program of scholarships to supplement or replace the loan provisions now contained in both the House-passed bill and the bill before the Senate group.

The House-passed measure provides for $105 million aid to construction program over a three-year period and $35 million for loans over the same years. The bill before the Senate subcommittee calls for a total of $170 million construction program over a 10-year period and $72 million in student loans in a five-year program.

IBEW Local Wins Hikes of 10.25 Percent

Oakland, Calif.—Benefits totaling 40 cents an hour have been won for 14,350 employes of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. in the first three-year agreement ever negotiated by Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' Local 1245.

The agreement was ratified in a mail referendum by operating, construction, maintenance and clerical workers in the utility's 47-county California service area.

Business Mgr. Ronald T. Weakley said it provides wage increases of 10.25 percent in three steps; increased company contributions for medical group plans, increased shift differentials, vacation and holiday improvements, and special wage adjustments for more than 80 job classifications.

The first general wage hike of 3.75 percent was retroactive to July 1. Two more increases of 3.25 percent will become payable on that date in 1964 and 1965.

The union, which has been employe bargaining agent for more than 20 years, opened negotiations about three months ago.

Study of Arbitration Endorsed by Beirne

The "abysmal ignorance" about automation and its effect on the economy may be overcome by Pres. Kennedy's proposed commission on automation, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A Beirne declared.

Beirne said on a nationwide broadcast, "Labor News Conference," carried on the Mutual Broadcasting System, that an intensive study is needed to find the answers posed by automation. The chief problem, he commented, is wiping out the hard core of unemployment that has plagued the nation for nearly six years.

The President announced in his message to Congress on the rail dispute that he will appoint a 25-member commission to recommend a program "to assure both the continued advance of our technology and the continued well-being of our people."

Beirne stressed that organized labor has long been on record as welcoming automation because it holds the promise of giving "the people of America and the world a much better standard of life."

But, he added, when automation causes "havoc among the work force," it is "morally justifiable to resent and to oppose the introduction of new machinery." The final test, declared the president of the Communications Workers, "is whether we want to place human values above property values, above machine values, above profits."

Beirne told interviewers Howard Norton of the Baltimore Sun and John Koenig of the Associated Press that "there is no question in my judgment at all that automation is responsible" for part of the high level of unemployment, but that "how much it is responsible for I don't think anyone knows."

That's why, he said, the presidential commission approach is a good first step.

Senate Democrats Ask Aid Cut Restoration

(Continued from Page 1)

moved toward what would be, in effect, a Labor Day recess after clearing an arbitration resolution dealing with the four-year-old rail dispute, further delays in major legislation were in prospect.

A House Judiciary subcommittee headed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) indicated that its basic civil rights bill would not be drafted for the full committee until the week of Sept. 9.

The House Ways & Means Committee under the chairmanship of Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) struck a snag as it tried to complete its basic tax-reduction and reform bill and postponed further sessions until Sept. 10. The prospect was that the bill would not reach the floor until the week beginning Sept. 23—and that the civil rights bill would be delayed until after the tax measure.

Tax Bill Changed

The Ways & Means Committee reversed an earlier decision to impose capital gains tax rates on increased assets of an estate transferred by death. At present, no taxes are payable on the increased value of capital assets—such as stocks and bonds—unless or until the heirs sell the assets. The committee failed to draft acceptable language to plug up this loophole.

In its tentative bill, agreed to on Aug. 14, the committee approved total individual and corporate income tax reductions of about $11 billion, two-thirds of which would become effective next Jan. 1, with the rest going into effect Jan. 1, 1965. The proposed bill was subject to further last-minute revisions.

A key issue in the Judiciary subcommittee's civil rights bill was whether it would include the fair employment practice measure already approved by the House Labor Committee with enforcement powers centered in a new independent commission with power to hold hearings, issue directives and seek compliance orders from the U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals.

Celler and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) had previously agreed to seek to add the FEP bill to the omnibus rights measure, and Celler said there were enough votes in the subcommittee for approval of the plan. He indicated doubt that the full Judiciary Committee was certain to accept the addition.

The eventual subcommittee bill is generally considered to be the base from which both House and Senate will move when the measure reaches the point of floor action.

8-31-63

Kennedy's statement on the House foreign aid cuts pointed out that Democratic members of Congress had strongly supported aid programs backed by former Pres. Eisenhower.

The President had already slashed $400 million from his original recommendation of $4.9 billion for foreign aid and the Foreign Affairs Committee knocked out an additional $400 million—even in the face of protests by Gen. Lucius Clay, chairman of a recent advisory committee which had itself suggested a $4.4 billion ceiling. Meany, a member of the Clay advisory group, had filed a dissenting opinion sharply disagreeing with the committee majority.

If the House vote should stand, Kennedy warned, " no [new] development loans could be made" hereafter to Iran, Greece and Turkey, countries "on the rim of the Communist empire."

Would 'Stall' Progress

"Hopeful social and economic progress" under the Alliance for Progress would be "stalled," the President said, and the Soviet Union would be "giving almost as much assistance to the small island of Cuba as the United States to the whole of Latin America."

The Administration's urgency for a Senate increase in aid authorizations reflected the apprehension arising from its knowledge that actual money eventually voted has historically fallen short of authorized levels.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, September 7, 1963 | No. 36

Senate Votes to Continue Federal Job Training Aid

CHILDREN OF UNION MEMBERS marched with their parents in New York City's gala Labor Day parade. This contingent is from Local 91, Ladies' Garment Workers—one of 500 locals from 45 international unions participating in the eight-hour parade up Fifth Ave.

Bill Eases State Costs In Program

The Senate gave the manpower training program a new lease on life by postponing for one year a provision which would have forced its abandonment in states which failed to pick up half the cost of training jobless workers in needed skills.

Only three legislatures acted this year to authorize matching funds—which under existing law are required as of next July 1. Most legislatures do not meet again until 1965.

The labor-backed bill, to extend full federal financing until July 1, 1965, passed the Senate by voice vote. The key ballot was a decisive 44-19 defeat of a Republican motion to recommit the bill to committee—and thus kill it.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) led the GOP fight against the bill, arguing that failure of the states to appropriate matching funds indicated the program was not worthwhile.

Training Funds Doubled

The bill as passed doubles federal training funds authorized for the 1965 fiscal year from $161 million—a figure based on matching state funds—to $322 million. With this amount, the Administration estimates more than 100,000 persons can be trained that year.

Although the bill was endorsed in Pres. Kennedy's civil rights message as an important means of providing training for Negroes and was hailed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), its floor manager, as a "significant" civil rights measure, a number of southern Democrats supported it.

With about one third of the Senate absent, the recommittal motion was supported by only

(Continued on Page 8)

Meany Asks 'Vigilance' On Red Rift

The free world must maintain a policy of "realism, vigilance, firmness, strength and unity," if it is to score real gains from the rift between the Soviet Union and Communist China, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has warned.

In a signed editorial in the September issue of the AFL-CIO monthly magazine, the American Federationist, Meany saw "great significance" in the evidences that world communism "is in a deep crisis which is likely to worsen."

Relations between the Soviet and Chinese leaders have "steadily deteriorated" as differences between the two governments "multiplied and deepened," he said.

But "however profound and bitter" their controversy may be, he declared, "it does not involve long-range, basic Communist objectives." Premier Khrushchev and Mao "continue to be in full agreement about the goal—world conquest and domination."

The free world is now "confronted with a choice between the two opponents, one of whom is the lesser danger," the editorial continued. "Both are very dangerous to the free world."

Unity Myth Exploded

The Chinese program "is that of a poor and relatively weak" Communist country "which has to resort to revolutionary actions for attaining its goal of world domination," he wrote.

"The Soviet program is that of a super-power ready to rely on its resources, prestige and strength for achieving the triumph of world communism."

The "myth about the unbreakable unity of world communism has been exploded," he observed. The Chinese have accused Moscow of "great-power chauvinism," stinginess toward Peiping and "economic exploitation of the satellites." The Soviet Communists "have countered with charges of Chinese warmongering and racialism."

The menace of Chinese communism remains "obvious because of its bellicose statements and policies," Meany wrote, but as for the

(Continued on Page 8)

Fix-Up Fund Aids Victims Of Racist Mob

Folcroft, Pa.—The Delaware County United Labor Council has voted to raise funds to restore the home of a Negro family damaged when a jeering, stone-throwing crowd of more than 1,000 attacked the property in protest of Negro occupancy in this previously all-white suburb.

Officers of the council, which has headquarters eight miles away in Chester, voted an initial pledge of $200 and secured further pledges from affiliated locals. Council Pres. H. Page Groton, an international representative of the Boilermakers, said a contractor and appraiser had inspected the damage done the home of Mr. and Mrs. Horace Baker, and that labor hoped to be able to pay the cost of repairs.

Groton said in a statement that the mob assault had placed a "burden of shame" on all and raised a "moral issue as old as the Scriptures and as clear as the American Constitution."

The trade union movement was founded on the principle "that every man should unite with his fellow men so that each achieves freedom and justice," Groton said.

(Continued on Page 7)

Union Goals Reaffirmed In Broadcasts

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a radio address to the nation, put the nuclear test ban treaty high among the federation's priorities on Labor Day 1963 because of the "hope" it offers mankind.

Urging Senate ratification of the treaty, Meany emphasized, however, that the United States must remain militarily, economically and morally strong to achieve the goal of "a world of peace in freedom."

Economic and social weaknesses must be overcome to bring the nation up to "full strength" in the battle for world freedom, he declared over the National Broadcasting Co. network.

"In the broadest sense," he continued, "a stronger America is the fundamental objective of the AFL-CIO. It is the foundation on which our policies and our objectives are built."

In other Labor Day broadcasts, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and A. J. Hayes joined Meany in reaffirming American labor's "unending quest" for peace, equal rights, jobs and social progress.

Women's Rights Hailed

Schnitzler, speaking over the Mutual network, viewed congressional enactment of the labor-backed equal-pay-for-women law earlier this year as a "portent of things to come" in the area of equal opportunity legislation.

Noting that the number of women in the work force is growing and is expected to reach 30 million by 1970, Schnitzler said the new law will remedy "an ancient injustice" and "also will have a healthy impact on the economy by

(Continued on Page 6)

100,000 March in New York:

Parades and Rallies Mark Labor Holiday

Americans observed Labor Day with an eight-hour parade in New York, fireworks in Toledo and special church services in cities large and small throughout the nation.

They rallied at Henryetta, Okla., brought their families to an outing at Lincoln Woods, R. I., took part in a special program during a baseball doubleheader in Los Angeles, and picknicked and paraded from Eureka, Calif., to Anderson, Ind.

At Pennsauken, N. J., thousands gathered at the graveside of Peter J. McGuire, the carpenter who first proposed that a day be set aside to honor labor "at the most pleasant season of the year, nearly midway between the Fourth of July and Thanksgiving."

And at Durham, N. C., union members honored a rank-and-file labor martyr of the 1930's. In a program sponsored annually by the Hosiery Workers and the Central Labor Union, they gathered for memorial services at the grave of Clem Norwood, a knitter who was shot to death on a picket line in 1933.

Many Carried Tools

The biggest and most colorful of the observances was the parade of more than 100,000 New York union members, led by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the grand marshal, and viewed by an estimated 750,000 New Yorkers including dignitaries from all walks of life.

With more than 100 floats and 150 bands, banners calling for full employment and equal opportunity for all, the marchers carried out the central theme of the unity of labor, made up of men and women of diverse races, nationalities and skills.

Virtually every craft was represented in the parade up Fifth Ave., with many marchers carrying tools of their trade. Large groups were in the colorful traditional costumes of their native or ancestral lands. Some carried the same banners they had brought to Washington for the civil rights march a few days earlier.

Joining Meany and Central Labor Council Pres. Harry A. Van Arsdale in the reviewing stand were Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) and Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D), along with presidents of a number of unions who had marched in the

(Continued on page 6)

Unions, Rails Ready New Talks on Dispute

Rail union and management representatives have begun working on a blueprint for the combination of negotiations and arbitration prescribed by Congress for settlement of the work rules dispute.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, Pres. Kennedy was scheduled to name the three neutral members of the arbitration board which will decide two key issues in the dispute—the use of locomotive firemen on freight trains and the minimum size of train crews.

Other issues must be resolved through negotiations, with unilateral action by either side barred for a six-month period.

The five operating unions selected Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and Vice Pres. Ray McDonald of the Trainmen as their representatives on the seven-man board. Representing management will be J. E. Wolfe, chief negotiator for the railroads, and Guy W. Knight, vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The board will have 90 days to decide the issues.

In the aftermath of the unprecedented congressional vote for

(Continued on Page 7)

Rail Carmen Convene:

Shorter Week Seen Key to Employment

Kansas City, Mo.—A shorter workweek is the "only solution" to the problem of shrinking employment opportunities, Pres. A. J. Bernhardt told more than 900 delegates to the Railway Carmen's convention here.

"In the past 10 years, railroad jobs have declined by over 500,000," Bernhardt declared. "The only way we are going to get these people back into employment is by a shorter workweek without any reduction in take-home pay."

The union, meeting on the eve of the 75th anniversary of its founding, is the largest of the railroad shopcraft unions. Its major committees were called into session before the official opening of the convention to begin work on the heavy agenda of resolutions and proposed constitutional amendments. Recommendations made by national officers include a higher per capita tax—from $1.50 to $2.25 per month.

Bernhardt, in his report to the convention, stressed the importance of union political education and action.

"Much of our lives—more than ever before—is now being regulated by laws enacted by Congress," he said. "It is therefore necessary that we educate ourselves and become interested in politics, on a local and state, as well as a national level."

Bernhardt reported that since the last convention in 1958, "we have increased wages and secured a number of important improvements in working conditions" for the membership.

Referring to the long dispute over work rules for the operating unions and the passage of arbitration legislation by Congress, Bernhardt told the delegates:

"We are afraid — very much afraid—that a like situation is waiting for us."

Bank Pays $24,700 To Fired Unionist

Vancouver, B. C. — The Bank of Montreal has made an out-of-court settlement of $24,794 to M. W. Bluck, an official of the bank for 27 years prior to his dismissal in October 1961 during a union organizing drive at the branch here.

Bluck was president of Bank Employes Association Local 387, a unit of the Office Employes, when he was discharged. In addition to the settlement, he received $1,850 in severance pay.

Screen Actors Open TV Ad Pact

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has notified all signers of its television commercials contract that it wants to start negotiations on a new agreement. The existing contract, in effect since Nov. 16, 1960, will terminate Nov. 15, 1963, unless renewed.

SAG Executive Sec. John L. Dales said the notice of termination is a legal requirement and gives the Guild "freedom to act as its members see fit."

Texas Unions Push 'Bootstrap' Project

Houston—The Texas AFL-CIO convention voted to expand "Operation Bootstrap," a program aimed at elevating living standards of 500,000 economically depressed Latin Americans in south Texas.

Delegates appropriated "an amount in excess of $30,000" to continue an educational and public relations program to inform working people of their rights under federal law to benefits which flow from the trade union movement.

The plight of workers receiving as little as 9 cents an hour has been brought to public attention by the "pilot" educational program of the State AFL-CIO. Under the expanded program three representatives will be hired to man offices at Laredo, El Paso and in the Rio Grande Valley.

Cooperation of Mexican unions will be sought in carrying out the program and in other projects to help improve wages and conditions on both sides of the border.

Delegates reaffirmed support for a legal fight against the practice of permitting Mexican nationals to commute to jobs in the U.S. without maintaining residence in this country. These "commuters" depress wages and aggravate serious unemployment problems of American workers along the border, the convention points out.

Opposition to a resumption of the "bracero" migrant worker program, recently checked by Congress, also was voted.

Brown Re-elected

Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown was re-elected by the convention without opposition. Sec.-Treas. Roy Evans defeated Allan Maley, executive secretary of the Dallas AFL-CIO Council, 90,452 to 40,820.

Highlighting the convention program in addition to Operation Bootstrap, were a special 5-cent COPE assessment per member per month for 20 months and a series of proposals for promoting civil rights and job equality.

The funds will be used to help finance a campaign aimed at abolishing the poll tax in a special election on Nov. 9. A registration system would replace the poll tax.

The state federation also plans intensive efforts to get thousands of Texans to register to vote in the 1964 primary and general elections.

The assessment, to be collected Sept. 1, 1963, through Apr. 30, 1965, is technically a 5-cent increase in the 13-cent per capita tax, but it may be paid by locals or by national and international unions or state or district bodies or associations in behalf of locals.

Gov. John Connally was asked to call a special session of the legislature on civil rights matters, wield his executive powers against discrimination and intimidation, and appoint a statewide multi-racial committee to promote equal rights.

The legislature was called on to outlaw race, creed, color or national origin as a basis for denying employment by the state or its political subdivisions, set a $1.25 minimum wage for "1.5 million Texans in serfdom" and repeal all existing laws favoring one class of citizens over another.

The convention called on its affiliated unions to admit all qualified applicants, regardless of race, to their memberships and apprentice programs and to refer all workers to jobs on non-discriminatory basis.

It asked unions to negotiate non-discrimination clauses in their contracts with employers.

Plea to Affiliates

In addition, the convention urged affiliated unions to eliminate any identification of job applicants as to race, creed, color or national origin.

Delegates asked that Congress set up a national unemployment insurance plan to be administered by the Social Security Administration. Noting that the Texas state plan could not be wiped away "overnight," they urged the state legislature to improve unemployment benefits and liberalize the law so fewer claimants would be disqualified. They denounced the existing Texas Employment Commission as "bureaucratic" and "employer-dominated."

The convention decided that henceforth labor support will be withheld from any candidate for office who makes retention of the state "right-to-work" law part of his platform.

The state federation voted to change its name from the Texas State AFL-CIO to the Texas AFL-CIO.

AFL-CIO Convention Call Sent to Affiliates

The fifth constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO will meet at a time "of paramount importance to workers and to America" to meet the challenges of creating a full employment economy, assuring equal opportunity for all and intensifying the worldwide struggle for freedom.

That's the theme of the federation's official convention call signed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in behalf of the Executive Council.

The convention will open Nov. 14 in the Americana Hotel, New York City. The call declares:

The delegates to the fifth constitutional convention of the American Federation of Labor & Congress of Industrial Organizations can deservedly take pride in the strength, unity and dedication of the trade union movement at every level in every state and city across the nation.

We are meeting at a time of paramount importance to workers and to America, for the tasks of today are more demanding than ever before. The American trade union movement, joined by an alert citizenry, can successfully meet this challenge.

First among these tasks is full employment. The apparent prosperity of most Americans cannot, should not and must not conceal the distress of the others—amounting to nearly 6 percent of the work force—who, month in and month out for almost six years, have been jobless. Little better is the plight of additional millions who can find only part-time work, and still others whose earnings are below the level of bare subsistence.

Deplorably, these are not new statistics; they have been recited many times before. But what they represent—millions of American families consigned to economic degradation—can never be shrugged off as an old story.

Moreover, there is a strong likelihood that what is now intolerable may become disastrous. Unemployment is as malignant in its own way as cancer. The nation has been lucky to escape a more rapid spread of the disease, but luck may be running out.

The accelerating growth of the labor force and the constant shrinkage of job opportunities, due to automation and other technological changes, continue on their inexorable course. There is no visible prospect that rich new sources of employment will arise spontaneously from private enterprise.

Government leadership and government action—bold, imaginative and far-ranging—are essential to avert a job crisis.

No single measure can meet the need. Consumer purchasing-power must be increased by cutting taxes on lower and middle incomes; by extending the wage-hour law to the millions now excluded from its protection; by establishing realistic federal standards for unemployment compensation; by safeguarding the solvency of retired citizens through a federal system of hospital insurance under social security; by comprehensive federal aid to education, and by a broad spectrum of other undertakings, all of great social value apart from their economic impact.

Even if every one of these measures—every item on the AFL-CIO legislative agenda—were enacted, full employment could not long be maintained without a reduction in the basic workweek to 35 hours, with penalty pay of double time beyond that standard. The nation's economy has again reached a point—as it has so often done in the past—when a shorter workweek is essential to insure its stability and growth.

The second great task we face is equal opportunity—the fulfillment of the social revolution which is sweeping across America. This takes second place only because its ends cannot fully be attained unless good jobs, at good wages, are ready and waiting for all when the last barrier of racial discrimination is toppled.

In keeping with its inherent commitment to human brotherhood, the American trade union movement has for many years been in the forefront of the struggle for the full and equal rights of all Americans. But at this moment in history, when the struggle is at a climax, the reaffirmation of long-standing principles is not enough. Equal rights is no longer a goal for tomorrow; it is a matter of here and now. And while the shortcomings of the labor movement are few indeed compared to those found elsewhere in the nation, even these few must be promptly overcome.

Beyond that, the labor movement has an obligation to see to it that discrimination is obliterated in every aspect of American life. Hopefully, Congress will enact a new charter of human freedom this year; but more important than laws is the implementation of their purposes in communities everywhere. Here the AFL-CIO, through its local organizations, can and must play a leading part.

Third, we must continue and intensify the role of the labor movement in mankind's worldwide fight for freedom. Atomic test bans, safeguards against accidental war, relaxation of immediate tensions—these and other steps to minimize the possibility of holocaust are welcome. But they do not change in the slightest degree the continuing global contest between liberty and totalitarianism.

Here, too, it is not enough for us to keep our own country strong and to help strengthen old ties with other democracies. The labor movement has a unique task to carry out in the new nations, emerging from centuries of colonial rule, and in the many others newly freed from the grip of local tyrants.

People throughout the world hunger for liberty, for democracy, for self-determination at every level of life. But this cannot be attained without democratic institutions, among which a free labor movement is pre-eminent. The AFL-CIO must see to it that the people of these new nations have a fair chance to build the framework of a free society, in whatever pattern they choose, so long as it is free and they are free to change it.

These are only three of the major tasks among the many we face. If they are fulfilled, the wellbeing of all Americans and the final attainment of the American dream will be within grasp, and the growth of free societies throughout the world will be assured. It is to the solution of these problems and the realization of these goals that the AFL-CIO is dedicated. It is to the achievement of this better world that the fifth constitutional convention of the American Federation of Labor & Congress of Industrial Organizations will give its undivided attention.

12 Unfair Practices:

New NLRB Rulings Hit Burlington Firm

Two more "cease and desist" orders against Burlington Industries, Inc., have been issued by the National Labor Relations Board after a board panel found the firm guilty of a dozen unfair labor practices at its Vinton, Va., weaving plant.

The board refused a union request to make Burlington post a $10 million performance bond against continued law violations, but said it would review the record in any future cases.

The request was made by the Textile Workers Union of America, which pointed out past violations by the giant firm at several of its 114 plants. Calling not only for a performance bond but for more persuasive penalties, the TWUA asked also that Burlington be required to instruct all its supervisors they will be discharged if the board finds they have engaged in future unfair practices.

Three board members—Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, Philip Ray Rodgers and Boyd Leedom—upheld the union's charge in the Vinton cases and ordered two fired workers reinstated with lost pay. But, they said, despite the "serious nature of the unfair labor practices" found in this and companion cases, "we do not believe that more stringent remedies are required at this time."

They said they would review the record in future cases to determine if Burlington's conduct compels a finding of "such serious, repeated or widespread violations of the law, and opposition to its purposes and policies" as to warrant added penalties.

The union asserted that a "stiffer remedy" is needed to prevent the nation's largest textile chain from continuing a "chain-wide policy of intimidating, coercing, discriminating and discharging pro-union employes."

In its latest rulings the board upheld findings by Trial Examiner Robert E. Mullin that the firm fired Charles E. Crouch, union supporter, to discourage union membership, and by Examiner Thomas A. Ricci that management fired Robert E. Wright for "talking union."

The board ordered Burlington not to threaten to fire employes for union activity, not to quiz employes about the union or ask them to spy on other workers, and not to harass them in any other way in the exercise of their rights.

The two charges and a previous one grew out of a TWUA organizing campaign at Vinton in 1962. The union lost a representation election, 184 to 226, and charged the firm with unlawful interference.

U. S. Asked to Probe Migrants' Use in Strike

Trappe, Md.—More than 100 members of the Packinghouse Workers have urged both federal and state investigations of the use of migrant farm workers as strikebreakers by a frozen-food processor here.

The strike, voted by the union's Local 1109, is believed to be the first since 1935 on Maryland's Eastern Shore, an area of prosperous commercial truck farms and low wages. Certified as bargaining agent in April, the local struck after the Trappe Frozen Food Corp. rejected demands for a 20-cent wage increase over the "going" rate of $1.15 an hour, plus fringe benefits.

Partial production is being maintained by crews of migrant farm workers quartered at a camp in Hurlock, Md., 18 miles away. A battered bus with Florida license plates transports the migrants to and from the plant each day, shepherded by a state police cruiser.

Union officials have appealed for help from the Senate migratory labor subcommittee headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D.-N. J.) and have asked the U. S. Dept. of Labor to check whether federal laws are being violated by use of migrant field hands as strikebreakers. Maryland health and employment authorities have been asked to investigate possible violations of state law.

Pres. Charles A. Della of the Maryland-D. C. AFL-CIO has also asked members of the Maryland congressional delegation to investigate the strike issues.

A private police agency from Baltimore was hired by management to guard the plant. Armed guards work on each shift, keeping police dogs on short leashes only a score of feet from the picket line. From a makeshift watch tower at the plant's main gate, a guard makes a movie record of picket activities.

Fourteen strikers were arrested, charged with a variety of offenses, when violence erupted briefly early in the strike that began Aug. 18.

The bus carrying migrants into the plant was stoned and 10 occupants were slightly injured by broken glass. Hospital records indicate that two of them were 15-year-old girls. The bus driver, reputed to be the migrants' "crew chief," was listed as from Pompano Beach, Fla.

Bond for those arrested was set at a total of nearly $40,000—a sum union lawyers charged was "inordinately high."

Support for the strike has come from the Ladies' Garment Workers and some other unionists on the Eastern Shore.

William Lavelle, USWA Aide, Dies

William Lavelle, assistant to Sec.-Treas. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, died of a heart attack while in Washington on union business. He was 53.

Secretary-treasurer of the former Ohio CIO Council from 1943 to 1949 with time out for war service, he also had been assistant director of the former National CIO Legislative Dept.

He was born to a miner's family in Rossiter, Pa., and moved as a child to Warren, Ohio, where he attended high school. He was graduated from Wooster (Ohio) College in 1931, studied law at Ohio State University and was admitted to the bar in 1934. He was a practicing attorney in Warren when he went to work for the old Steel Workers Organizing Committee in 1937, and he had been an aide to Abel for the past 10 years.

Surviving are his widow, Lucretia; two sons, William J. and Edward Lavelle; two brothers and three sisters. The funeral services and burial were in Pittsburgh.

INFORMATIONAL PICKET LINE, at entrance to Chicago's huge Merchandise Mart, informs the public that the building houses the main offices of Field Enterprises Educational Corp., major book customer of the struck Kingsport Press in Tennessee, which has continued to send its work to be done by strikebreakers while Machinists and four printing trades unions have maintained picket lines since last Mar. 11.

Kingsporters Picket Office In Chicago

Chicago—Union pickets have been posted here at the sales office of the Kingsport Press and at the Merchandise Mart headquarters of the Field Enterprises Educational Corp. to tell the public why 1,600 union members have been on strike at the Kingsport, Tenn., book printing plant since Mar. 11.

The pickets represented a new effort by the Intl. Allied Printing Trades Association to publicize strike issues and to call public attention to publishers who use the struck facilities.

A major customer of the Kingsport plant—biggest hard-cover book plant in the nation—is the Field corporation, publishers of the World Book Encyclopedia and the Childcraft series.

Kingsport Press has rejected all union offers to settle the strike. A Field Enterprises representative met with union spokesmen to disavow any responsibility for Kingsport management's labor policies and to urge removal of the pickets.

"We have no choice," replied Pres. James H. Sampson of the IAPTA, "but to regard those publishers who are continuing to send their work to Kingsport, to be produced by strikebreakers, as allies of this unfair employer."

This will put all publishers on notice, Sampson observed, that the unions seek the support of organized labor, school boards, libraries, and the general public "not to buy any books produced by the Kingsport Press until this strike is settled and strikers are back at work on an honorable basis."

Maintaining picket lines at Kingsport are the Machinists and four printing trades unions—Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers and Typographers.

Musicians' Local Honors Film Firm

Hollywood, Calif. — Musicians Local 47 has presented a certificate of appreciation to afficials of American Intl. Pictures in recognition of the firm's use of American-made sound track to score movies.

The presentation was made by Local Pres. John Tranchitella and Sec. Don Morris to James Nicholson, president; Samuel Arkoff, vice president, and Al Simms, musical director of the firm. Simms, a long-time professional musician and a member of Local 47, is the father of LuAnn Simms, the singer.

Union Counterproposal Offers GE 3-Year Pact

New York—A counterproposal, offered as a "basis for agreement," was handed General Electric Co. negotiators Sept. 4 by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers as bargaining sessions entered the last month before expiration of the existing contract.

The counterproposal, presented by IUE Pres. James B. Carey, called for a three-year contract with wage increases of 2.5 percent each year, a wage adjustment clause tied to future cost-of-living figures and continuation of present grievance-arbitration language with modifications including establishment of a permanent panel of arbitrators.

The counterproposal acknowledged GE's offer of improvements in pension plans, holiday pay, medical protection, sickness and accident benefits, vacations and layoff protection.

IUE negotiators commented that some of these improvements had been urged by the union for years but that they did not represent "an adequate response to the needs of GE employes affected by layoff and automation." The company's total offer "falls short of meeting the problems plaguing" its employes, they said.

Nevertheless, said IUE's GE Conference Board Chairman John Callahan, the union "is prepared to bargain on both [union and company] proposals to conclude a satisfactory agreement in the shortest possible time."

Meanwhile, IUE negotiations with Westinghouse Electric Corp. went into their fifth week in Pittsburgh, with most time spent on explanation and discussion of union proposals. The company had made no offer of its own by Sept. 4.

The Westinghouse contract expires Oct. 15 and the union urged an early settlement to avoid "crisis bargaining."

'Roadblocks' Cited

The GE offer included these proposals cited by the union as potential "roadblocks" to settlement:

- A sharply restricted arbitration clause limiting the types of unsettled grievances that would be arbitrable. This reflected a company position that some grievances previously arbitrated infringed on management prerogatives.
- A wage offer of only two 2.5 percent increases in a three-year contract—the second to be payable 18 months after the effective date.
- Refusal to reinstate a cost-of-living clause dropped during the last negotiations at management insistence.
- A proposal to freeze pension, vacation and insurance benefits for five years, thus foreclosing them from negotiation at the next bargaining sessions three years hence.

The union said GE's arbitration proposal was "unacceptable," declaring that "a comprehensive arbitration procedure is essential to the fair enforcement of a collective bargaining agreement, amicable relations between the parties, and uninterrupted production."

Pointing out that denial of grievance arbitration leaves a union with no recourse but a strike if grievances are rejected unilaterally by management, IUE said the company's position "makes no sense if there is to be a mature labor-management relationship."

The company's two-step wage increase proposal represents an "18-month stretch-out" and even falls short of "guidelines" on pay settlements devised by the government, IUE negotiators said, and fails to take into account increases in productivity by GE workers.

Protection Denied

Company refusal to reinstate a cost-of-living clause denies GE workers protection "that would make wage increases meaningful in terms of purchasing dollars, at a time when government statistics show another jump in the Consumer Price Index," the union declared.

Bargaining sessions began early in August after preliminary discussions dating back to May. GE's chief negotiator, Philip D. Moore, said the informal talks had been useful in the areas of contract language and employe benefits.

Union and company teams split into subcommittees after GE made its offer, one subcommittee dealing with the arbitration clause, the other with benefits. The full committees resumed meetings for the IUE counterproposal.

C. L. Rosemund Dead, Early AFTE Leader

Alexandria, Va. — Charles L. Rosemund, who helped found the Technical Engineers and was president of that union from 1919 to 1942, died here at 84. He was an associate of Samuel Gompers, first president of the former AFL.

The Same Old Story

THERE ARE several constants in the nation's education situation as each new school year rolls around: more students, not enough teachers and classrooms and very limited congressional action on federal aid to education.

These conditions prevail again this year as 51.5 million students enroll in schools and colleges. There is still a severe shortage of qualified teachers and a failure to provide them with an adequate salary scale, and there are still not enough classrooms and too many ancient, unsafe, inadequate buildings.

Federal aid to education is still stalled as it has been since the end of World War II, although this year there is some small hope for a piecemeal approach on vocational education, medical schools and perhaps college classroom construction.

But this year a new element has been introduced which ironically may further aggravate a difficult situation. The widely publicized and supported drive to prevent school dropouts, to bring back into the classrooms those who have previously quit school, may prove too successful.

In the District of Columbia, where a particularly intensive drive has been waged against dropouts, early enrollment reports indicate that the number of dropouts returning to school may create a severe teacher shortage.

If the District experience is duplicated elsewhere, the nation may well find itself in the position of urging youngsters to make the "$50,000 decision" in terms of education aiding their future earning power, and then failing to provide the facilities and teachers to convert that decision into reality.

★ ★ ★

IN REPORTING enrollment expectations for the 1963-64 school year, the U.S. Office of Education notes what presumbly it feels is a measure of progress—that 58 percent of the school-age population was enrolled in some type of school last fall compared to 42 percent 15 years earlier; that 64 percent of all pupils entering the fifth grade in 1954-55 were graduated on schedule compared to 50.5 percent 12 years earlier.

The comparison to 12 and 15 years ago is thin comfort. Why not 100 percent of school-age population in the schools this fall and 100 percent of the youngsters in fifth grade graduating?

★ ★ ★

THE OPENING of another school year also brings out the measuring stick in school integration. Much is being made this September of the fact that all states will have desegregated their schools below the college level to some extent or other except Mississippi.

In most southern states the desegregation involves a handful of youngsters, a token gesture to a Supreme Court decision that will be 10 years old next spring. In the northern states school district boundaries and housing segregation continue a pattern of segregated schools in fact if not in policy or in law.

The states and the localities have had their way on education during the postwar crisis. Many have tried their best, with limited resources, to meet the challenge. Many have sidestepped or ignored the situation.

This September, with the spotlight turned on schools and education, the time has come to ask again of Congress how much longer must the nation wait for a school system fitting to the greatest democratic nation on earth—adequate facilities, able, well-paid teachers, classes assembled without reference to race, creed or national origins.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, September 7, 1963 No. 36

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

'Sorry, Kids, the Bus Isn't Running Yet'

Hits 'Stale Charges':

'Unions Are Very Much Alive,' Labor Journalist Advises Critic

The following article by Irwin Klass, veteran labor editor and writer, appeared in Chicago Federation News under the headline, "Unions Are Very Much Alive."

WANT TO MAKE headlines? Get yourself rated as a former "organizer" for a union, develop a glib pen, induce a foundation or university to keep you in a style that permits you to grind axes without getting a callus yourself.

Most important, become an "objective" critic of the labor movement, and in the name of academic or scholarly freedom publish pamphlets that urge the breakup of the AFL-CIO and proclaim the end of collective bargaining.

If it's press clippings you want, brother, you're made.

That seems to be the career of one Paul Jacobs, whose work is financed by an organization called the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. We've never met Mr. Jacobs outside of his writings, and our own analysis is this: he's a frustrated revolutionary who found he couldn't reshape the world to his pattern when associated with a union, and now would rebuild the trade union movement on the ashes of the wreckage he'd like to help create.

Winning the title of "expert" and "author" on the basis of a pamphlet that compresses all the alleged ailments of organized labor into 46 pages, Mr. Jacobs should be ready to retire with glory, but we read that he's now associated with the University of California Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations. In a nutshell, Mr. Jacobs believes:

- Collective bargaining is finished.
- The AFL-CIO should be split up.
- Get the government more directly involved in labor relations.
- If unions with similar jurisdiction don't merge fast enough, pass a law to make them get together.

Clark Kerr, president of the University of California and chairman of the trade union advisory committee of the organization sponsoring the study, disagreed with Jacobs. He said:

"I do not agree with his conclusions that the present system of collective bargaining is obsolete and needs replacing, although I do think we have entered a new stage in the relationships among labor, management and the government. . . . I am not so pessimistic about the future as I take Paul Jacobs to be, nor am I convinced as he is that some of the contradictions in public policy that he discusses cannot be resolved by the exercise of prudence and good judgment."

There's no documentation of Jacobs' stale charges. The labor movement welcomes study by serious scholars, notably people like Dr. Kerr who come into a research situation without conviction that all of labor's programs and personnel are lacking in honor or dedication. The shelf of hardcover commentaries on labor-management relations in this country is overflowing, and much of the work is good. We reject the notion that a 46-page pamphlet loaded with selective "evidence" to justify a long-standing bias constitutes serious scholarship.

The fact is that collective bargaining is changing daily; the recent innovations in the steel industry (sharing of saving on production costs at Kaiser, longterm vacations in basic steel) are results of flexibility of the American bargaining system.

Jacobs' reaction to a problem is one that often afflicts those who have lost the power of impact on events: call in the government. We reject this approach, which has failed in countries where the government is deeply involved in the labor-management process.

SURELY THERE IS much in American unions and other institutions that needs correction. Yet labor fills the void in our society when others fail to act on the issues related to the quality of life in America. The "liberal" commentators on organized labor have evidently abandoned this fight. Organized labor still works as best it knows how in achieving these goals for our country:

- The kind of opportunity to provide for all our children an education that will enable them to grow and develop to the best of their capabilities.
- The security and dignity provided to our older citizens after they have done their share of work.
- The kind of economic, social and political opportunities provided for all citizens regardless of their race or creed or color.
- The kind of opportunity provided for every able and willing person to be gainfully employed.

It's easier for the critics of labor like Jacobs to be critical than correct. The work that organized labor performs daily does change the quality of life in our nation, but the process is tedious and doesn't get many headlines.

Morgan Says:

Pressure of Evidence Piling Up Linking Cigarets with Cancer

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE OLD SAW about "where there's smoke, there's fire" may soon be applied in a blistering manner to the tobacco industry. Pressures, scientific and otherwise, are increasingly directed against cigarets as the evidence, though still not positively conclusive, piles up to link cigaret smoking with lung cancer.

Morgan

A special committee of scientists is due to report to the U.S. Surgeon General, probably before the end of the year, a series of findings on smoking and the health issue. In a front page lead story recently, the Wall Street Journal reported that the controversy was pointing a loaded, double-barreled shotgun directly at the huge, lucrative and important U.S. tobacco industry.

". . . Most authorities agree," the Journal recount said, "that the ever-stronger case against cigarets makes it far more likely that the Surgeon General's group will declare that cigarets are a probable cause of lung cancer and other lung disease and that they contribute to heart disease and higher mortality rates in general. If so, these authorities add, the AMA (American Medical Association) undoubtedly would take a strong anti-smoking stand for the first time."

Of more importance is a recently published book called "The Consumers Union Report on Smoking and the Public Interest." Consumers Union is a non-profit organization of high integrity which for years has been a boon to the American customer and a bane to manufacturers and merchants inclined to give the public short measure on quantity or quality. But its careful testing of countless products and publication of the results in a monthly magazine, Consumer Reports, may well have generated modest booms for goods and services rated up to standard.

"The conclusion is inescapable," the book says, "and even spokesmen for the cigaret industry today rarely seek to escape it: We are living in the midst of a major lung cancer epidemic. This epidemic hit men first and hardest, but has affected women as well. It is occurring not only in the United States but in a number of other countries. It cannot be explained away by such factors as improved diagnosis. . . .

"The American Public Health Association has called attention to this black future in a single dramatic statistic. If present trends continue, the association reported in 1959, 'lung cancer will claim the lives of more than 1 million present school children in this country before they reach the age of 70 years.' "

Finally, "Smoking and The Public Interest" emphasizes, "there is the strange but unchallenged fact that lung cancer remains today a rare disease among men and women who do not smoke and who never have smoked. It is also relatively uncommon among men who smoke cigars or pipes or both, but not cigarets."

Then the book adds this stunning haymaker: "If a single population could be found—urban or rural, domestic or foreign, red, yellow, black or white—in which an increase in lung cancer is not linked with heavy, prolonged cigaret smoking, the case against the cigaret would concededly be weakened. But no such population has been reported."

AND SO THIS Consumers Union examination concludes: "The first practical question the layman should bear in mind is quite simply, 'If I start smoking cigarets, will my chances of dying of lung cancer go up significantly? The answer is Yes.

"The other practical question is for men and women who already smoke cigarets: 'If I stop smoking them, will my chances of getting lung cancer go down?' The answer is again Yes."

But as the Wall Street Journal points out, the habit won't be easy to break, for a number of reasons: American consumers spent nearly $8 billion on tobacco last year. The livelihoods of more than 3.5 million workers depend at least to some extent on the tobacco industry which yielded more than $3.2 billion in federal, state and municipal excise taxes in 1962.

If the problem is as bad as even the most cautious examinations indicate it is . . . we might best begin with an education program that would be a little more honest and candid than cigaret advertising campaigns which proclaim smoking will increase our status symbols if not actually strengthen our well-being and health.

Washington Reports:

4-1 Senate Approval Predicted For Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

THE NUCLEAR TEST BAN treaty will be approved by the Senate by a 4-to-1 vote, Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.) predicted in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on almost 700 stations.

"We have been fearfully close—as our experience in the Cuban crisis should have shown us all —to nuclear catastrophe, and so we ought to look upon this [treaty] as an opportunity to step in the other direction," Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) declared on the same program.

"If this treaty leads to further progress toward enforceable disarmament and lessening of the tensions and dangers in today's world, then we will have reason to applaud the action the Senate is about to take. If it does not work out, we won't be any worse off than we are today."

Both senators declared themselves in favor of the four "safeguards" proposed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff: The U.S. must stand ready to resume testing in case of violation of the treaty; the U.S. should continue efforts to improve its detection system; the U.S. should expand its underground testing for military and peace-time uses of the atom; the U.S. should maintain its laboratory facilities.

Both discounted an argument by Dr. Edward Teller, a nuclear scientist, that the Soviet Union might cheat on the treaty by tests in outer space.

"It is my observation that the Soviet Union is short of cash right now," commented Aiken, "and when we consider the billions and billions of dollars that would be necessary to conduct a test 20 million miles from earth and get adequate reports back from the test, then I think there is little likelihood that they would undertake such a test. Furthermore, our government scientists say they think they could detect such a test."

ASKED IF THE TREATY would tie U.S. hands in case of war, Aiken replied: "Absolutely not. Under international law, the provisions of a treaty are not applicable when any signatory happens to get into war. At such time, the treaty goes out the window."

Church, asked about Soviet Union reasons for signing the treaty, said:

"For one thing, we all breath the same air and we have a common interest in preventing its further poisoning. For another, the nuclear arsenals have reached fantastic levels. Today the equivalent of 60 million tons of TNT is in the existing U.S. and USSR arsenals. That is equivalent to a bomb against the head of every inhabitant of this planet.

"A third reason is the mounting costs of this continuing race, which puts a disproportionate burden on the nuclear powers, making it less and less possible to devote the resources we should be using to peaceful uses and to competition in international markets."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EVERY ONCE IN A WHILE a congressional committee experiences a moment of truth. Such a moment occurred during Senate Labor Committee hearings on amendment of the Manpower Development & Training Act—and the bearer of tidings was the Republican Sen. Len B. Jordan of Idaho.

At issue was the simple question of whether Congress should continue to insist on state matching funds to operate the manpower program.

When the original training act was passed in 1962, the federal government was to put up somewhat more than half the money to get the program launched, with a total authorized expenditure of $435 million. But the states were required to start furnishing matching funds for part of the program, and after June 30, 1964, one-half the cost for all of the vocational training and one-half the allowances to support trainees while they were being re-educated.

This was in line with the immemorial dogma that the states ought to show evidence of being "interested" in a program, and bear "their share" of its costs, if a joint federal-state operation is conducted for the general welfare.

The Labor Committee was faced with the cold fact that only three legislatures—in Connecticut, Montana and Tennessee—have passed matching fund authorizations, and for only a total of $720,000. The whole experimental project in retraining would grind to a halt unless the matching-fund formula was dropped.

* * *

THE ALTERNATIVE, of course, was to let it die. And two senators—Goldwater of Arizona, Tower of Texas, both Republicans—declined to sign a report supporting amendment of the act, saying that 47 legislatures "have refused to enact matching legislation" although they have had ample opportunity.

But the proposed amendment was overwhelmingly backed by other members, and the official report relied heavily on Jordan's comments during hearings.

Jordan is a former member of the Idaho legislature and a former governor. In an exchange with a witness, the senator remarked that "the mills grind very slowly at the state level." Practically speaking, he suggested, it was "expecting a good deal" for the states to have "come out wholeheartedly in support of this program" in 1963 when the enabling legislation was approved by Congress only last year.

He referred to the shortness of sessions in most legislatures—a holdover from state constitutions adopted when rural populations thought that legislature best which did little or nothing and was sent home quickly.

Even more significantly, he cited the high turnover of members in most legislatures and the inexperience of both old and new members in such complicated programs as manpower training—the selection of vocational skills to promote the projection of programs to fit workers for jobs that will be available when they are trained.

* * *

BESIDES, the committee report pointed out, "most of the states are extremely hard pressed financially."

State and local government debt has jumped 600 percent since 1945 while the federal government debt increased only 10 percent. A state's failure to vote funds for a program that is brand new, that is experimental and preliminary, that is intended to develop techniques through trial-and-error methods, doesn't mean that the state disapproves the program. It may mean simply that it has neither the competence to build a record and justify authorization nor the money to spend.

What is true in regard to manpower training is true for a good many other programs basically national in scope, and it is no longer logical for matching state funds to be required automatically.

And federal financing, it may be remembered, is provided from a graduated income tax vastly more equitable than financing from state revenues drawn largely from property taxes and sales taxes bearing most heavily on low-income and middle-income families.

THE NUCLEAR TEST BAN TREATY should and will be approved by an overwhelming vote, Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.), left, and Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) agreed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Both are members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Meany Sees Civil Rights Made 'Fully Secure' in '63

The year 1963 is the "year in which civil rights of every American must be made truly meaningful and fully secure for all time," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a special message to the American Negro Emancipation Centennial in Chicago.

"The AFL-CIO is dedicated to the still unfinished task of Negro emancipation," Meany wrote the centennial group, on four levels:

- Economic emancipation through enactment of a federal fair employment practices law.
- Social emancipation by enactment of federal legislation to outlaw discrimination in all places of public accommodation and executive action to extend and reinforce equal opportunity in housing.
- Political emancipation by legislation empowering the attorney general to insist on equal justice before the law whenever discrimination is practiced.
- Education emancipation by federal action to assure full equality in education for all children without regard to race, creed or color.

Meany paid tribute to Negro trade unionists whose "dedication, leadership and sacrifices over the years have done so much to advance organized labor's unremitting struggle for a better life and higher standards of working and living conditions for all Americans."

He stressed that the concept of equal opportunity rests in a large sense on the ability to strengthen the U.S. economy to provide jobs, good wages and living standards "in keeping with the American dream."

Parades, Rallies Mark Labor's Own Holiday

(Continued from Page 1)

parade. Some 500 locals from 45 international unions were in the line of march which began under bright sunlight and ended well after dark.

For stay-at-homes in many cities throughout the nation, there was the television preview of the AFL-CIO's 1963 Labor day film, "In Common Brotherhood."

Filmed on four continents, it showed a cros-section of the assistance given by the AFL-CIO to free trade unions throughout the world.

All major radio networks carried speeches by top AFL-CIO officials and newspapers reported Labor Day messages and greetings by Pres. Kennedy, congressional leaders and spokesmen for all major religious groups.

Wirtz Hails Unions

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz hailed organized labor for having added "industrial democracy" to the political democracy established in the United States. He used the occasion, also to emphasize the higher degree of skill and training needed in today's labor market and to make a last-minute appeal to youngsters thinking about "dropping out" of school to return to classrooms this fall.

Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service Dir. William E. Simkin reminded the nation that "collective bargaining is working well in the vast majority of cases" despite "mammoth current problems that are by-products of unemployment and automation."

Typical of messages received from trade unions overseas was one from the Austrian Federation of Trade Unions, voicing "wishes for best success in your struggle for full employment, for increased social security and for fair employment opportunities for all."

For some 2.6 million of the nation's lowest-paid workers, Labor Day heralded a pay increase —under the federal Wage-Hour Act.

Effective Sept. 3, the minimum wage for workers in jobs covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act prior to 1961 advanced from $1.15 an hour to a new minimum of $1.25 an hour. This will add an estimated $365 million in buying power.

For all retail service workers brought under the wage-hour coverage in 1961, the 44-hour week became effective, with overtime rates required above that ceiling. Other previously-covered workers remain under the 40-hour week.

Schlossberg Joins UAW Legal Staff

Stephen I. Schlossberg has resigned as special assistant to the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to become associate general counsel for the Auto Workers.

A one-time organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers, Schlossberg will handle UAW legal matters in Detroit under Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., of Washington, who was recently named UAW general counsel.

In announcing the resignation, FMCS Dir. William E. Simkin said Schlossberg would be succeeded by Herbert Schmertz, who has been the agency's general counsel, and that Schmertz in turn would be replaced by H. T. Herrick, for the past two years special assistant to Assistant Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds.

In Labor Day Speeches:

Peace, Rights, Jobs, Progress Reaffirmed as Union Goals

(Continued from Page 1)

raising the wages of millions of working women." He added:

There may be a long road to travel before equal rights and equal opportunity, with no ifs, ands or buts, are established beyond question . . . but we are moving with increasing speed in that direction."

Beirne, speaking over the American Broadcasting Co. network, traced the "years of legislative effort and struggle" which led to such programs as free public education and social security, and economic struggles which brought about shorter hours, paid vacations and a "democratic economy."

These, he emphasized, "did not spring automatically into existance. . . . When we take for granted any of these American social advances, we have taken the first step to make them weaker or even losing them altogether."

Beirne and Hayes both stressed the human problems arising from automation—and from the failure of the economy to grow rapidly enough to provide jobs for workers displaced by technological developments and new workers entering the labor market.

Hayes, heard over the Columbia Broadcasting System, pointed out that labor's drive for shorter hours is motivated by the fact that "millions of American workers who want work do not have jobs."

Opponents of shorter hours, he declared, "offer no answers, no alternatives of their own to the problem of technological unemployment."

Purchasing Power Stressed

Organized labor, Hayes said, is "deeply and directly" concerned with finding an answer to the problem of maintaining "the dignity of labor and the purchasing power of working families at the time when the human factor in industry is threatened as it is through automation."

Meany, in his Labor Day addres, declared the United States has "an obligation" to the world "to demonstrate the superiority of a free society."

The place to start, he said, "is right here at home." He added:

"It is all very well to say that the worker earning $3,000 a year in America is better off than most workers in the Soviet Union. That may be true but it is not enough. We have to see to it that everyone in America enjoys an American standard of living."

On civil rights failures, Meany said, "we cannot wiggle off the hook by saying that there is anti-semitism in the Soviet Union . . . what matters is our own conduct, here in America. If there is a question whether every American is equal, then the whole concept of America is in question everywhere."

Meany emphasized that U.S. labor is alert to the continuing threat of world communism and is under "no illusions" about the Soviet Union.

"Even so," he said, "we are aware that anti-communism, in itself, is not a policy that can prevail in the world."

Freedom, Meany said, "can and will prevail as long as free Americans continue their unending quest for a stronger and better society."

Farmers, Labor Urged To Unite Against R-T-W

Henryetta, Okla.—Farmers and city workers must "stand together" to defeat a drive to outlaw the union shop in Oklahoma, Pres. James G. Patton of the National Farmers Union declared at a statewide Labor Day rally here.

Patton, whose organization represents family farmers, warned that a so-called "right-to-work" law would cause the state's economy to "take a nose dive."

He said such a punitive and "unfair" law would lower the income of Oklahoma's small farmers and merchants as much as it would slash the wages of workers in industry.

The business reactionaries and "wild-eyed John Birchers" who are seeking to ban the union shop are also the leaders of the drive to destroy farmer co-ops and the rural electrification program, Patton charged.

"You have stuck with us and we're going to stick with you," he pledged to the Labor Day gathering.

"The important message I want to get over to both farmers and working people is to stick together and help each other in this fight.

"Together, farmers and workers of Oklahoma can protect each other's hard-won rights. Alone, you can't. So look to the things you have in common. Don't let the John Birchers, the 'right-to-workers' or anyone else fool you into thinking you should be on opposite sides. If that happens, it will be tragic for you and for Oklahoma."

Patton, who is an executive board member of the National Council for Industrial Peace, noted that Oklahoma has been a prime target for the "right-to-work" drive. An initiative petition to force a referendum on a proposed "right-to-work" constitutional amendment is currently before the State Supreme Court.

"Day after tomorrow it will be some kind of legislation to aid monopoly business at the expense of the small merchants," he added.

The goal of "national prosperity and abundance for all," Patton declared, cannot be acheived "by turning the clock back to the last century. . . . We cannot produce greater purchasing power for our farm and factory products by enacting so-called 'right-to-work' laws that lower wages and dry up the buying power of 70 million working Americans."

Meany Protests Ruling On Northeast Airlines

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged the Civil Aeronautics Board to reconsider its decision to cancel Northeast Airlines' Florida and Eastern Seaboard routes—a move which would sharply curtail air service in the New England area and cost the jobs of several thousand airline employes.

In a letter to CAB Chairman Allan S. Boyd, Meany expressed "most serious objection" to the ruling.

It was made, he declared, "with an apparent disregard" for the continued existence of the airline and "its depressing effect" on the economy of New England and the air service needs of the population.

"The decision," he said, "seems to have been taken with an apparent disregard for its inhuman effect on the livelihood of thousands of skilled and trained employes of the carrier and their families."

Meany also expressed "serious concern" at the "undesirable monopolistic characteristics" resulting from the lessening of competition along routes which have been served by Northeast.

The 3-2 decision eliminated Northeast from the profitable Florida route, which included the right to stop at Washington and Philadelphia, leaving the field to National and Eastern Airlines.

Unions representing nearly 2,000 Northeast employes who are expected to lose their jobs if the CAB decision stands have vigorously protested the ruling, as have New England business groups and the area's congressional delegation.

Meany urged reconsideration by the CAB "so that a more equitable resolution of difficulties of Northeast Airlines can be achieved and the rights and well-being of so many American citizens might be better protected and advanced."

REVIEWING STAND SCENE at height of New York City AFL-CIO Labor Day parade shows, left to right, Sen. Jacob K. Javits, Treas. William H. Bowe of the citywide AFL-CIO, Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Mayor Robert F. Wagner, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the local AFL-CIO.

Program for Dropouts:

Labor Urged to Back Youth Training Plan

An appeal that all AFL-CIO affiliates cooperate with the Youth Employment Program of the National Institute of Labor Education has been made by Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The project originated in a resolution adopted by the President's Committee on Youth Employment, of which Haggerty is a member, calling on the labor movement to establish training centers where school dropouts can learn skills commensurate with their abilities. It is jointly financed by the AFL-CIO and the Labor Dept.

Haggerty pointed out that the jobless rate among high school dropouts runs four to six times that of the total labor force.

"A complicating factor is that much of the untrained labor force is to be found among racial minority groups who, because of poverty, ignorance or race, are not among the beneficiaries of any kind of training," he added.

"The trend towards automation further narrows the opportunities for these people who are at the lowest level of skills.

"By contrast, we can expect a rise in the need for professional, technical and related workers, and thus expanding opportunities for highly trained people."

Haggerty said it seemed advisable that the voluntary groups of U.S. society, "especially management and labor," supplement what the federal government is doing to help young people. The NILE program is the result.

Declaring that "the present situation calls for bold and imaginative action, and some sacrifice," he pointed out that "there are many ways by which a local union or a council could start a good, meaningful program."

"Government assistance is available for these programs in the form of subsidies to young people undergoing training, as well as funds for the hiring of teachers, rental of equipment, and training facilities," he said.

Haggerty urged affiliates to direct their inquiries to Dir. Nicholas R. Loope, NILE Youth Employment Program, 1755 Massachusetts Avenue, Suite 300, Washington, D. C.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Mrs. Mildred Jeffrey of the Auto Workers serve with Haggerty on the President's committee. AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin is a vice president of NILE.

GOOD FOOD and lots of it was served at this union-operated stand during the Clearfield County (Pa.) Fair. The union label-decorated staff was composed of, left to right, Sec. Fred Pizzella of the Clearfield County AFL-CIO; Cora Turner, Clothing Workers; Pres. Willard Nelson of the county central body, and Thomas Leone of the Stone & Allied Products Workers.

Chicago AFM Locals Told to Speed Merger

New York—Two Chicago locals of the Musicians have been instructed by the American Federation of Musicians, to "enter promptly into good-faith negotiations looking torward merger," Pres. Herman Kenin announced.

The order reaffirmed the AFM policy "to effect with all possible speed a program for ending segregation, separation or exclusion" in its locals "based on race, color, creed or national origin," Kenin emphasized. He said he had been "assured" of the dedication of both Chicago units—Local 10 and Local 208—to the purpose.

Noting that unity discussions have been taking place, the AFM international executive board declared itself "dissatisfied with the merger developments . . . since March of this year."

The parent international "prefers that the terms of the merger be negotiated," Kenin said, but "is determined that the merging process shall not be delayed unduly."

Unless the union is satisfied that joint negotiations will produce agreement no later than Mar. 1, 1964, the AFM "will take such action as may be deemed necessary to accomplish the merger . . . with due regard to the rights and privileges of all concerned," he said.

The executive board directive came after officers of Local 208 had met at their own suggestion with the board, with officers of Local 10 also invited.

The board responded Aug. 28 with a "statement of policy and order" sent identically to each local.

The locals were instructed to "enter promptly into good-faith negotiations looking toward merger."

During negotiations "and until further action by the international union," the board directed, "neither local shall induce nor accept membership applications from the other local; all members of either local who have already applied may enjoy dual membership, provided they shall have paid the full initiation fees and dues not later than Oct. 1, 1963."

The latter provision, Kenin announced, bears on the status of Negro members of Local 208 who recently applied for membership in Local 10.

The AFT order stressed that "all parties must be constantly aware that a real merger presupposes a joining of equals, with mutual respect and with full regard for previous contributions of all parties to the labor movement," and that "any such merger must contain the assurance of future equality and opportunity for those joining together."

Fix-Up Fund Aids Victims Of Racist Mob

(Continued from Page 1)

It stands for "fair play for all," including "the right of every American to live where he chooses."

The attempt to deny the Bakers this right "is a cause of deep sorrow to all fair-minded trade unionists," he continued. The question all had to face, he said, was how to "lift the burden of shame."

State police fenced off the mobs assaulting the Baker home and shouting insults in riotous scenes, but the violent crowd had already broken the windows and storm sash, partially burned out a bedroom with a fire bomb, torn off the garage doors, damaged the heating system, destroyed the water heater, and stoned and egged the officers.

The family nevertheless moved in under police protection. Baker is a laboratory technician, his wife a hospital nurse. Their two-year-old daughter was left with relatives until the violence faded.

The Bakers said "we only want a decent place to live. We will obey and respect the law and hope other people will." The mob outbreak was a "challenge," Baker added. "And if we can't live up to a challenge, we have no place to go."

Florida Line Yields on Work Rules

Jacksonville, Fla.—The Florida East Coast Railway has bowed to a government order and rescinded drastic work rules changes it had unilaterally imposed two months ago, but operating employes continued to respect the picket lines of "non-op" unions which have been on strike since Jan. 23.

The non-op strike is over wages. Management refused to grant its workers the 10.3 cents an hour increase won last year on all other major railroads.

Members of the operating unions, who have observed the picket lines since the start of the non-op strike, formally called a strike when the railroad imposed its rules changes.

Although the company has not participated in the national bargaining over work rules, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and National Mediation Board Chairman Francis A. O'Neill ruled that the arbitration law passed by Congress on the work rules issue applies to all railroads.

In a joint telegram to the railroad, they declared that the operating rules changes must be "rescinded, cancelled and annulled."

The railroad has maintained skeleton freight service during the strike but a recent financial report showed a net operating loss of $573,951 during the first half of 1963 compared with an operating profit of $357,183 during the comparable period last year.

Kit on Colleges Ready for Parents

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has prepared a kit for the parents of youngsters who enter their junior year of high school this fall and who are interested in the AFL-CIO scholarship program.

Juniors who want to compete for the AFL-CIO awards, which are worth up to $6,000 over the four years of college, must take the National Merit Scholarship Examination on Mar. 10, 1964.

The federation kit includes complete information on AFL-CIO scholarships and other sources of scholarships and low-cost financial aid, makes suggestions for selecting the right college and outlines preparations for college entrance.

A kit will be sent free to any union member who sends a postcard to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Rail, Union Spokesmen Plot Route to Settlement

(Continued from Page 1)

limited arbitration, to avert the shutdown which would have taken place had the railroads been permitted to put into effect their work rules changes, union spokesmen viewed the legislative battle against compulsory arbitration as "not a total defeat."

"Labor," weekly newspaper of the rail brotherhoods, said the precedent set may be "harmful to the future of free labor-management relations." But it added in an editorial:

"Operating unions salvaged a great deal in their hard and determined four-year battle. . . .

"The unions blocked efforts by the railroads to secure legislation requiring compulsory arbitration of all unsettled disputes. . . . They blocked attempts to have the entire dispute submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission. . . . They won their battle to have all items in dispute, other than two main issues, handled by collective bargaining."

Gilbert, writing in the Locomotive Firemen's publication, noted that the bill as enacted limited "compulsion" to the two areas the parties had earlier agreed voluntarily to arbitrate but were unable to get together on the procedure.

"We won a major point," Gilbert said, when the Senate accepted the amendment by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) which limited arbitration to these issues and prescribed renewed collective bargaining for other matters.

Nevertheless, he said, "I am still firm in my view that a two or three-day strike would not only have settled the dispute but would have reaffirmed the basic tenets of free collective bargaining."

NAM Puts Full Weight Behind BIPAC Drive

New York—The National Association of Manufacturers is throwing the full weight of its influence and public relations services behind the newly-created Business-Industry Political Action Committee (BIPAC), the creation of which it sponsored, despite the committee's technical standing as an "independent" political operation.

NAM Pres. W. P. Gullander said in a speech here to the Rotary Club that "we intend to give BIPAC every support and help we legitimately can."

Telling the Rotarians that the business community had been slow in developing an organization to make its influence felt politically, Gullander commended as "far-sighted and courageous" the 13 businessmen who formed BIPAC and agreed to serve as directors.

He also sent a letter to all NAM members, enclosing BIPAC literature, and urging them to join as individuals and "help enroll other individuals within their companies as BIPAC members."

He also directed all NAM offices to maintain a supply of BIPAC literature and membership application forms, and to support a national campaign by the NAM Public Affairs Dept. to promote BIPAC.

An editorial in the NAM News remarked that aspirants for office "have developed a healthy respect for the campaign organizations developed by labor-liberal interests, particularly COPE, the political arm of the AFL-CIO."

"Businessmen have wanted such an organization [as BIPAC] for many years. . . . We trust the response will be enthusiastic and immediate," the editorial concluded.

BIPAC said in its organization announcement that it would raise funds to back congressional candidates "who support the principles of constitutional government." It will also summarize "the records of officeholders and candidates," its chairman, St. Louis banker Kenton R. Cravens, said.

The NAM public affairs director, Robert L. Humphrey, told the AFL-CIO News last May that he had been working for years to set up such an organization as BIPAC.

The objective, the News was told by NAM spokesmen at the time, was to back "conservative-oriented" candidates. Humphrey said BIPAC naturally would operate often on what amounts to a collision course with COPE.

Union Lends Hall To New Church

West Mifflin, Pa.—Members of Steelworkers Local 2227 have voted to make their union hall temporarily available for the celebration of mass for parishioners of the recently-created Holy Spirit Church.

Members of the local are employed in the Irvin Works of the U. S. Steel Corp. The pastor, Rev. Thomas J. Horner, is a native of Homestead, Pa., where his father, Jacob J. Horner, spent 48 years working in U. S. Steel plants.

Aimed at King-Anderson:

Health Care 'Politics' Seen in New Plans

Current efforts by private and commercial insurance carriers to push policies offering health insurance to the aged are "politically inspired" with the objective of killing the King-Anderson bill, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank charged.

In a network radio interview over the Mutual Broadcasting System, Cruikshank declared that the companies "are going to come out with a whole host of promises again to try to confuse the people, making them believe that they have available protection at a cost that is comparable."

Rising costs and premium charges show that the private insurance plans are not an "economical operation," he said on labor news conference, and the current drive in states such as Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York is a "belated effort" that "is not economically or business-inspired."

The cost of plans in the states noted above are "largely prohibitive" for most retired persons, Cruikshank said, noting that on a median yearly income of $2,530 "the typical elderly couple cannot pay 16 percent of their income for an adequate insurance plan."

Business Costs Stressed

Stressing the needs for a hospital insurance program financed through the social security system as envisioned in the King-Anderson bill, the AFL-CIO's director of social security said that one of the largest insurance carriers in the country has reported that it pays "49 cents out of every premium dollar in benefits and the remaining 51 cents goes to acquisition costs —agents' commissions, advertising and company profits." Cruikshank added that "you don't have those costs in a social security program."

The public must be informed that the "only practical mechanism" for the aged to meet their hospital bills is through the King-Anderson approach, he said. The social security plan "is so widely distributed over such a wide sector of the population," he said, "you can provide comparable services, comparable protection for older people at a much lower rate" than under private plans.

Under social security the cost of hospital insurance would be about $1 a month for the average wage earner making about $4,800 a year, compared to yearly premiums of $252 for adequate protection through private and commercial insurance plans.

Cruikshank was interviewed by Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc.

SEVENTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the Madison, Wis., Federation of Labor was marked by a dinner at which AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, a former Wisconsin assemblyman and congressman, was the main speaker. Shown from left are Rabbi Manfred Swarensky; Biemiller; State AFL-CIO Pres. George Haberman; AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Charles Heymanns; MFL Pres. Marvin E. Brickson; Richard Huffman, editor of the Union Labor News; Pres. Carl Eckloff of the Madison Building Trades Council; John A. Lawton, MFL counsel; Sec. A. H. Younger of the Madison Labor Temple Association.

AFL-CIO Fraternal Delegates Hail Heritage Shared with TUC

Brighton, England—Two fraternal delegates from the AFL-CIO brought to the 95th convention of the British Trades Union Congress here a message of solidarity based on "a common heritage" of personal freedom, political democracy, and economic and social progress.

This "unquenchable yearning for liberty," Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild declared, unites free unions throughout the world and "cannot be quenched forever behind the iron or bamboo curtains."

Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen, reporting on recent economic and political developments in the United States, declared that the civil rights "revolution" in America was "long overdue."

"We cannot wipe away the record of the past," he declared, "but we can—and we will—see to it that the future will be different."

DeAndrade told the TUC convention that he and Farson had walked the picket lines together frequently during the past year, including the long New York newspaper strike. He added:

"Because some of these strikes caused a degree of public inconvenience, there has been a great deal of loose talk in the United States about a 'breakdown in collective bargaining.' This, of course, is nonsense. The trouble lies not with collective bargaining, but with the national economy."

The "root of most labor-management difficulties in America, De Andrade said, has been the "rapid" destruction of jobs, combined with the inadequate development of new ones."

'Surface' Prosperity

The United States, he said, has "a high degree of surface prosperity" but "in spite of all this, we are in trouble."

"We have suffered, for nearly six years, an unemployment rate approaching 6 percent," he said. "Our labor force is growing very rapidly, and our technological genius—which we have boasted about so often, to the annoyance of other nations—is destroying old jobs faster than it is creating new ones."

Farson told the delegates that U.S. labor is "proud" of the nation's foreign aid record and the "readiness of the American people to preserve freedom in the world and to help promote the economic well-being and social progress of the free world countries."

As a member of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, Farson said, the AFL-CIO "strives to meet its responsibility in helping to make it an ever more effective instrument in the fight against world Communist subversion."

To TUC delegates, who in past conventions have been sharply divided over issues of disarmament and military alliances, Farson emphasized that the AFL-CIO considers the nuclear test ban treaty "a step towards peace." But he pointed out:

"It does not mean that we reduce our vigilance, or our insistence that the overall disarmament cannot be acheived except on the basis of strict international inspection and effective control.

"We will work toward that end, but still maintain our vigilance, our strength and our unity, especially with our Atlantic partners, so that we may be able to meet any emergency which may arise."

Senate Votes to Extend Manpower Training Aid

(Continued from Page 1)

13 Republicans and six Democrats and opposed by 39 Democrats and five Republicans.

The ease of the bill's passage raised hopes for a companion measure which was next on the Senate agenda. This would step up the portion of the training program earmarked for youth from 5 to 15 percent, lower the age at which training allowances could be paid from 19 to 16, and establish a new basic literacy program for trainees who lack the reading, writing and arithmetic skills necessary to qualify.

These improvements have been strongly supported by the AFL-CIO. Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate committee that the original act passed last year gave "insufficient attention" to the problem of training workers with inadequate education.

Starting Sept. 9, the Senate will debate the nuclear test ban treaty — possibly for several weeks.

The treaty, which requires a two-thirds majority for ratification, moved to the floor with a resounding bipartisan endorsement by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The committee, which approved the treaty by a 16-1 vote, declared it represents a "net advantage to the United States" and strongly urged ratification by the full Senate.

Under the agreement reached by the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain, nuclear explosions would be banned in the atmosphere, under water and in space. Its ratification was urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and Pres. George Meany told the Foreign Relations Committee that while labor doesn't consider the treaty "the millennium" in ensuring world peace, "we have no reservations about it."

The Senate committee report declared the test ban treaty "offers the prospect of a gradual lessening of tensions, of a start toward the progressive elimination of the danger of nuclear war." At the same time it warned against any loosening of the western alliance.

Still far from the legislative floor, however, are most of the key items in the Administration's program, including the big two —civil rights legislation and a tax cut.

The House Judiciary Committee, which has before it the omnibus civil rights bill plus a fair employment measure already approved by the Labor Committee, is in the midst of a 10-day recess.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, under southern leadership, is not expected to move on civil rights, and Administration leaders have pinned their hopes on the Senate Commerce Committee, which has begun closed-door consideration of the key public accommodations portion of the rights program.

Tax Cut Lags

Tax cut legislation, once expected to clear the House before Labor Day, appears unlikely to be brought to a vote before late September. If passed, it would then face lengthy Senate hearings before an unfriendly Finance Committee chairman, Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D.-Va.).

Although the new fiscal year began July 1, most government agencies are still waiting for their appropriations bills to be passed and meanwhile are operating under temporary resolutions authorizing continued expenditures not to exceed last year's levels.

Senate action on a House-passed aid to medical education bill had been scheduled for Sept. 6, but was put off until after the test ban debate when Goldwater asked more time to submit a minority report.

Toronto Newsman Joins USWA Staff

Toronto, Ont.—Frank Drea, nationally known labor reporter and columnist for the Toronto Telegram, has joined the Canadian public relations staff of the Steelworkers as assistant to Dir. Murray Cotterill.

A member of the Newspaper Guild, Drea was the first Canadian to win the Heywood Broun Award. He is widely known also as a television and radio commentator, and served as a correspondent of the AFL-CIO News.

Meany Urges 'Realism' On Soviet-China Break

(Continued from Page 1)

Soviet Union, "wishful thinking . . . would be fatal to our cause."

"Because of its huge military machine, its possession of the most modern nuclear weapons and missiles, its rising industrial strength and the presence of the Red Army in the heart of Europe, the Soviet Union continues to be a powerful and dangerous enemy," he said.

It would be wrong "to assume that, as a result of their feud with Peiping, the Kremlin rulers will be forced to turn to the West for protection. . . . Moscow does not need western help to save it from the 'yellow peril,'" he added.

USSR 'Predicament' Cited

"Khrushchev is in trouble," Meany noted. "He faces economic worries at home—at a time when the Soviet people yearn for a better life, when there is unrest among the Soviet youth and intellectuals and when the satellites are manifesting resentment against Moscow's tight grip."

He continued: "This is no time for the West rushing into accommodations with Moscow in order to help and strengthen Khrushchev as 'the lesser evil.'. . .

"The West should consider Khrushchev's predicament as an opportunity to extract concessions from him. . . .

"This is the time for the West to make united efforts for a settlement of the main problems causing international friction: the division of Germany, the Berlin wall, Soviet colonialism in East Europe, Soviet armed forces in Cuba, and Moscow's rejection of general disarmament under adequate international inspection."

At the same time, it would be a "fatal fallacy to believe that, because of its split with the Kremlin, Communist China will mellow," Meany noted.

China seeks greater trade with the free world "only because of its own needs aggravated by the loss of Soviet deliveries," he declared.

"The entire Chinese Communist program is based on increased enmity towards the West," he said. "We cannot emphasize too strongly that because of Communist China's expansionist ambitions, it would be suicidal for the West to help Mao build up a strong economy and, thereby, a powerful military machine."

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Sept. 14, 1963 | No. 37

Meany Backs Tax Cut Bill As Boost to Jobs, Economy

No Major Changes:

August Jobless Rate Slips to 5.5 Percent

A slight improvement in unemployment rates for adult men and teen-agers in mid-August edged the jobless rate down to 5.5 percent for the month, the Labor Dept. reported.

The change from 5.6 percent in July and the drop in the number of jobless by 465,000—a normal seasonal decline—brought the unemployment picture to the levels of December 1962, when the rate was also 5.5 percent and the number of unemployed last dipped under 4 million.

Compared to a year ago, the rate was down from 5.7 percent but the change in the number of jobless—at 3.9 million—was down only by 75,000.

The August 1963 figures reflected no major changes in the employment situation. The jobless rate has been stuck in the 5.5 to 6 percent range all through the year and has exceeded 5 percent for the past six years.

There was one unexpected change in the August figures—employment dropped 300,000 to 70.6 million. Seasonal expectations call for little movement between July and August and Labor Dept. officials charged the drop to a sharp decline in farm employment.

The unemployment rate for adult men dropped from 4.3 to 4.1 percent and the teen-agers' rate from 16.2 to 14.1 percent. But the rate for adult women moved upward from 5.3 to 5.7 percent.

Long-term unemployment remained at about 900,000 and was unchanged from a year ago. Included in this category were 500,000 persons who had been unemployed 6 months or longer.

There were 2.8 million workers on part-time workweeks for eco-

(Continued on Page 12)

Wage Gains Posted for 3.8 Million

While major industrial controversies won frontpage attention during the past 18 months, "the powerful currents of collective bargaining were quietly producing gains for millions of workers," an AFL-CIO report has declared.

In a review of wage developments, the report showed typical wage gains ranging from 7 to 11 cents an hour in 1962 contracts covering some 2.8 million workers. In the first half of 1963, nearly a million workers won wage hikes, with special factors bringing 17 cents and more an hour to a third of them.

The review, entitled "Wage Gains Under Bargaining," appears in the September issue of the American Federationist, monthly publication of the AFL-CIO. Prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, it is based on the U.S. Dept. of Labor's study of major contracts—those covering 1,000 or more workers.

Peaceful bargaining in thou-

(Continued on Page 11)

VICTORY SALUTE is given by United Federation of Teachers Pres. Charles Cogen at New York Teachers' union meeting in Randalls Island Stadium which ratified contract providing $24 million in raises and giving 43,000 employes more voice in school affairs affecting them. The settlement, approved the day before new semester started, was recommended by UFT bargaining committee along lines suggested by panel of mediators.

Major Breakthrough:

New York Teachers Win Voice on Policy

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—The United Federation of Teachers has won for 43,000 New York City school employes a pattern-setting two-year contract that breaks new ground in giving teachers a vastly more effective voice in school policy matters affecting every classroom.

The union, negotiating right up to the opening day of the 1-million pupil school system, won a wage increase of $24 million in the next two years and contract provisions giving teachers a specified set of rights they had never been able to attain in any other school system.

Negotiators for Teachers' Local 2 called the new pact a breakthrough, a pattern-setter in the field of union rights and union responsibility. The greatest triumph, achieved after months of collective bargaining and the intervention of Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) was, in the words of the union, breaking through into an area most jealously guarded by administrators of every U.S. school system—the right of teachers to be consulted about class size, teaching periods, assignments and other policy matters usually reserved for "management" determination only.

Theodore W. Kheel, one of the three Wagner-appointed mediators who helped resolve the school crisis, saw the contract as one "breaking new ground in the relationship of white-collar workers." Other mediators were U.S. District Judge Simon H. Rifkind and Frank E. Karelsen of the Public Education Association.

UFT Pres. Charles C. Kogen and Special Rep. David Selden said the teachers considered gains in union recognition and teacher dignity even more important than salary increases, which will give most teachers a $580 wage boost in the

(Continued on Page 2)

Hits Move To Restrict '64 Budget

Passage of the $11.1 billion tax reduction bill reported by the House Ways & Means Committee is "desirable and necessary" and will have a "substantial beneficial impact on the American economy," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Much of the tax reduction provided by the bill "will go to low and moderate income groups, thereby increasing consumer purchasing power, stimulating business expansion and creating new jobs," Meany said.

The AFL-CIO president vigorously opposed a GOP move, defeated in committee, to make the tax cut contingent upon reductions in the federal budget. He termed such a move "deplorable," stressing that this would "absolutely defeat the purpose of a tax cut." He added:

"We are for tax relief to spur the economy. We are against every device that will hamstring the economy."

Meany noted that the bill—reported by the committee by a 17 to 8 vote after earlier tentative approval on a straight party vote of 15 to 10—is not perfect in every respect. Many desirable reforms requested by the President are not included but the task at the moment, he said, is to secure House passage in the "hope the Senate will improve it."

Cut in Two Steps

The measure reported by Ways & Means, after months of deliberation, provides for tax reductions in two steps starting January 1964. The rate cuts and structural changes

(Continued on Page 12)

Senate Votes to Expand Job Training, Opens Debate on Test Ban Treaty

The Senate has voted a $200 million expansion of the manpower training program, shifting its emphasis from those with the best chances of finding jobs to the "hard core" of the unemployed—school dropouts, and men and women who need to be taught reading, writing and arithmetic before they can qualify for job training.

Approval of the expansion—by a 41-26 vote—was the second boost the Senate has given the manpower program within a week. The earlier action postponed a requirement that states match federal training funds, which would have killed the program in most states next year.

After acting on the training bills, the Senate opened a historic debate on ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain.

The treaty, which bars nuclear explosions in the atmosphere, under water and in space, has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO, and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller sent to each senator a copy of Pres. George Meany's supporting testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee.

Prospects for ratification by more than the required two-thirds majority were raised as Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen gave the treaty unqualified support and voiced his disagreement with Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), who has said he will oppose the pact in its present form.

The Senate's Foreign Relations Committee gave the treaty a 16-1 endorsement. However, Armed Services Committee Chairman Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) and a subcommittee headed by Sen. John Stennis (D-Miss.) have indicated opposition.

The House, returning after a

(Continued on Page 9)

AMA Challenged On Doctor Census

The American Medical Association has been challenged by the U.S. Public Health Service for, in effect, engaging in statistical sleight of hand in its recent report that the number of doctors in the United States rose by 29,000 between 1960 and 1963.

Actually, PHS said, the net increase is about 13,000.

It seems the AMA included in its 1963 figure medical school graduates for the current year, foreign physicians temporarily in this country and 2,000 California osteopaths recently granted medical doctor degrees under a state law. But the 1960 figure did not include those categories, PHS pointed out.

WOMEN WORKERS who have volunteered many hours of service to the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education receive awards at the Kentucky state COPE conference. From left: Mrs. Catherine Jackson, cited for giving 500 hours to WAD work; COPE Area Dir. Wilbur Hobby, who presented the awards; and WAD Volunteers Pat Ray, Heloise Jones, Shirley Titsworth and Sadie Jones, who gave 100 hours each. Mrs. Jackson is WAD chairman of the Western Kentucky AFL-CIO Area Council.

NLRB Rejects Challenge to Union In Aftermath of Aerospace Dispute

Stability of labor relations in the aerospace industry was held by the National Labor Relations Board to be an overriding consideration in a decision which denied a request by an unaffiliated union for an election at a California plant where the Machinists have held bargaining rights since 1941.

The petition was filed last November by the United Missile & Aerospace Technicians at the Aerojet-General Corp. plant in Sacramento. At the time, the Machinists and Auto Workers were fighting for contract improvements in the aerospace industry and had agreed to withhold strike action when the President and Secretary of Labor intervened. The contract expired at that point and a group of dissident employes filed the election petition.

An NLRB panel of Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members Boyd Leedom and Gerald A. Brown agreed that under the special circumstances, the IAM ought not to be penalized for having cooperated with the government.

The panel's decision reviewed a ruling by the NLRB regional director that an election should be held. The IAM had urged the board to institute a policy in the aerospace industry of "not entertaining the petitions of rival unions filed during federal intervention" into collective bargaining between an employer and an incumbent union.

The unaffiliated union had argued that the adoption of such a rule would deprive the employes of rights guaranteed by Sections 7 and 9 of the Labor Relations Act "freely to designate representatives of their own choosing."

The board, disagreeing with the regional director and the intervening union that the "freedom of choice" interest should be paramount, said "we do not believe it would be in the national interest to direct an election" based on the present petition.

To hold that an "entertainable question concerning representation was raised by the filing of the petition simply because the settlement reached" by the IAM and the employer had not been put into writing would be, the panel said, "to act at cross-purposes with, and possibly impede, the government-sponsored procedures" to maintain peace in the industry.

Except for its no-strike commitment after expiration of the old agreement, the IAM might have used its economic strength to hasten a favorable settlement and conclude a contract before the petition was filed, the board members observed.

They agreed also that "a denial to unions of protection against new representation challenges" may "serve to discourage unions in comparable future situations from acceding to a presidential request to forego strike action."

Handbilling Held Legal In Shopping Centers

Lansing, Mich.—The Michigan Supreme Court, in a precedent-setting decision, has upheld the right of labor unions to distribute consumer education leaflets in shopping centers in the state.

The court affirmed a ruling of the Wayne County (Detroit) Circuit Court preventing management of the Wonderland Shopping Center in Livonia, Mich., from interfering with distribution of "do not patronize" handbills by the Clothing Workers in front of a United Shirt store.

The handbills asked shoppers not to buy non-union apparel such as Imperial brand clothing manufactured by Sewell. The shopping center, arguing that the ACWA had trespassed on private property, appealed.

"Wonderland is simply a modern public market-place," the state high court said in a 4-4 tie vote split along party lines—Democrats for the union position, Republicans against. The tie resulted in affirming the lower court ruling.

The court said that management cannot on one hand make every effort to induce the public to use the center as a public place while on the other hand denying rights constitutionally guaranteed in public places.

If the 55-acre center "may be lawfully set up to selectively exclude the right of free speech on the public malls and sidewalks thereof," the judges asked, "then why may not a 550-acre company community be set up and made profitably operable with the like right of discriminatory exclusion from the public areas of undesirable free speechers?"

ACWA Gen. Counsel Jacob Sheinkman called the decision "a major breakthrough for the rights of labor and for the right of all citizens to free speech."

Shopping center managements in many areas have sought to "use the shield of private property" to restrict labor activities in organizing campaigns and in union label education work, Sheinkman said.

The Wonderland case is the "first clear-cut decision on the relation of private property and shopping centers" and exposes the fiction that the centers are private property and thus "off limits" to the public and the labor movement, he added.

New England Labor Backs Tidal Project

Boston—New England organized labor has given solid endorsement to proposals backed by the Kennedy Administration for revival of the Passamaquoddy tidal project and the hydro power development of the St. John's River.

The New England AFL-CIO Council, composed of officials of state central bodies in the region, said the plan to harness the tides of the Bay of Fundy, along with development of New England's streams and rivers for hydro power, could bring "low-cost power, new industries, payrolls and jobs into our region."

At present, the statement observed, New England industry and residential consumers pay the highest power rates in the nation while much undeveloped hydro power lies "wasted."

Frank Winn Named Aide to Reuther

Frank Winn, public relations director of the Auto Workers, has been appointed special assistant to the president for public relations, UAW Pres Walter P. Reuther announced.

He will be succeeded as public relations and publications director by Joseph R. Walsh, Jr., who has been assistant director of the department for the past six years.

Winn has been with the UAW since 1936 following a newspaper career in Dallas and New York. Walsh worked on newspapers in Ohio and Colorado and served as assistant public relations director of the Rubber Workers before joining UAW in 1954 as assistant director of the Radio & Television Dept.

Pay Raises Gained:

School Policy Role Won by Teachers

(Continued from Page 1)

15-month period beginning next Apr. 1, and will raise the top salary for seasoned teachers to $11,025 a year by Jan. 1, 1965.

The new contract, approved by officers, delegate assembly and members by secret ballot, provides that:

- The school superintendent shall "meet and consult" monthly with a union committee on "matters of educational policy and development" and school principals also must meet monthly—starting in February — with union chapter chairmen on school policy and contract implementation.

The superintendent and the union shall "try to achieve agreement" in such areas as recruitment of qualified teachers, improvement of difficult schools, reduction of class size, and development of a more effective curriculum.

- Teacher salaries will be increased by $130 next Apr. 1 and by $200 next July 1, with an additional $250 going to more than half the teachers Jan. 1, 1965—those entitled to a promotion differential because of additional education.

The salary section provides a formula under which increases in the school budget after July 1, 1964, will go one-third to salaries and two-thirds to other school needs.

- Class size shall be reduced by July 1, 1964, from 39 pupils to 38 in high schools and from 35 to 34 in elementary and junior high schools—a step toward a major objective of the union.
- The union may take educational policy matters through the grievance procedure to arbitration.

The school board and the UFT also agreed to these other contract improvements:

Other Improvements

An increase in teacher sick leave benefits; a teacher transfer policy based on seniority; jury duty pay; providing for teacher aides and reducing hours of teaching in special service schools; no interference with lesson-preparation time for teachers; advance discharge notice to regular substitute teachers, and notice to all teachers of subjects and grades of each school year.

It was agreed also that a joint committee be set up to study the city-school welfare system and to suggest changes. Under the new contract, union chapters may meet in school buildings; the schools will provide up to $100 for damaged or lost teacher clothing and will guarantee "adequate supplies" for teacher washrooms.

The agreement sets up a rotation plan under which teachers may bid for non-teaching assignments, and makes numerous other improvements in school working conditions.

The new pact was won with the backing of the New York State AFL-CIO and the New York City Central Labor Council.

The Industrial Union Dept. has provided financial aid and manpower to the New York teachers since the UFT first sought collective bargaining rights more than two years ago.

ALA Backs Merger With Engravers

Montreal—Delegates to the 17th constitutional convention of the unaffiliated Lithographers voted overwhelmingly in favor of an agreement for merger with the AFL-CIO Photo Engravers after a marathon debate lasting more than 10 hours.

The "weighted" vote — on the basis of local membership — was 1,188 for, 377 against.

ALA Pres. Kenneth J. Brown had earlier read a message to the convention from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noting that the federation's Executive Council had approved the proposed merger. Meany said he was looking forward to the reaffiliation of the ALA membership with the AFL-CIO.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, who addressed the 180 delegates, also voiced support for the merger.

Hall on Merger

Pres. William J. Hall of the Photo Engravers described the proposed merger as "one designed to create a modern-day union able to deal with the vast technological developments in the graphic arts." He warned that some employers are already taking advantage of the present jurisdictional disputes and conflicts.

The IPEU approved the merger at its convention last month. Approval at the ALA convention means that the proposal now will be put to secret ballot referendums of both memberships.

Mine Wage Pact Held 'Hot Cargo' Violation

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that the protective wage clause of the 13-year-old agreement between the unaffiliated Mine Workers and the mine operators is in violation of the "hot cargo" prohibition of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The board ordered the operators and the union to cease and desist from maintaining or enforcing the contract provision which provides that operators cannot procure or subcontract for coal produced by employers who do not observe the standards of the Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1950.

The design and intent of the clause, the NLRB declared, "requires unorganized producers to adopt union standards if they are to remain or become eligible to receive subcontracts from signatory operators."

This "limitation of an employer's right to do business with another, whether explicitly or implicitly imposed by a collective bargaining agreement," violates the hot cargo ban in Landrum-Griffin, the board said.

The finding is based on the thesis that the protective wage agreement "appears to be not primarily for the purpose of preserving work for the employes covered by the contract but for the purpose of regulating the employment forms and conditions of employes of other employers with whom the signatory employers may do business."

The board held that the explicit exemptions from the hot cargo ban permitting subcontracting limitations in the building construction and garment industries "only serve to make clear the congressional purpose in 1959 to prohibit it elsewhere."

'Worthy of Support':

Meany Asks Funds For Kingsport Strike

More than 1,600 union members who have been on the picket line at Kingsport, Tenn., since Mar. 11 in a strike for decent wages and conditions "deserve the support of the whole labor movement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a nationwide appeal.

Reviewing the "intense struggle" of the workers for social justice, Meany urged all federation affiliates to send donations, to the limit of their ability, to Allied Kingsport Press Unions, P. O. Box 1097, Kingsport, Tenn.

On strike for respectable contract terms at Kingsport Press, Inc., big book publishing plant, are members of the Bookbinders, Pressmen, Typographers, Stereotypers and Machinists, cooperating as the allied group.

The struggle for justice began, Meany said in a letter to national and international unions and AFL-CIO central bodies, "when all five unions were forced to strike against management policies which could no longer be tolerated by any self-respecting group of trade unionists."

Asserting that the outcome of the strike, because of its magnitude, "will in my considered opinion have a profound effect on the future pace of union progress in the South," he said:

"Those of us who have had first-hand experience with long-term strikes know only too well of the severe hardship imposed upon those willing to stand fast against all odds.

"Affiliated unions directly engaged in this fight have strained their resources to the utmost" in support of the strikers, he added, and, as time goes on, their economic hardship "gets beyond the ability of their international unions to alleviate."

In his appeal for contributions to aid in this assault on management paternalism which attempts to reduce unions to a "position of impotence," Meany voiced his belief that "these gallant men and women are worthy of and deserve the support of the whole labor movement."

The Intl. Allied Printing Trades Association previously had put all book publishers on notice that the union will make a vigorous appeal to book buyers "not to buy any books produced by the Kingsport Press until this strike is settled" and strikers are back at work with an honorable contract.

As the first step in a nationwide informational campaign, the unions posted pickets at the Chicago offices of Kingsport Press and at the Merchandise Mart offices of the Field Enterprises Educational Corp., publisher of the World Book and the Childcraft series, printed at the struck plant.

The managers of Kingsport Press have refused all union efforts at settlement by negotiation or arbitration.

UNION-MANAGEMENT negotiators sign nationwide apprenticeship agreement for the plastering industry at Labor Dept. ceremony. Seated, left to right: Sec.-Treas. John J. Hauck and Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; and the two chief employer representatives, John W. Thompson, Jr., and William Duguid. Standing: Gene Edwin, employer representative; Tom Turnbill of the Plasterers' staff; Joseph Davies, employer representative; Executive Vice Pres. Joseph T. Power of the union, and Joseph Robertson, Joseph Baker, Jr., and Joseph Rourke, employer representatives.

White, Negro Locals Merge In Danville

Danville, Va. — Two formerly segregated locals of the United Textile Workers have been merged into one integrated local by vote of their members.

At a meeting of the new joint Local 248, representing 8,000 workers at the Dan River Mills here, members approved the merger, nominated officers to be balloted on next month, and ratified a new two-year contract with the mills.

The new agreement contains a provision for paying lost time of workers called for jury duty—a clause common in many parts of the country but unprecedented in southern cotton mills, according to UTWA Vice Pres. William H. Silcox. Also won by the union were insurance plan improvements and establishment of a joint union-management committee to study the existing pension plan with a view toward improvement.

Merger of the two formerly separate units combines Local 250, which for many years represented about 1,100 Negro members, and Local 248, representing almost 7,000 other workers at the mills.

Silcox said the two locals had been working together in harmony in recent years. Pres. Irving Burton of Local 250 served on the negotiating committee, and there were joint meetings of shop stewards, executive board members, officers and union members.

Plaster Trade Adopts Plan For Training

A nationwide union-management agreement has paved the way for a major expansion of apprenticeship training in the plastering trade.

Negotiators for both groups, headed by Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers and John W. Thompson, Jr., president of the employers' association, signed the agreement at a Labor Dept. ceremony.

It provides that the 12,000 employers in the association will contribute 1 cent per hour on the wages of each plasterer employed to a special fund which will be used largely for training materials, instructors and classroom space. The agreement also contemplates appointment of a full-time apprenticeship director, assisted by a number of regional representatives.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz hailed the apprenticeship plan as "another step forward on the part of labor and management in the construction industry to privately develop the skills so badly required in America's new technological age."

It represents, Wirtz added, "awareness" by the union and management "of the job problems of American youth."

Congress Urged to Push U.S. Ship Construction

"Vastly increased" appropriations for ship construction, conversion and repair have been urged on Congress by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

The executive board of the 29-union department, asserting that the "constant decline" in the U.S. maritime fleet "portends liquidation" of the shipbuilding industry and constitutes a national peril, called for these steps to relieve unemployment among shipyard workers:

A ship construction program assuring 80 new naval and 60 merchant ships a year; permission to "all qualified U.S. shipyards to acquire a just share" of shipbuilding awards; allocation of adequate contracts to insure continued operation of shipyard facilities; encouragement of private ship construction through tax relief, beneficial amortization, and all other possible methods to "restore and retain U.S. supremacy on the high seas."

The department noted an "ever-increasing" ratio of construction in foreign shipyards by American industry and said that at the present rate, the Soviet merchant fleet will be twice as large as that of the U.S. by 1971.

In other actions, the board called for "government leadership" to bring about bold actions to meet the crisis of unemployment, for a cut in the workweek, tax reduction, minimum wage improvements and other measures in the AFL-CIO legislative program. It voiced opposition to the "quality stabilization" bill as price-fixing and urged the defeat of other bills it called harmful to domestic waterborne commerce.

The delegates voted a $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the recent dynamiting of the freighter Howard L. Shaw at a Chicago dock.

'Equalizing' Tax Backed On Foreign Investment

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to adopt Pres. Kennedy's plan to tax American purchases of foreign stocks and bonds to reduce the outflow of investment funds, a major factor in the nation's balance of payments deficit.

Nathaniel Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director, filed a statement with the House Ways & Means Committee urging adoption of the measure, but warning that if the tax approach proves ineffective "the government should move quickly to establish direct restrictions on the use of American capital markets by foreigners for the sale of their securities."

Commenting that the balance of payments problem requires attention and that the interest equalization tax, as the measure is called, is a "step in the right direction," Goldfinger said the federation is "firmly convinced" that the payments problem "has been grossly exaggerated."

The graver problem, he emphasized, is the persistent high level of unemployment and idle capacity, and the payments deficit reflects "our continuing inability . . . to sustain full employment and maximum utilization of productive capacity."

Goldfinger cited statistics showing that the outflow of American long-term private capital to other nations was running at an annual rate of $4 billion in the first quarter of 1963. The normal or "traditional" action, he said, would be to raise interest rates at home, but this approach would increase the threat of a recession.

The interest equalization tax will pinpoint the specific problem of investment in other nations "rather than the blunderbuss approach of a generally restrictive monetary policy that curtails the activities of the economy as a whole."

Goldfinger urged also restrictions on direct investment of American companies in foreign countries, especially developed and industrial nations, to reduce dollar outflow, and the removal of the 25 percent gold cover on U.S. currency.

Pay Hike Based on 'Simple Justice' Asked in Southern Textile Industry

Boston—Southern textile employers have been challenged by the Textile Workers Union of America to "take the step that simple justice demands" by linking a general wage increase to the raises compelled by the new federal minimum wage of $1.25 an hour.

A resolution adopted by the union's executive council at a quarterly meeting here branded the textile industry as "a low-wage operation" and "a drag on the entire economy."

Noting that southern textile employers have not raised the wages of their employes for a year and a half in a period of "brisk prosperity," the 22-member council observed:

"As the largest group of industrial employers in the South, textile manufacturers are directly to blame for the fact that this region is saddled with low wages, insufficient fringe benefits, inadequate education and health facilities, and substandard housing.

"In the face of their unending campaign to prevent their workers from securing the benefits of collective bargaining, it would take unprecedented gall, even for this group of employers, to do any thing less than grant a substantial raise to all of their employes" instead of merely complying with the new wage law by raising their lowest rates only.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock pointed out that textile wages now are 31 percent, or $30 a week behind the hourly average wage of $2.46 for all manufacturing; that textile profits average 12.8 percent of the industry's net worth; that many southern firms are reporting profit rates in excess of 20 percent, and that the textile productivity rate is 67 percent higher than the manufacturing average.

The council also urged speedy negotiation of an international agreement to regulate wool textile imports to "save what is left of the U.S. wool manufacturing industry"; called on the Justice Dept. to bring to trial state and local authorities involved in attacks on union organizers in Hartwell, Ga., and other southern towns; and proposed a $10 billion cut in individual income taxes.

Trade Act Changes

The TWUA body noted that four petitions for special assistance to groups of workers whose jobs were lost because of increased imports have been rejected by the U.S. Tariff Commission and urged amendment of the Trade Expansion Act to fulfill Pres. Kennedy's pledge that no American worker will be "sacrificed to the national interest with a medal or an empty grocery bag."

Project Seeks to Aid Older Unemployed

A special project aimed at developing new ways of easing the plight of older unemployed workers has been approved by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

ONE OF THE FIRST 10 dwellings erected in a four-colony, 700-unit housing project sponsored by the Union of Employes of the Tela Railroad at La Lima, Honduras. The project was financed by the first direct loan from the Agency for Intl. Development (AID) to a democratic union. The initial units were dedicated recently with AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan speaking for North American workers.

President of Honduras Dedicates Union Houses

La Lima, Honduras—The first 10 dwellings in a 102-unit housing project — the first financed by a direct loan from the Agency for Intl. Development (AID) to a free trade union—was dedicated here at ceremonies attended by Pres. Ramon Villeda Morales and his entire cabinet.

The project is sponsored by SITRATERCO, the Union of Employes of the Tela Railroad, a subsidiary of the United Fruit Co. It is one of four colonies totaling 700 houses which will be constructed by the union, the 9,000 members of which are under a dues-checkoff contract with the railroad.

In setting up the project the union had assistance from William C. Doherty, Jr., head of the Social Projects Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, who assisted in negotiations and supplied architectural and economic advisers.

The keys to the first 10 completed homes were presented to the new owners, who will pay for them over extended periods, by Senora Villeda Morales.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan brought greetings from North American workers.

"All the workers of America," he declared, "should unite in a single front in the fight against the eternal enemies of labor—misery, ignorance and disease.

"It is my hope, and that of the workers in the AFL-CIO, that these 10 houses which today are given to the fortunate brothers, will be converted tomorrow into hundreds, into thousands, into tens of thousands—into all those necessary to give proper homes to our Honduran brothers, who deserve proper, adequate and most comfortable housing."

Also representing the AFL-CIO at the ceremony was Inter-American Rep. Andrew J. McLellan, who helped organize the union while on the staff of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT).

Each house has a large living room, dining room, kitchen, bath and three bedrooms. Construction is of cement block with all woodwork of the finest Honduran mahogany. Each of the four colonies will have its own water and sewage systems, a social center, a cooperative and other community amenities.

The La Lima project is being built on land United Fruit contributed as a result of negotiations with the union. The company also did much of the fundamental development, such as laying out roads and streets.

The dedication was timed to coincide with the opening of the union convention here. Among others attending were U.S. Ambassador C. R. Burrows, AID Mission Chief Carson Crocker, and Arthur Hamilton, general manager of United Fruit.

Union Passes Coffee Breaks To Fight Reds

Sandusky, O. — Members of Rubber Workers Local 28 employed at the Barr Rubber Products Co. here are going without their coffee breaks so they can cooperate with management by making 50,000 balloons and 2,500 rubber balls to help fight communism.

The balloons and balls are being sent to a man in Laos nobody at the plant has ever seen—Edgar Buell, former Indiana farmer helping the Laotians with agricultural and medical problems as a representative of the Agency for Intl. Development (AID).

Buell channels the toys to the children of about 150,000 Meo tribesmen with whom he is now working. Living in a remote part of Laos, they are described as among the world's least fortunate people and are prime targets of Communist penetration. Fewer than half the children live to become adults; life expectancy is under 35 years.

The union members and company officials decided to give Buell a helping hand when they heard he was not only teaching the Meos how to grow gardens, dig wells and establish schools and medical centers, but also was spending his salary on toys, soap and towels for the children.

"The members feel this is a unique and effective way of fighting communism," said Pres. Kenneth Oswald of Local 28. "It may help to quell some of the 'ugly American' charges that have been slammed at our country."

Time Lost in Stoppages Rises in Canada

Ottawa, Ont. — Time lost by Canadian workers because of work stoppages more than doubled between June and July—from seven-one-hundredths of 1 percent to 15 one-hundredths of 1 percent.

Time lost in July totaled 181,030 manhours compared with 78,400 manhours in June. Involved in July were 17,010 workers, with most of the time lost growing out of disputes involving fishermen in British Columbia and building tradesmen in Toronto.

'Wage Restraint' Opposed:

British Unions Outline Role In Nation's Economic Policy

Brighton, Eng.—The British Trades Union Congress has overwhelmingly endorsed labor's participation in national economic planning to increase real income and purchasing power and correct the "present inequitable distribution of the nation's wealth."

The 8 million-member TUC adopted a report of its general council on economic development and planning by a vote of 7,474,000 to 629,000 after intensive debate, and approved a resolution embodying the views of the report by a vote of 6 million to 2 million.

The resolution stressed that the TUC council should oppose any policy that did not "contribute positively to a more just distribution of incomes and an improvement of social welfare."

The 975 delegates attending the TUC's 95th annual congress also went on record in a close vote opposing "any form of wage restraint." This position was adopted by a thin majority of 380,000 votes.

TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock and Frank Cousins, leader of the Transport & General Workers Union, are two of the TUC's six members on the National Economic Development Council, Britain's first economic planning organization. They led opposing forces on the general debate of how far labor should move in the area of tying wages to economic planning policies.

The general council's position on planning was outlined in a statement whose basic point was that economic planning is necessary if the British economy is to grow faster and that unions must play a central role in the planning process.

The government, the statement said, must consult the unions, just as it must consult employers, if planning is to work.

The statement suggested also that the structure of the unions affiliated to the TUC will have to change if the organization is to present a coordinated union view to the government. A special committee of the general council is now studying the structure and current objectives of the British trade union movement. It will report to the 1964 TUC congress.

In addition to dealing with economic policy and wage problems, the delegates unanimously adopted a resolution calling on the council to "declare for nationalization of industries such as road transport, aircraft, steel, shipbuilding and electrical engineering." Demands for nationalization of construction, life insurance and drug industries were turned back.

Delegates agreed unanimously to a motion condemning the plan for reorganization of the British railway system until an integrated plan including road, air, sea and other forms of transportation is developed.

There was unanimous support also for a resolution calling for a campaign for the 40-hour week throughout British industry. Criticism of the 40-hour week as "inflationary" by a government commission was assailed as an unwarranted interference with free collective bargaining.

Perlis Urges Nationwide Health Fund

Oklahoma City—Federation of voluntary national health agencies into a national health fund is essential to avoid wasteful duplication of effort and to eliminate multiplicity of fund-raising campaigns, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, said here.

Speaking at a labor rally in support of the drive of the United Fund of Greater Oklahoma City, he said that such a set-up would permit allocation of funds on the basis of relative needs and, most important, would permit coordination in basic medical research.

Labor and management should take an equal interest in community planning and service along with their interest in fund-raising, Perlis said, emphasizing that in all community health and welfare organizations the end product is service to the people.

Perlis pointed out that federation gives member agencies, by their own admission, more time for other activities. Federation must be flexible to survive, he added. "Federation, as we know, can be so rigid as to undo everything we are trying to accomplish. Flexible federation must recognize the particular needs of individual agencies. We believe in the principle of 'one campaign through a united appeal.' Yet we also recognize the special need of the Red Cross, in time of disaster, for example, to go to the public with an emergency fund-raising campaign. This is the type of flexibility, in the last analysis, which makes federation more effective."

Consumer Co-ops Fight Senate Price Fixing Bill

A spokesman for 15 million "co-op" member families has urged Congress to reject a so-called "quality stabilization" bill which he said would "pick the consumers' pockets of hundreds of millions of dollars."

Robert Merrow, representing the Cooperative League of the United States, termed the title of the bill "misleading" since the legislation "stabilizes neither quality nor service—only price."

In fact, he told a special Senate Commerce subcommittee, "this new facade is in fact only a device legalizing and legitimatizing monopolistic price-fixing."

The bill, which has been strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO as a variant of "fair trade" laws, would enable manufacturers to control the retail prices of brand-name products. A government survey of the economic effect of state "fair trade" laws brought an Administration estimate that the proposed legislation would send prices up an average of 20 percent and "have a powerfully inflationary effect."

Morrow, who is manager of the 24,000-member Greenbelt (Md.) Consumers Services, which operates 11 shopping centers, told the subcommittee that the nation's co-op movement considers price-fixing and price maintainance systems "in contradiction to a free competitive market."

The Senate subcommittee has resumed hearings on the bill, which had a number of co-sponsors from both Democratic and Republican ranks, after a three-week intermission. A companion measure has been approved by the House Commerce Committee, but has not yet reached the floor.

Jenkins Quits NLRB Post at Albuquerque

The National Labor Relations Board has accepted the resignation of Joseph A. Jenkins as NLRB regional director at Albuquerque, N. M. A former member of the labor board, Jenkins resigned to practice law in Dallas, Tex.

Potofsky Hits Eased Curbs On Imports

New York—Clothing Workers' Pres. Jacob Potofsky has voiced a protest against a three-year cotton textile and apparel agreement between the United States and Japan as "foreshadowing further disruption and unemployment" in the U.S. as low-wage countries "drive for an ever-larger share of the U.S. apparel market."

The recently negotiated pact increases the ceiling on Japaneses textile imports to this country from 275 million to 287.5 million square yards and boosts the apparel ceiling from 104.5 million to 111 million square yards.

The agreement permits "substantial increases" in categories already suffering from an undue concentration of imports and will add to the demoralization of markets, said Potofsky.

ILGWU Affiliates Pledge $125,000 to 'Eleanor' Fund

New York—As the Ladies' Garment Workers launched their drive in support of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, three affiliates—representing one-eighth of the ILGWU's total membership—solidly committed themselves to raise half the union's total pledge of $250,000.

ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky said the commitments indicated the union would far exceed its pledge in the drive, which it hopes to complete by the end of October. It is seeking contributions of an hour's pay from individual members.

Dubinsky reported on the eve of the drive that Knitgoods Local 155 had pledged a total contribution of $30,000 and Cutters Local 10 is completing collection of $20,000, both sums representing average contributions of $3 per member.

Following an address by Dubinsky at the seasonal meeting of the chairmen and chairladies of the New York Cloak Board affiliates, the Cloakmakers adopted a pledge of $75,000 for the foundation, on the basis of $3 a member for all crafts and $1.50 average among floor workers.

LABOR DAY parade in New York was led by Miss Union Maid (left) on her float, with Pres. Charles Garrahan of the Union Label & Service Trades Council waving from the escort car. Above is the delegation from Ladies' Garment Workers Local 40.

Labor Day: Parades, Picnics, Programs

Each year Labor Day seems to recapture just a little more of its past, of the spirit of the days when life was grimmer for the worker and he took job, recreation and union more seriously. This year was no exception. Like many a small community throughout the U.S., New York had a parade with all the trappings of tradition. More than 100,000 union members were in line and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was grand marshal. There were picnics and other outings, too, from Maine to California, just as in the old days, and in dozens of cities there were special religious services often preceded or followed by parades.

But workers on Labor Day 1963 also had a few things their fathers lacked. AFL-CIO top officers were heard on the radio, and on TV there were local programs and showings of the AFL-CIO film, "In Common Brotherhood." In Los Angeles there was something new—a special program between the games of the Dodgers-Houston doubleheader (right) with Undersec. of Labor John Henning as the principal speaker (at microphone). There was one other little thing, too, that would have seemed odd to the old-timers—the laudatory editorials in the newspapers. It wasn't, they tell us, like that in the old days.

QUAD CITIES labor program was given over WOC-TV, Rock Island, Ill., by Carroll Wright, Dick John, Moderator Bill Gress, Marjorie Bender, Tom Kale.

CROSSING BATS for Manager Walt Alston (left) of Dodgers are Outfielder Tommy Davis, central body Sec. William Bassett.

MORE THAN 4,000 attended a "Let's Keep Labor in Labor Day" fete at Cincinnati's Riverview Park. There were games and prizes galore for the kids.

MANY A CHILD had his first horseback ride at the Cincinnati festival—and Audrey Mathis, 19, won the big door prize: a half-ton of groceries.

The Test Ban Treaty

THE DEMOCRATIC CAUSE of peace and freedom will be strengthened throughout the world by an overwhelmingly affirmative vote in the Senate for the nuclear test ban treaty.

The proposal to ban testing of atomic weapons is an American proposal. That it is limited in scope and allows underground testing, that it does not provide for on-site inspection, are weaknesses but not damaging ones.

That the Communists, after years of rejecting such proposals, have finally consented to the limited plan for their own reasons and tactics is beside the point.

What is relevant is that for the first time there is an opportunity to check the radiation and fallout hazards that threaten the life and health of future generations without impairing the security or the safety of the nation.

This is the question before the U.S. Senate. The small band of diehard right-wingers seeking to load the treaty with unnecessary and weakening reservations must be soundly defeated so that the world will know that America has no reservations about peace and freedom.

A Shocking Waste

TUCKED AWAY in the government's monthly report on employment and unemployment is a revealing figure on the manhour cost of joblessness, a shocking disclosure of the waste of the nation's labor power.

In August the labor force time lost through unemployment and part-time work was estimated at 6.7 percent of potential man-hours.

The failure of the economy to make any marked progress in the area of unemployment is underscored by the fact that the 6.7 percent figure of labor force time lost through joblessness was the same a year ago August.

It is in comparison with a more widely published figure on lost manhours—time lost through stoppages—that the unemployment figures become even more meaningful. In July 1963 manhours lost through stoppages in all industries was two-tenths of 1 percent. For the same month manhours lost through joblessness was 6.8 percent—34 times as great.

An economy operating with only 93 percent of its manhour potential combines inefficiency with tragic human waste.

The Role of the Union

NEW YORK CITY'S organized teachers have scored a major breakthrough in their new contract, firmly establishing the role of the union in helping frame policies on long-term goals and the general objectives of the city's school system.

The substantial pay increases negotiated in the two-year pact will have an effect throughout the nation. But the contract provisions setting out for the first time the role of the teacher in helping determine school policies and the conditions under which education must function are of a highly important and pattern-setting nature.

That these provisions affecting the role of the teacher as a professional were obtained through collective bargaining procedures by an established local of the American Federation of Teachers holds out new hopes for stepped-up organization of teachers throughout the country into bona fide unions that can provide them economic security, dignity, recognition and a meaningful voice in the how and what of education.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Sept. 14, 1963 No. 37

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Launch It!

Stevenson Says:

Eleanor Roosevelt Saw Unions As Crusaders for Social Justice

The following is excerpted from remarks prepared by Adlai E. Stevenson, chairman of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, for the recent meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

IT IS, OF COURSE, no surprise that the AFL-CIO should desire to pay tribute to one of mankind's noblest creatures, for Eleanor Roosevelt and organized labor constituted, in the best sense of the phrase, a mutual admiration society.

The labor movement saw in Eleanor Roosevelt not just a brave woman who defended labor's rights—this she did to the fullest measure—but one who spoke out and battled for every good cause. She was, as your own resolution reminds us, "a friend of mankind, a champion for humanity, a crusader for social justice, and a gracious and generous lady universally loved and respected."

And Eleanor Roosevelt saw in the labor movement a vehicle not just for improving the wage-earner's immediate economic lot, but an instrument in our democratic society for promoting the welfare, the peace, the human rights of all people everywhere.

Most Americans have assumed that Eleanor Roosevelt's interest in and support of trade unionism stemmed from her experiences during the New Deal. The fact is that even before she was 20, she was meeting regularly with underprivileged girls in a settlement house located deep in a New York slum. In the earliest days of her marriage she worked with a group which visited dingy factories. There she inspected washrooms and rest facilities to see what factory owners were making available to their women workers.

By 1921 she made her first active association with a union group: as a member of the Women's Trade Union League in New York City. The league was trying to wipe out sweatshop conditions by bringing women workers into the needle trades unions, and she was a principal source of its financial support.

Her conviction that the labor movement was a vital part of the crusade for social justice was not only verbal. She was an active, loyal, dues-paying member of the Newspaper Guild.

When anti-union forces embarked on a national campaign to weaken the labor movement under the spurious slogan of "right-to-work," Eleanor Roosevelt and another great friend of labor, Herbert Lehman (who, incidentally, serves on the foundation's board of trustees) teamed together to co-chair the National Council for Industrial Peace.

Mrs. Roosevelt believed that a strong labor movement was good for all America—and for all the world. She appreciated—as I do, in my daily responsibilities—the strong backing that labor has given to the United Nations. She approved—as I do—labor's enlightened positions on international trade, foreign aid, immigration reform and other international policies aimed at strengthening the free world alliance.

And Eleanor Roosevelt approved of the work of the labor movement—directly and indirectly—in securing the civil rights of all Americans. She knew, for example, that in hundreds of American communities it is still a sad fact that the only integrated meeting place is the union hall.

HER VOICE IS MISSING, unfortunately, in today's turbulent and explosive situations. Eleanor Roosevelt—as you and I—would be supporting every one of the goals involved in today's Negro revolution: complete access to public accommodations, better and integrated education, equal job opportunities, elimination of slums, open occupancy, absolute freedom to vote in all elections. One hundred years after the Civil War, our Negro citizens have every right to be angry, to be resentful, to be impatient, to be demanding.

It would be a tragedy of colossal proportions, however, if out of this anger and impatience came only some immediate concessions—but no real steps for permanent gains. And it would be ironic indeed if out of this struggle there emerged a weakened and a maligned labor movement.

Eleanor Roosevelt's voice would be heard today saying some of the things that need saying. She would commend the AFL-CIO stating that labor's record in civil rights is not perfect, that there are still unions and union leaders who are in default. But she would just as frankly warn against proposals that fail to recognize labor's struggles and labor's needs.

Eleanor Roosevelt would be pointing out that such institutions as the union shop and seniority were won only after decades of sacrifice and bloodshed, that such institutions have brought economic and social gains to millions, including minority groups. She would urge not moderation but understanding. Mostly, she would, in her own quiet but effective way, demand that all of the parties involved sit down and work out fair and practical solutions.

Morgan Says:

Exchange of Persons Program Offsets 'Ugly American' Image

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

WE SENSITIVE AMERICANS keep worrying about our "image" abroad—and Heaven knows we should. A truculent tourist or a peanut politician can knock it—temporarily—into a cocked hat. Sometimes whole policies are misunderstood, misdirected, or twisted by hostile propaganda. Sometimes Congress, in its wisdom, moves too provincially in dealing with international problems. Too often it is simply a deep gulf of ignorance, whose tide of misinformation moves from our shores to theirs and back again, which separates us from other countries.

Morgan

But it turns out, encouragingly, that there is something more authentic and positive and durable to our profile in foreign lands than can be permanently distorted by that misleading catchphrase, "the ugly American," or mortally wounded by such poisonous poppycock as the footloose observations of Louisiana's Sen. Ellender that Africans—whose continent he happened to be visiting at the time—were, in effect, inferior people.

There is, in other words, some solid substance behind our image. Some of it has accumulated in admiration for the American revolutionary tradition—the brave, bold principles of which are often more vividly remembered by foreigners than by ourselves. Some of this substance has been furnished by the Voice of America and U.S. Information Centers—libraries—abroad. And a good deal of it has been developed by student exchange programs, which should be cultivated and expanded.

Recently the U.S. Advisory Commission on Intl. Educational & Cultural Affairs, which is made up not of government officials but of private citizens, issued two encouraging reports on these exchange-of-person programs. Since 1949 when the experiment began, roughly 25,000 American students, professors and others have gone abroad to study and teach, more than twice that many foreigners have come to the United States for learning and lecturing, all on grants of dollars or foreign currencies accumulated in "counterpart funds" used as part payment for our foreign aid programs.

After detailed studies of the reactions of former grantees and prominent local leaders in 20 countries, of inquiries at U.S. embassies, fact-finding trips by commission members and intensive interviews in the U.S., the commission's special study said flatly:

"Testimony is overwhelmingly from all sources that the (exchange) program is as a whole effective . . . The evidence is also conclusive that the program has proved itself . . . (a) valuable part of America's total international effort . . . (and) has succeeded in helping dispel among foreign visitors many misconceptions and ugly stereotypes about the American people."

An important part of the program has been to increase the studies of American history in the educational systems of other countries. In a separate report by Walter Johnson, history professor at the University of Chicago, the commission urged expansion of these American studies.

THE COMMISSION had several critical suggestions including the implication that the cultural affairs officers in our embassies abroad were not always the best equipped for their jobs but indicating also that the importance of their posts was often not fully appreciated. The commission also urged that "all programs for all foreign visitors provide more time and arrangements for meeting a wide cross-section of American families."

Some U.S. officials posted in Africa have been pleasantly surprised to find that students returning home after a year or more of study in the U.S. have a far more sympathetic understanding of our racial problems than they might be expected to have—especially when they themselves were often subjected to indignities and insults. This may be particularly significant—if it is typical—because of the contrast with the embittered disappointment that many African students have expressed over discrimination they encountered (and didn't expect to find) in the Soviet Union.

One of the things apparently hardest for visiting students to understand and for Americans to explain abroad is the complicated relationship between the federal government and the governments of the various states. "How is it possible," a foreign student is likely to say, "that when the 'central' government is against something, it isn't done away with?"

Quite apart from, or at least in addition to, the debate over "big" government versus states' rights, I sometimes think we Americans have more than a little difficulty answering that question to our own satisfaction.

Washington Reports:

Senate Moves Seen to Restore Aid Funds Slashed by House

THE HOUSE REDUCTION of $500 million in foreign aid funds was "radical and extreme," and particularly "unfortunate and unwise" in view of its effect on the Alliance for Progress program, just as it is getting underway.

That was the comment of Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), assistant Senate majority leader, in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on some 700 radio stations.

Earlier Pres. Kennedy had called the cut "unprecedented, unwarranted and unwise . . . a cut that will drastically affect our strength at a time when the forces of freedom are moving forward around the world."

Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, predicted that the Senate would increase the authorization and that Congress would be "more generous in rendering aid for our Latin American neighbors."

Humphrey expressed concern that a reduction in aid for Latin America would mean "the investment that we have already made will, for all practical purposes, be lost."

"Our investment in Latin America is started," he said. "It was a slow start, 20 years late, but we did get a start. Now, in the third year, when we are really about to get at the job and make substantial progress, what happens? We start cutting back."

Aiken pointed out that countries which had received U.S. aid in the past—under the Marshall Plan in western Europe, for example—are now carrying on their own assistance programs. He declared that Africa should be the special responsibility of western Europe, since the new nations there are former colonies of England, France and Belgium. Germany "is lending money, furnishing assistance," he noted, but added that no country is offering loans as liberal as those of the U.S.

"THE REAL PROBLEM we face today in Latin America is the intrusion and penetration of communism and Castroism," Humphrey said. "We can wake up one of these days and find that a country like the Argentine or Brazil or Chile or Colombia or Venezuela has gone down the drain.

"And I venture to say that the very people who made the cut in the aid program will then be the sharpest critics of our foreign policy."

Meanwhile, he said, the Alliance for Progress has already scored real successes in Venezuela, Colombia, Chile, and Bolivia.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton, whose commentary on the Washington scene normally appears in this space, is on vacation.)

THE WORLD STOOD BY and watched and waited; another coal mine disaster had occurred. This time in Hazleton, Pa. Eventually two of the three trapped miners were rescued.

Few who followed this emotion-packed human drama realized that this disaster need not have happened. And it probably would not have happened if a proposed amendment to the federal coal mine safety law of 1952 was on the statute books.

The 1952 law provides federal safety protection that has succeeded in reducing the number of mine fatalities sharply. Before 1952, upward of 1,500 men lost their lives annually in mine disasters; in 1962, the number was reduced to 287.

The Hazleton mine, where the latest tragedy and near-tragedy occurred, was known as a Title I mine. This meant that it employed 15 or less miners. It also meant that it was exempt from the provisions of the federal mine safety law.

Title I mines are usually marginal. They produce about 10 percent of the coal removed from underground mines. Yet, one-third of all men killed in mines work in these marginal mines.

The Mine Workers, many mine owners and others are supporting an amendment to the Mine Safety Act which would cover Title I mines. Hearings have been conducted on the proposal. Supporters are hopeful that this year they will succeed.

"It seems a great tragedy," a UMW official said, "that a great catastrophe has to occur before we can get consideration on safety legislation."

He pointed out that before the 1952 law was passed, 111 men lost their lives in Centralia, Ill., in 1949, and 119 were killed in a mine disaster in West Frankfort, Ill., in 1951.

* * *

THIS IS THE FULL STORY of the Hazleton mine:

It was shut down in 1956. Later it was purchased by Gene Gibbons, who is not a miner. Boley Overa, a UMW staff representative, said the mine was closed in January 1961 because of water.

Overa said that David Fellin, one of the rescued miners, went down in March to drill holes to get out some of the water. The work of getting out the coal was started on a steady basis only about a month before the cave-in.

Actually, the three men went into the mine to drill additional holes to drain more water.

Some days after the cave-in, no contact had been established with the miners. The men were presumed dead.

Fellin's brother, Joseph, did not accept the decision. An experienced miner, he approached UMW officials and asked for their aid in rescue operations. The UMW had no contract with the company but these were human beings and the union started wheels working.

Pres. Martin Brennan of UMW Dist. 7 and other unionists decided it would be feasible to drill a plain bore hole. UMW Pres. W. A. (Tony) Boyle instructed the men to work until the miners had been found. He also assigned Louis Evans, former Pennsylvania secretary of mines, to render all assistance necessary. The 6-inch bore resulted in the first contact with the two rescued miners.

* * *

TITLE I MINES were once labeled by John L. Lewis as the "ragtail, bob-tail" element of the industry. Normally, they have only one entry; a second would cost money. A federal mine inspector can order unsafe mines closed down; with the small mines, however, he can only make a recommendation.

Larger mines, as a rule, take all safety precautions possible. At stake are not only the lives of the miners but equipment worth millions of dollars. If the smaller mines lose men, they can easily be replaced, as there are thousands of unemployed miners.

Passage of the mine safety amendment would significantly reduce the number of coal miners who are killed or injured while working in small mines.—(PAI)

FOREIGN AID CUTBACK to a half-billion dollars below the Administration request was "radical and unwise," Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. George D. Aiken (R-Vt.), right, predicted on the same program that the Senate will "be more generous."

How to Buy:

Mutual Fund Warning Renewed In Light of SEC Study Findings

By Sidney Margolius

NOT LONG AGO a workingman living in a large city—we'll call him Anthony because that's his name—heard one of those radio commercials offering information on mutual funds. He wrote to the advertiser, one of the country's largest fund dealers, for the information. He got a return visit from a salesman, and signed a contract to invest $40 a month.

Some months later the stock market dropped, as it periodically does, and so did the value of the fund shares Anthony was buying each month. In a mutual fund, the pooled investments of many small investors are used to buy shares of stocks, and when the market drops, so does the value of fund shares.

By the time Anthony had put in $160 he decided to discontinue. He got back exactly $55.95. He wrote me: "If I wasn't a fool I would have $163.20 in the savings account or $160 under the mattress."

Anthony is a wiser and sadder man today, and also an angry one. He had made a whole series of mistakes.

First, he had failed to read his union publication. As far back as 1954 we had warned that mutual-fund promotion had become a high-pressure selling business; that an army of salesmen was making the rounds; that small savers could not be certain of retrieving their investments in such shares at the time they might need their money; that it was especially risky to use the contractual method of investing in mutual funds.

But in spite of the warnings in the labor and co-op papers, there was a breakdown in communications. Anthony was listening to the radio instead. Nor, he claims, did the salesman explain the potential loss if he discontinued. So he signed a contract to invest $40 a month for 150 months, no less.

He finally got back only $56 for the $160 he did put in, partly because he sold his shares at the wrong time—the time the market had collapsed—but even more, because he bought on the contractual plan. Under this plan, you sign a contract to invest so much a month. But a large part of your first payments go to pay the salesman's commission. If you drop out at the end of the first year, in some plans you would get back only 50 percent of your payments because the rest went to the sales commission. Even if you drop out at the end of the tenth year, you would lose 9 percent of your basic investment in some plans. (This is exactly what we wrote nine years ago.)

ACTUALLY ANTHONY would have fared better if he had insisted on using the voluntary method of buying fund shares, if mutual-fund shares were suitable at all for him, which is doubtful. In the voluntary method, you simply indicate your intention of investing so much a month, but do not sign a contract. The salesman still gets his commission, usually 8 percent of the amount you invest, but he gets it over a period of years as you make your investment, rather than the bulk of it at the beginning.

Some mutual fund companies insist you must use the contractual method, and argue that this is to your benefit because it forces you to keep on investing on pain of losing part of your investment. Well, the argument is much like a cigarette manufacturer advertising that cancer is good for you.

Now the government belatedly is doing something about mutual-fund selling methods. The Securities & Exchange Commission has just spent many months and much money on an investigation which confirms what seemed obvious for a long time.

The SEC finds that one out every six mutual fund accounts is of the contractual type, and that the 1 million people who have signed up for such plans are usually the smaller investors who can least afford to forfeit their deposits for the sake of paying the salesmen the bulk of their commissions the first year.

Now the SEC study group recommends that the contractual plan be outlawed. We'd like to suggest that while some families have increased their assets through mutual funds and even direct purchases of stocks, you never consider this form of investment for money you cannot afford to risk.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS SOCIETY thanks Retail Clerks Local 324 and its secretary-treasurer, Arthur Z. Berland, right, for the union's help during the organization's annual drive—including messages carried on 50 union billboards in the Los Angeles area. The presentation is made by Actor Raymond Burr, left, who portrays Perry Mason on television.

List Grows:

More Unions Name Scholarship Winners

Eight young Californians have won $500 scholarships on the basis of competitive examinations and their high school records under the program of the California AFL-CIO.

The tests included questions intended to show an understanding of the labor movement. Although union affiliation of parents is not a factor in the awards, two of this year's winners came from union families and one is a union member himself.

The unionist-winner is Stan Speros Draenos, of Fresno, who plans to attend the University of California at Berkeley. Both he and his mother belong to the Retail Clerks.

Maryellen Vizcarra, of San Pablo, is the daughter of a member of Operating Engineers Local 3 in Oakland and will attend the University of California at Davis.

Other winners were Raymond N. Palmer, Walnut Creek; Bradford C. Snell, El Cajon; W. Ray Hadley, Arcata; Susan Thomas, San Diego; Lee C. H. Soong, Berkeley, and Richard H. Smith, Oakland.

ABC Lists First Winners

First winners under the new scholarship program set up by the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers are Valerie Lynne Herbert, Newark, N. J., whose father, Ira, is a member of Local 84; and Edward C. Weiner, son of Meyer Weiner of Los Angeles Local 453.

The scholarships are worth $2,000 each over four-year periods and are restricted to members of the union.

Steelworkers Local 1211 in Aliquippa, Pa., has awarded its first college scholarship, worth $500 a year for four years, to William S. Wojkowski, Ambridge, Pa., who will study engineering at Pennsylvania State University. He is the son of Edward Wojkowski, a member of the local since 1937.

The local is continuing its traditional program of nursing scholerships, with the winners to be named soon.

The first scholarship in the new program benefitting the children of members of USWA Local 3687, South Point, O., was won by Patricia Diana Webber of Grayson, Ky. Presentation of the scholarship, worth $700, was made by Pres. Carl Curry of the local on the basis of Miss Webber's citizenship, scholastic and college entrance examination records.

Ten children of members of locals affiliated with the Clothing Workers Joint Board in Philadelphia has been awarded scholarship aid under a joint program of the board and the city's clothing industry.

They are Karen Arduino, Carmela Buccieri, Anna Cavaliere, Stanley Cohen, Camille D'Orazio, Angela Fecca, Paul L. Ginsberg, William J. Hetrick, Rocco Rinaldi and J. Bernard Salera.

The National Merit Scholarships awarded to the children of members by the Utility Workers have been presented to Karen D. Whipple, Long Beach, Calif., and Mary C. Waters, New York City.

The former's father, Donald C. Whipple, is a Southern California Edison Co. mechanic; the latter's parent, William Waters, is a business representative for the Consolidated Edison Co.

The John Fitzpatrick memorial scholarships, set up by the Chicago AFL-CIO in memory of the late president of the former Chicago Federation of Labor, have been presented to Sandra Hallgren, whose father, Earl W. Hallgren, is a member of Steelworkers Local 1033, and Frank Paul Bolin, son of Frank J. Bolin, a member of Local 163, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The scholarships, worth $500 each, are open to members of affiliates of the local AFL-CIO. Similar awards were made to a girl and a boy who were graduated in January.

The Rubber Workers $500 Joseph Childs Memorial Scholarship, honoring the union's late international secretary-treasurer, has been awarded to Michael L. Flanagan, Swansea, Mass., whose father, Louis J. Flanagan, is a member of Fall River Local 261. The youth has enrolled in Providence College and plans to become a doctor.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Our Thrifty Little Economies Strike Horror in Other Hearts

By Jane Goodsell

THERE ARE PROBABLY as many ways of saving money as there are ways of spending it, and all of us have our thrifty little economies. Indeed, most of us economize with as much enthusiasm as we splurge, and we defend our pet economies even as we stare in horrified disbelief at our end-of-the-month bank statements.

Penny - pinching is an almost universal custom, but each of us is thrifty and extravagant in his own fashion. One person's idea of a basic necessity is another's idea of throwing money around like a drunken sailor.

Take taxis. There are people who automatically hail a cab even when it would be simpler and easier to walk. And other people put taxis in the special-occasion category of Napoleon brandy and breakfast in bed. But don't be misled in thinking that non-taxiers thriftily hoard the pennies they save. Like as not, they blow them on Corona Coronas. And I personally know a reckless taxi-hailer who rolls his own cigarettes.

Some women would sooner starve than iron their husbands' shirts, while others think it's wickedly extravagant to send shirts to the laundry. I have a friend who shakes her head at me because I send out my husband's shirts, and I think she's a wild spendthrift because she has her groceries delivered.

I have another friend who makes soup out of pea pods and potato peelings, and cuts up her old rubber gloves to make rubber bands. She was horrified to learn that I use the "more expensive spread," and even shell out 2 cents extra to buy it in cubes. But she gets her hair and nails done twice a week, which scandalizes me.

MY NEXT-DOOR neighbor would rather tie up her feet in paper bags than wear shoes that aren't custom-made, but she bakes bread pudding once a week because she can't bear to throw out stale crusts. Apparently it doesn't bother her to throw out stale bread pudding. I think she's out of her mind.

My husband thinks I'm goofy because I'll drive halfway across town to buy mayonnaise for 10 cents off, and I save string and wrapping paper. He buys books as casually as other people buy candy bars, but he absolutely refuses to go to first-run movies.

Thrift is a many-splendored thing, and there are endless ways to save money. But since most of us operate on the principle that a penny saved is a dollar earned, thrift isn't likely to keep much money out of circulation.

Safeguards Held Inadequate:

Bracero Bill Scored As 'Obstacle' to Jobs

Amendments to a Senate-approved one-year extension of the importation of Mexican farm labor "are not adequate really to safeguard U.S. farm workers and farm families," an AFL-CIO legislative spokesman declared.

While the amendments providing that U.S. growers must offer domestic farm laborers work guarantees and fringe benefits equal to those given Mexican workers offer "some slight improvement," said Arnold Mayer, chairman of the Farm-Labor Subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Legislative Council, the only adequate answer is to end the 12-year-old program.

Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, assailed the bracero program on Labor News Conference, broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting System. He charged that the program is a "tremendous obstacle" to decent wages and working conditions for American farm laborers and has caused widespread unemployment among U.S. farm workers.

The House voted in May to allow the program to die at the end of the year, but the Senate adopted a one-year extension. House reconsideration of its earlier action is expected at the current session.

Mayer cited figures showing that in 1961 American farm workers averaged 134 days of work a year and earned less than $1,000. There were 195,000 imported Mexican farm workers in 1962 taking jobs "desperately needed by unemployed U.S. farm workers," he said.

Current regulations, he stressed, are meaningless, especially the provisions calling on the U.S. Labor Dept. to set conditions that do not cause an adverse effect on U.S. farm workers. All an employer has to do, he pointed out, is offer the minimum set in the area—60 cents an hour in Arkansas—and if American farm workers turn down the rate the employer is free to report no workers are available and hire braceros.

The program hurts American family farmers, Mayer declared, by depressing the value of family labor to the same low rates given braceros and allowing the large corporation farms to expand production based on low wage rates and cut into the family farmer's markets.

Mayer noted that the Mexican Federation of Labor is opposed to the continuation of the bracero program, initiated in 1951, as is the Catholic Church in that country as well as all major church groups in the U.S., along with a long list of civic and welfare organizations.

Mayer was interviewed by Mike O'Neill of the New York Daily News and John Koenig of the Associated Press.

ARBITRATION PROCEDURES for resolving two key issues in the railroad work rules dispute were discussed at a top-level meeting in the Labor Dept. Seated, left to right, are Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds; Ralph T. Seward, chairman of the arbitration panel; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and Chairman Francis A. O'Neill of the National Mediation Board. Standing are J. E. Wolfe, chief management negotiator; Vice Pres. Ray McDonald of the Trainmen, and Vice Pres. S. C. Phillips of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Seven-Member Panel Opens Rail Arbitration

Three experienced arbitrators, named by Pres. Kennedy as public members of the seven-man panel set up to adjudicate two key issues in the railroad work rules dispute, met with labor and management members to begin their 90-day assignment.

Kennedy named Ralph T. Seward, 56-year-old professional arbitrator and a former member of the National War Labor Board, as chairman of the panel.

Other members are Benjamin Aaron, 48, director of the Institute of Industrial Relations at UCLA and past president of the National Academy of Arbitrators, and Harvard University Prof. James J. Healy, 47, who has served on panels in a number of major disputes.

The appointments were made by Kennedy when union and management representatives were unable to agree on neutral members.

Under the emergency legislation passed by Congress to avert a nationwide railroad shutdown, arbitration is confined to the two issues of the use of locomotive firemen and the minimum size of train crews. The five operating unions and management are directed to resume collective bargaining on other issues in dispute.

Earlier the unions chose Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen and Vice Pres. R. H. McDonald of the Railroad Trainmen as their representatives. Management is represented by J. E. Wolfe and Guy W. Knight, the industry's chief negotiators.

Although public attention has centered on the issues to be arbitrated, there are many major items on both sides of the bargaining table in the agenda for renewed bargaining.

These include railroad demands for changes in wage structure, fewer crew changes, and combination of road and yard work. They include also union proposals for improved overtime pay, wage and work guarantees, paid holidays, payment of expenses during layovers and greater job protection in the event of mergers.

The arbitration report is due 90 days from Aug. 28, when the law was enacted, to become effective 60 days thereafter. The award is binding for a two-year period.

While there is no direct deadline on the bargaining over other issues, both sides are precluded from unilateral action for a six-month period.

Far West Doctors Turn to Bircher

Los Angeles—The Section on General Practice of the Los Angeles County Medical Association simply turned to the right for a speaker who would oppose social security old-age health care at its 1963 general meeting and came up with Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society.

Dr. Griffith C. Barlow, president of the section, in a letter offering members "the opportunity to hear and evaluate one of the most controversial speakers of our time," aligned himself with Welch on the claim that "his unwavering stand against bureaucratic contamination of the physician-patient relationship mirrors the ideals of private medicine."

When Sec.-Treas. William Bassett of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO challenged the medical association, he was told "this is only one section . . . it does not represent the medical profession." His suggestion that the association publicly disavow the bid to Welch was rejected.

Senate Votes to Expand Job Training Program

(Continued from Page 1)

Labor Day holiday week during which only token sessions were held, passed a pared-down version of Pres. Kennedy's proposal to finance community mental health centers and assist public and private institutions dealing with problems of mental illness and retardation.

Senate Program Slashed

Last May, the Senate approved a 10-year, $848.5 million mental health program by a 72-1 vote. The House Commerce Committee cut this to a three-year $238 million program and eliminated entirely all provisions for grants to help pay the initial cost of staffing the new centers. The grants for staff salaries had been opposed by the American Medical Association.

While the economy bloc remained strong in the House, the Senate easily defeated attempts to reduce the added funds authorized for the manpower retraining program to help it meet its new goals.

As passed by the Senate, the bill provides:

- Pre-training literacy courses, not to exceed one year, to prepare the "hard core" jobless for job training. Trainees could receive allowance for up to two years in all, although the average duration of literacy and job training is expected to be considerably less.
- Reduction of the minimum age at which the $20 a week youth training benefit can be paid from 19 under the present law to 16. Adult benefits are based on unemployment compensation benefits in the states.
- An increase in the percentage of total manpower training funds which can be used for the youth program, from the present 5 percent to 15 percent.
- An additional $100 million a year over the present $165 million a year authorization for the next two years to pay for the expanded training program.

Amendments Defeated

An amendment by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) to cut the added amount to $60 million a year was defeated, 38-29. The Senate also rejected a proposal by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) to liberalize subsistence payments to adult trainees, which currently average about $35 a week.

Accepted by voice vote was an amendment by Prouty which would seek to discourage school dropouts by providing payments only to youth who have been out of school for six months or longer. The committee bill had set this period at three months.

The expanded program was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO. In Senate committee testimony, Biemiller said the 1962 Manpower Development & Training Act gave "insufficient attention" to the training of workers with educational deficiencies.

The Senate Labor Committee's report found that the present program has been "geared to the selection of candidates who are most likely to succeed, and conversely is calculated to exclude from training those who most desperately need it."

Clair Cook Resigns From NRLC Post

Rev. Clair M. Cook, education director of the National Religion & Labor Council, has resigned to take a post as legislative assistant to Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.).

A veteran of nearly a decade of service with the council, he was executive director from 1954 until 1961, when he assumed the education directorship.

ACWA Widens Drive Against Siegel Firm

New York—The Clothing Workers will distribute more than 10 million "Don't Buy H.I.S." leaflets at stores, plant gates, union halls and college campuses in conducting the most extensive education campaign in the union's history against the Henry I. Siegel Co., makers of suits, slacks and outerwear.

Five of the seven Siegel plants in Tennessee and Kentucky are non-union, and the ACWA has filed several unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board on the basis of company efforts to prevent workers from organizing.

The union's consumer education campaign urges buyers not to purchase products carrying the H.I.S. brand name label or H.I.S. slacks distributed by the New Process Co., a mail order house in Warren, Pa.

Leaflets have been given out at stores here and in Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Memphis, Seattle, Los Angeles, Milwaukee and Birmingham

110,136 Disabled Trained in Year

The state-federal system of vocational rehabilitation restored 110,136 disabled men and women to productive life during the year ended June 30, according to a report by Mary E. Switzer, Labor Dept. commissioner of vocational rehabilitation.

The figure exceeded 100,000 for the second consecutive year, she said, adding that a new high record has been set annually for the past eight years. Pennsylvania led all states with 10,877 rehabilitations.

Labor Enters Illiteracy Fight In New York

New York—The labor movement here has played a leading role in planning "Operation Alphabet," an effort to combat illiteracy through a series of 30-minute television programs to be broadcast daily for 20 weeks, beginning Sept. 30, over stations, WPIX, WNDT and WNYC.

The programs, scientifically designed to teach adults how to read and write a basic 600-word vocabulary, have been prepared by the City Dept. of Labor with the aid of the New York City Central Labor Council, headed by Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., and other community groups.

The labor council has called "Operation Alphabet" the first major step toward educating the "functional illiterate" — those with a fourth grade reading level or less. The program, designed to teach the meaning of words needed in family life, for shopping, visiting a doctor or hospital, mailing letters, will be conducted by Dr. Alexander Shevlin, radio-TV specialist on the staff of the Philadelphia public schools.

This city has 510,000 functional illiterates, many on the welfare rolls. Acting Labor Commissioner James J. McFadden said the first step in getting employment for many persons is to teach them to read and write.

GOLD MEDAL of the City of New York was presented to Luigi Antonini, first vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, on his 80th birthday for services to the community and the labor movement. Top picture shows, left to right, Antonini, Mayor Robert F. Wagner and ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky. In lower photo, city workers install street sign temporarily renaming a section of 7th Avenue "Luigi Antonini Ave." Antonini, a needle trades leader for more than 50 years, played major role in founding Italian Dressmakers' Local 89, largest ILGWU local with 30,000 members, and has served as secretary for many years. Congratulatory messages came from Pres. Kennedy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and others.

To Insure Proper Development:

Mass Transit Role Urged for Bus Union

Minneapolis—Pres. John M. Elliott of the Street, Electric Railway & Motor Coach Employes urged active participation by labor in community planning to insure proper development of mass transit facilities.

He predicted that the population boom will force a return to mass transit as the easiest, quickest and cheapest way of moving urban residents and commuters.

Freeways alone cannot do the job, he warned, and attempts to relieve auto congestion in crowded cities must include parallel development of mass transit systems.

450 Delegates Attend

The 135,000-member union opened its 37th convention here with some 450 delegates. The Women's Auxiliary met at the same time.

Elliott was critical of the Kennedy Administration's proposals to provide federal subsidies for local communities to develop automated transit systems, complaining that it does not provide sufficient protection for displaced workers.

However, he said that amendments added in the Senate had provided some guarantees and urged that similar amendments be made in the House bill now under consideration.

The same point was made by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), who said the Administration's mass transit program is essential to the nation's social and economic future.

McCarthy noted that Senate amendments required that transit workers be protected before federal aid is granted and that collective bargaining be encouraged.

He noted that an attempt by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) to eliminate these provisions was rejected by a vote of 63 to 27 and a variety of "state's rights" amendments also were beaten back.

Elliott urged sustained political action by union members, arguing that "collective bargaining alone cannot do the job."

One of the principal proposals before the convention is to establish an industrywide pension program under which transit systems in smaller cities would be able to provide funded pensions for employes.

Union officers said that local divisions in larger cities have been able to establish, through bargaining, adequate pension plans but that small-town bus firms were unable to establish units of sufficient size to do so and often ended up with unfunded inadequate plans.

Another proposal seeks to change the union name to a simpler form like "Amalgamated Transit Employes Union" or "Amalgamated Transit Union." The present name, in full, is Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway & Motor Coach Employes of America.

West Virginia Labor Marks 100th Year

An attractive pamphlet, One Hundred Years with West Virginia Labor, has been published by the Organized Labor Committee of the West Virginia Centennial Commission in connection with the 100th anniversary of the state's founding in 1863.

Miles C. Stanley, president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO and chairman of the labor committee, in a foreword recalled that the state's labor movement has had a "full and rich history" and that "it has enjoyed triumphs and has suffered disasters, but it has withstood all the trials and tribulations visited upon it in the past 100 years."

Single copies may be had from the State AFL-CIO office at 1624 Kanawha Boulevard East, Charleston, W. Va.

Politics, Legislation, Bargaining Set Theme for UPP Convention

By David L. Perlman

Miami Beach—Labor's political and legislative program was given equal billing with collective bargaining goals as the third convention of the Papermakers & Paperworkers opened here.

In one of the first resolutions, the convention summoned the union's 140,000 members to "start to work today" on the 1964 election campaign.

Pres. Paul L. Phillips reminded the 1,200 delegates that higher wages are "worth nothing if you haven't got a job."

The millions of new jobs needed for full employment, he said, can't be obtained "across the bargaining table—this task requires legislation."

Phillips, reporting to the triennial convention of the union which was created in 1957 by a merger of former AFL and CIO affiliates, declared the UPP "is on the march . . . is going forward with strength and vitality."

He recommended continued merger discussions with other AFL-CIO unions in the printing and paper industries. A unanimously adopted convention resolution strongly endorsed this goal, declaring that such a merger would bring "greater strength and unity" in bargaining and organizing.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared that labor can be "pleased" with the changes in Washington since the UPP's 1960 convention, citing enactment of minimum wage improvements, area redevelopment legislation and an equal-pay-for-women law, and elimination of "big business" domination of the National Labor Relations Board.

"We're pleased," he said, "but we can't be satisfied because there's too much of our program that hasn't been passed yet."

Reading the record on the high rate of bank embezzlements and the favorable experience rating bonding companies have given to trade unions in comparison with financial institutions, Schnitzler urged the delegates to "take these figures back with you. We've got to go out and tell our story."

He called on UPP locals to establish human rights committees, to settle civil rights problems in union meetings and to work with other community groups. He cited as a precedent labor's early role in helping end exploitation of immigrant workers, bringing them into full participation in the trade union movement and helping them acquire full citizenship.

By direct action, as well as a strongly-worded resolution, the convention voiced opposition to the so-called quality stabilization bill now pending in Congress.

The bill, which would permit manufacturers to fix retail prices of most products, would result in "legalized gouging," Phillips charged in his keynote address. A convention resolution warned that its effect on the family pay envelope might well be equivalent to a 25 percent wage cut.

Then, carrying out a "resolve" that the UPP "launch an all-out congressional writing campaign" against the bill, delegates sent postcards and letters from a booth set up adjacent to the convention hall.

In other resolutions dealing with consumer issues, the UPP strongly endorsed the "truth-in-lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and the "truth-in-packaging" measure introduced by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

The convention called for a continuing campaign against so-called "right-to-work" laws and warned that the same "reactionary anti-labor forces" are behind the current drive for states' rights amendments to the Constitution which would "change the U.S. form of government."

A redistricting of the union's regions, reducing the number from 13 to 12, was approved on a 743-522 rollcall vote. A New York state court had held that the elimination of a district by executive board action in 1961 was invalid in absence of convention action.

Central Bodies Praised

The convention praised state, provincial and local central bodies as "vital links" that bind the labor movement together" and called on all locals to affiliate with appropriate central bodies and "to pay per capita taxes on their full membership."

These groups, the resolution declared, "carry the principal burden of the state legislative programs" and provide "essential support" to labor's national program.

Ahead for the convention, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was the election of officers, completion of action on a number of resolutions and proposed constitutional amendments and a speaking list including officers from other graphic arts unions which have participated with the UPP in unity discussions.

Railway Carmen Vote Strike Fund, Dues Rise

Kansas City, Mo.—Delegates to the Railway Carmen's convention here have voted to establish a strike fund and raise monthly dues to strengthen the union's treasury as it enters national wage negotiations along with other non-operating rail unions.

The convention voted to raise the per capita tax to $2.50 a month for all working members, compared with the present $1.50 for mechanics and less for other categories of members. Twenty-five cents of the increase will be used to set up a strike fund.

The brotherhood also will establish a new minimum local dues schedule of $5 a month, including the per capita payment.

In another measure to bolster finances, delegates voted to hold conventions every five years instead of every four years. The brotherhood pays the expenses of delegates and convention costs have been a major drain on the treasury.

Pres. A. J. Bernhardt led a list of re-elected national officers. Also named to new terms were Assistant Pres. George O'Brien, Sec.-Treas. Leroy Taylor and R. H. Harrison, director of trade education.

In a major address Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association branded railroad claims of "poverty" as "baloney."

With a few exceptions "that I can count on the fingers of one hand," he said, "all of the major railroads in the country are in excellent condition, and most of them are in the best financial condition they have ever been."

Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. told the delegates that this has been "a year of crisis for all railroad workers."

In addition to the fight of the operating unions "to preserve free collective bargaining" in the industry, all rail unions have been faced with an "unprecedented wave of railroad mergers," he said.

Fox warned that the proposed mergers of competing railroads would destroy jobs, eliminate essential services and facilities, and benefit only the "financiers" who seek them.

Earlier, Bernhardt stressed the growing problem of unemployment created by technological changes and declared that if Congress can pass legislation for compulsory arbitration of work rule disputes, then it can certainly enact legislation to meet the nation's unemployment problem.

AFL-CIO Reports:

Sharp Wage Gains Won in Bargaining

(Continued from Page 1)

sands of agreements brought a wide range of fringe benefit improvements in addition to wage gains, the AFL-CIO said.

Job security was an important issue, the report added, with the collective bargaining process put to the test in industries hit hard by unemployment and technological change. And, in a few industries, labor and management created study groups to discuss problems in advance of bargaining deadlines.

"But the central issue in most negotiations continued to be the quest for increased wages," the AFL-CIO said, adding:

"The bargaining advances of the past 18 months were won with a minimum of work disruption. Strikes and lockouts held at low levels during 1962 and, in the first half of this year, reached a record low for any comparable postwar period."

Typical Raise 7-11 Cents

In 1962, the AFL-CIO noted, the typical negotiated wage increase amounted to 7 to 11 cents an hour, except in the construction industry where typical rises ranged from 10 to 15 cents and even 25 cents an hour.

The range of gains for some 2.8 million workers in manufacturing and major non-manufacturing industries showed that 51 percent received 7 to 11 cents and 14 percent received 11 cents an hour or more.

The average rise for 1962 was higher than in 1960 and 1961, but short of 1959's gains, the report said.

In percentage terms, the wage gains in major pacts showed a median rise of 3.4 percent of straighttime hourly earnings and a typical gain of 3 to 5 percent.

In 1962, the article continued, some 2.5 million additional workers received wage hikes from contracts negotiated in earlier years.

This means, the AFL-CIO observed, that the basic trend of the 7 to 11-cent hike was extended and applied to a total of roughly 5.3 million workers in addition to wage gains negotiated with smaller firms following the major pattern setters.

In the first half of 1963, the AFL-CIO report continued, nearly 1 million workers won wage hikes.

The boost of 17 cents an hour and over which went to 35 percent of these workers reflected a combination of special factors rather than a change in trends, the report noted.

Workers in the men's clothing industry received their first general wage boost since 1960 and some aircraft and longshore contracts scheduled two wage increases in 1963 because their expired contracts had not been settled last year, the report explained.

These three settlements influenced the statistics on the 868,000 workers who won raises in the first half of this year. The median rise was 4.2 percent as a result, the report noted.

Construction again showed higher gains than the norm, with hikes running from 10 to 25 cents an hour.

The number of wage cuts in both 1962 and the first half of 1963 was "insignificant," the AFL-CIO said. Government figures show they amounted to less than one-half of 1 percent of total workers covered.

The AFL-CIO also noted that more than 3.3 million workers will receive deferred wage increases during 1963 on pacts negotiated earlier. These range from 6 to 9 cents an hour.

LETTER CARRIERS' branch president in Madison, Wis.—Ralph Riley, right—offers hat and congratulations to John Gronouski, Wisconsin tax commissioner named to Pres. Kennedy's cabinet as postmaster general. Riley also invited Gronouski, who will be his boss, to make his first major address at coming state convention of Letter Carriers.

Connecticut Sales Tax Target of Labor Drive

Hartford, Conn.—Independent political action, a progressive state income tax to replace the current sales tax, a federal tax cut for low and middle-income groups and a strong civil rights program were the chief policies approved by the delegates to the State Labor Council convention here.

In the main contested election, Joseph C. Bober of Plumbers' Local 173 was elected to the fulltime post of secretary-treasurer. Bober defeated Roland L. Sepa in a runoff vote, 70,112 to 46,611, after the original field of four had been narrowed down.

Joseph M. Rourke left the office to become deputy director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

In other contests, John J. Driscoll of Auto Workers' Local 1251 defeated Fritz Petela to win a second term as president and Leonard B. Kershner of Fire Fighters' Local 834 won the executive vice-presidency. Daniel J. Gallagher was unopposed as executive secretary.

Taxes, politics and civil rights were the themes running through the reports to the 800 delegates and the resolutions they adopted.

Driscoll, in his report, pointed out that the state faced the need for rising revenues to finance college scholarships, for highways, for facilities for the mentally ill and to promote job growth.

Because the worker and his family faces higher sales taxes in coming years, he said, labor had revived a long-dormant bill for a state income tax based on ability to pay to replace the sales levy. Both parties ran from the proposal, Driscoll declared. Thus, he added, it must become a touchstone of labor support.

"Our central labor councils in every locality must call on every candidate for the Assembly—before the election—and ask whether he stands for more sales taxes," he asserted. "If he says yes, we must say no—as to any type of support in the election."

Rourke, in his legislative report, strongly supported this point, declaring:

"If a candidate or a party is wishy-washy on taxes, and will not support the principle that taxes must be based on ability to pay, neither one is worthy of our support."

In the COPE resolution, the delegates approved a shift in emphasis from legislation to political action so as to produce better candidates for public office. In addition to a wide-ranging program of year-round education and training, all councils were urged to endorse candidates, "regardless of party affiliation, on the basis of their positions on labor's legislative program."

On civil rights, Driscoll recalled labor's leadership in winning one of the nation's first fair employment practices laws back in 1947. He urged a stepped-up campaign within the power of the council to persuade and encourage unions and government at every level to expand equal job rights and apprenticeship opportunities, to ban discrimination in hiring through union contract clauses, to crack down on "slumlords" and to create bi-racial committees.

Wage Increases Under Major Agreements

THESE CHARTS cover only those workers who received pay hikes under collective bargaining agreements covering 1,000 or more workers. Included are all industries except construction, services, finance and government. The amounts refer to wage increases negotiated during the period covered and do not include cost-of-living hikes, fixed "deferred" increases, or non-wage or "fringe" benefits. Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Stereotypers Weigh Impact Of Automation

Cincinnati—The rising threat of automation to job security was the major topic at opening sessions here of the 60th annual convention of the Stereotypers.

More than 100 delegates, gathered here for the week-long sessions, were also scheduled to discuss apprenticeship training and the possibility of mergers with other printing craft unions.

Pres. James H. Sampson and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer guided the discussions concerning the inroads of automation and other job slaughtering measures.

"We have lost about 1000 members in the last two years," Creamer said. "Trouble has come from many fronts—fewer employers because of consolidations, the introduction of new machines, competition from new printing techniques — all have spelled trouble."

To attack the twin problems of loss of members and loss of jobs, union delegates will consider a three-point program, Creamer said.

These include minimizing apprenticeship programs, seeking longer vacations, and a shorter workweek.

Creamer said that while the question would probably come up, he did not believe there would be a merger with any other union at this time.

Lynch Heads Labor Council In Tennessee

Gatlinburg, Tenn. — Matthew Lynch unseated S. A. Para in a heated campaign here to become president of the Tennessee State Labor Council.

Lynch, who had been secretary of the council, polled 564 votes to Para's 426 votes. A key issue concerned labor's legislative and political strategy within the state.

Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) told the 600 delegates the issue of controlling nuclear arms is "today's greatest international problem." He said he strongly favored ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty now being debated in the Senate.

Gore said unemployment is the greatest domestic problem facing the nation. He called for a one-year extension of the accelerated public works program.

The now senior senator from Tennessee said he has that distinction only because of "the death of the greatest friend labor ever had," referring to the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Two Unions In Canada Slate Merger

Ottawa, Ont.—The National Union of Public Employes and the National Union of Public Service Employes, both affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress, will merge into the Canadian Union of Public Employes at a convention in Winnipeg, Man., Sept. 23-26.

NUPE united in a single group several unions in the former Trades & Labor Congress of Canada representing workers in hospital and municipal services. NUPSE began among Ontario hydroelectric employes in 1945 and was formerly affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labor.

NUPE has 56,000 members and NUPSE 32,000. The new union will be the largest all-Canadian affiliate of the CLC and with 88,000 members will be second in size only to the Steelworkers, with 90,000 members.

Phillips Appointed to Parks Board

Pres. Paul Phillips of the Paperkers & Paperworkers has been named a member of the advisory board of National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings & Monuments.

The board, with 11 members, advises the Interior Dept. on acquisition, restoration and administration of sites within its jurisdiction.

Agreements Net Negro Job Gains

Nearly 25 percent of the 45,728 new positions filled by 75 firms in the first six months of 1963 went to nonwhites, the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity has reported.

The committee said 11,274 new jobs went to nonwhites in companies having "Plans for Progress" agreements with the committee and praised the "volunteer actions" of the employers, who are government contractors.

In the office and clerical divisions, the labor force dropped by 5,040 among the firms but nonwhites gained by 1,096. In the hourly wage areas, nearly 38 percent of the increase in jobs went to nonwhites. Among salaried workers, nonwhites got 2,029 of the 21,461 new positions, or almost 10 percent. Formerly the average ranged around three-tenths of 1 percent, the committee reported.

Meany Urges Passage of Tax Cut Bill

Assails GOP Move To Curb '64 Budget

(Continued from Page 1)

in the tax law provided in the bill would result in annual tax relief of $8.7 billion for individuals and $2.3 billion for corporations.

The major actions affecting low and middle-income groups are:

- An average tax cut of 20 percent with two-thirds of the cut effective in 1964, and a change in the rates from the present 20 to 91 percent to 14 to 70 percent.
- A new first bracket rate of 14 percent on the first $500 of taxable income for single persons or $1,000 for married couples, moving up in $500 jumps to the fourth $500 at 17 percent. Under present law the first $2,000 of taxable income carries a 20 percent rate. Taxable income is income left for tax purposes after personal exemptions and other deductions.
- A new minimum standard deduction, for taxpayers who do not itemize their deductions, of $300 for the taxpayer plus $100 for each dependent. This provision would exempt all single persons with incomes up to $900 from taxation and eliminate from tax obligation married couples with two children and $3,000 in income. All told, the new standard deduction provision would remove 1.5 million low income persons from the tax rolls and give others in the low brackets additional tax relief.

The bill provides full deductibility of expenses for medicines and drugs for persons over 65 as compared to the present limitation to one percent of income regardless of age. Persons over 65 also would not have to pay taxes on profits from the sale of a home.

Figuring all exemptions and deductions available, a married couple over 65 with an income up to $3,200 would pay no taxes.

The Treasury Dept. figures that a married couple with two dependents taking the standard deductions and earning $5,000 a year would receive a 31 percent tax cut; the same couple with the same earnings taking typical itemized deductions would get tax relief of 26 percent.

The average trade union member, economists estimate, would receive a tax cut ranging from $100 to $200 per year.

Other major provisions of the bill include:

- Abolishing the dividend tax credit of 4 percent while increasing the present exclusion of up to $50 in dividend income from taxable income to $100, or to $200 for a couple filing jointly.
- Establishing a new two-year category for capital gains with 40 percent of the gain on assets taxable at 21 percent. The present capital gains provision covering holdings of stock or property for more than six months would continue at 50 percent of the gains taxable at 25 percent.
- Eliminating from the list of itemized deductions state and local taxes on gasoline, cigarettes and liquor; allowing casualty losses only in excess of $100; liberalizing deductions for contributions and child-care allowances for working wives, widows and widowers.
- Changing the sick pay provision to exclude from taxable income up to $100 a week in sick pay after a 30-day absence compared to the present $100 exclusion after seven days. Payments by employers for life insurance for employes that exceeds $30,000 in value would be included in an employe's taxable income.
- Allowing taxpayers with fluctuating incomes to average their income over a five-year period. This applies mostly to actors, authors, athletes, etc.
- Tightening slightly the rules governing allowances for depletion of oil and gas properties; some curtailing of tax benefits available to corporation executives under stock option plans; barring most deductions of interest on loans to pay life insurance premiums; limiting profits from certain real estate transactions usually figured under capital gains provisions.
- Reducing the corporate tax rate from the present 52 percent to 50 percent in 1963 and 48 percent in 1965. For small firms, the rate on the first $25,000 of earnings would be lowered from the present 30 percent to 22 percent in 1963.

The major outlines of the tax measure, given a top priority by Pres. Kennedy, were set about a month ago but the final measure was delayed until this week. In the vote to report the measure to the House, two Republicans joined 15 Democrats but reserved the right to oppose the measure on the floor.

GOP Amendment Scored

The approval of the measure followed a bid by Republicans to bar the second step of the proposed rate reductions in 1965 if the "net" national debt on June 30, 1964, were higher than $303 billion and if expenditures for the fiscal year starting next July 1 exceeded $98 billion. This amendment, offered by Rep. John M. Byrnes (R-Wis.), ranking GOP member, was defeated 12 to 11 with one Democrat joining the Republicans and two others abstaining.

The committee did approve by a 15-10 vote an amendment offered by Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) that it is "the sense of Congress" that increased revenues stimulated by the tax reduction first be used to cut budget deficits and secondly to reduce the national debt.

Byrnes indicated that when the measure reaches the floor the GOP will attempt to tack on the amendment defeated in committee to make portions of the tax cut contingent on the level of the national debt and the budgetary spending ceiling.

"Such a move would be deplorable," Meany said. "It would absolutely defeat the purpose of a tax cut. Instead of stimulating the economy, a large reduction in federal expenditures would merely nullify the beneficial effects of the tax bill and would contract economic activity."

UNION EMPLOYES of Northeast Airlines stepped off a Boston-Washington plane with petitions bearing more than 200,000 signatures of New England and Florida voters urging support for a law permitting the airline to continue flying to Miami. Shown are members of the Pilots, Transport Workers, Machinists and Air Line Dispatchers at Washington National Airport en route to the Capitol. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany recently urged the Civil Aeronautics Board to reconsider its decision to cancel Northeast's Florida and eastern seaboard routes, pointing out the jobs of several thousand airline employes would be lost.

'States Rights' Amendments Called Unsound, Threat to Constitution

Three proposed "states rights" amendments to the Constitution are "unsound, dangerous" and should be given "quick burial," U.S. Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox told delegates to a conference called by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The proposed amendments were denounced as a "time bomb" under the Constitution by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), another conference speaker. Their sponsors were described by Charles S. Rhyne, past president of the American Bar Association, as "misguided" and "ignored," and the amendments themselves as a "great evil."

17 States Act

The 100 delegates, representing civic, educational, civil liberties and church groups as well as unions. expressed concern that in less than a year since the amendment drive was initiated by a council of state legislators, 17 states have approved one or more of these proposals to change the federal constitution:

- To eliminate federal court jurisdiction over the apportionment of state legislatures.
- To permit legislatures of two-thirds of the states to propose amendments to the Constitution without consideration or action by Congress. The proposed amendments would then become effective on ratification by three-fourths of the states.
- To establish a "court of the union," made up of the chief justices of the 50 states, which would have the power to overrule the U.S. Supreme Court on matters involving federal-state relationships.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last spring branded the proposed amendments an "attack on the American form of government" designed to "implement the political and economic program of reactionary big business."

Douglas termed the attempt to change the method of amending the Constitution "the most subtle and probably the most dangerous" of the three proposals.

He warned that it would permit state legislators elected by less than 16 percent of the nation's population to rewrite the Constitution. If this were done, Douglas declared, future years might see a national "right-to-work" law, abolition of the income tax and U.S. withdrawal from the United Nations.

'Resounding Defeat' Urged

Rhyne, whose address was read by John J. Gunther, executive director of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, called for "resounding defeat and repudiation" of all three proposals.

Adoption of the "court of the union" proposal, he asserted, would destroy the judiciary and "bring an end to our federal system of government."

"Not one of our priceless freedoms," Rhyne declared, "would be safe without the final safeguard of the courts."

Cox said the "states rights" proposals would move the U.S. back to the loose relationship which existed under the Articles of Confederation and fly in the face of "the most profound lessons of national history."

At a panel discussion moderated by Attorney Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. John Beidler; Mrs. Kathryn H. Stone, a member of the Virginia legislature, and Executive Dir. John Pemberton of the American Civil Liberties Union, discussed methods of fighting the proposed amendments.

Much of the early success of the amendments, they noted, was because they were slipped through legislatures without publicity and with little or no discussion of the issues.

The method the sponsors have adopted to initiate their amendments is the never-used section under which two-thirds of the states can petition Congress to call a special convention for the purpose of considering amendments to the Constitution.

Unlike the proposal for direct state initiation of constitutional amendments, this procedure requires congressional implementation and assures a national forum for debate of the proposals.

'Even to Stand Still, We Have to Move Fast'

Pres. Kennedy told a nationwide television audience that it will take two and one-half years to reduce unemployment to under 5 percent of the labor force with the help of an $11 billion tax cut and other economic stimulants.

The President told Walter Cronkite in an interview broadcast on the Columbia Broadcasting System that a tax cut was the most important of all measures proposed by the Administration to reduce unemployment.

An $11 billion tax cut in a period of 18 months, with other stimulants, he said, might reduce unemployment from the present 5.5 percent of the labor force to less than 5 percent in two and one-half years.

"What we have to realize," he said, "is that even to stand still, stay still, we have to move very fast. We have 2.5 million more people working than when I came to office and yet 1.5 million more people have come into the labor market."

Jobless Rate Dips to 5.5% In August

(Continued from Page 1)

nomic reasons, up from 2.5 million in July. The total labor force dropped by 750,000 to 77.2 million, somewhat more than the expected decline and about 600,000 higher than August a year ago. The average growth in the labor force on a month-to-month basis this year has been about 1 million.

Time lost through unemployment and part-time work, as a percent of total manhours potentially available to the civilian labor force, registered 6.7 pe cent, the same as a year ago.

In another report, the de ment said the reclassification August of Spokane, Wash., fr an area of substantial unemp ment reduced to 37 the number major areas with 6 percent or m jobless. A year ago 47 of job areas were in this category.

The 37 major job areas with s stantial unemployment in Au brought the figure to the pre low, last reached in July 196

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Sept. 21, 1963 | No. 38

Kennedy Presses Tax Cut To Spur Jobs, Fight Slump

DELEGATES TO COPE Big Cities Conference took time out for a visit to the White House, where they were greeted by Pres. Kennedy in the rose garden. The President praised organized labor's "impressive record" of support for social welfare legislation and international programs that have strengthened the free world.

Aid Voted To Medical Education

Congress has given final approval to the labor-backed Administration bill providing large-scale federal aid to medical education.

It is the first major new aid to education measure to reach the White House during the Kennedy Administration — and it took nearly three years to get there.

Pres. Kennedy first asked for the legislation on Feb. 9, 1961, shortly after taking office, and renewed his request each year since then.

As finally enacted, the bill provides:

- $175 million in federal grants over a three-year period to enable medical, dental, nursing and other health professional schools to expand and improve their teaching facilities.
- Approximately $61 million in low-cost loans to medical, dental and osteopathy students.

The House had approved the bill, 288-122, last April and the Senate, at the urging of Administration leaders, passed it intact so as to avoid the necessity for a conference and a possible deadlock.

The Senate vote for final passage was a lopsided 71-9. An attempt by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) to knock out the student loan provision was beaten 63-18.

The American Medical Association, which operates its own loan program in cooperation with private banks, fought the federal loan clause and Goldwater argued that there was no need for federal loans.

Rebuttal by Hill

Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), who led the fight for the Administration bill, retorted that a student who borrowed $6,000 to finance his medical education would have to repay $10,500 in principal and interest under the AMA program as compared with $7,200 under the federal program.

The Senate voted 39-37 to table a civil rights amendment offered by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) and defeated, 43-39, a proposal by Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N. H.) to forgive half the loan to students who enter practice in an area of doctor or dentist shortage.

Hill and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield opposed the Cotton amendment because it would force the bill into conference, but promised to support separate legislation to carry out its intent.

Funds for the new program must still be voted by Congress.

(Continued on Page 2)

Broadcast Puts Case To People

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Kennedy went to the people of the United States to rally support for an $11 billion tax cut which "means more jobs for American workers."

The alternative, he warned, is growing unemployment and a new recession in which "no worker can be sure of his job and no businessman can be sure of his future."

He termed the tax cut bill "the most important domestic economic measure to come before Congress in 15 years" and said it must not be "diluted by amendments or conditions."

Kennedy's dramatic television and radio appeal came after House Republicans vowed to fight any tax reduction unless it is coupled to a cut in federal spending—a move which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has warned would "absolutely defeat the purpose of a tax cut."

The bill comes up in the House Sept. 24, with the key vote expected the following day. To win it, the Administration must hold conservative Democratic defections to a bare minimum or, alternatively, attract a number of GOP votes.

Kennedy hammered at the theme that more buying power in the hands of private citizens is the key to the economic growth needed to reduce the present high level of un-

(Continued on Page 8)

Meany Opens COPE Parley:

Voter Registration Pushed as '64 Key

Labor can afford "no illusions about the prospects for liberal victories in 1964," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned, adding that "only if we get our members to register and vote can we feel confident of reasonable success."

His warning, coupled with a prediction that "the money and manpower of big industry and the right wing will be pumped into the 1964 elections in unprecedented amounts to elect conservative candidates," was made at a meeting of AFL-CIO leaders representing the nation's 22 most populous areas.

In an opening address to the three-day Big Cities Conference of the Committee on Political Education, Meany declared that a massive registration and get-out-the-vote campaign is the answer to the conservative drive. Labor, he stressed, must use its "natural advantage" in the big cities and their suburbs.

"The outcome of the presidential and congressional elections next year will hinge on what we are able to accomplish in the major industrial cities and the fast-growing suburbs around them," he said.

The federation president urged the delegates to "improve on past performance." He pointed out that in 1960 about 60 percent of union members voted in the presidential contest and about 50 percent voted in the 1962 congressional elections.

"This just about equals voting performance of the population as a whole," he added. "We should do better."

Recent formation of conservative political action groups provides conclusive evidence that a drive is under way for a major effort in 1964 to elect a President and Congress to "turn back the clock" on progressive legislation, Meany said.

Among these he listed the American Medical Political Action Committee of the American Medical Association and the Business-Industry Political Action Committee launched by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Political analyst Louis Harris gave the delegates key statistics

(Continued on Page 8)

Auto, Steel Layoffs Dim Job Picture

A smaller-than-usual increase in non-farm employment between July and August was reported by the Labor Dept. with the failure to reach seasonal expectations traced to unusually heavy layoffs in the auto industry and cutbacks in steel.

The department reported the non-farm payroll employment rose only 170,000 over the month to a total of 57.6 million, "less than expected at this time of year."

In addition to steel and autos, the department noted that the apparel industry had not achieved its usual growth and that "no strength was evident in other major metal industries," the group that had provided a major part of the 1963 job expansion.

The factory workweek at 40.5 hours was unchanged from July and about the same as a year ago.

Hourly Earnings Dip

Average hourly earnings of all factory production workers dropped by 2 cents to $2.43 in August and average weekly earnings went to $98.42. The cutback did not reflect, said the department, a drop in wages in specific industries, but resulted from a shift in the composition of employment with fewer high-wage workers and more in the lower wage areas making up the August force.

In its earlier report, the department noted a slight improvement in unemployment rates for adult men and teen-agers in mid-August which edged the jobless rate down to 5.5 percent for the month.

The August figures reflected no major changes in the employment situation. The jobless rate has been stuck in the 5.5 to 6 percent range

(Continued on Page 8)

Doctors Find Welfare Pays —$2 Million

Charleston, W. Va.—West Virginia doctors, who with their counterparts in other states set up loud cries against "socialized" medical care, collected more than $2 million in state and federal funds last year for treating patients too poor to pay.

One physician, the Charleston Gazette reported, received $44,391 in state payments—presumably in addition to the fees he received from non-charity patients. Another managed to see enough charity patients to bill the state for $40,596.37.

Seventy-six doctors were paid more than $5,000 each for treating indigent patients during the year.

The problem isn't a new one. More than a year ago, poverty-hit West Virginia tried to correct abuses which were draining its MAA funds (medical asssistance for the aged under the Kerr-Mills Act). The state cut the schedule of fees to

(Continued on Page 2)

New York State Urged To Extend Bias Penalty

Rochester, N. Y.—Extension of New York's Fair Employment Practice law to ban state procurement from out-of-state employers who practice job discrimination was demanded by Pres. Raymond P. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO at the annual convention here of the State Council of Carpenters.

Corbett cited the case of a North Carolina maker of library furniture who denies better-paying jobs to Negroes yet recently received government contracts as low bidder.

"We believe in the free flow of merchandise between the states and we are certain our industry can compete effectively with out-of-state industry," he said.

"But accepting merchandise produced in out-of-state plants where workers are discriminated against, and paying for it with the people's tax dollars, is another matter of grave import to the workers and all the people in this state. Discrimination, we know, goes hand-in-hand with low wages, putting New York taxpayers in the position of subsidizing out-of-state discrimination. This must be stopped."

Corbett said organized labor will seek the backing of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) when the legislature convenes for amendment of the labor law "to make the same non-discrimination rules that apply to New York manufacturers apply equally to out-of-state producers who sell to government agencies in this state."

UNION LABEL WEEK observance in St. Paul, Minn., area included distribution of Miss Union Maid dolls and Minnesota Twins baseball souvenir kits by the St. Paul AFL-CIO. Here Rich Rollins, Twins' third baseman, and Mrs. Tobey Lapakko, chairman of the central body's Human Rights Committee, chat with a couple of young patients at Gillette State Hospital for Crippled Children.

St. Paul Unions Launch Drive for Blood Donors

St. Paul, Minn.—Organized labor in the greater St. Paul area combined observance of Union Label Week with celebration of the U.S. Labor Dept.'s 50th anniversary and used both to kick off a drive to meet an annual shortage of 2,000 pints of blood reported by the Red Cross center here.

In addition, the observance—co-sponsored by the St. Paul AFL-CIO and the Minnesota Union Advocate, its official publication—was marked by distribution of gifts to crippled children and in community centers; a banquet in honor of some 200 old timers who had been members of their unions for 50 years or more, presentation of a piano to a senior citizens' recreation room and a Union Label Week dance.

The drive for blood donations stresses the slogan, "1963 EXTRA pints of blood from union members during 1963" and is intended to set up contributions in addition to the thousands of pints given every year by union members.

The local AFL-CIO and the Red Cross had 10,000 pledge cards printed and began distribution of them immediately. The AFL-CIO is taking the position that the "fiscal year" for the campaign runs from Labor Day this year to Labor Day 1964.

Third Baseman Rich Rollins and Second Baseman John Goryl of the Minnesota Twins helped in the distribution of 300 Twins' baseball souvenir kits and 300 "Miss Union Maid" dolls to the children.

Purchasers of tickets to the Union Label Week dance competed in a contest consisting of finishing in 25 words or less a sentence starting "Union Label Week Is Important Because . . ." Prizes ranged from canned hams to a new automobile won by Ruth Frazier, a member of the St. Paul Teachers local.

Crowned at the dance as "Miss Trade Union of 1963" was Mrs. Sharon Pointer, a member of Local 2047, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who was judged winner by the "royalty" of the St. Paul Winter Carnival.

Raises End Food Chain Clerks' Strike

Miami—Striking members of the Retail Clerks at Food Fair stores in Florida have returned to work with a new two-year contract providing pay increases, reduction in the workweek and other improvements.

The strike began Aug. 22 and was settled Sept. 15 after around-the-clock negotiations in which Board Chairman Samuel Friedland of the Food Fair Corp. intervened to moderate what the union called the "intransigent stand" of other company negotiators.

Full-time employes will get raises of $6 to $18 a week over the term, with the first increase retroactive to Apr. 14 for Miami area employes and to July 23 in other areas. Part-time employes gain 15 to 37.5 cents an hour, and bag boys win 30 to 70 cents an hour and classification of full-time workers as stockmen during the life of the contract. A new classification of utility clerk also was established.

The agreement provides uniform rates throughout the chain in Florida. For the Miami area, there is an immediate reduction of 2.5 hours in the workweek without loss of pay. In other areas, the workweek reduction will proceed in three steps.

PRR Fireman Wins Union Safety Award

Columbus, O.—A Pennsylvania Railroad locomotive fireman who risked his life to save an 18-month-old child was honored here by his union.

The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen presented their monthly safety award—$250 and a plaque—to Ralph M. LaRue, who hung from the front end of his moving freight train to sweep little Shirley Ward from the track when the 89-car freight train was unable to stop in time.

At Human Rights Conference:

Labor-Liberal-Negro Unity Urged in Drive Against Bias

Unity House, Pa.—A strong alliance of labor, civil rights and liberal forces was urged at a three-day conference here of 500 trade unionists. The meeting, sponsored by the National Trade Union Council for Human Rights of the Jewish Labor Committee, drew delegates from 28 international unions, AFL-CIO national headquarters, the Industrial Union dept. and several state and city central labor bodies.

The dominant refrain was the need for unity among advocates of equal opportunity, full employment and social progress. Any failure of labor, civil rights forces and liberals to maintain their alliance, a conference resolution stated, "would play into the hands of our common opponents—the southern racists and their northern reactionary allies, the labor baiters and the anti-Semites."

The resolution went on to observe that "an alliance does not require the complete elimination of differences" before united action can be undertaken. There are "justifiable grievances against segments of each of our communities," the conferees agreed, but "the existence of the alliance calls for differences to be expressed in a positive and constructive manner. It demands a consciousness of the value of the coalition and the examination of proposed criticisms in that light."

Leading speakers included G. Mennen Williams, assistant secretary of state for African affairs; Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and James Farmer, national director of the Congress on Racial Equality. Each stressed the urgent need for grass roots backing for Pres. Kennedy's civil rights proposals to Congress.

Tyler took a long view of political trends affecting the labor and civil rights movements. He said a national trend toward political realignment is most apparent in Congress, where the lineup on key issues is usually conservatives versus liberals rather than Republicans versus Democrats.

The same tendency, he predicted, would thoroughly reshape the nation's political parties in the future with the final outcome the development of a new "first party" in the United States "with its mass base in labor and the civil rights movements and its programmatic architects in our intellectual community."

Constant Sessions

From the time the delegates arrived to the adjournment of the sessions, they met almost constantly to discuss the conference theme of "perspectives on the civil rights explosion." In addition to the labor delegates there were representatives from civil rights organizations and the Jewish community.

The conferees were divided into panels for discussions on many subjects. In one panel session, "Coalition in Distress: The Negro and Organized Labor," Dir. Michael Mann of AFL-CIO Reg. 2, presided, while talks were given by Nelson Jack Edwards of the Auto Workers, Murray Gross of the ILGWU, Benjamin McLaurin of the Sleeping Car Porters and Prof. Arnold Rose of the University of Minnesota.

All agreed that most unions had good civil rights records, but that there could be no relaxing until every corner of the labor movement was free of racial or religious discrimination.

Several cited the key role played by labor in the battle for civil rights legislation in the past and present.

Three concurrent panels discussed "Labor and the Fight for Human Rights." Dir. Boris Shishkin, Walter Davis and Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights outlined the new labor drive to eliminate discrimination in the community.

Pres. Claude Ramsey of the Mississippi AFL-CIO and Floyd McKessick, national chairman of CORE, emphasized the importance of registering new voters, Negro and white, in the South. They predicted that as the number of registered voters grew, there would be a vast change for the better in southern politics and that this would produce a healthy effect on Congress.

Medical Education Aid Enacted by Congress

(Continued from Page 1)

Meanwhile, in another effort to get Kennedy's education program moving, a Senate subcommittee voted to expand the House-passed vocational education bill.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), voted to increase the four-year, $450 million vocation training program authorized by the House to $702 million.

In addition, the subcommittee incorporated in the bill other Administration proposals, including an extension of the National Defense Education Act with higher ceilings on student loans, continuation of the aid to federally-impacted areas program, an expanded three-year program of federal aid to community public libraries, and grants to states to provide part-time jobs for needy students.

A House Judiciary subcommittee reached tentative agreement on a substantial portion of the Administration's civil rights package, but a number of key issues were still to be thrashed out, including a labor-supported effort to incorporate an enforceable ban on race and religious discrimination in employment.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), appearing before the Rules Committee to seek clearance of the tax cut bill, said he will not seek to bring a hospital care for the aged bill to the House floor this year.

The Ways & Means Committee was expected to open hearings on the hospital care bill in October and Administration officials had expressed hope that, assuming a late adjournment, it might be possible to start the bill on its legislative journey.

Doctors Get Hefty Fees In State Plan

(Continued from Page 1)

doctors and tried to put a stop to bill-padding abuses—such as the case of the doctor who prescribed so many medicines that one patient would have had to take 143 pills daily to follow his orders.

The result was a short-lived—and successful—"strike" by doctors who refused to participate further in the program unless their full fees were restored.

An angry West Virginia newspaper columnist, Thomas F. Stafford of the Gazette, wrote recently that "while doctors gasp publicly at the mere mention of government intervention in their professional activities, no single group in America has a more ravenous appetite when it gets to the public trough."

Stafford suggests that unless tighter controls are put on payments to doctors, "they will soon own the gold on the statehouse dome."

"When a single doctor is paid for an average of 36 visits from welfare patients a day, and collects many thousands of dollars in fees, it is time for new regulatory measures," he added.

He closed with the suggestion that the medical profession stop "crying wolf" and "start policing the abuses which are slowly destroying its public image."

House Moves To Strengthen Rail Pensions

A bill to strengthen the finances of the railroad retirement system—supported by unions and management—sailed through the House and appeared headed for early Senate approval.

It raises payroll taxes paid by workers and employers to finance retirement and disability benefits by lifting the taxable wage base from $400 to $450 a month.

The effect will be to reduce the present $77 million a year "actuarial deficit." It will also mean higher benefits for some employes on retirement, since their pensions will be calculated on a higher wage base.

Another portion of the bill raised employer contributions to the separate unemployment insurance fund and tightened qualifications in order to take the fund out of the red.

In testimony before the House and Senate Commerce committees, George M. Harrison, chief executive of the Railway Clerks, said rail labor supported the amendments in order to put the two funds "in financially sound condition." Harrison testified on behalf of the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

Another provision in the bill, raising the interest rate paid by the Treasury on special bonds held by the retirement fund, is expected to add $25 million a year to the fund.

The changes were endorsed by all three members of the Railroad Retirement Board as well as union and management representatives.

Becu Asks UN Sanctions On South Africa, Portugal

Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has renewed an "urgent appeal" to the United Nations for "immediate and effective" action "to put an end to the shameful apartheid policies of the South African government and to the oppression of the African peoples still under Portuguese colonial rule."

Becu said sanctions should include severance of diplomatic and commercial relations "until these governments abandon their policies which are a disgrace to humanity."

His letter to UN Sec.-Gen. U Thant noted that Sept. 17, the date the UN General Assembly convened, had been designated a day of international worker solidarity against apartheid and colonialism by the African Trade Union Confederation, to which ICFTU affiliates in Africa belong.

Helping Fair Employers:

'Do Not Buy' Drive Upheld by NLRB

A union-sponsored "Do Not Buy" campaign against merchants in Jerseyville, Ill., was not unlawful, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled, because the pickets did not have a recognition or organizational purpose within the meaning of the labor act.

Board Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown voted to dismiss a complaint brought by the Jerseyville Retail Merchants Association against the Alton-Wood River Building & Construction Trades Council; Hod Carriers Local 646, Retail Clerks Local 344, Plumbers Local 553, and Teamsters Local 525.

Reversing Trial Examiner Eugene E. Dixon, the board concluded that the union pickets, carrying signs and passing out handbills and newspapers, were interested not in recognition by the assertedly "unfair" employers nor in organizing their employes, but in getting consumers to support "fair" employers.

The board observed that the picketing was not directed at any particular employers, their suppliers, customers or employes and reflected only an attempt to "achieve the limited purpose of disseminating information to the buying public generally" in order to persuade that public to confine its patronage to AFL-CIO and IBT-organized businesses. Therefore there was no law violation, the panel found.

Unaffiliated Union Recognized

The examiner had concluded that the unions broke the law because they picketed after the merchants had recognized Local 50, Congress of Independent Unions, unaffiliated, and had reached an agreement containing starting wages "far below those advocated" by the affiliated unions in their contracts. Member Boyd Leedom dissented.

The decision was considered significant as a further delineation of board policy in informational picketing cases. The Jerseyville case presented a unique set of factors, in the opinion of union lawyers.

The "do not patronize" campaign started when Sec.-Treas. William Doty of IBT Local 525 set up a "Cooperative Educational Committee" and induced 78 representatives of AFL-CIO unions to join him in an appeal to "union members, family and friends" printed in the East St. Louis, Ill. Labor Tribune.

The substance of the appeal was that, in a town with a large number of union members, many merchants opposed labor objectives and some had contracts with wages detrimental to the prosperity of the area. It pointed out also that the most powerful weapon a wage earner has is the dollar he spends and requested that "our membership institute a personal boycott of these business establishments."

The pickets then launched a campaign to encourage trade at stores hiring members of the picketing organizations. They walked on Jerseyville's main streets from mid-April to December 1962, when they halted the activity pending NLRB proceedings. Pickets did not appear before any individual stores and signs did not list any establishment, though some signs did urge that a "fair trade list" be used in shopping. The list carried the names of 28 firms considered unfair.

Last month the same board members dismissed a similar complaint against the Alton-Wood River Building & Construction Trades Council for picketing job sites of the Kopp-Evans Construction Co. in nearby Bethalto, Ill.

They held that the firm granted recognition to the Congress of Independent Unions but that such recognition did not bar a petition by another union, and therefore it was lawful to picket for recognition. Dissents were entered by Leedom and by Philip Ray Rodgers, who since has left the board.

INSTRUCTORS FROM LOCAL UNIONS of the Operating Engineers observe a demonstration during the 11-day training course they are taking at the Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies. Left to right are Donald Goebel, Local 2; Charles Gladstone, Local 547; Intl. Rep. Garfield Kinchen, Local 216; James Merrill of the U.S. Army Engineers School; Alan Burch, the union's assistant research and education director, and Joseph Jordan, Local 522. The training will be relayed to union members employed in industries using radioactive materials through local programs.

All Needed Safeguards Seen in Test Ban Pact

The U.S. has all "the safeguards we need" in the nuclear test ban treaty, and the pact should be ratified without amendments or reservations, Andrew J. Biemiller, AFL-CIO legislative director, told a network radio audience.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Biemiller discounted the demand by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) that the pact's effective date be delayed until the removal of Soviet arms and military personnel from Cuba. Goldwater thinks "there ought to be a partisan fight" and his demand is "strictly a device in a forlorn hope to defeat the treaty," Biemiller said.

The Senate, after two weeks of debate, agreed to vote on ratification Sept. 24, with all signs pointing to approval by more than the two-thirds margin required under the Constitution.

In the interview over the Mutual Broadcasting System, Biemiller said the treaty allows the U.S. to continue testing weapons underground and the nation is free to resume other forms of testing if a critical need arises to renounce the agreement.

He termed the treaty "a very small first step . . . toward disarmament" and said the AFL-CIO regards its signing "as clear evidence of American strength and relative Russian weakness."

The federation, he stressed, welcomes the treaty "as a means of getting some of this lethal danger" of radioactive fallout out of the air.

"We think this is one of the great virtues of this treaty," he added.

Biemiller was interviewed by Peter Edson of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and John Herling of National Newspaper Syndicate.

Samoff Appointed To NLRB Post

The appointment of Bernard L. Samoff as Philadelphia regional director for the National Labor Relations Board has been announced by NLRB Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman. Samoff, a board employe since 1942, succeeds Bennet F. Schauffler, who retired after 25 years as director.

Ordman and NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch announced two other executive appointments. Thomas W. Kennedy, associate executive board secretary, was named an assistant general counsel. John C. Truesdale, former NLRB employe who has been with the National Academy of Sciences since 1957, returns as associate executive secretary.

Scranton's City Police Reserves Put on Payroll by Struck Firm

Scranton, Pa.—City police reserves, in regular uniform, walk their posts at a big mining-drill plant here in full view of 120 pickets, on strike since Apr. 6 for a first contract with the Sprague & Henwood Co.

The police—hired with the consent of city officials—are "guarding" the plant from the 49 strikers whose jobs have been given to strikebreakers and from all the other employes who helped build it to its present important position in the mining industry.

That may tell the story of today's Scranton, home town of Gov. William W. Scranton (R) and of sturdy union families which survived the brutal coal and iron police and built a monument in the public square to John Mitchell, miners' hero.

It may explain also why the old-timers will tell you that the hated coal and iron police are gone but the spirit of the old anthracite barons who hired them has never left Scranton.

Adrian Ross, scion of an old Scranton family, is president and inheritor of the Sprague & Henwood firm, which defeated all union organizing attempts until the Machinists won an election last October, went through 50 negotiating sessions without agreeing to one basic contract clause, and has refused to agree to any contract which does not provide superseniority for the strikebreakers over employes with long company service.

And that's the key issue of the strike, which has resisted all settlement attempts.

On use of city police, AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Henry A. McFarland has this comment:

"I haven't heard of such a thing for years. We are checking the state law to see if it's constitutional."

Mayor William T. Schmidt (R) contends that the police used as company guards are only technically members of the city police force and are used mainly on special occasions and in emergencies. The police guards themselves say they have been sworn in as police and have the power of arrest.

Recently the mayor held a dinner meeting for labor, management and others at which he urged the disputed issues be submitted to arbitration. The union agreed but management postponed an answer.

The Scranton labor movement has rallied behind the little band of strikers, who have said they will not accept any settlement which does not cover the entire group.

The Scranton AFL-CIO has passed out leaflets telling shoppers the issues of the strike, and even used a sound truck despite police refusal to issue a permit. In a Labor Day broadcast, the central body urged all workers to aid the strikers by donating one hour's pay to their support.

In the NLRB election last year the workers chose the IAM, 86-68. Management, the union reported, then summarily discharged an employe who came in during his vacation to vote in the election and suspended a worker because a foreman smelled smoke in the men's locker room (the worker doesn't smoke).

After the company contract offer was voted down, 92-0, and the strike commenced, the firm obtained an injunction limiting pickets. Ironically, the local observed, it was the pickets themselves who were endangered—by strikebreakers and executives who drove their cars at speeds up to 30 miles an hour through the lines.

A delegation from the central body drove in a 100-car pilgrimage of workers, strikers and their families to see Gov. Scranton. He promised to use his "good offices" but nothing happened, and the local labor movement sent him a telegram reminding him of his commitment.

Hearings to Start Push For Hospital Care in '64

House hearings next month on hospital care for the aged through social security will pave the way for a "major push" for enactment of the Anderson-King bill in 1964, an AFL-CIO spokesman declared.

Nelson Cruikshank, director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, said "time is on the side of the health bill's supporters."

Commenting on a statement by House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) that he would not seek to bring the hospital care bill to the House floor this year, Cruikshank said it would be "erroneous" for anyone to read that statement as the "death knell" of the legislation.

It means only, Cruikshank said, that Congress will be completing action this year on the tax cut and civil rights bills and "the decks will be cleared so that a major push for the hospital insurance bill can be made in 1964."

Meanwhile, he said, "every day the evidence grows that the Kerr-Mills Act is a colossal failure in regard to meeting the health needs of the elderly" and there is a "mounting record" of the inability of private insurance to meet the need.

Cruikshank added:

"The hearings that Congressman Mills has announced, which will probably be held in October of this year, will make clear to Congress and to the public that these substitutes for the Anderson-King bill have failed, and that the social security mechanism is the only practical method of financing the basic health needs of the vast majority of the aged."

The Why of the Tax Cut Bill

THE CONSERVATIVE coalition in the House is working on a new version of having its cake and eating it too on the $11 billion tax reduction bill reported out by the Ways & Means Committee.

The new gimmick is to try to block any tax cut unless the federal budget is slashed at least $1 billion next year, with a tight lid on spending the following year as well.

Under this strategy, worked out by GOP members of the committee and supported by a number of conservative southern Democrats, the coalition could claim that it cut taxes and blocked "spending" all in one fell swoop.

This is hypocrisy of the rankest sort. Honest opposition to the tax cut bill founded on a belief in "fiscal responsibility" and a program of reducing the size of the federal budget and the national debt is one thing. Approving a $7 billion tax cut and then protesting about the size of the debt and the scope of the budget is another.

★ ★ ★

THE TAX CUT was conceived and is being supported by a great cross-section of groups and interests on the essential ground that it is needed to stimulate the economy and spur economic growth.

The present tax structure has been slowing economic growth, curtailing recoveries from recessions and holding back the consumer purchasing power that is necessary to an expanding economy and maximum use of plant and manpower.

The problem of reducing the present high, chronic levels of unemployment and of providing jobs for the sharply expanding labor force is tied to a tax cut that will provide the stimulus to step up economic growth beyond the inadequate 3.5 percent level of the past year.

These are the issues at stake in the tax cut program. A dynamic and expanding economy will more than restore in the next few years the tax-reduction dollars lost to the Treasury; the initial deficit will turn into a surplus.

Without a tax cut and the necessary spur to the economy the likelihood of another recession grows larger, a recession that would bring even greater deficits, an increase in spending and a mounting national debt.

★ ★ ★

THE BILL REPORTED out by the Ways & Means Committee is not a perfect measure. Many reforms urged by the President and the AFL-CIO are not included. Tax relief for large corporations with zooming, record-shattering profits is debatable.

But the measure provides for $8.7 billion in tax cuts for individuals and contains major revisions of rates and deductions to aid the low and middle-income brackets: an average 25 percent tax reduction in these brackets; the revision of the first bracket rates to an equitable schedule; the new minimum standard deduction that will remove 1.5 million low income persons from the tax rolls and give millions of others additional relief.

The tax bill is a first major step toward reducing the level of unemployment, of vitalizing the economy and spurring it to greater growth. This is what the tax bill is all about.

To saddle it with debt-ceiling and budget-limiting provisions is to destroy its usefulness as an economic tool and endanger America's future.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Sept. 21, 1963 No. 38

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Preferable to Life Under Reds:

Free China Labor Movement Under Rigid Federal Control

By Arnold Beichman

TAIPEI, FORMOSA—To distinguish it from Communist China, Formosa (Taiwan) is called "Free China." That it is—free from Mao Tse-tung's red army. But by any other standard, the word is barely applicable to Pres. Chiang Kai-Shek's island bastion, 110 miles from the red mainland.

The word "free" is least applicable to the country's labor movement. Although it is far from suffering the common disabilities of labor organizations in totalitarian countries—for example, rigid control over a worker's movements—the Chinese Federation of Labor is dominated by the government and the only major party, the Kuomintang.

The official reason for this mastery over the union structure is that Free China is at war with communism and that Formosa has been under martial law since Chiang's forces took over the island.

The right to strike is specifically forbidden by government decree. Violations are punishable by imprisonment. However, there is an occasional walkout which authorities ignore.

Yet a new wind of change is rustling through Formosa, largely due to the younger men in the government, particularly those who have traveled and know the meaning of free, democratic institutions. Among them, there is the most acute discomfort that a free labor movement does not exist in a country which calls itself—and justifiably so—Free China.

For however socially backward Chiang and Vice Pres. Chen Cheng may be, it cannot be forgotten that there is a vast difference between a terroristic, totalitarian regime of the Communist variety and the discomforting, authoritarian rule of Chiang.

The area of freedom on Formosa is narrow and its spread is discouraged. To the government and party leaders, the concept of freedom of association represents danger—from communism, they say. Many of them recall that back in the days before the reds ousted the Nationalists from the mainland, the unions had been deeply penetrated by Communist agents.

However, there are officials who feel that what happened a quarter-century ago should not be a guide to the present. Even officials who defended the government's policy indicated their discomfort by suggesting that the fault lay with the labor movement.

"There is no capable person to lead the unions; they can't find the right person to appeal to the government," said Tang Tsung, Kuomintang secretary-general, when I asked him about labor's status.

One cannot speak harshly about Formosa without at the same time stating that its 11 million people enjoy a high standard of living, second in Southeast Asia only to the Malaya Federation. Formosa can boast a rural reform program, widely recognized as one of the most successful in the world, which has virtually ended the old feudal landlord regime. It has introduced a broad system of education in urban and rural areas. It has indeed much to be proud of when compared to a human disaster area like Indonesia with its "guided democracy."

IT IS PRECISELY because Nationalist China has so many accomplishments to its credit over the past 14 years that a visitor cannot but fail to be astonished at the antediluvian approach to trade unionism.

Lacking any genuine collective bargaining, the workers must take what they can get in the way of wages, particularly in government-owned industries. These include sugar, salt, aluminum processing, petroleum refineries, some textile mills, communications and railroads, and highway and inland transport. The government approves the budget for each industry annually; this in turn decides the wage regardless of what may happen to living costs.

Within the Chinese Federation of Labor are three national industrial federations, one national union of seamen and the Taiwan Federation of Labor, the only provincial body in operation. The other provinces are, of course, in Red China where the unions are nothing more than political appendages. As of last June, there were on Formosa 692 unions and federations with an estimated 280,000 members out of a potential organizable force of 500,000.

The basic or minimum wage, fixed by law, is $7.50 a month. Though many urban workers earn considerably more, the government refuses to increase it lest by so doing it might lead to further across-the-board increases.

Unemployment, by government admission, is about 13 to 15 percent of the 3.25 million work force. Underemployment is estimated at about 15 to 18 percent. Analysts predict that these figures will remain high because with a population which increases at the rate of 3.5 percent annually—one of the highest in Asia—the need for 150,000 new jobs a year will remain unmet.

Morgan Says:

The Quality of the Fourth Estate Needs Some Self-Examination

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE SAN FRANCISCO Press Club is celebrating its 75th anniversary. This diamond jubilee occasion provides an appropriate time to re-examine the quality of the Fourth Estate, including its electronic addition, broadcasting. The San Francisco Press Club has survived the great earthquake and fire of 1906 and all other intervening cataclysms, including the invention of the gasoline engine and women's hats. But the question for news media now is whether our reports are candid enough, dimensional enough and thoughtful enough to help the country make it the rest of the way.

Morgan

As a working member of the trade, I have my doubts. We Americans pride ourselves on being the best-informed people in the world. We probably are but that is not saying very much. Too much of the time, I contend, we are uninformed, half-informed or misinformed. We seem to like it that way.

In a devastating, even merciless, critique of our media, that distinguished American sociologist, Harry Overstreet, once wrote in his book, "The Mature Mind," that in our money-making culture newspapers have developed a "vested interest in catastrophe." Thus the competitive clash between the Communist and non-Communist ideologies is wrenched out of the context of the world's vast sociological upheaval and becomes, simply, the cold war.

Broadcasting, Overstreet said, has found its vested interest in mediocrity. (Surprise, surprise!) Radio, television and Hollywood all have a vested interest in escapism, therefore in emotional immaturity. Advertising, he observed, "makes us want things for the wrong reasons." So advertising has developed its own peculiar vested interest: in human self-indulgence.

In our commercially-impelled attempts to shock or induce sedation, we minions of journalism seem to be cooking constantly on a recipe of crisis. We grind the explosive pods of conflict into a fine powder. Then we pour on black headlines or the liquid doom of a newscaster's voice and we get instant news.

The bushy-browed father of the H-bomb, Edward Teller, got shock-treatment coverage when he testified against the test ban treaty in Washington and so did Gen. Power, the chief of the Strategic Air Command. But who remembers that another scientist of signal distinction, Dr. Glenn Seaborg, chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, and eight out of nine top operational military commanders testified in favor of the treaty?

How many citizens yet realize that the legislatures of half the states have given varying degrees of approval to three proposed constitutional amendments that would radically change the form of the federal government and emasculate the powers of the Supreme Court? The New York Times belatedly made a creditable stab at rounding up the story but it remained for a small, courageous monthly magazine, the Progressive of Madison, Wis., to tie details together in a meaningful (and disturbing) report on the coordinated efforts of extreme right-wingers toward this almost revolutionary objective.

Our "money-making culture" is capable of pluses as well as minuses. The New York Herald Tribune has just begun a bold experiment with a team of top-flight reporters to research the news behind the headlines.

TRYING THE HALF-HOUR newscast on network television is interesting though New York Times Critic Jack Gould found the initial change "only more headline bulletins, not any appreciable increase in the true depth or diversity of coverage." How about less timidity and more trenchant use of the news on the newscast periods broadcasting already has?

What is our message to ourselves and to the world anyway? If you'll excuse my presumptuousness in quoting from the Opening Commercial of my book, "Clearing the Air," I wrote that it is not tawdry, yellow journalism stuff but "the revolutionary example of a democratic society of free men recognizing its problems and solving them openly, with enough courage and wisdom to spare to inspire others, and enough generosity to help that inspiration along."

The other day I asked Ed Murrow how he thought the Voice of America and the U.S. Information Agency were doing in getting our message across. We can penetrate the Iron Curtain with broadcasts, he said, we can flood Africa and Asia and Latin America with books but who knows what happens on that last few inches it takes an idea to travel into a man's mind? Responsible journalism can help clear that distance both for ourselves and the rest of the world. But neither the San Francisco Press Club nor the journalistic trade of the country at large has another 75 years to decide that that ought to be our primary and minimal goal.

Washington Reports:

Williams Finds Africans Aware Of U.S. Progress in Bias Fight

THE PEOPLE OF AFRICA believe the U.S. is making progress in the elimination of racial discrimination, G. Mennen Williams, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

The former governor of Michigan said the question always comes up when he talks with student groups or newsmen.

"On the last trip, the people reacted very favorably toward the initiatives taken by Pres. Kennedy," he continued. "They were dismayed by the pictures of dogs being used against human beings. This was very distressing indeed, but they have confidence in the statements of the President and his activities to eliminate discrimination."

Williams, just returned from Africa, said in the exclusive interview that "the progress I have seen in a number of African states is really remarkable."

He declared he was "struck by the new buildings, particularly new schools, new business enterprises. . . . My conversations with both government leaders and private citizens indicated an increased concern with the economic welfare of the people."

HE WAS much impressed with the school of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions for training trade union leaders in Kampala, Uganda, he said, adding:

"It gives the English-speaking trade union leaders an opportunity to become acquainted with the techniques of successful free trade unionism. And I certainly hope, along with many Africans, that there will be a French-speaking school of a similar sort on the west side of Africa in the not too distant future."

Communism has lost influence in Africa, he asserted. "Most of all because the Communists began to interfere in the affairs of the states; they were also disappointing in aid and in the delivery of promised materials."

He warned, however, that the U.S. "must not let down its guard."

"They (the Reds) are training students," he said. "They are getting people into sensitive areas where they can, into the press and radio. They try to get into the labor unions."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN RECENT WEEKS Edwin P. Neilan, a self-described small town banker who has just been elected president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, has been engaged in what he obviously feels is a great moral crusade.

He has been denouncing members of Congress almost en masse and the American public for engaging in a corrupt game of "pork barrel" politics in which the "biggest briber" gets himself elected with the aid of federal funds for local projects.

Neilan's charges of such "corruption" were so sweeping that they brought a shower of congressional criticism on his head. He has now returned to the battle with the sanctimonious observation that he is just a simple banker who is surprised to be criticized for his efforts to protect the public morals.

He can make his charges stick here and there. But what he has done is lump virtually every federally-supported public improvement as corrupt in itself, clearly a reflection of his own conservative political philosophy which happens to be contrary to the whole history of the U.S.

Our nation simply could not have become a nation without the very public works which Neilan has denounced in such unbridled fashion. It would long since have been fragmentized into a collection of Balkan states if the country had not been bound together through federal action.

* * *

FROM THE VERY FIRST, there were other Neilans who objected to federal roads and the federal post office, who wanted the states and local communities to take care of the public works that they needed. For the entire life of our country there have been "pork barrel" charges, most of them basically absurd attacks on the very growth of the nation.

Was the Tennessee Valley Authority a "corrupt" pork barrel deal?

Was George Norris of Nebraska a "corrupt" politician because he brought the TVA into being in a part of the country where he never got a single vote? Are the millions of voters in the Tennessee Valley "corrupt" because they support a project that has enriched not only their own region but the country?

Is the Bonneville power program of the Northwest the result of political "corruption"? Or like TVA, is it not rather a great national effort that has brought untold wealth to millions of Americans and to the nation itself because of federal action?

The examples are numerous. There was a time when great destructive floods swept the Missouri Valley. Yet today, through federal action, the Missouri River has been penned between its banks to serve constructive purposes such as power and recreation.

* * *

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY, which would have been impossible to build without federal aid, has brought new life to the whole northeastern and north central sections of our country. The New York Barge Canal, built with federal aid, has helped restore the economy of Upper New York State.

Today's giant federal road system has tied the nation together. Could the states and local communities by themselves have built it? Of course not. Conservatives will argue that they could and would if they had the tax money that now goes to the federal government. The answer is that the whole march of the U.S. as a nation for two centuries has been one directed toward national purposes and national aims that has resisted the splintering of strength that is the inevitable result of state and local domination.

Certainly Americans can differ among themselves as to the role of the federal government in local improvements that have national impact. But Neilan does the country and the business interests he represents a grave disservice when he equates differences of opinions and political philosophy with corruption.

Neilan fondly believes himself a moral crusader, yet how much morality is there in labeling people "corrupt" simply because they disagree with you? (PAI).

G. MENNEN WILLIAMS, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, lauded the Kampala, Uganda, school of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, as he was interviewed for the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. He expressed the hope that a similar school would be established on the West Coast of Africa. Harry W. Flannery interviewed Williams.

Lynch Slate Takes Over In Tennessee

Gatlinburg, Tenn.—Delegates to the Tennessee AFL-CIO convention here united behind their new president, Matthew Lynch, and elected his running mates by acclamation to other top offices.

New officers include Talley Livingston of Oak Ridge as first vice president, James Lee Case of Chattanooga as secretary, and Harry Morgan of Knoxville as treasurer. Earlier Lynch, former secretary of the council, had defeated incumbent Pres. S. A. Para in a spirited race.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in an address declared that "something must be done and done quickly" to meet the nation's unemployment problem. He stressed labor's push for a 35-hour workweek.

To meet the needs of a fast-growing population, he said, the U.S. must start now to build more homes, more classrooms, mass transit facilities and recreation and cultural projects.

COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan told delegates that "silence" is the biggest "crime" committed by a local union. He urged members to speak out against right-wing, anti-labor groups.

Delegates also heard from Stanton E. Smith, coordinator of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and a former president of the state body.

He called for continued strengthening of labor's community ties and reminded delegates that many of labor's problems can be solved only through legislation.

SCRAPBOOK on long printing trades strike at Kingsport, Tenn., is displayed by Stereotypers Pres. James H. Sampson, seated, at union's convention in Cincinnati. Standing, from left: Intl. Rep. John McDermott; Carl E. Svendsen, delegate from Portland, Ore., and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer.

Stereotypers Step Up Kingsport Strike Drive

Cincinnati—A stepped-up campaign against the struck Kingsport Press in Kingsport, Tenn., was voted by the 123 delegates to the 60th annual convention of the Stereotypers & Electrotypers.

More than 1,700 members of five AFL-CIO unions, including 65 electrotypers have been on strike at the huge book publishing house since Mar. 11.

The walkout, which is primarily against substandard wages, is also, according to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "a strike against management policies which could no longer be tolerated by any self-respecting group of trade unionists." He has urged support by all working men and women because the outcome "will have a profound effect on the future pace of union progress in the South."

Pres. James H. Sampson of Chicago, reported that $30,000 has been contributed voluntarily by local unions. Delegates voted to increase the international's contribution $1,000 a week.

Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer, reported on the picketing of Kingsport Press sales offices in Chicago and the Field Enterprises Educational Corp., whose World Book encyclopedia and Childcraft series are printed by the Tennessee firm.

Publishers in other sections of the country who patronize Kingsport Press will also be picketed, Creamer declared.

The convention adopted a resolution which will allow international officers more elbow-room in dealing with management on automation and technological progress. It will be presented to the membership for approval through referendum.

Merger with other printing trades unions was not discussed, although delegates did hear from Pres. William J. Hall of the Photo Engravers on the merger plans of his union with the unaffiliated Lithographers.

Heller Cites Job Gains As Major Tax Cut Goal

Chicago—Chairman Walter W. Heller of the President's Council of Economic Advisers made a strong appeal for enactment of the Administration's tax cut bill "to put money back into the economy, to help reduce unemployment and speed up economic growth, to provide insurance against a recession in 1964 and stimulate business investment."

Heller, one of the principal speakers as the Allied Industrial Workers opened their 14th convention here, said that tax reduction would be no "cure-all" for the nation's economic ills, but that it would be a major step toward the goals of the Employment Act of 1946—maximum employment, production and purchasing power.

He told the 500 delegates that the tax cut measure, when fully effective, would create two to three million jobs and add $30 billion to $40 billion a year to the nation's output. It is "hogwash," he declared, to suggest that the U.S. "can live" with an unemployment rate of 5.5 percent.

He noted that the rate of joblessness has remained at 5 percent or more for 70 straight months and that only 86 percent of factory production capacity is being utilized.

"Running at full capacity," he said, "we could have an additional $30 billion a year in output."

Among other speakers, Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) called for a joint effort by labor, management and government to solve the problems posed by the spread of automation.

D. Kenneth Clement, president of the National Medical Association, an organization of Negro physicians, urged all-out support for the Administration's proposals for old-age hospital insurance financed through the social security system.

He described the Kerr-Mills Act, which provides federal matching grants to states for medical assistance to the needy aged, as "ridiculous" because of its means test which, he said, shuts out many elderly persons who really need assistance.

In early business, the convention voted to abolish the post of international vice president as an economy measure. The action had been urged by the incumbent, Vice Pres. Bert Backlinger, as the "best thing for the union." He will become an AIW international representative and the vice president's duties will be added to those of the secretary-treasurer.

Mine-Mill Loses Another to USWA

Merritt, B. C.—The Steelworkers drove the Communist-dominated Mine, Mill & Smelter workers from another of their dwindling strongholds by winning a representation election at Craigmont Mines here by a 282-73 vote.

More than 200 employes of the copper producing firm who had belonged to Mine-Mill filed a decertification petition with the British Columbia Labor Relations Board in November 1962, but it was rejected.

Last May the USWA filed a formal petition, signed by nearly 250 of the 370 employes, for recognition as bargaining agent. USWA Local 2952 was certified after the vote.

In the past year the USWA has taken bargaining rights from Mine-Mill for 16,500 Intl. Nickel Co. employes at Sundbury and Port Colborne, Ont., and Thompson, Man. Mine-Mill still represents about 5,000 employes of the Consolidated Mining & Smelter Corp. of Canada at Trail and Kimberly, B. C.

Vermont AFL-CIO Official Dead

St. Albans, Vt.—James R. Cross, financial secretary-treasurer of the Vermont AFL-CIO since merger of the former state AFL and CIO bodies, died in St. Albans Hospital of a heart attack. He was 65.

Until he was stricken he was preparing for the eighth annual convention of the state body.

A founding member of Grain Millers Local 139, now 45 years old, he had been its chief financial officer for 18 years. He served as organized labor's legislative representative in the Vermont legislature, was secretary-treasurer of the St. Albans Central Labor Union, and prior to the merger was a member of the executive council of the former State AFL.

Surviving are two daughters. Funeral services were held in St. Mary's Church of the Immaculate Conception, with burial in Holy Cross Cemetery.

At IWA Convention:

Job-Building Laws Urged by Hartung

Vancouver, B. C.—Legislation that will provide full employment opportunities "for all who are willing and able to work" is a top priority in both the U.S. and Canada, Pres. A. F. Hartung, of the Woodworkers told the union's 23d biennial convention here.

An immediate tax cut for low and middle-income groups, a retraining program, larger unemployment benefits and a redevelopment program all are components of this legislative approach, he told the delegates.

The trade union movement should take under consideration an international strike fund so that the unions could stand up to the giant corporations, he said. Such a fund, based on $2 per month per worker, $1 to the international union and $1 to either the AFL-CIO or the Canadian Labor Congress, would reduce the number of strikes, Hartung said.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther told the convention that full employment and full production is the key to defeating communism. The problem in the U.S., he said, is that the nation has learned to step up production but not how to increase distribution. The core of the problem, he stressed, is under-consumption.

Lost Manhours Cited

Reuther pointed out that more manhours were lost from employment in the past 11 months in the U.S. than from strikes in the 36 years recorded by U.S. Dept of Labor.

Hartung, in his opening address to the convention, declared his belief that the "reactionary right-wing element is the most dangerous organization confronting" the country.

"They have unlimited funds, are well staffed and if they gain power will wreck democratic government as we know it," he declared.

Gould Battery Strike Brings IBEW Boycott

Chicago—The Gould Battery Workers Council of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has voted to launch a "Don't buy" campaign against Gould National Battery, Inc., charging refusal to settle a strike of 1,500 IBEW members at 14 locations in 10 states.

The council, which called a strike in June on the ground that management refused to bargain in good faith and to pay fair wages, has filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board and will post informational pickets at all locations where Gould batteries are sold or distributed, it said.

The firm makes batteries for Montgomery Ward, Standard Oil Co., Western Auto Supply Co. and 60 other companies which sell them under their own brand names. Locations where Gould batteries are made by IBEW members include plants at Denver, Colo.; East Point, Ga.; Chicago Heights, Kankakee and Rock Island, Ill.; Leavenworth, Kan.; Marlboro, Mass.; St. Paul, Minn.; Zanesville, O.; Salem, Ore.; Memphis, Tenn., and Dallas, Tex.

The IBEW, with the approval of Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, said it will station members at all Gould locations to ask consumers not to buy the product. The campaign has been started in 20 major cities.

Barbers Elect DePaola New President of Union

Indianapolis—New officers to head the 73,000-member Barbers Union were elected at the 22nd convention here after six days of intensive debate and revision of the union's constitution.

The union's new president is Joseph DePaola of Meriden, Conn. who defeated Vincent N. Pace of Syracuse, N. Y., by a 59-vote margin of the 913 votes cast. DePaola succeeds William C. Birthright, an AFL-CIO vice president, who did not seek re-election to the post which he had held since 1936.

E. M. Sanders of Dayton, O., was elected secretary-treasurer in a tight contest with Birthright. The president and secretary-treasurer posts were separated in a union referendum vote two years ago. Birthright will become president-emeritus Jan. 1.

The convention elected a 15-man general executive board and revised the union's constitution to give the board new authority, including the power to veto presidential appointments.

The constitutional changes made the secretary-treasurer responsible for all financial and business records and provided that he file all referendums with the executive board.

The convention abolished a 96-cents-a-month assessment for a death benefit program and also adopted a resolution permitting the choice of convention site for the 1968 convention other than Indianapolis.

The new vice presidents, who will be members of the executive board, are: Jack Baker, Portland, Ore.; James Coon, Rochester, Minn.; Mrs. Macel Anderson, Tacoma, Wash.; Charles Whitman, Seattle, Wash.; Del Aleman, New Orleans; Rashea Smith, Logan, W. Va.; Frank Blazina, Cleveland; C. O. Huff, Indianapolis; George Bynum, Chicago; Nelson Cox, Paris, Ont.; Frank Ward, Erie, Pa.; Joseph Pelligra, Paterson, N. J.; Alvin Holt, San Diego, Calif.; Roger Jamison, Kansas City, Kans.; Allen Coleman, Vancouver, B. C.

The new officers will take office Jan. 1, 1964 and serve till the end of 1968.

Automation Group Proposed in House

Automation is creating both abundance and the threat of "vast unemployment, with useless human beings and unwanted hands," Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N. Y.) declared in a recent speech in the House as he introduced a bill "to establish a full-time, working Federal Commission on Automation."

Such a commission, he said, "would bring labor and management together on a continuous basis in planning sessions preparing for automation, seeking solutions to future problems long before the problems reach the crisis stage."

Bus Union Parley Acts:

JobProtectionUrged In Mass Transit Bill

Minneapolis—The Street, Electric Railway & Motor Coach Employes served notice at their convention here that any federal mass transit program must include collective bargaining guarantees and protection for displaced workers.

Delegates voted to oppose a bill now pending in the House unless it is amended to include protective provisions already added in the Senate.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler pledged the federation's support for the union's position.

"You fellows have a right to be dissatisfied in the way mass transit has been handled up to this time," he told the delegates, "and we are as dissatisfied as you are.

"I know how much it means to your organization.

"This is one union, this is one movement—and our interests must be geared to the interest of our members, so I am glad to be in this fight that you are in."

The convention voted to change the name of the organization effective next July 1, to the American Transit Union.

It also re-elected its top officers, including Pres. John M. Elliott, Henry B. Mann, executive vice president, and Sec.-Treas. O. J. Mischo.

The only extended debate came over a proposal to void a constitution clause which requires locals to propose arbitration of unsettled disputes before seeking strike sanction from the international.

The clause came under attack from some delegates who complained that it allows employers to decide whether to arbitrate or force a strike.

However, the convention voted, 277 to 100, to retain the clause after Elliott called it essential to meet "the threat of repressive and punitive legislation."

The convention voted "wholehearted support" of the civil rights movement and called upon Congress to enact a minimum program which would include a public accommodations law, a desegregation compliance plan and use of "federal registrars" to insure equal voting rights.

Delegates also voted to oppose right-wing amendments to the U.S. Constitution which would establish states' rights supremacy over the federal government, as "harmful to the legitimate interests of labor."

It also voted support of:

- A campaign to lower the social security retirement age to 60 and boost the basic benefit to $200 a month.
- A national system of health insurance under social security.
- Reduction of the workweek to 35 hours "through collective bargaining and through amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act."
- A "speedy tax cut" which would lower taxes for low and middle-income families.

R-T-W Group Labeled Front for Big Business

An Indiana congressman has blasted the National Right to Work Committee as "a front for the reactionary segment of big business" and has described the committee's purported "poll" of newspaper editors as "a contrived propaganda gimmick."

Rep. Ray J. Madden (D) took the floor of the House to commend Labor Dept. officials for openly describing "work " laws which ban union shop agreements as "unwise."

The Right-to-Work Committee announced recently that its poll of newspaper editors showed 91 percent of those who responded "agreed" that Labor Dept. officials should not "aid union officialdom in their campaign to destroy" so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Madden noted that some 90 percent of the editors polled did not respond to the questionnaire, which he said was "deliberately devised with loaded questions in a cynical attempt to subvert collective bargaining legislation and turn the clock back to the last century."

The union shop, Madden said, "is accepted and desired by the preponderance of our responsible and forward-thinking leaders of business and industry." It leads, he said, to "responsible" labor relations.

"It is the balance wheel in assuring equality between labor and management when collective bargaining contracts are negotiated," he added.

Madden noted that the National Right-to-Work Committee "is being investigated by the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports of the Dept. of Labor" in connection with "anti-labor activities in Florida."

"It is interesting to note that this alleged poll attacking Pres. Kennedy and the Dept. of Labor has been conducted at the same time that its anti-labor activities are under investigation," he said.

Minton Asks Tax Incentive For New Jobs

Philadelphia—Declaring that the nation's "unusual" unemployment crisis demands an "unusual approach," Pres. Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers has proposed a "subsidy" in the form of a tax incentive to businesses which "create" jobs for the unemployed.

Writing in Glass Horizons, the union's official publication, Minton noted that 3 million new jobs are needed to realize a level of reasonably full employment, plus 1.3 million more jobs a year for new additions to the work force and additional millions for workers displaced by automation.

Yet, he said, there are some 6 million business firms in operation in the United States.

"Why not amend the corporate tax structure to permit these business firms a special tax break or some other form of subsidy for each job they can show was specially created to make work for an unemployed American?" he asked.

To any charges that the plan would amount to "featherbedding," Minton responded that the quick stimulus the program would give to the economy would soon pose a real need for the added workers.

NEARLY 600 POSTAL CARDS opposing so-called "quality stabilization" legislation were mailed from this write-in station set up at the Papermakers & Paperworkers convention in Miami. A convention resolution denounced the stabilization bill as a "price-fixing scheme" which will raise prices and cut the buying power of wages. Helping to launch the UPP's letter-writing campaign are, left to right, Mrs. Delmar Mason, Dayton, O., and Mrs. Richard Cabage, Peoria, Ill., wives of delegates, and two delegates from Houston, Tex., Mrs. Laurlie Weatherly and Mrs. Lois Hill.

Papermakers Re-elect Officers; Hear Printing Unions Merger Plea

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Papermakers & Paperworkers triennial convention here reelected top officers and adopted a program calling for a buildup of the union's organizing, bargaining and political muscle.

Pres. Paul L. Phillips, who has headed the 140,000-member union since it was formed six years ago by the merger of former AFL and CIO affiliates, was unanimously elected to a third term.

Returned to office with him were the UPP's three other administrative officers—Executive Vice Pres. Harry D. Sayre, Sec.-Treas. Al E. Brown and Gen. Vice Pres. Robert A. Bergeron.

Sayre defeated Patrick W. Harte, director of the union's New York State region, in the only contest.

In a closing demonstration of solidarity, delegates who had been members of rival caucuses which functioned during the convention publicly discarded caucus buttons.

The UPP, which has participated with other unions in the printing and paper industries in merger discussions, heard a strong plea from a Printing Pressmen's spokesman for the early establishment of "one great paper trades and graphic arts international union."

Vice Pres. Walter Turner of the Pressmen termed the two unions "blood brothers" dealing with many of the same employers and facing the same problems, including the trend towards domination of the industry by a few big employers.

There are "problems" in merger, he acknowledged, "but men of good will can work them out—and in a reasonably short period of time."

The convention also heard a telegraphed message from Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union, who described merger of printing and paper unions as a "necessity."

A spokesman for a third union—Vice Pres. S. A. Stevens of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers, expressed the belief that any steps towards organic merger should be taken cautiously and "start from the bottom up." He suggested that committees from the two unions consider a two-year trial period of working more closely together before submitting a merger proposal for ratification.

Two AFL-CIO department heads—Organization Dir. John Livingston and COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan—were among the speakers.

Livingston stressed to the 1,200 delegates that "we need the unorganized workers and they need us" in order to protect and continue gains won through collective bargaining.

Barkan warned that anti-union legislation "going far beyond" the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin laws has been introduced in Congress and that employers are switching their drive to bust unions to the legislative and political field.

Calling on the delegates to "give your membership leadership," Barkan warned that labor "can't wait until October 1964" to prepare for the next national elections.

The convention reaffirmed the union's opposition to any form of racial discrimination in hiring and promotion and pledged to seek equal opportunity goals through collective bargaining.

In district caucuses, delegates reelected eight regional directors, who also serve as vice presidents: Harte, Frederick J. Rochford, Mark Fisher, Herbert G. Schwenker, Nicholas C. Vrataric, Joseph T. Hyrczyk, Oscar Robertson and J. Arthur D'Aoust.

New directors elected were John Stratton, Arnold Brown, William Franks and Arthur E. Pinton.

Also re-elected were two vice presidents at large, George H. O'Bea and Canadian Vice Pres. J. S. Lambert.

Hotel Employes Join Applause for Barkan

Miami Beach—COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan had a bigger audience than he realized when he addressed the Papermakers & Paperworkers convention here.

Barkan got a rousing ovation from the 1,200 delegates after he warned of the threat of union-busting legislation and called for an all-out drive to elect friends of labor to Congress.

Out of sight, but within hearing range, was a group of cooks and kitchen helpers preparing the convention banquet. Several dashed into the hall to add their enthusiastic applause to that of the delegates.

Send 'Best' U.S. Talent, Performers' Unions Ask

Unions representing the performing arts have called on the United States to send more of its best musical and theatrical talent on overseas cultural exchange missions.

Pres. Herman D. Kenin and Sec. Stanley Ballard of the Musicians compared the $2.5 million U.S. budget for cultural programs with vastly greater amounts spent by other nations, including the Soviet Union.

Ballard told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that America's image abroad is "blurred" for lack of dollars to present the nation's "best effort and best talent."

Angus Duncan, executive secretary of Actors Equity, told the subcommittee that the American stage has produced "some of the world's finest playwrights, actors and directors."

Too little use has been made of this talent, he declared, "to overcome the widespread notion of America as a 'cultural desert' and the American as a cross between Mencken's 'boob' and Sinclair Lewis' Babbitt."

Both unions rapped the policy of sending amateur college groups rather than professionals on overseas missions.

Duncan compared it to "sending our best sandlot club while ignoring the big leaguers."

The result, he said, is that "unprepared students were thrust upon stage in some of the major cities and prominent theaters of the world to face audiences that expected the best of American theater."

"It was unfair to do this to the students, to the audience . . ." he said. "Most distressing, such practices furthered the myth that American theater arts rest not upon serious artists but upon charming but wholly inexperienced and incomplete performers."

The Foreign Affairs subcommittee, headed by Rep. Dante B. Fascell (D-Fla.), has been holding hearings on the U.S. ideological offensive in the cold war.

President Rallies Support:

Appeal for Tax Cut Stresses Job Needs

(Continued from Page 1)

employment and to provide the new jobs needed for a growing work force and an automated economy.

He placed the need at 10,000 new jobs a day—10 million new jobs in the next two-and-a-half years.

"We cannot effectively solve the problems of racial injustice as long as unemployment is high," the President warned.

"We cannot effectively attack the problem of teen-age crime and delinquency as long as so many of our young people are out of work.

"We cannot tackle the problem of automation when we are losing 1 million jobs every year to machines."

The President appealed to those who live in prosperity to consider the plight of those who "live in depression."

While the nation gets "excited" about a labor dispute idling thousands of workers, Kennedy said, "our loss from excessive unemployment in recent years has been 20 times as great as our loss from strikes."

Kennedy noted that there were 45 months of upturn between the first and second postwar recessions, 35 months between the second and third, and 25 months between the third and fourth. He added:

"We have now had 31 months of steady upturn. I would like to see us skip a recession.

'Insurance for Prosperity'

"I would like to see us release $11 billion of after-tax purchasing power into the private economy before another downturn can begin. That is why this bill is insurance for prosperity and insurance against recession."

In his broadcast to the nation and in a letter to House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), Kennedy pictured the tax cut as an alternative to large-scale government expenditures designed primarily to pump money into the economy.

He rejected the condition set by the Republicans for support of a tax reduction—trimming the present $98 billion federal budget by $1 billion next year—but promised that "no wasteful, inefficient or unnecessary government activity will be tolerated."

Full Employment the Key

The path to a balanced budget, Kennedy emphasized, is a "full-employment economy."

The Administration bill would provide a $5.6 billion cut in individual income taxes and a $1.4 billion cut in corporate taxes in 1964, with an additional $3.1 billion income tax reduction and $900 million corporate cut the following year.

Putting the reduction in personal terms to his nationwide audience, Kennedy said this would cut taxes of a $90-a-week worker with three dependents by one-third, give a 25 percent cut to a similar family making $6,000 a year and a 20 percent tax saving to an $8,000 a year family.

As they spend their extra take-home pay, Kennedy said:

"The businesses which serve them need to hire more men and women. The men and women who are hired have more money to spend. The companies who sell these items have more incentive to invest, to improve and to expand their operation. More young people out of school can find work, and the danger of recession then becomes less."

MASSIVE REGISTRATION and voting by union members are vital to counter the money and manpower of big business and provide the key to liberal victories in 1964, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the Big Cities Conference of the Committee on Political Education. COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan is in foreground.

COPE Vote Drive Pushed By Meany

(Continued from Page 1)

showing the gap in voting performance between city dwellers and rural and other non-urban residents.

In 1960 in New York, he said, 18 percent less of the total number of urban citizens eligible to vote turned out than in non-metropolitan areas of the state; in Missouri the figure was 15 percent; Ohio, 11 percent; Wisconsin, 9 percent; Illinois and Minnesota, 7 percent; Michigan, 6 percent; California, 5 percent.

This lag in performance, Harris said, "costs hundreds of thousands of votes for liberal candidates."

Other speakers were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; James McGregor Burns, professor of political science; Roy Reuther, citizenship director of the Auto Workers; Dir. Richard Scammon of the U.S. Census Bureau; Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.); Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.); Lawrence O'Brien, special assistant to Pres. Kennedy.

Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, who had just returned from his tour of Scandinavian countries, spoke briefly to the delegates, commending COPE for its nonpartisan voter registration campaigns. He also had high praise for trade unions generally for supporting and cooperating with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, which he heads.

Climaxing the three-day COPE sessions was a visit to the White House, where Pres. Kennedy greeted the delegates and lauded labor's "impressive record" of support for social welfare legislation, which he said had built a "solid framework" to bolster the nation's economy in times of stress.

9-21-63

Strong U.S. Controls Urged in Air Pollution

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to strengthen the federal air pollution control program to protect "the health and safety of the American people."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Public Works subcommittee that strong federal action is necessary because only four states presently have effective regulation of air pollution.

The result of past reliance on state and community action, he said, has been "blight" and "respiratory disease" in cities and "large-scale damage to livestock, crops, timber and recreational areas."

Air pollution, he declared, "is a problem that will not stay confined within artificial boundaries. Air moves, just as water flows, with a fine contempt for man-made boundaries."

Biemiller and other witnesses urged stronger legislation than a House-passed bill which limits federal action to instances where such aid is requested by the governor of the state in which the pollution originates.

Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), sponsor of the Administration bill, told the subcommittee that the nation narrowly escaped a major disaster last winter when, for nearly four days, a mass of dirty and poisoned air hovered over several eastern cities. That same mass of air, he said, later showed up in England and contributed to the death of 750 persons in London.

Ribicoff, a former secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, branded as "sophistry" the argument that federal pollution control threatens "states rights."

Biemiller urged the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), to bring out a strengthened bill which would increase federal grants-in-aid to support state air pollution control programs and which would direct the federal government to develop a nationwide standard of air quality.

He warned that the steady rise in the number of automobiles "means an inevitable increase in threats to health by additional release of exhaust fumes."

Mayor Richard J. Daley of Chicago, speaking for the U.S. Conference of Mayors, supported strong federal legislation and said the only way to see clear sky over an American city is to go up in an airplane.

Fallout Shelter Program Wins House Passage

The House approved a $190 million community fallout shelter program which had been urged by the Administration and strongly supported by the AFL-CIO.

Rep. F. Edward Hebert (D-La.), chairman of the Armed Services subcommittee, told the House that testimony by 108 witnesses during nine weeks of hearings had convinced him the program deserved support.

"I don't know whether it will save a single life," he declared, "but I am not going to play God and make a judgment that affects the chances for existence of millions of Americans."

Eloquent pleas for support came also from Rep. Carl Vinson (D-Ga.), influential chairman of the parent Armed Services Committee, and Speaker John W. McCormack (Mass.), who took the floor for a rare personal appeal for passage of the bill.

The bill, passed intact, authorized $175 million in federal "incentive grants" to help build shelters in schools, hospitals and other public buildings and non-profit institutions, plus $15.6 million for construction and stocking of shelters in federal buildings.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, one of the witnesses who supported the bill before the subcommittee, declared that fallout shelters "can save more lives than would any other feasible protection against nuclear attack."

Attempts to delete the $175 million federal grant program were decisively rejected by 137-50 and 172-67 margins before the bill was passed by voice vote.

Wealthy Still Control Bulk of Stock Shares

The number of stockholders has doubled in the past 10 years but one-tenth of 1 percent of America's tax-paying population still owns nearly 20 percent of all the shares in the country, a new study has disclosed.

The sharp rise in small investors has overshadowed the concentrated ownership and control of the nation's corporations, the study shows. Persons with incomes of over $25,000 a year still own 48 percent of all shares.

The contrast is underscored in the study, "Characteristics of Stock Ownership," by Jean Crockett and Irwin Friend of the University of Pennsylvania, thusly:

All 101,000 of the monthly investment plans of the nation's stock exchanges, set up to encourage small purchases of corporate stocks, hold 6.6 million shares worth $270 million, yet one individual, J. Paul Getty, president of the Getty Oil Co., alone controls 12,570,939 shares of that company worth more than $300 million.

The New York Times story on the report was headlined "Multi-millionaire Stockholders Still Rule Big Business." The story said "the ranks of the millionaire capitalist remains a glowing powerful force behind the affairs of many of the nation's corporations."

Small Purchasers

The recent emphasis on the small stock purchaser, the Times wrote, "has cloaked the importance of established millionaires with great holdings in well-established 'blue chip' corporations, and of new millionaires with substantial ownership in rapidly growing newer enterprises."

The study notes that while the number of shareowners has grown sharply in the last decade, the distribution of income has remained essentially the same. It cites Dept. of Commerce figures showing that the 5 percent of the population with the largest income in 1955 received 20.3 percent of total income. Six years later this same 5 percent earned 19.6 percent of total income.

The Times story lists a number of major capitalists and their share ownings in addition to Getty and his estimated fortune of more than $1 billion.

Stone Workers Win 3 Election Contests

Barre, Vt.—Employes of three plants in Tennessee, Florida and Georgia have voted for the Stone Workers in representation elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

At the Floridin Co., Quincy, Fla., the vote was 65 for the union, 53 against, and at the Milwhite Co., Attapulgus, Ga., by a 12-1 margin. The other victory was at the John A. Denies panel plant, Memphis, Tenn.

Pensions in Canada Up to $75 in October

Ottawa, Ont.—The Liberal government has agreed, under pressure, to increase the old age pension from $65 to $75 monthly at age 70 in October.

The boost is contingent upon action by Parliament, where approval is taken for granted because both the New Democrats and the Conservatives have been clamoring for such an increase.

Auto, Steel Layoffs Dim Job Picture

(Continued from Page 1)

all through the year and has exceeded 5 percent for the past six years.

Comparing the August rates of unemployment with those of August 1957, the department found that current joblessness is "more heavily concentrated among women and teen-agers than at any other time since before the 1958 recession."

Adult men accounted for 46 percent of the 4 million unemployed in 1963; they were 52 percent of the 2.8 million jobless in August 1957. A comparison shows that the unemployment rate for teen-agers was 10.7 percent in August 1957 and 14.1 percent in August 1963; for women 4 percent in 1957 and 5.7 percent in 1963.

The unemployment rate for married men was 3 percent in August 1963 compared to 2.7 percent six years earlier.

Radiation Safety Standards Held Up

The effective date for radiation safety and health standards tentatively set up under the Walsh-Healey Act has been postponed by the Labor Dept. from Sept. 8, 1963, to Jan. 6, 1964, largely because of AFL-CIO protests.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Sept. 28, 1963 | No. 39

$11.1 Billion Cut in Taxes Voted by House, 271-155

Test Ban Approved By Senate

The Senate approved the nuclear test ban treaty with votes to spare after decisively rejecting all efforts to attach reservations or conditions to the U.S.-British-Soviet pact to refrain from nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere, underwater and in outer space.

The bipartisan 80-19 vote—14 more than the required two-thirds—was hailed by Pres. Kennedy as "highly satisfactory" and a step toward the "path of peace." Approval of the treaty had been urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and by Pres. George Meany in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.), the only absentee, sent word from his hospital bed that he, too, would have voted for the treaty had he been able to be present.

Party Lines Crossed

Both support and opposition crossed party lines. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.), Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) led the fight for approval. Opposition leaders included Democrats Richard B. Russell (Ga.), Russell B. Long (La.) and John Stennis (Miss.), and Republicans Barry Goldwater (Ariz.) and John G. Tower (Tex.).

Goldwater's proposal to make the treaty conditional on verified withdrawal of all Soviet troops and equipment from Cuba was rejected 75-17. The closest vote was the 61-33 defeat of a proposal by Long and Tower asserting the right to use nuclear weapons in time of war. The State Dept. had already assured Con-

(Continued on Page 4)

SPANISH-SPEAKING children in Arizona learned the meaning of 400 basic English words in classes sponsored by the State AFL-CIO and two other groups. Pictured are boys and girls at Wesley Community Center, Phoenix, with their volunteer teacher, Kathrin Gill of the Phoenix public school system. After six weeks of summer classes, the youngsters entered the first grade better equipped to understand lessons in the formerly unfamiliar tongue. (See story on Page 2)

Work With Unions:

Meany to Industry—Aid Latin Progress

Chicago—American business firms, as well as unions, can help strengthen democracy in Latin America and other developing areas of the world, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a blue ribbon audience of businessmen here.

In a speech to the Chicago Executives' Club, he made it clear that U.S. labor supports and considers itself a part of the private enterprise system. But he stressed:

"We cannot just say 'private enterprise' and let it go at that. The system has to work for the benefit of the people as a whole. In Latin America, as elsewhere, this means that the owners of business and industry have to learn to recognize unions, to bargain collectively and to accept the right of workers to strike.

"A private enterprise economy in which only the rich get richer is inviting a Communist takeover."

Meany commented favorably on a recent proposal by David Rockefeller, president of the Chase Manhattan Bank, for a privately-financed business counterpart of the Peace Corps which would provide management specialists to assist developing nations which request them.

Meany said that if such a group of business experts could teach the importance of raising the standard of living of workers, "as well as industrial techniques," it would be "a telling blow in the cause of freedom."

Grace Praised

American labor's active international role—on which the AFL-CIO spends some 25 percent of its income—is motivated both by "a spirit of brotherhood" and "enlightened self-interest," Meany declared.

"If democracy is destroyed any place in the world," he said, "that very fact represents a continued menace to the preservation of democracy here in the United States."

The AFL-CIO president praised businessmen such as J. Peter Grace

(Continued on Page 12)

House Panel Adds FEP To Civil Rights Measure

A House Judiciary subcommittee has reached tentative agreement on a broad-ranging civil rights bill—including a ban on job discrimination long urged by the AFL-CIO.

It includes, in addition to the fair employment provision:

- A public accommodations law prohibiting discrimination in hotels, stores, theaters, restaurants and other establishments serving the general public.
- Authority for the Justice Dept. to initiate suits challenging all forms of denial of civil rights.
- A voting rights section, covering state as well as federal elections, which makes a sixth grade education a presumption of literacy for voting eligibility.
- Authority for a census to determine the extent of racial discrimination in voting.

The subcommittee draft was termed "exceedingly strong" by its chief sponsor, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of both the subcommittee and the full Judiciary Committee.

The committee's ranking Republican member, Rep. William M.

(Continued on Page 4)

Trustees Find Social Security Funds 'Sound'

The social security trust funds that paid benefits to about 18.5 million Americans at a monthly rate of $1.3 billion in mid 1963 are financially "sound", the trustees have reported.

Treasury Sec. C. Douglas Dillon, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze told the nation that the funds are in close acturial balance.

The schedule of contribution rates now in the law "is estimated to produce adequate income to pay the benefits now provided in the law to all present and future beneficiaries, and to pay the administrative expenses of the program, without any subsidy from the general funds of the Treasury."

Noting that the economic security of millions of Americans depends in part on the continuing financial soundness of the program, Dillon, managing trustee, said the report could be compared to one that a board of directors of a corporation might make to its stockholders.

The new report is a summary of an earlier detailed accounting made to Congress this year in accord with the Social Security Act. Free copies of the report, "The Status of the Social Security Trust Funds," are available upon request from local social security district offices.

The report by the three cabinet officers notes that 9 out of 10 of the nation's workers are covered by

(Continued on Page 12)

GOP Loses Bid to Curb '64 Budget

The House voted to cut federal taxes $11.1 billion in order to stimulate business, create new jobs and—in Pres. Kennedy's words—enable the United States to "skip a recession."

The two-stage tax cut bill, if approved by the Senate, would give the average union member the equivalent of a 7.5-cent hourly raise in take-home pay. It would remove 1.5 million persons—those with the lowest income—from the tax rolls.

In the key vote, the Administration beat back a Republican attempt to impose federal spending ceilings as a condition for the tax cut. After this 226-199 victory, the tax bill then sailed to final passage, 271-155.

On the eve of the tax debate, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote House members that a curb on federal spending "would totally nullify the beneficial effects of the tax bill by withdrawing from the economy the jobs federal expenditures create."

Terming tax cut legislation the "key economic issue" before Congress, Meany said the money freed for purchasing power and business investment could, "within a reasonable period, put millions of unemployed Americans back to work."

To win conservative Democratic support necessary to beat back the solid Republican lineup for a rigid spending curb, Kennedy told House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) that the Administration agreed that the alternative to a tax cut would be stepped-up government spending

(Continued on Page 12)

IUE Agrees To New Pact For GE Plants

New York—The General Electric Conference Board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has recommended a new three-year contract providing wage increases, improved fringe benefits and better working conditions for 70,000 GE employes.

The board, comprised of 100 delegates from 70 IUE local unions at GE plant locations, approved the agreement after hearing a report on negotiations from the union's 10-man bargaining committee. The committee has resumed meetings with GE management to draw up actual contract language. Details of the agreement were withheld pending action by

(Continued on Page 2)

FOURTEEN-YEAR CAMPAIGN for federal aid to medical education is climaxed by this White House signing ceremony. Pens used to sign the bill are given by Pres. Kennedy to witnesses who helped steer the measure to passage. Left to right: Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R. I.), AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), Rep. Seymour Halpern (R-N. Y.), Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson (in background), and Boisfeuillet Jones of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. Pepper, then a senator, and Biemiller, then a congressman from Wisconsin, were co-sponsors with the late Sen. Robert A. Taft (R-O.) of the first medical education bill in 1950.

Labor Dept. Study Shows:

Incomes of Jobless 40% Below Average

The sharp impact of unemployment on income and purchasing power has been spelled out in a new Labor Dept. study disclosing that the average income of workers unemployed during 1961 was 40 percent below the average of fully employed jobholders.

There were 15.1 million persons who had some unemployment during 1961, the study disclosed. Excluding the 5.5 million unemployed for less than five weeks, those under 18 and those who had little or no work experience, the 9.6 million left had an average income of $2,300 for the year.

The average for all other persons who had some work experience during the year was $3,700, the study showed.

About 80 percent of the income received by the unemployed came from their own wages and salaries; 12 percent came from unemployment insurance and the rest from welfare and pension programs set up through legislation or contracts.

Unemployed persons covered by the study averaged about $70 a week when they were working while full-time workers averaged about $95, indicating that the jobless, even when working, earned less.

The duration of unemployment had a marked effect on sources of income, the study showed. Of the total group covered in the study, 95.4 percent received wages or salaries. But those unemployed six months or more had a total of only 88.3 percent in wages or salaries.

Public assistance went to 4.6 percent of the overall group but to 7.5 percent of the long-term unemployed. Unemployment insurance went to 56.6 percent of the total group and 58.2 percent of the long-term jobless.

The average income of those unemployed a half-year or more was $1,443, of which $831 came from unemployment insurance. The average income of those jobless for five to 26 weeks was $2,607, of which $38 came from insurance benefits.

"Some measure of the financial hardship of unemployment," the study said, is found from a review of methods used to meet living expenses. In a high proportion of families withdrawal of savings, borrowing of money, turning to friends or relatives were methods used to meet living needs. The most usual was use of savings, with almost half the families resorting to this means of meeting expenses. One-quarter of the families borrowed money.

Labor-Backed Classes Aid Arizona Youngsters

Phoenix—Joining efforts to meet a community need, the Arizona AFL-CIO helped sponsor four summer classes for Spanish-speaking children who did not know enough English to enter the first grade successfully this year.

The results were so beneficial that the state body will keep an eye on the progress of the young students, and will petition the legislature to make pre-school training in English a regular part of the public school curriculum, as Texas schools have recently done.

"Sponsors were needed, so we volunteered," said state officers headed by Pres. Fred D. Rhodes and Sec.-Treas. John E. Evans. "The results were highly satisfactory."

The need for prior training in English was highlighted by the failure of 70 first graders last year in classes at nearby Eloy, Ariz. Four centers were secured and volunteer teachers agreed to conduct "Little 400" schools offering instruction on a vocabulary of 400 English words.

Eighty children showed up on opening day in Phoenix, Eloy and Miranda, cleanly scrubbed and neatly dressed. Most of them could speak no English. When the summer ended, boys and girls could stand up and say their own names, greet a visitor with "good morning," conduct a short conversation and correctly identify household objects and use familiar words like cold, drink, sweet, milk and cookies.

For some of the children, snacks served in class represented the breakfast they had not had before leaving home or lunch they would not have, perhaps because of poverty, according to a report on the project in the Arizona Labor Journal.

Airline Strike Dates Set by Machinists

Refusal of airline managements to offer counterproposals on seven contract proposals of the Machinists has brought strike authorizations at United and Trans World Airlines and votes seeking such authorization at Eastern, National, Northwest, Braniff and Continental airlines.

The union has set Oct. 10 as the strike deadline at United, where negotiations on a new contract began more than 16 months ago. No strike date has been set at TWA but members voted by an overwhelming margin to authorize a walkout if necessary to achieve a settlement.

IAM Airlines Coordinator Frank Heisler said the union has rejected an arbitration proposal made by the National Mediation Board following the collapse of its mediation efforts after many weeks of IAM attempts to negotiate an agreement.

Announcement by IAM Vice Pres. George Watkins that the union had rejected arbitration put into effect a 30-day "status quo" period under the law governing airline negotiations.

The union, representing 30,000 mechanics and ground service workers, is asking improvements in wages, vacations, paid holidays, health and welfare, severance pay provisions, overtime pay and shift differentials.

Negotiations with Northeast Air Lines were recessed pending the appeal of a decision by the Civil Aeronautics Board to terminate Northeast's Florida service.

IUE Agrees to GE Pact, Raps Bargaining Tactics

(Continued from Page 1)

union members in GE plants.

With the current contract scheduled to expire Sept. 30, negotiators for IUE and management began preliminary discussions in May and formal negotiations in August. The company then offered to improve wages, pension plans, holiday pay, medical protection, sickness and accident benefits, vacations and layoff protection,

The offer included a pay hike of 7 cents an hour, effective Sept. 23, and another 7-cent boost in April 1965. It called for three weeks' vacation after 10 years instead of the former 15 years and for four weeks after 20 years, instead of 25.

GE offered to increase holiday pay from double time, the former provision, to 2.5 times the regular hourly rate. Its offer also set up an accelerated plan for re-accumulating layoff benefits during the layoff and afterwards. Company proposals on pensions, vacations and insurance were predicated on a five-year term.

The union counterproposal, presented by IUE Pres. James B. Carey, was for a three-year contract with wage hikes of 2.5 percent each year; a wage adjustment clause tied to future cost-of-living data, and continuance of contract language on grievances and arbitration, including establishment of a permanent panel of arbitrators.

Conference board members were in general agreement that, while terms of the new pact contain a number of important improvements that the IUE has been advocating for years, "they are still seriously inadequate in the light of current conditions."

Shortly before the bargaining talks reached their climax the IUE filed unfair labor practice charges against management for processing by the National Labor Relations Board. Two other unions followed with charges of their own—the Auto Workers and the Steelworkers, who represent some 7,000 additional GE workers.

Similar charges were made by the IUE after a strike that followed negotiations in 1960. The union asserted that GE practices a take it-or-leave-it bargaining technique under which management makes a "package" offer, attempts to bypass union bargainers by going directly to the members with it, and then refuses any changes. NLRB Trial Examiner Arthur Leff upheld the charges, which have not yet reached the board for decision.

Equality Guidelines Set For Building Trainees

Detailed guidelines for local joint apprenticeship committees based on standards of equal employment opportunity have been issued by labor and management in the building and construction industry.

The Joint Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity of the Construction Industry Joint Conference issued the recommended apprenticeship standards and procedures to provide more detailed advice to unions and contractors on meeting equal employment objectives.

The joint conference is made up of major national contractors and the 18 unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. In August the conference issued a statement urging all apprenticeship committees to review their qualifications and standards, current lists and appeal procedures.

The guidelines suggested to carry out the objectives of the program include:

- Selection of apprentices should be made on the basis of qualification alone without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.
- Qualification standards may include age, education, physical ability, aptitude tests. "Qualities such as interest, character, cooperativeness, judgment and similar factors which promise successful completion of the individual's apprenticeship and performance as a journeyman can only be satisfactorily determined in a fair and impartial interview."
- Application lists should be reviewed to determine if they meet the standards of non-discrimination. If not, a new list should be drawn up and notice periodically furnished the school systems.
- An appeals procedure for "an applicant who is aggrieved by the administration of the apprentice selection process," preferably an appeals board made up of representatives of labor, management and "a public person" to decide the merits of the complaint.

Panel Appointed In FEC Strike

Pres. Kennedy has set up a panel to investigate the Florida East Coast Railway strike, evaluate its impact on defense programs, and make settlement recommendations.

The company's 1,200 non-operating employes struck last January. They are seeking the pattern 10-cent increase agreed to last year by all other railroads.

Assistant Labor Sec. James Reynolds will head the panel. Other members are Stephen N. Shulman of the Defense Dept. and Walter L. Lingle, Jr., of the National Aeronautics & Space Administration.

Union Catches Proctor Firm, Wins Election

Mt. Airy, N. C.—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have caught up with a runaway plant, the Proctor Electric Co., whose workers here voted for IUE representation, 292-250.

The IUE represented Proctor workers at Philadelphia from 1949 until new management moved operations to North Carolina and Puerto Rico during a strike. In 1957, during another walkout at Baltimore, Proctor hired strikebreakers, and the union was ousted in a decertification election in which the strikers were denied the vote.

The firm's hostile tactics led the union to launch a nationwide "Don't Buy Proctor" drive.

Since then the IUE has carried on three organizing campaigns at the Proctor plant here. The firm's reaction, the union observed, was "illegal but hardly unexpected." It fired 15 members of the organizing committee, and the union filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

Three days after the IUE's winning vote, 350 employes and members of their families held a victory party at the Mt. Airy National Guard Armory. The election campaign was headed by IUE Rep. Carlton Hooks, assisted by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

31 Fired Illegally:

'Runaway' Firm Told to Bargain

The refusal of the Blades Manufacturing Corp. of St. Louis, to bargain with a union that won an election at its new runaway plant in Arkansas was an unfair labor practice and so was the firing of 31 workers who called "quickie" walkouts in protest, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Reversing Trial Examiner Thomas F. Maher, the board upheld the IAM in its three-year battle with the airplane parts maker. A three-member panel—Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown—ordered the runaway firm to:

- Reinstate the 31 employes fired in 1962; give them their former or substantially equivalent positions "without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges," and make them whole for any earnings loss.
- Stop refusing to bargain with the IAM, which was certified after winning a second NLRB election in 1961.
- Revoke a group life and hospitalization plan, put into effect without consulting with the IAM, and return to the former status if the union so desires.
- Entertain grievances filed by IAM members, and stop interfering with the union or trying to discourage union membership.

The union's struggle with Blades came to a head in 1960 when the firm — then Selb & Blades, a unit of Western, Inc.—claimed some work for airframe and missile firms could not be performed at St. Louis and moved machines and work to new plants in Rector and Walnut Ridge, Ark., and Denver, Colo.

An arbitrator ordered Blades to reinstate 167 laid-off St. Louis workers with more than $190,000 in lost wages for violating a contract clause prohibiting the farming-out of work, and a U.S. District Court upheld the arbiter after Blades refused to comply.

Next the union petitioned for an election at the new Rector plant, lost it by six votes on Jan. 20, 1961, and won a second election when the first one was quashed because of company interference.

It was the second election that the firm refused to recognize, and the trial examiner said the company was right and the NLRB regional director and the labor board wrong.

The latest board ruling was that the results of the first election were "properly set aside" and the second vote was a valid one. The company, by its "admitted refusal" to honor certification of the IAM and to bargain with it on and after Oct. 25, 1961, broke the law, the board found.

As to the "quickie" strikes, the NLRB said each walkout "was precipitated by, and was in protest against, a separate unlawful act" of the management—the refusal to recognize the right of the union to represent employes in processing grievances. Each strike, therefore, "was a separate, protected concerted activity," the board ruled. It added:

"The conduct engaged in by the respondent here was a flagrant disregard of the rights of its employes and of the union as their exclusive bargaining representative.

"The strike activity of the employes was not in violation of any law. It was at all time peaceful. The strikes were provoked by the respondent's unfair labor practices."

The strikers' discharge was not for cause, the board added.

ARBITRATION PANEL in the railroad work rules dispute begins formal hearings in Washington, D. C. Seated are the three public members, Benjamin Aaron, Chairman Ralph T. Seward and James J. Healy. Standing are Vice Pres. R. H. McDonald of the Trainmen, Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and the two management members, J. E. Wolfe and Guy W. Knight.

Labor Board Role in Grievances Opposed in AFL-CIO Court Brief

The AFL-CIO has asked a federal court to keep the National Labor Relations Board from involvement in grievances—real or fancied—which have no relation to a workers' membership or non-membership in a union.

In a brief filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals in New York, AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris protested a board decision against the Miranda Fuel Co. and a local of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The labor board, in a 3-2 decision, upheld the complaint of an employe that he was improperly dropped to the bottom of the seniority list under a union interpretation of a leave of absence clause in the contract.

The two dissenting members — Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and John H. Fanning—stressed that there was no evidence that the action, whether or not justified, was motivated by considerations of the employe's union activities.

Harris told the court that the AFL-CIO's position was that a union has "a duty to represent all employes in the bargaining unit fairly and impartially" and that this obligation has been and can be enforced in the courts but not by the NLRB unless it involves an unfair labor practice.

Both the AFL-CIO and the American Civil Liberties Union—which filed a brief supporting the NLRB's jurisdiction — recognized that the principles involved could apply to questions of racial discrimination in employment, even though there was no race issue in the case before the court.

For this reason, the ACLU said, the court should uphold the right and duty of the NLRB to assure that unions represent employes without discrimination.

Racial Argument Cited

The AFL-CIO brief acknowledged that "probably the most appealing argument for sustaining labor board jurisdiction in cases of unfair representation is that it will enable a federal agency to proceed against racial discrimination in employment."

The brief pointed out that "the AFL-CIO has for years been asking Congress for effective legislation to guarantee Negroes fair employment opportunities."

Noting that the "key to racial discrimination" is the attitude of the employer, the brief emphasized that NLRB administrative action "would bring pressure to bear primarily at one point, and that the wrong one."

In fact, it said, it would enable an employer to argue truthfully that if the white majority of workers voted to keep a union out, there would be no change in race discrimination policies as a result of NLRB action.

Even if "well-intentioned," the AFL-CIO contended, "in the long run more harm than good would come from twisting the National Labor Relations Act so as to commit to the federal labor board a task far different from the specific role assigned it by Congress."

If the NLRB were to "embark on the vast undertaking of trying to police the substantive bargaining arrangements of the nation's unions and employers," the brief pointed out, the board would be so "flooded" with cases involving employes' "individual" rights as contrasted with "collective rights" that it could not cope with the workload.

As examples, the AFL-CIO noted:

Examples Given

"The board would have to decide whether a wage scale was based on a reasonable differential in employe skills, or on the numerical strength or influence of a particular group of employes within the union. It would have to decide whether a given grievance was not carried to arbitration because the union had a bona fide belief it was not meritorious, or because the complaining employe possessed an abrasive personality which had aroused the enmity of his fellow workers."

President Lauds Labor For 'Impressive' Record

Pres. Kennedy, in welcoming the delegates to the recent Big Cities Conference of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, called attention to labor's accomplishments over the past 30 years as evidence of what it can do for the nation now and in the future.

"This country is very strong" and "on the whole, rich," despite "serious islands of real poverty," the President said at a White House rose garden meeting with the group, which was led by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan. The text of the President's remarks was later released by the White House.

Kennedy noted that the 18 years since World War II had been free of the "tragedy which we experienced 10 years after the first war and, indeed, in the early years, 1921 and 1922."

He suggested that the most important explanation of this lay in the "solid framework of legislation established in the Thirties which has put a platform under the lives of most Americans, whether it is minimum wage or social security or unemployment compensation or housing, urban renewal, protection of the bank deposits, all the rest."

"We have really proceeded through 18 years of an extraordinary economic story," the President continued. "And what we have done at home, I think, we have done even more significantly abroad. And the AFL-CIO has strongly supported those domestic measures and those great international measures which will not affect just labor and labor issues, but . . . the well-being and the security of the United States through NATO, the Marshall Plan, Point IV, the Alliance for Progress, our efforts in disarmament, our efforts to keep this country strong.

"I think that is an impressive record. I think that is an extraordinary story.

"Our job, it seems to me, in the 1960s, is to build upon that past, and that we are trying to do. It may sometimes seem that our progress is imperceptible, but I am hopeful that after sufficient time has passed . . . we can look back on these years in which we took important steps at home and abroad to match, at least in some ways, what was done before.

"That is our effort—to try to provide in the national arena, in those areas where governmental policies are affected, to try to arrange and develop policies which will maintain our economic momentum, the thrust of our growth, which will deal with the problems of chronic unemployment, which will deal with the problems of the chronic business cycle, which will provide equality of opportunity for all Americans.

"That is what we are attempting to do, and I think with your help and the help of other responsible and interested citizens, we can do a good deal of it."

Aerospace Parley Set by IAM-UAW

Los Angeles—More than 300 representatives of the Machinists and the Auto Workers will meet here Oct. 2-4 for the third joint IAM-UAW aerospace conference.

The conference call was issued by IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes and UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Meeting at the Thunderbird Hotel in El Segundo, representatives of more than 500,000 U.S. and Canadian workers will review results of 1962 bargaining in the aerospace industry and lay the foundation for 1965, when major union contracts expire, the union heads announced.

Canadian Union Ranks Show Increase in 1962

Ottawa, Ont.—Union membership in Canada increased by about 26,000, or nearly 2 percent, during 1962, the federal Labor Dept. reported on the basis of statistics compiled for its annual listing of labor organizations.

Total membership stood at 1,449,200 at the beginning of 1963, the department reported.

Of that number, 1,079,900 belonged to unions affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress—most of them also affiliated with the AFL-CIO. About 8 percent of the total, or 110,600 workers, belonged to affiliates of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, practically all in Quebec. More than 1 million of the total were in 110 international unions.

The survey found that 87 international unions with 882,200 members were affiliated with both the CLC and the AFL-CIO. Ten unions with 106,000 members belonged only to the AFL-CIO and three with 12,600 members only to the CLC. The remaining 10 internationals, with 106,300 members, had no affiliation.

Some 350,900 workers were organized in 51 national unions—163,200 members of 18 CLC affiliates and 104,500 members of 10 CNTU federations. Twenty remaining unions with 83,200 members were without affiliation.

In addition the CLC and the CNTU between them had 232 directly-chartered locals with about 28,000 members, and there were 128 independent local bodies with 38,700 members.

The survey also showed that 16 unions operating in Canada gained 1,000 or more members during the year with the Steelworkers reporting 8,000 additions and the Auto Workers 4,300 new members.

Seven unions reported declines of 1,000 or more.

THE FIRST TRADE UNION delegation from Guinea since the nation won independence five years ago is welcomed to labor's house in Washington, by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. From left are Mrs. Maida Springer of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs; Sekou Kaba, Denka Mansare and Ansoumane Oulare of Guinea; Meany and Mrs. Yari Hadiri of the delegation. Oulare is vice president of the National Confederation of Guinean Workers. He led the group on a visit to the U.S. to see America and strengthen ties with U.S. labor.

AFL-CIO Role in Race Bias Fight Hailed by Guinean Union Delegation

A four-member delegation from the National Confederation of Guinean Workers, ending a three-week tour of the United States, has voiced its thanks for labor's "generous hospitality" and its increased appreciation of the role of the AFL-CIO in its fight against race discrimination.

Delegation members were luncheon guests of Pres. George Meany and other AFL-CIO leaders. They participated in the civil rights "March on Washington" Aug. 28 and celebrated Labor Day with American workers before concluding their visit.

"It is with a deep satisfaction," said Vice Pres. Ansoumane Oulare of the confederation (CNTG), "that the delegation emphasizes the warm and friendly reception" that greeted it and "expresses its sincere gratitude to the leaders of the AFL-CIO for its generous hospitality."

Conversations with trade union members and leaders brought a better appreciation of the activities of U.S. trade unions in their struggles for social betterment, said Oulare.

He said the delegation "declares its active solidarity with U.S. unions in these struggles and expresses its confidence that the workers of this country will successfully overcome the obstacles" in their path to complete equality of rights for all.

Other members were Sec. Sekou Kaba of the General Administration Workers; Denka Mansare of the local union of Liquiri, and Mrs. Yari Hadiri, an officer of the General Administration Workers.

The visitors came here to improve the knowledge and understanding of both groups. They met union representatives in New York City; Unity House, Pa.; Chicago, Los Angeles, Detroit, Knoxville, Tenn., and other points.

The four Guineans have played a leading role in the labor movement of their land since the 1940's.

Oulare is a state official assigned to the headquarters of the CNTG, which has 22 national union affiliates and 30 local unions with 250,000 members. Kaba is director of the cabinet for the Guinean Dept. of Labor. Mansare and Mrs. Hadiri are leaders of their own unions.

Price Index Holds Steady In August

The cost of living remained unchanged in August as lower food prices offset higher transportation and recreation costs, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The Consumer Price Index of the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics held steady at 107.1. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.71.

On the basis of the August CPI, some 150,000 workers will receive wage hikes of 1 to 3 cents an hour. Of these, 130,000 in aerospace will get 2 or 3 cents and 6,000 chemical workers will get 1 cent, based on quarterly reviews.

In addition, 4,000 food processing workers in Michigan will get a 4-cent quarterly raise based on the Detroit index and 1,000 Illinois delicatessen workers will get 1 cent based on the Chicago index.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said, the net spendable earnings or take-home pay of factory production workers dropped for the second straight month. The decline reflected a 2-cent cut in average hourly earnings caused by a seasonal drop in high-wage jobs overshadowing a rise in low-wage jobs.

With the CPI holding steady, the real earnings or purchasing power of factory workers were reduced as well.

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

The auditors of the AFL-CIO Employes Federal Credit Union will be making a complete verification of members' accounts at the close of business Sept. 30. Statements should reach all members during the month of October. If not received by Oct. 31, please notify Chairman, Supervisory Committee, 815 16th Street, N. W., Room 711, Washington 6, D. C.

Test Ban Pact Wins 80-19 in Senate Vote

(Continued from Page 1)

gress that nothing in the treaty limited the use of nuclear arms in warfare.

The Administration raised no objection to a preamble to the resolution of ratification which asserted the Senate's constitutional right to pass on any future amendment to the treaty.

In the treaty, the three nations proclaim their desire to abolish nuclear weapons tests "for all time" and "put an end to the contamination of man's environment by radioactive substances."

Scientists Disagree

Underground tests are not prohibited because the parties were unable to agree on a foolproof inspection system. Scientists generally agreed that nuclear explosions other than underground can be detected through existing scientific techniques.

The Senate's "advice and consent" to the treaty paved the way for Pres. Kennedy's signature, which will make the U.S. the first of the three sponsoring nations formally to ratify the agreement. Britain cannot act until after Parliament reconvenes Oct. 24, when the treaty must lie before the House of Commons for 21 days. One day after the Senate acted, the Presidium of the Soviet Union's parliament—the Supreme Soviet—also voted to ratify the treaty. It goes into effect when ratified by all the sponsoring nations.

Meanwhile, most of the other nations in the world have signed the treaty with the significant exceptions of France, the only other country to have exploded a nuclear device, and Communist China, which has bitterly attacked Soviet Russia for its treaty with the western powers.

Rules Set Forth On Welfare Files

Rules on the preservation of welfare and pension plan records have been announced by Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds in a bulletin citing provisions of the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

The bulletin says administrators of all plans subject to the act must retain records for examination for at least five years. This includes vouchers, work sheets, receipts and other basic data needed to verify documents submitted to the Labor Dept. as part of the disclosure requirements.

The use of microfilm is permitted, the bulletin points out, under certain conditions. When tape or punch cards are used, the original records must be retained under the law administered by the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports and covering about 170,000 plans.

Approval 'Tentative':

House Panel Drafts Civil Rights Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

McCulloch (O.), said he considered the public accommodations provision too sweeping and called for "compromise" and "moderation" in drafting rights legislation.

Meanwhile, in the Senate, a bipatrisan leadership move was under way to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission, which otherwise would go out of existence Oct. 1. A proposed one-year extension was not expected to touch off a full-fledged Southern filibuster. A longer extension, coupled with a broadening of the commission's powers, is included in the Administration's omnibus civil rights package.

In other developments:

- Congress has given final approval to a plan worked out by rail unions and management to strengthen the financing of railroad retirement and unemployment benefits.

The Senate passed unchanged a House bill which raises the payroll tax paid by both workers and employers to finance retirement and disability benefits. This is accomplished by boosting the present taxable wage base from $400 to $450 a month—a move which also will mean higher pensions in the future for many railroad workers.

A deficit in the unemployment fund is met by boosting employer payments and raising eligibility requirements.

The third step towards cutting down the retirement-unemployment funds deficit is to increase the interest paid by the U.S. Treasury on retirement system funds to the level of other government bonds.

- The Senate, after brief debate, voted 77-0 to appropriate $47.3 billion—nearly half the nation's budget—for defense spending. This is $258 million more than the House bill. The measure now goes to conference.
- House-Senate conferees approved a $1.2 billion pay raise for career members of the armed services and final approval by both houses was assured.
- The Senate Labor Committee approved both a new college aid bill and the Administration's vocational education expansion proposal. Meanwhile an aid to medical education bill—the first school aid measure to reach the White House—was signed into law by Pres. Kennedy.
- The House Rules Committee held a hearing on a labor-opposed bill to enable manufacturers to control retail prices of their products but did not take immediate action.

Seidman to Attend ILO Parley on Jobs

Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO economic representative in Europe, will represent U.S. workers at a preparatory technical conference on unemployment and underemployment scheduled by the Intl. Labor Organization for Geneva, Switzerland, from Sept. 30 to Oct. 18.

The meeting will attempt to draft standards for submission to the ILO annual conference next June. The basis for its discussions will be a report, Employment: Objectives and Policies, prepared by the ILO secretariat.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Test Ban Treaty

The Senate on Sept. 24 ratified the nuclear test ban treaty by a 80-19 vote. The AFL-CIO endorsed the three-nation agreement to cease atmospheric testing and urged ratification. The rollcall follows:

FOR RATIFICATION

DEMOCRATS 55

Anderson (N. M.)
Bartlett (Alaska)
Bayh (Ind.)
Bible (Nev.)
Brewster (Md.)
Burdick (N. D.)
Cannon (Nev.)
Church (Ida.)
Clark (Pa.)
Dodd (Conn.)
Douglas (Ill.)
Edmondson (Okla.)
Ellender (La.)
Ervin (N. C.)
Fulbright (Ark.)
Gore (Tenn.)
Gruening (Alaska)
Hart (Mich.)
Hartke (Ind.)
Hayden (Ariz.)
Hill (Ala.)
Holland (Fla.)
Humphrey (Minn.)
Inouye (Hawaii)
Jackson (Wash.)
Johnston (S. C.)
Jordan (N. C.)
Kennedy (Mass.)
Long (Mo.)
Magnuson (Wash.)
Mansfield (Mont.)
McCarthy (Minn.)
McGee (Wyo.)
McGovern (S. D.)
McIntyre (N. H.)
McNamara (Mich.)
Metcalf (Mont.)
Monroney (Okla.)
Morse (Ore.)
Moss (Utah)
Muskie (Me.)
Nelson (Wis.)
Neuberger (Ore.)
Pastore (R. I.)
Pell (R. I.)
Proxmire (Wis.)
Randolph (W. Va.)
Ribicoff (Conn.)
Smathers (Fla.)
Sparkman (Ala.)
Symington (Mo.)
Walters (Tenn.)
Williams (N. J.)
Yarborough (Tex.)
Young (O.)

REPUBLICANS 25

Aiken (Vt.)
Allott (Colo.)
Beall (Md.)
Boggs (Del.)
Carlson (Kans.)
Case (N. J.)
Cooper (Ky.)
Cotton (N. H.)
Dirksen (Ill.)
Dominick (Colo.)
Fong (Hawaii)
Hickenlooper (Iowa)
Hruska (Neb.)
Javits (N. Y.)
Keating (N. Y.)
Kuchel (Calif.)
Miller (Iowa)
Morton (Ky.)
Mundt (S. D.)
Pearson (Kans.)
Prouty (Vt.)
Saltonstall (Mass.)
Scott (Pa.)
Williams (Del.)
Young (N. D.)

AGAINST RATIFICATION

DEMOCRATS 11

Byrd (Va.)
Byrd (W. Va.)
Eastland (Miss.)
Lausche (O.)
Long (La.)
McClellan (Ark.)
Robertson (Va.)
Russell (Ga.)
Stennis (Miss.)
Talmadge (Ga.)
Thurmond (S. C.)

REPUBLICANS 8

Bennett (Utah)
Curtis (Neb.)
Goldwater (Ariz.)
Jordan (Ida.)
Mechem (N. M.)
Simpson (Wyo.)
Smith (Me.)
Tower (Tex.)

Newest U.S. Sub Gets Union Checkout

CRUISING OFF Florida coast with 10 union observers on board, new ballistic missile submarine Alexander Hamilton shows its mighty wake on one-day orientation trip. Awesome deterrent to enemy aggression, latest weapon in the U.S. defense system was inspected from stem to stern by representatives of workmen who made the parts that give this newest sea wasp its sting.

AFL-CIO SEC.-TREAS. William F. Schnitzler uses glasses. Left, Deputy Assistant Defense Sec. S. N. Shulman; right, ship's officers.

RUBBER WORKERS' Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold takes a turn at the periscope of the submarine as it cruises below the surface.

SHIP'S SAIL, high above ocean, holds Fire Fighters' Sec.-Treas. John C. Kabachus, Pres. Max Greenberg, Retail-Wholesale.

TORPEDO ROOM crewman tells federation Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, center, and Boiler Makers' Pres. Russell K. Berg, right, about electronic equipment packing every available inch of space.

SUB'S GUESTS, third from the left: Berg; Navy's W. P. Vosseler; Lewis McCracken, Glass Workers; Metal Trades Pres. B. A. Gritta; Kabachus; Navy's D. V. Geoffrion; Schnitzler; Asbestos Workers' Pres. Carl Sickles; AFL-CIO's Thomas P. Moran; Gold, Shulman, Greenberg, Walsh.

STEERING the submarine from computer-crammed control center is no problem for Schnitzler, with crew member and Gritta, right, standing by. All visitors took a turn at steering.

Blueprint for Action

THE 1964 ELECTIONS are shaping up as one of the more decisive confrontations between conservative and liberal forces in American political life.

The well-planned drive in Republican ranks to name Sen. Barry Goldwater as the party's presidential standard-bearer in 1964 is bringing the liberal vs. conservative issue into focus.

And although the jockeying for the GOP nomination is receiving major attention, in states and congressional districts throughout the nation similar activity is taking place as potential candidates maneuver to win support of their respective parties.

The emergence of conservative political action groups sponsored by the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Medical Association, among others, the vigor and unrelenting attacks of the radical right, all combine to make 1964 a showdown year on the future direction of American policy.

This election will directly affect every trade union member both as a citizen and as a worker. And yet, a check of the figures indicates that unless union members take a more direct role in political activity, the liberal forces may be weakened.

★ ★ ★

IN 1960 Pres. Kennedy's hairline victory brought only 60 percent of union members to the polls. In 1962 the battle to maintain a liberal complexion in Congress drew only 50 percent.

A .600 average may be enough to win a major league baseball pennant but it is not enough to ensure victory for the liberal-progressive forces in 1964.

The labor movement gave top priority in 1960 and 1962 to registration and get-out-the-vote drives. The drives had varying degree of success, but the victory and survival of liberal forces can be traced directly in many cases to labor's efforts to register its members and make sure that they cast their votes on election day.

★ ★ ★

IN 1964 registration will be the key to the results. The ineligible voter will in effect be casting a "no" vote on the election of liberal candidates and a liberal program that will produce a full employment, full production economy free of bias and discrimination and strong enough to meet the challenge of the Communist dictatorship.

Now, 13 months before the critical day of decision, is the time to plan the drive to make every union member an eligible voter, to determine the areas of non-registration, to line up the manpower and the funds that spell a sucessful registration campaign.

Registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns are in the great tradition of American democracy—to give every citizen a voice in determining the leaders and the policies of the nation. Analysis of registration and voting statistics indicates that all too often trade union members have not exercised their democratic privileges and rights to register and to vote. In effect they have defaulted to those who would weaken and destroy unions and helped give them a disproportionate voice in the shaping of national and state policy.

In 1964 these forces will be making their greatest bid for office. It can be turned back by an alert and informed electorate if it is registered and turns out to vote. The labor movement's job is to see that in the ensuing 13 months an overwhelming percentage of its members pull their weight.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Sept. 28, 1963 No. 39

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

'This Will Open the Gate'

'The Master Key':

Negro Struggle for Full Rights Seen Basically a Fight for Jobs

The following is excerpted from an address to the Connecticut AFL-CIO convention by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Joseph F. Donnelly, chairman of the Connecticut Board of Mediation & Arbitration.

TODAY OUR NATION stands divided as millions of Negro Americans demand the rights which they have been denied.

No region of the land is immune. In one place the key issue is schools, in another it is housing—and everywhere it is jobs. And everywhere this struggle for justice has one face in common. It is the determined face of our Negro fellow-citizens struggling to attain the opportunity to exercise the rights given to them by their God and their country.

To you in the organized labor movement this struggle for justice must have a special significance. A struggle for justice, a struggle against injustice, a struggle for the recognition of rights, a struggle in which men are willing to suffer and to bleed and to die—this is the pattern of the struggle of those who cast the shape of the American labor movement, a struggle which went on for many decades of our American history. Today the struggle of the American Negro should have no more fervent champion than the American labor movement.

The Negro has many real grievances. He is making many demands. But he is not asking for privileges. He is demanding his rights. He is demanding the right to vote as other Americans enjoy that right. He is demanding adequate schooling for his children as other Americans enjoy that right. He is demanding the free use of public facilities, the opportunity to decent housing, the right to be treated with the dignity and respect given to his white fellow Americans.

All these are prominent in the current struggle, but the hard core of what the Negro wants today is employment. Negro leaders today see that equal employment opportunity for Negro workers in every industry and trade is the master key to the solution of the total problem of race relations in the United States.

In the present pattern of employment the Negro generally gets jobs at the lower end of the pay scale, jobs that may be among the first to disappear under the impact of industrial automation. Once he loses one of these jobs it may be a long time before he finds any new employment. Making up less than 10 percent of the country's labor force, Negroes account for 20 percent of its unemployment.

Perhaps the greatest handicap to the Negro in his struggle for more and better jobs is his lack of education. This is true at the college level as at lower levels. Among adults some 43 percent of white men have high school diplomas, but only 22 percent of non-white men have these diplomas. A high school diploma is about the absolute minimum qualification for jobs that open up in industry today.

WHY IS THE NEGRO UNPREPARED? Because few men will devote years of their lives to preparing themselves for jobs which they have been conditioned to consider closed to them because of their race.

Thus the Negro has traveled a vicious circle—poor education, leading to low pay, leading to sharply limited opportunities to break out of the ghetto Negro housing, leading to no inspiration for the next generation and so leading back again to poor education. Today the Negro is determined to break this circle; and basic to that determination must be the knowledge that there are job opportunities for him.

Because employment and jobs are the master key to the solution of the total problem of race relations in the U.S., you of the American labor movement have a special responsibility. Often you are the keeper of the key. Today there are no longer any international unions in the U.S.—as too long there were—which in their constitutions bar Negro workers from membership. In practice, however, a number of unions effectively exclude Negroes by making it extremely difficult for them to qualify for membership.

To bar a man from employment at any level merely because of his race is immoral, and practices and traditions which in the past and today bar Negroes from employment must be condemned and abolished. Justice and respect for rights must be the guiding force of all union actions.

To the millions of Negro workers who have been shunted aside in the search for decent jobs, unions in this time of crisis have a special responsibility. We are not advocating quotas or depriving workers of jobs which they now hold. But we are advocating accepting Negro workers as all workers should be accepted—with respect and dignity and the opportunity to be evaluated in terms of their worth as individuals.

Morgan Says:

Guilt Must Be Spread Around For the Church Bomb Murders

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

I SEE BY THE PAPERS that Alabama's Gov. Wallace has offered a $5,000 reward for the apprehension of the person or persons responsible for the fiendish bombing of a church in Birmingham. The governor will save trouble and serve justice if he simply cashes the check himself and divides the proceeds with other like-minded officials of the state.

Morgan

The dynamite murder of four Negro girls was a savage crime against civilized society. But were the perpetrators of this defiance basically more guilty of a crime against humanity than a governor who has persistently acted to defy the U.S. Constitution, federal authority and the very tenets of human decency on which the American society is founded? The bombing was an act of madness but it was the effect of a deeper cause—the cause which Wallace and other racial extremists not only represent but encourage, the cause of ignorance over knowledge, hatred over love, fear over confidence, inequality over equal rights.

Of course the governor and his men—the active racists—are not the only guilty ones. The silent are guilty, too. What a bitter tragedy it is that Alabama's two U.S. senators, Lister Hill and John Sparkman, both with distinguished liberal records of public service on almost every other issue, have not been able to bring themselves to break publicly with extremism and provide the calm, brave leadership which their state so desperately needs.

Such a stand, it is argued, would be political suicide. One looks at the murderous rubble of the 16th Street Baptist Church and wonders what price compromise?

It would be unfair, however, to single out one brace of senators for criticism. The sad fact is that no member of Congress has shown the calibre of statesmanship demanded by the times on this tortuous but real and vital issue. Greatness is required and except for the eloquent paradox of the Negro leadership, we are given instead the white-breasted demagogue, the political ostrich or the soft-bellied moralizer . . . and while we're scattering the guilt around, let us not except ourselves or the public at large.

This qualifying statement is made not to minimize the responsibility of the Wallaces but to maximize the emphasis on the following point: The battle for equal rights for all citizens cannot be truly won until all citizens, or the majority, realize it is their battle. Fragments of my rights and pieces of my security were blown up in the Birmingham church, and so were yours. This is not a struggle of the Negro population versus die-hard segregationists. This is a struggle that involves citizens of Seattle, Sitka, Savannah and Syracuse and intermediate points. All of us.

IT IS NOT EASY to take a fabric of social prejudice and custom accepted for a hundred years and reweave it into a radical new pattern, but it must be done and perhaps one of the most effective ways to begin is to realize the virtual bankruptcy of American public education in terms of teaching the realities of life and teaching them with quality.

The Birmingham bombing wasn't the only event which produced a headline. In a Page One story, the Sunday New York Times reported a sweeping critique by Dr. James Bryant Conant, former president of Harvard, in which he called teacher training courses a "scandal" and urged widespread reforms.

In a trenchant New York Herald Tribune review of Conant's study, "The Education of American Teachers," another eminent educator, Harold Taylor, former president of Sarah Lawrence College, complained the study did not go far enough, that it omitted such seething subjects as Negro education and the preparation for teaching in slum area schools.

"American education," Taylor wrote, "is in the midst of a crisis deeper than it knows, a crisis many of whose elements are hidden by a driving national ambition for technology, military and economic power. Other elements of the crisis are overt and have expressed themselves in radical form.

"The education of the Negro people has now revealed itself as a national scandal, and the evidence of years of neglect is now exploding into public consciousness. It is clear that at least one-third of the entire population, white and black, is receiving a third-rate education, suited to a poor and backward society. We now have thousands of young men and women roaming the slum streets of our big cities, uneducated, unemployed and unemployable. The favored youth of the suburbs drifts on a tide of affluence to the twin ports of status and security. The general level of teaching in our colleges and universities is such that the best students are bored with it and the rest suffer from intellectual malnutrition."

The problem is not only in Alabama but everywhere. When I visited the Chicago office of the National Urban League, it was crowded with young Negroes looking for work. While I was there a report was telephoned in of an attack on a Negro couple who had moved into a white neighborhood on the western edge of Chicago. These incidents may not serve to re-educate the George Wallaces of the land but the rest of us miss their portentous lesson at our mutual peril.

Washington Reports:

Letters to Reluctant Lawmakers Urged in Hospital Care Drive

REP. CECIL KING (D-Calif.), co-author of the King-Anderson bill for hospital insurance for the aged under social security, advised supporters of the measure to write to members of Congress opposed to the legislation, rather than to those who support it.

King made the statement as he was interviewed with Rep. Seymour Halpern (R-N.Y.), one of the original supporters of the similar legislation first proposed in 1959 by former Rep. Aime Forand (D-N.J.). They appeared on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on some 700 radio stations.

Halpern reported that 78 percent of about 17,000 of his constituents who responded to a questionnaire favor the social security approach to hospital insurance for the aged, against 68 percent last year.

King said his mail is 10 to 1 for the measure, but added that supporters of the bill should not "just write to the friends of the legislation—they should instead pick out the members who are in doubt or opposed and try to convince them."

He urged backers of King-Anderson to follow through by asking relatives in other parts of the country to write to their own congressmen who may be in doubt or against the bill.

"Get to those who have had no mail," he said. "That member believes his friends don't want it. And that isn't the case."

KING SUGGESTED that if enough sentiment is demonstrated for the measure it could still be brought before the 1963 session of Congress.

Both congressmen noted the heavy cost of hospital care for retired people, rising from $9.39 a day to $34.98 on a national average, according to Halpern, and $40 a day in California, King asserted.

Both also observed that while private insurance is all right for persons who can afford it, few can. King declared that the King-Anderson bill would help insurance companies by removing the heavy actuarial cost for the elderly.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton, whose commentary on the Washington scene normally appears in this space, is on vacation.)

THE KENNEDY ADMINISTRATION, in effect, has just told the American business community to get busy on increasing foreign exports as a highly important way of cutting into the stubborn balance of payments deficit.

President Kennedy challenged businessmen to lower their prices as one way of increasing American exports by at least 10 percent. Such an increase, the Administration is contending, would go far to eliminate the balance of payments deficits without resorting to fiscal measures that might lead the United States into a new recession.

Addressing delegates to the White House Conference on Export Expansion, the President noted that other nations had expanded their exports more rapidly than the U.S. because "European producers, unlike American producers, respond to excess capacity by reducing prices in order to maintain production, rather than reducing production to maintain prices."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz urged organized labor to intensify its "efforts and interest in promoting a greater volume of exports" and, if necessary, stick a few pins into their employers to get them moving. He said:

"The AFL-CIO and the various international unions should continue through union news and educational programs to bring home to workers the relationship of jobs and exports. Perhaps, more directly, the unions in their day-to-day as well as formal exchanges with management, can encourage a bolder approach—or sometimes even a first venture—by management into the export market as an outlet for the products of the plant or industry."

Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges, a businessman, said that most of the average businessman's objections to entering the export business were "nonsense." He strongly suggested that some of the reasons for American business failures abroad were failure to answer mail promptly, failure to speak foreign languages and a general looking down the nose at "foreigners."

* * *

HODGES ACCUSED many American businessmen of using a double standard—working hard on sales and sales methods at home and flubbing the foreign markets through ignorance or inefficiency.

The old chestnut that the U.S. can't compete abroad because of high American wages was thoroughly exploded by Hodges, who said:

"I am surprised to hear so many firms complain they cannot compete with low foreign wages. Costs, to begin with, depend on both wages and productivity. Americans boast the most advanced production methods in the world and American workers the highest productivity. Indeed, those firms with the highest export volume are the high wage industries and account for two-thirds of our total manufactured exports. Cost is not the only factor in competition—quality is more often than not the determining factor in sales, and here again the U.S. is a leader."

Hodges noted that many U.S. firms are now in export trade, but that "incredibly enough, thousands upon thousands of American businessmen remain ignorant of the opportunities of overseas trade or hold to the erroneous opinion that somehow they cannot compete abroad or that it is enormously difficult and complicated to export."

"And too many of them say, 'Oh, we are doing OK here in the market we know,' " he added.

Day after day the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers boast of the spirit of competition that has made America strong and rich. Yet, it is clear that large sectors of the business world are strikingly lacking in the spirit of that enterprise and competition when it comes to foreign trade. (PAI)

THE KING-ANDERSON BILL to provide social security hospital insurance for the aged should be passed without further delay, Rep. Cecil King (D-Calif.), left, and Rep. Seymour Halpern (R-N.Y.) declared in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

October Offers Year's Bargains In Coats, Mattresses and Rugs

By Sidney Margolius

AFTER A SUMMER of jumping prices, living costs finally are receding. With a number of important foods a little cheaper, you can bring your eating bill back into line, especially if you seek out the more-abundant, and thus cheaper, foods of the month.

October also is a good month to look for coat sales. The Columbus Day sales start the annual price-cutting from the higher prices usually charged for fall clothing in September.

If your house needs roof repairs before winter, note that the building materials buy of the year is asphalt roofing. It has taken a noticeable drop in recent months.

Other good values include the recently-reduced prices of stereo record players, standard-quality mattresses and nylon rugs. In children's clothing, Dame Fashion once in a while takes a practical turn, and the big style for girls this year is the versatile jumper. Corduroy jumpers are both reasonable and machine-washable.

Here are price trends and buying tips for October which can help you choose family needs more advantageously:

Many retailers nowadays advertise innerspring mattresses at $39. These are "leaders," advertised at a low price to bring you into the store. There, the salesmen have an opportunity to trade you up to a $79 deluxe mattress, or even a "king," "queen" or other "supersize" for as much as $100. The mattress industry is trying urgently to promote them these days.

But the $39 standard mattress widely advertised as a special actually happens to be quite good quality and better than mattresses at this price used to be. Trade sources report that the improved quality at this moderate price is made possible by automation.

This is one of the few areas besides appliances in which automation noticeably has reduced prices to consumers. Another reason for the value is that retailers get a very small profit, often only $2 after expenses, on the $39 mattresses, compared to the $20 they usually net on the $79 mattresses.

You will find a hard push from salesmen to buy the supersize mattresses and the new box spring you consequently would need. Salesmen get bonuses (known in the trade as PM's or "push money") from manufacturers for pushing the higher-priced sets. They make as much as $8 extra for selling a supersize bedding set, according to Home Furnishings Daily, industry trade paper.

PRICES OF WOOL RUGS have been raised. Result is, nylon is getting more retail promotion and consumer interest. Good wool rugs have high soil resistance, but continuous-filament nylon rugs are reasonably good in this respect, and the better grades do rate high in durability.

However, nylon rugs range from very poor to very good, and anywhere from $4.95 a square yard to $14.95. Even the fact that a rug is made of "continuous-filament" nylon is no assurance of durability. Continuous-filament nylon is a thicker, longer nylon which resists soil and doesn't form little fiber balls as does the older "staple" nylon.

But continuous-filament nylon carpeting can vary in quality of fiber, in the thickness and length of pile, and in how closely woven or tufted it is. One of the most notorious scandals in the building industry today is the low-grade nylon carpeting installed in place of finished wood floors in many moderate-price new houses. Woven nylon rugs usually are more durable, more stable and shape-retaining than tufted rugs, and not really much more expensive for the same grade. Tufted rugs can be satisfactory if thickly tufted and made with a double jute back.

Meat prices are edging down but turkey and broilers are still outstanding values. Cheese is abundant, with prices trimmed, and is an outstanding value for main dishes. Tuna and pink salmon are in good supply, with special prices featured by the stores. In red meats, beef chuck roast and pork shoulders are relatively reasonable.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

AFL-CIO MERIT scholarship winner Travis A. Meredith of Welch, W. Va., greets Pres. George Meany on a visit to Washington. Meredith, en route to Yale University to begin his senior year as a pre-medical student, spent a few days doing research for term paper on union organizational work in West Virginia in the Thirties. Son of a Railway Clerks' member, Meredith was one of the first AFL-CIO scholarship students in 1960.

U.S. Ranking Slips:

Prenatal Care Urged To Cut Infant Deaths

THE UNITED STATES slipped from 10th to 11th place in the 1962 infant death rates of 15 countries, according to provisional figures released by the Children's Bureau of the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Ireland climbed from 13th place into the 10th place spot held by the U.S. in 1961. Remaining at the top of the list of countries with low infant mortality are the Netherlands and Sweden. The 15 countries, in order from lowest to highest mortality, are: Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Australia, Denmark, New Zealand, Switzerland, United Kingdom, Ireland, United States, Luxembourg, Canada, Japan, and Federal Republic of Germany.

The countries are those with populations over 300,000 that use the World Health Organization definitions of live birth and of infant death and have relatively complete reporting.

Katherine B. Oettinger, chief of the U.S. Children's Bureau, pointed out that in 1961, which was the most recent year for which state-by-state information was available, none of the states in the U.S. had an infant mortality as low as that of the Netherlands or Sweden.

The Utah rate, lowest in the country (20.3 per 1,000 live births), was about a third higher than the rates of either the Netherlands or Sweden for that year, she said.

The heaviest toll continues to be in the first month of life, Mrs. Oettinger said, pointing out that seven out of 10 infants born alive in the U.S. in 1961 who did not live to see their first birthday had died in the first month of life.

* * *

THE MAJOR FACTORS in America's failure to reduce infant mortality more rapidly, she said, are premature birth and inadequate prenatal care.

"Premature termination of pregnancy increases the risk of death in the newborn period about 20 times," she stated. "Women who receive no prenatal care have a high incidence of premature delivery, and many of these babies die or suffer damage of an avoidable nature. Experience in a number of our cities has shown that lack of prenatal care about doubles the incidence of prematurity, and our studies show that the incidence of prematurity is much higher in our large cities than in the country as a whole."

Mrs. Oettinger urged more prenatal clinics so that mothers "can carry their babies to term with a minimum risk to the life of the infant," It is necessary, she said, to expand and improve "our maternity care programs if we are to make significant reductions in our present infant mortality rate."

In nine leading cities, according to a table prepared by the Children's Bureau, infant mortality among non-whites continued to run at a rate in striking excess of the white death rate. It ranged from a Los Angeles low of 29.2 per 1,000 live births for nonwhite, as against 22.1 for whites, to a figure nearly double the white rate in New York and Philadelphia. (Medical Tribune—Sept. 6, 1963).

From Soup to Nonsense:

Nobody Can Lead a Full Life Without a Call to Jury Duty

By Jane Goodsell

GETTING A SUMMONS to jury service is a lot like discovering that you're pregnant. You're astonished, excited, thrilled and proud. And you wonder how in the world you're going to fit it into your life.

It's almost as irreversible a phenomenon, too. Or anyway it seems like it. The subpoena, signed by the sheriff, states that you are hereby commanded to appear at the county courthouse at 9 o'clock on a Monday morning three weeks hence to begin a month's term as a juror.

This command business strikes you as pretty ungracious. In fact, downright rude. Commanded, indeed! This is a democracy, isn't it? And you're a citizen and a voter, aren't you? You're not accustomed to being commanded. An invitation, perhaps followed up by a bit of coaxing and flattery, would be a more charming way of obtaining your services.

After some sober reflection, you realize that you are being treated like that precisely because this is a democracy and you are a citizen. And, unless you have a really valid excuse, you'd better appear promptly at 9 a.m. on the appointed Monday.

Having accepted your duty, you begin to feel quite self-important and pleased with yourself. You phone your friends to boast of your appointment: "Guess what? I'm going to be on the jury!"

If you have any acting ability at all, you can tell the truth (that your name was drawn at random from a list of registered voters) and still imply that you were really picked because of your keen, logical mind and judicial reasoning powers.

BY THIS TIME you've finally got straight which one is the plaintiff and which is the defendant, and you can sound pretty authoritative —unless you're talking to a lawyer, which you'd better not.

As the day draws closer, you are assailed by doubts: What does one wear to court? Who are you to be deciding other people's fate? How will your family get along without you if you should happen to be on a jury that gets locked up overnight? Have you the mental acuity to understand what the attorneys are talking about? How do you address a judge? Where is the courthouse, anyway?

When you walk into the courthouse at 8:50, clutching your subpoena, you try to look brisk and self-possessed, but you feel as though it's your first day at a new school. And you can no longer remember which one is the plaintiff and which is the defendant.

'Statistical Chicanery' Hit:

'Neat Trick' Exposed In Claims for R-T-W

If you listen to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, there's nothing like a "right-to-work" law to boost union membership.

The Chamber has even put out a new pamphlet which makes the claim that union membership "skyrocketed" in states which have banned the union shop.

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) told the House that this would indeed be "a neat trick . . . if it were true."

To reach this "amazing" conclusion—that "work" laws stimulate union growth—the authors of the Chamber's pamphlet resorted to what Dent termed "a calculated misstatement of fact."

He cited both a press release and the language in the booklet to back up his charge of "statistical chicanery."

The CofC press release begins: "Union membership 'skyrocketed' in six states after enactment of right to work laws, according to a booklet released today by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States."

The portion of the booklet on which the release is based doesn't exactly say that—although the implication was apparently strong enough to mislead the Chamber's own publicists.

Here's the actual language.

"Union membership has skyrocketed, especially in states that enacted right-to-work laws . . . Georgia's right-to-work law was adopted in 1947 and union membership climbed from 35,000 in 1939 to 135,000 in 1953, or 280 percent. Other increases are equally impressive: Texas 239 percent, Arizona 257 percent, Nebraska 153 percent, South Dakota 185 percent, and Arkansas 171 percent."

Chamber's Conclusion

These figures, according to the Chamber's so-called Committee for Voluntary Unionism, demonstrate that "right-to-work laws help employes keep their unions strong."

Dent told the House that "the U.S. Chamber has sought to claim the labor movement's greatest period of growth, the war years and the period immediately preceding and following the war, resulted from right-to-work laws."

In fact, he emphasized, "the law did not come into existence until after the Taft-Hartley Act passage in 1947."

Dent said he discovered that the union growth statistics used by the Chamber came from a 1956 survey by Leo Wolman, but the booklet "ignored" Wolman's conclusion that the "large postwar spurt" of union membership ended in 1947, before the enactment of "work" laws and that union membership growth in New York State alone was more than the entire gain claimed for "right-to-work" laws.

The Pennsylvania congressman summed up his analysis with this comment:

"When honest men encounter such blatant misuse of fact, they can only conclude that the whole effort of fraud and misrepresentation has been undertaken deliberately in a cynical attempt to sway the judgment and viewpoint of the uninformed."

UAW Chosen At Burroughs After 30 Years

Detroit—The Auto Workers, successful after 30 years of trying to organize the Burroughs Corp. and its 5,527 employes, has been chosen bargaining agent, 2,760 to 2,404, in an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

UAW Reg. Dir. Joseph McCusker, who started the winning campaign last May, said the firm has been Michigan's largest non-union industrial employer.

After the election the company, which makes computers, filed objections citing rumors that the firm would merge and alleging that the election campaign interfered with those "laboratory conditions" which the NLRB has said are required for employe free choice.

The union said it fairly and freely won and is entitled to certification. Two other unions represent small groups at Burroughs, it said—the Firemen & Oilers and the United Plant Guards.

SEMINAR SPONSORED by the Railway Labor Executives' Association brought six leaders of the Japanese General Federation of Private Railway Workers to this country for the union-to-union program. RLEA Executive Sec. Donald S. Beattie is shown as he addressed the group. Seated at his right is Pres. Toshikatsu Horii of the Japanese union federation.

Protestant, Catholic Churchmen Accuse 'Work' Forces of Deceit

Two nationally prominent church leaders—a Protestant and a Catholic—have accused promoters of so-called "right-to-work" laws of a calculated attempt to deceive the American public about the true nature of the anti-union state legislation.

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, charged that "work" propagandists have "pitched" their claims "on a low ethical level" and are guilty of fraud in their use of the "right-to-work" slogan and their claims that the laws are designed to guarantee "freedom."

"It is called a 'right-to-work' law, I think designedly, to leave the impression with the general public that it will provide work," Msgr. Higgins continued.

Instead of providing jobs or individual rights to workers, however, "work" law promoters are "out to break union organizations," observed the Rev. Edward F. Allen, superintendent of the Augusta Dist. of the Maine Methodist Churches.

"The purpose is union-busting," he declared.

The two clergymen made their charges on the American University program, "Viewpoint Washington," broadcast over an eight-station educational television network. The discussion was moderated by Prof. Laurence Martin of the Johns Hapkins School of Advanced Intl. Studies.

Threat to Freedom

In another comment on the nature of the "work" laws, Dr. William J. Lee, S.S., dean of studies at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore and a recognized Catholic authority on labor-management relations, declared that the open shop laws pose a serious threat to the American free enterprise system.

His charge appeared in an article in the September issue of the Industrial & Labor Relations Report Card, a quarterly issued by the New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations.

Dr. Lee said that "right-to-work" propagandists have cloaked their real purpose—outlawing freedom of contract between labor and management and destruction of the collective bargaining process—under "an extraordinary amount of double talk" and "misrepresentation."

"Many social thinkers are convinced that suppression of collective bargaining or the deferment of unions from effective representation of employes would, under present conditions, lead sooner or later to state control and to the impairment or collapse of the free enterprise system," the educator declared.

Msgr. Higgins explained that because the "work" forces have based their arguments on the unethical and false contention that the purpose of the legislation is to guarantee freedom, "churchmen feel they ought to speak out and try to clear the air."

"The underlying interest of church groups," he said, "is in the right of labor to organize and the advantage of collective bargaining. The 'right-to-work' law is a very serious threat to collective bargaining and, therefore, the church speaks out."

He noted that some labor issues do not evoke much comment from the churches because they are technical and there is room for honest debate, "but here is one that has been squarely pitched in ethical terms by the opposition, and I think church groups feel they should speak out on the issue."

Allen Adds Point

"Not only that," Allen added, "but these working people are within our churches. They are worthy, good citizens, and in all justice we should bring this out and be concerned with their problems as church people."

In addition to the moral grounds on which the nation's great religious faiths oppose the "work" laws, the clerics pointed out, there is a strong practical case endorsed by many industrial executives that such legislation is harmful to sound labor-management relations based on the nationally-accepted federal policy of collective bargaining.

"To my personal knowledge," said Msgr. Higgins, "a number of substantial employers in the country, men representing large industries, are—privately at least—opposed to 'right-to-work' legislation. I doubt that any of the really important industrial relations people in the large industries want 'right-to-work' legislation or would want to do away with the union shop."

"Work" law proposals have been defeated decisively in the legislatures of five states so far this year—Maine, Vermont, New Mexico, Idaho and Connecticut. A Wyoming statute passed by the legislature is under court attack as unconstitutional.

A current attempt to put the issue to a referendum in Oklahoma is being opposed by citizens groups, which in hearings before the State Supreme Court have charged "wholesale fraud, forgery" and other irregularities in the gathering of petitions by the "work" forces.

Medicare Premium Cut By Saskatchewan Plan

Regina, Sask.—The Saskatchewan medical care-hospitalization program, which covers everybody in the province, worked so successfully in the first year of its existence that a major cut in the annual premium has been announced by Premier Woodrow Lloyd.

The combined fee, $72 for a family during the first year, was reduced to $52. Single persons, who have been paying $36, will now pay $26.

Two factors were involved in the price cut:

- Costs of operation were less than anticipated, whereas critics had claimed the plan would be abused and would cost more than expected.
- A jump in receipts from the province's 5 percent sales tax, half of which is earmarked for meeting the expenses of the program, due to the general economic boom.

The combination of less-than-anticipated costs and increased sales tax receipts left the Medical Care Commission, which administers the insurance funds, with a $9.5 million surplus after the first year. About half is being returned to the public in the form of lower premiums and the remainder is being retained as a reserve fund.

Lloyd pointed out that the premium may fluctuate from time to time as a result of variations in operating costs and in general economic conditions, but that he expects the new rates to remain in force for "some time."

The boom had a good effect in provincial finances generally. Treasurer J. H. Brockelbank reported a surplus of nearly $10 million although net debt had been wiped out during the fiscal year.

New York Blue Shield Hit for 'Backwardness'

New York—The New York Blue Shield plan—United Medical Service, Inc.—has drawn sharp criticism from a labor-management group which declared it is "backward" in benefits and financing and "behind the standards of other large communities and the average for the nation as a whole."

The criticism, coupled with recommendations for a major overhaul of the plan to meet more nearly the needs of subscribers, was voiced in a report issued by the New York Labor-Management Council of Health and Welfare Plans, Inc. The group was formed a year ago to represent consumers of pre-paid health insurance, particularly large groups of workers whose coverage is financed under labor-management contracts.

Chairman of LMC is John I. Snyder, Jr., president of U.S. Industries, Inc., and the co-chairman is Jay Rubin, president of the New York Hotel Trades Council, who also is chairman of the New York City Central Labor Council's committee on hospital and medical care.

A major criticism by LMC was that the New York Blue Shield plan is so set up that most of its subscribers are ineligible for the "paid-in-full" benefits under income limitations set by the plan.

The panel said these service benefits "have atrophied from little use" and urged the plan to revamp its contracts, to preserve low-cost service benefits for low income groups and set up a "multi-level" system which would provide uniform service benefits under fees and premiums that vary according to income.

It also called for an indemnity series of benefits to be sold to subscribers whose incomes do not qualify them for service benefits and urged that group purchasers be gvien "meaningful and realistic" choices through the separation of indemnity and service benefits from the same underwriting.

Students Get Labor Viewpoint

FROM ALL PARTS of the United States, as well as from the far corners of the world, visitors come to AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington for briefings on what labor thinks about the problems that face men at home and abroad. Many of the groups that come calling are made up of high school students. Typical are those listening to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in the top photo, from Nicolet High School in Madison, Wis. Second photo from top shows the third group the Duluth, Minn., YMCA has brought to Washington; speaking to them is Alex Christie of the Steelworkers. At the bottom is a church group, the Fountain Club for high school students of the Fountain Street Church in Grand Rapids, Mich. Addressing them on "Labor and Segregation" is Assistant Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. Various branches of the federal government often channel visitors to the building, too. Second photo from bottom shows some of the State Dept.'s intern interpreters hearing Assistant Research Dir. Frank Fernbach (at head of table).

In Automation's Onsurge:

35-Hour Week Seen 'Too Long' by 1970

Toronto—The 35-hour workweek will be considered "too long" by the year 1970, Machinists Pres. A. J. Hayes predicted in a speech to the Ontario Conference on Automation & Social Change.

He described the "threat and challenge" of automation as second only to that of the hydrogen bomb and said it will necessitate a shorter working life as well as a reduced workweek.

He told conference participants that the onsurge of automation in the United States and Canada has left in its wake millions of "walking wounded" who make up a growing "army of the unemployed."

For many years, Hayes said, "experts . . . kept reassuring one another that automation was just a logical extension of mechanization and that, like mechanization, it would create more jobs."

'Revolutionary' Force

Only now, he said, are people beginning to realize that this is "a revolutionary force capable of overturning our social order."

Mechanization "made workers more efficient and thus more valuable," Hayes pointed out, while "automation threatens to make them superfluous and thus without value."

He took note of a trade journal's survey showing that 76 percent of a group of corporate executives agreed with the statement that "the company is entitled to all of the savings resulting from the introduction of labor-saving equipment."

The statement, Hayes said, is "patently absurd" because public-supported research and education and a "heritage of scientific knowledge" are behind technology.

In addition, he said, management would be committing "economic suicide" if it were successful in maintaining such a position since "workers are consumers."

Markets Essential

"It is pointless to plan automated factories capable of pouring out endless streams of goods without also planning an economy in which those goods can be distributed and consumed," he added.

Hayes told the conference that to cope with a situation where "fewer and fewer people can turn out more and more goods in less and less time," it will be necessary "to reduce the number of hours an individual works—not merely in a day, a week, or a year, but in his lifetime."

He urged longer education, the better to prepare workers for jobs through special schools and institutes "specially designed to bridge the gap between high school and college."

At the other end of the scale, he said, "we must of necessity . . . make it possible for workers to retire on decent incomes at 60 or even 55 years of age."

Automation, Hayes concluded, gives mankind a choice between "abundance through rational planning" or "economic chaos."

5 to 1 Job Toll Reported From Office Automation

Five office jobs are lost for every one created by automation, a University of Chicago economics professor has reported.

Prof. Arnold Weber, speaking in Port Huron, Mich., at a meeting of an Auto Worker-organized White Collar Advisory Council, said the few surveys of automated offices that have been made to date indicate a top-heavy job loss.

He made these other points:

- Introduction of automated machinery usually has a disruptive effect on the work force because "inequities inevitably result."
- Automating an office produces a major shift in the sexes; surveys show a ratio of eight men to seven women was changed to eight men and one woman in some instances.
- Since machines don't need sleep or a coffee break, many offices have instituted "factory type" discipline. Shift work is now part of office life.
- Identification of office workers with management rather than with unions is undergoing a change. Automation's "easiest victims" are those office supervisors whose decision-making can be done by the new computers.

Weber said office workers who historically have been more pro-management than pro-labor now find their hoped-for advancement through the ranks blocked by decision-making machines.

Joseph Ross, president of Federal Department Stores, told the 150 delegates that unless special measures are taken, "the lethal combination of knowledge explosion and population bulge may produce an 'employment fallout' beyond the power of normal economic growth to absorb."

Dir. Douglas Fraser of the UAW's Technical, Office & Professional Dept. (TOP), told the conference the union won more NLRB white collar elections in the first eight months of 1963 than in any full year since 1957.

"There's a great deal of uncertainty among white collar workers as to their future," he said. "It's just now coming to the surface as more and more automated machinery is moved into their offices. They know all about the high casualty rate that comes with automated processes out in the plant."

Irving Bluestone, administrative assistant to UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, observed that the nation does not know where automation is leading it. The speed of change is not fully understood, and each company "nurses" its own automation plans, denying the government access to information that could help determine the course of national planning that must, he said, be followed.

Bluestone repeated the UAW's call for establishment of a "technological clearing house, so as a nation we know where we're headed."

The conference agreed that America must develop a full employment program to absorb the unemployed.

British Unemployment Drops to 2.2 Percent

London — Unemployment in Great Britain dipped to 2.1 percent of the labor force in mid-September from mid-August's 2.2 percent and stood where it was in September 1962, the Labor Ministry reported.

The biggest drop in September figures in four years resulted in 485,390 workers looking for jobs and unable to find them, a decline of 16,624 from August. February unemployment was 3.9 percent of the labor force, or 878,356.

For Full Employment:

Increase in Mobility Seen Workers' Need

Greater labor mobility will be required in the years ahead to meet the problems posed by rapid technological change, the Labor Dept. declared in a new study on manpower problems.

"The process by which workers are matched with jobs in this country is beset by barriers, inefficiencies and inadequacies which will require great and specific efforts to overcome," the report said.

Private, individual decisions on the part of workers and employers must play a significant role in the development of a "stabilized, full employment labor market," the department study said, pointing to the fact that 8 million Americans changed jobs in 1961.

More workers than in the past will have to develop the mobility to "shift from less skilled jobs to more complex control, service, distribution and creative functions," the study noted, to keep up with technological change.

These workers may have to change their residences "as well as their occupation and industry," the report continued, and the trend will affect not only blue-collar but white-collar workers as well.

Workers change their jobs for two main reasons, the report observed—to improve their status or to find new work because of layoff. Each of these categories accounts for one-third of the job shifts.

Nearly half the job changes in 1961 involved a major shift in occupation or industry, with more unskilled workers involved in these moves than other groups.

While stressing the need for greater mobility in the labor force, the report stressed the need "to strengthen and redirect the educational and training processes by which workers are prepared for employment."

The study found that home ownership, employer hiring practices and seniority and pension systems were important factors in lessening the mobility of workers, adding:

"The need to supplement general measures of economic stimulation with special measures designed to improve the functioning of the labor market and the qualifications of the work force is evident."

NEW OFFICERS of the Barbers are shown as they received the congratulations of delegates at the close of the union's convention. Sec.-Treas. E. M. Sanders is at left. At right is Pres. Joseph N. DePaola, who succeeded William C. Birthright as president of the 73,000-member union.

North Carolina Council Again Picks Barbee

Asheville—Pres. W. M. Barbee of the North Carolina AFL-CIO won re-election for a two-year term in a contest with Walter P. Brown at the convention of the state central body here.

In another contested election, Vice Pres. Julius R. Fry won over P. R. Latta. Returned to office without opposition were Vice Presidents John E. Jervis and Russell Ange. Ted B. Davis was chosen to succeed Vice Pres. Robert Baker, who chose not to run again.

The convention called for legislation permitting county and municipal employes to join unions; prohibiting the use of strikebreakers; and outlawing state collection of poll taxes. The delegates endorsed federal aid to education; health care for the aged under social security, and other major AFL-CIO legislative objectives.

Major convention addresses were made by Daniel A. Powell of Memphis, COPE area director; Paul A. Askew, assistant to the president of the Operating Engineers, and others.

Askew said labor has been "short-changed" and is "losing its rights and privileges through increased governmental power." Powell expressed a need for honest and intelligent conservatives as well as liberals but said the "radical right" is neither honest nor intelligent.

The delegates elected five at-large vice presidents: Patrick Boyd of Hamlet, Railway Carmen; Mrs. Joyce Ross of Hendersonville, Ladies' Garment Workers; John Jennings of Greensboro, Transport Service Workers; Sam H. Scott of Winston-Salem, Stone Workers; and Mrs. Edith Truitt of Lexington, Clothing Workers.

AIW Comeback Cited; Griepentrog Returned

Chicago—All members of the Allied Industrial Workers can have a "great sense of pride" for the part they have played in bringing the union back from the "brink of extinction," Pres. Carl W. Griepentrog told delegates to the union's 14th biennial convention.

Griepentrog noted that just a few years ago, the AIW was under the corrupt influence of racketeers, with its financial resources "down to nothing," and under the threat of expulsion from the AFL-CIO.

Since then, he observed, "loyalty to our members has brought about a sound union" with a democratic structure that now embraces some 80,000 members.

Griepentrog and AIW Sec.-Treas. Gilbert Jewell were reelected to four-year terms. Also returned to office were Frank Evans, executive board member-at-large, and Regional Directors Carl Smigel of Cleveland, Dominick D'Ambrosio of Cincinnati, Ira Luplow of Saginaw, Mich., Edward T. Donahue of Lansing, Mich., V. Q. LaPage of Decatur, Ill., and Clifford Matchey of Milwaukee.

Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson, among the speakers in the closing days of the convention, told the delegates that the role of women workers "must be considered within the total concept of the change that is occurring in the entire labor force."

"The fact that women are working is only part of the change that is taking place in the design for living of many workers and citizens," she observed.

"But to subtract the present 23 million working women from the labor force," she pointed out, "would be eliminating one-third of the work force of the nation. Such a step would not solve our problem of unemployment, but create instant havoc."

Lumber Quota, Tariffs Draw IWA Opposition

Vancouver, B. C.—Delegates to the Woodworkers convention here voted firm opposition to high U.S. tariffs and the imposition of quotas on Canadian softwoods after hearing appeals from Allan MacEachen, Canada's federal labor minister, and Arthur Laing, Canadian minister of northern affairs.

MacEachen told the more than 300 delegates that the problems of the American lumber industry would not be solved by placing curbs on Canadian lumber exports. He said, however, that the question was "of the greatest concern" to Canada because higher tariffs "would further increase the imbalance of our trade with the U.S." and affect workers in the Canadian woods industry.

In other resolutions, the IWA went on record as opposing racial discrimination in union ranks, supporting Pres. Kennedy's legislative proposals on civil rights, and favoring a federal minimum wage rate of $2 an hour.

A proposal to increase the union's minimum dues from $3 to $4 was defeated by a close vote, and a resolution calling for a $5 monthly assessment to build a $10-million strike fund was referred to the executive board.

IWA Pres. Al Hartung was nominated for re-election without opposition, as were Sec.-Treas. William Botkin, First Vice Pres. Claude Ballard, Second Vice Pres. Ronald F. Roley and Trustee Rae Eddie.

Speakers included Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, T. C. Douglas, head of Canada's New Democratic Party, and CLC Vice Pres. Joseph Morris, former president of IWA Reg. 1.

CLC Aide Appointed To UN Delegation

Vancouver, B. C.—Appointment of Kalmen Kaplansky, director of the Intl. Affairs Dept. of the Canadian Labor Congress, as a member of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations General Assembly, was announced by Labor Minister Allan J. MacEachen during a speech at the Woodworkers convention.

Kaplansky, a member of the Typographical Union, also is a member of the Governing Body of the Intl. Labor Organization.

Labor Support Lauded By Vermont Governor

Newport, Vt.—Democratic Gov. Philip H. Hoff gave his thanks for the labor votes that helped elect him last year in a speech to the eighth annual convention of the Vermont AFL-CIO in which he also lauded the state's union movement for its effort to get progressive legislation through the 1963 session of the legislature.

Hoff, who had the state body's endorsement in his campaign in 1962, was one of a number of political figures who addressed the convention. They included his Republican lieutenant governor, Ralph A. Foote; Republican State Senators John Boylan and James L. Oakes, regarded as probable candidates for the nomination for lieutenant governor next year; Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R) and Rep. Robert T. Stafford (R).

The 100 delegates elected Carroll P. Comstock, Jr., Rutland, a member of Machinists Lodge 1590, secretary-treasurer of the state organization to succeed James R. Cross of St. Albans, who died of a heart attack while making preparations for the convention.

Lena Brown of Windsor, a member of Rubber Workers Local 289, was elected executive vice president to succeed Donald E. Conley, president of the same local, who did not seek reelection.

The delegates passed 22 resolutions, including one calling for the formation of local groups to "take action" against "reactionary organizations which fight to weaken labor unions while claiming to fight communism."

The labor council pledged solidarity "with the aims of our Negro American citizens," commended labor participants in the "March on Washington;" supported Pres. Kennedy's eight-point civil rights program; endorsed the recently-enacted Vermont Fair Employment Practices Act; backed the AFL-CIO legislative program; urged participation in the activities of farm organizations and asked all union members to contribute $1 to the Committee on Political Education.

A committee was named to seek funds to establish a yearly scholarship in memory of Cross, veteran trade unionist who had been secretary-treasurer of the labor council since it was set up. Most of the delegates attended a memorial mass for him in St. Mary's Church here.

Other speakers included AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Hugh Thompson; Reg. Dir. Arthur Brown of the U.S. Conciliation & Mediation Service; Most Rev. Robert F. Joyce, Catholic bishop of Vermont; Reg. Dir. Henry Murray of COPE; and Mrs. Stella Hackel, Vermont's new commissioner of employment security.

Pres. Ralph Williams and Mrs. Ruth Colombo, director of women's activities, were reelected without opposition.

Aim for '64 Elections, Minnesota Unions Urged

Minneapolis—Labor's legislative program went down the drain last November when conservatives won both houses of the Minnesota legislature, Pres. Robert A. Olson told delegates to the State AFL-CIO convention here.

Calling for a strong drive to elect friendly legislators in 1964, Olson said the state central body has had to fight hard to block legislation which would be harmful to unions and to the state.

The 800 delegates heard Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.) express the hope that congressional action on the railroad work rules dispute will not set a precedent for compulsory arbitration.

"Under the circumstances, it was the best we could do," he said.

Rep. Donald M. Fraser (D-Minn.) told the delegates he was confident that hospital care for the aged under social security could be enacted before the 1964 elections.

Walter Davis, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, stressed the need for unions to take the initiative in developing effective civil rights programs at the community level.

Labor's support for consumer protection legislation pending in Congress and the AFL-CIO's opposition to a so-called quality-stabilization bill which would enable manufacturers to control the retail prices of brand-name merchandise, was explained by Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Other convention speakers included Minnesota Gov. Karl Rolvaag, State Atty. Gen. Walter F. Mondale, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, Steelworkers Legislative Rep. John Sheehan, and Wesley McCune, director of Group Research.

This was an off-year for election of state AFL-CIO officers, whose terms have another year to run.

Vicki Vola Named AFTRA President

New York—Vicki Vola is the new president of the Television & Radio Artists. Formerly first vice president, she was elected as successor to Art Gilmore. Other new officers are Jud Conlon of Los Angeles, recording secretary, and Ray Heatherton, New York, treasurer.

Delegates to the annual convention at Los Angeles voted to hold the 1964 convention in Denver and elected these vice presidents: Tyler McVey, Los Angeles; Arwin Schweig, Chicago; David H. Schnabel, Kansas City; William H. Deal, Philadelphia; Evelyn Freyman, Washington, D. C.; Larry Ward, St. Louis; John Milton Kennedy, Los Angeles.

UAW-Intl. Harvester Agree on Arbitrator

Chicago—Gabriel L. Alexander, Detroit attorney, has been chosen by the Auto Workers and the Intl. Harvester Co. as disputes arbitrator under existing contracts. Alexander also serves as permanent arbitrator for the UAW and the Chrysler Corp.

House Approves $11.1 Billion Tax Cut

Finance Committee Poses Senate Delay

(Continued from Page 1)

designed primarily to pump money into the economy.

Mills, who helped hold all but a hard core of 26 southern Democrats in line for the bill, also stressed that Congress would be abdicating its powers if it made a tax cut contingent on a White House decision regarding spending levels.

Only one Republican—Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (Wis. — broke with his party's leadership on the key spending curb vote.

On the final passage vote, when there was no doubt as to the outcome, 48 Republicans voted with 223 Democrats for the bill. Opposing passage were 126 Republicans and 29 Democrats.

As sent to the Senate, the bill would cut individual income taxes $8.8 billion and corporation taxes by $2.3 billion over a two-year period. Two-thirds of the tax cut for individuals and one-half of the cut for corporations would become effective Jan. 1, 1964; the balance one year later.

For a family with two children, earning $5,000 a year and taking the standard deduction, taxes would be cut from the present $420 to $290 by 1965—a 31 percent reduction.

A $6,000-a-year family, with typical itemized deductions, would pay $343 instead of $456—a 25 percent cut.

The House bill eliminates the present 4 percent dividend credit—which the AFL-CIO has termed "one of the most glaring tax loopholes favoring wealthy stockholders." However, it also tightens up the sick pay tax exclusion by applying it only after 30 days of illness as contrasted to seven days at present.

A number of tax reforms originally requested by Kennedy are not in the House bill, and the AFL-CIO has said it will seek further loophole-closing provisions in the Senate.

Although the outlook for Senate passage is considered good, the bill must first clear the key Finance Committee headed by an arch-opponent of a tax cut—Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.). Byrd has indicated a leisurely timetable.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) told newsmen that he sees a legislative "collision" between the Administration's two high-priority programs—the tax bill and civil rights legislation.

Concern Expressed On Dominican Coup

The AFL-CIO is concerned "for the future of free labor" in the Dominican Republic and "deeply regrets" the forcible overthrow of the government, Andrew C. McLellan, the federation's inter-American representative declared.

Commenting on the coup that ended the 7-month-old, democratically elected Bosch regime, McLellan urged that constitutional procedures established under the previous government be re-established as soon as possible.

Noting that the new provisional government has said it will adhere to the 1962 constitution, the AFL-CIO representative declared "we assume the workers' rights to organize freely will be maintained and that the new regime will ensure that its policies are representative of all non-Communist parties and democratic elements of the country."

The Bosch government was the first legally elected government in the Dominican Republic in 33 years and came after the assassination of Gen. Rafael Trujillo ended a 30-year military dictatorship.

Local Collects $7,121 From Closed Firm

Newark, N. J.—It took three years of court action, but Retail Clerks Local 21 finally collected $7,121 for former members whose last pay checks bounced when the Dennison Product Co. went out of business.

Distribution of the proceeds to the former employes, who had been covered by a union contract while working for Dennison, required a full week.

HONOR STUDENTS from Chicago high schools interview AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany after his speech to the Chicago Executives' Club. The students were invited by the club's Youth Committee.

Short Answers Make the Point

Chicago — AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany needed only one word to answer two of the questions asked by members of the Chicago Executives' Club following his speech.

"Do you believe in Khrushchev's good intentions?" he was asked.

"No," Meany replied.

"Do you consider Hoffa a detriment to the union cause?"

"Yes," said Meany.

City Loses Appeal On Public Unions

Sacramento—The California Supreme Court reaffirmed a previous ruling upholding the rights of public employes to join bona fide labor unions despite local laws to the contrary.

The court rejected an appeal by the city of Los Angeles from the earlier decision that state laws take precedence over local ordinances which upheld the right of city employes to join Fire Fighters Local 748.

The high court's decision reversed a finding made last March by the 2d District Court of Appeals in Los Angeles that a state law guaranteeing union rights did not apply to Los Angeles because it is a chartered city. The Fire Fighters had challenged that finding.

Meany Urges Business To Aid in Latin America

(Continued from Page 1)

who have helped support the American Institute for Free Labor Development, even though the institute's success in building a strong, free trade union movement will mean "tougher collective bargaining problems" for U.S. overseas operations.

"We have come a long way," Meany said, "from the days of banana republics, when American companies . . . made their deals with local tyrants, without regard to the welfare of the population. Mr. Grace and others like him are well aware that the choice today is between democracy and Castroism; and that if democracy is to win, it must meet the needs and the desires of the people, starting with a higher standard of living."

The young people trained by the institute, Meany emphasized, "are not engaged in mere academic exercises."

"They are on the firing line—sometimes literally—in the struggle to turn back a well-organized Communist attempt to seize the labor movements in their countries," he said.

The wife and child of one AIFLD graduate in Honduras "were seriously beaten in the street by Communist toughs," Meany recounted, but the fight to oust Communist leadership was successful.

The U.S. business community should realize, Meany said, that "just as there are no free trade unions except in free, democratic nations, there is no such thing as a free, democratic nation without a free labor movement. . . . So if some of you are tempted to wish that unions would disappear, pause for a second thought. If our freedom is destroyed, yours will disappear as well."

No 'Exact Image'

Both business and labor must recognize that "this country cannot build other nations exactly in the American image," Meany said.

He added:

"If the people of a nation freely choose certain political and economic forms, and remain free to change them, we should not be concerned about the forms themselves. For they have the essential quality of democracy—self-determination."

Inviting the "active help of American business" in support of programs to assist freedom throughout the world, Meany declared:

"While unions and management may quarrel over the terms of a contract; while the AFL-CIO and business spokesmen may be deeply divided on a wide range of domestic issues, from fiscal policy to federal housing, they should stand together in the great struggle of our times, the struggle that will determine the future and perhaps the survival of mankind."

9-28-63

"LABOR—THE PAST 50 YEARS", 36 cases of historical material loaned by Philadelphia local and international unions, went on display on Labor Day in the Philadelphia Free Library and will remain on exhibit until Thanksgiving. Arranged with the help of the Education Committee of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO, it includes a copy of "Land of Promise," Labor Day film donated by the national AFL-CIO. Shown at its presentation are, from left, AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Henry McFarland; George Holoway, head of the library's Educational Films Dept.; Philadelphia AFL-CIO Pres. Norman Blumberg and Deputy Dir. Helen D. Hutchinson of the Library.

Social Security Funds Found in Close Balance

(Continued from Page 1)

the old-age, survivors and disability insurance program and that at the end of June 1963 about 18.5 million people were being paid benefits at the $1.3 billion per month rate.

At the beginning of 1963 about 78 percent of all persons aged 65 and over were eligible to receive benefits. This is expected to reach 89 percent by the end of the year and will continue to increase to 93 to 95 percent in the future.

As of June 30, 1962, the assets of the OASI fund were $19.6 billion and the disability fund $2.5 billion. For the fiscal year 1962, OASI fund outgo exceeded income by $1.3 billion but it is estimated that the five fiscal years 1963 through 1967 will produce an increase in assets to $22 billion.

The disability fund income and outgo balanced out during the year despite a 46 percent increase in expenditures. However, to prevent an anticipated decline in fund assets, the trustees recommend that the law be changed so that a small portion of the increase in social security rates scheduled for 1966 will be allocated to the disability fund.

The trustees reported that for the combined OASI and disability program, administrative expenses amounted to 2.3 percent of the benefits paid. This included costs of the Treasury Dept. in collecting the taxes and preparing benefit checks.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Oct. 5, 1963 | No. 40

Unemployment Hits 5.6%, Rate Unchanged Over Year

DESIGN OF STAMP which will honor Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt was unveiled in simple ceremonies at the Post Office Dept. in Washington at which Postmaster Gen. John Gronouski (right) was joined by her son, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), and Hyman H. Bookbinder (left), director of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation. Mrs. Roosevelt is the first First Lady to be so honored since Martha Washington.

In Biennial Report:

Rights Commission Endorses FEP Law

A unanimous Civil Rights Commission has recommended strong new legislative and executive action to wipe out racial discrimination in the United States. It endorsed, for the first time, a broad federal fair employment law, long urged by the AFL-CIO as the keystone to civil rights progress.

The commission's life formally expired Sept. 30, the day after its report was submitted to the President and Congress. But the Senate, by a bipartisan 70-15 vote, approved a one-year extension. The House was expected to follow suit. A longer, possibly a permanent extension, is expected to be part of the omnibus civil rights bill to be acted on later this year.

In its third biennial report, the commission found "an atmosphere of genuine hopefulness" in the drive toward equal rights and opportunity.

All levels of government, it reported, have been "increasingly active in the protection of the rights of their citizens." A growing number of religious and civic groups have helped awaken the nation to its responsibilities, the commission declared. Pres. Kennedy has provided guidance, and "the nation now appears to be moving toward the eradication of slavery's lingering after-effects."

But this new hope, the six-member commission cautioned, "is no cause for complacency."

Still a 'Broad Gulf'

The commission found there remains "a broad gulf between the abandonment of enforced segregation and the achievement of a society in which race or color is not a factor in the hiring or promotion of an employe, in the sale of a home, or in the educational opportunity offered a child."

When the commission was established six years ago, the report noted, "there was some hope that voting would prove to be the key to the other aspects of civil rights. . . . This hope was implicit in the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960, but it has proved to be an oversimplification

(Continued on Page 7)

Senate Committee Told:

Productivity Rise Takes Toll in Jobs

Sharply rising productivity in a slowly growing economy is wiping out factory jobs and could result in increased unemployment, a Labor Dept. expert indicated in testimony before a congressional committee.

Automation and technological change, the major factors in rising output per manhour, can cause "sharp dislocation" in employment, Leon Greenberg of the Bureau of Labor Statistics told a Senate Labor subcommittee. In a "maximum employment" economy "the shifts may be accomplished easily," he said, but "if output is not increasing fast enough" then "long-term and high-level ratios of unemployment may arise."

Greenberg, assistant BLS commissioner for productivity and technological developments, estimated that in the five-year period 1957-61, nearly 200,000 factory workers' jobs were wiped out each year because of the sharp and sustained rise in productivity.

He told the subcommittee that output per manhour in manufacturing increased more than 4 percent a year in both 1961 and 1962 and that two successive years of large increases "is somewhat unusual."

The productivity rate for 1957-62 increased at an annual average of 3.4 percent, Greenberg said, "substantially higher" than the 1953-58 years and the average postwar rate of 2.7 percent.

Margin 'Very Small'

In contrast, actual production of goods and services, which ran higher than the increase in output per manhour between 1947 and 1957, has barely exceeded the average productivity gain since 1957 "so the

(Continued on Page 8)

Military Get $1.2 Billion Pay Boost

Congress voted members of the armed forces their first pay raise in five years and the increase—promptly signed by Pres. Kennedy "with pleasure"—will pump $1.2 billion a year into the nation's economy.

Some 2 million officers and servicemen on active duty—excluding only draftees and two-year volunteers—will receive increases averaging 14.4 percent. An additional million reservists, National Guard members and retirees will benefit by varying amounts.

The Senate voted unanimously for the pay hike and the House then approved it with only five dissenting votes.

Strong bipartisan support also assured at least a stop-gap extension of the Civil Rights Commission for an additional year. The Senate approved the bill with only 15 southern Democrats opposed, and House leaders hoped to pass it quickly under a suspension of the rules procedure, which requires a two-

(Continued on Page 8)

September Shifts Held 'Seasonal'

The nation's unemployment problem remained unimproved in September as the Labor Dept. reported only seasonal changes in the job picture with the mass return of teenagers to school.

The key jobless rate, adjusted for such seasonal influences, moved up again to 5.6 percent from 5.5 percent in August. This means 56 of every 1,000 workers in the labor force were actively seeking jobs and could not find them.

The 5.6 percent rate is the same as in September a year ago. The low for the month in postwar Septembers was the 2.9 percent jobless in 1953.

The Labor Dept.'s summary report said employment and unemployment both declined seasonally in September "as the reopening of schools brought the usual large reduction in the teen-age work force."

The unemployed total dropped by 350,000 as expected to 3.5 million, the same as a year ago.

Adult Rate Unchanged

Jobless rates for adult workers were unchanged over the month, at 4.1 percent for men and 5.8 percent for women. The rate for teenagers remained in the 14 to 16

(Continued on Page 8)

Philadelphia Orchestra Contract Gives Musicians 52 Weeks Pay

Philadelphia—A revolutionary new approach to collective bargaining for symphony musicians has given members of the noted Philadelphia Orchestra a new three-year contract with an unprecedented guarantee of 52 weeks' pay in the final year.

It also provides for a $10 increase that boosts the weekly minimum wage from $190 to $200 and freezes the rate for the life of the agreement.

It works up to the full employment finale by guaranteeing the 106 members of Musicians Local 77 who compose the orchestra 40 weeks' pay during the first year of the pact and 47 weeks during the second year.

Beginning with the third year the orchestra will have the exclusive right to services of the members, many of whom have had to teach or take other side jobs to make ends meet. However, permission for outside work may be granted if it does not interfere with orchestra requirements.

Sec.-Treas. A. A. Tomei of Local 77 said the full year of paychecks will include "pop" and educational concerts in addition to the regular symphony season—plus four weeks of paid vacation.

"This is something new in labor-management relations," declared Tomei. "It's revolutionary. Symphony orchestra players simply cannot exist from the income of a regular season. The generosity of the public toward them pending subsidized music of this type has been nothing short of extraordinary."

Members of the orchestra had 42 weeks of work last season. In past years they have had as little as 30 weeks.

Players Negotiated

Tomei said the agreement was negotiated not by the officers of the local but by a committee of five members of the orchestra who spent most of the summer in sessions with five directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association led by the association president, C. Wanton Balis.

(Continued on Page 2)

Meany Backs Shorter Hours For Porters

The Sleeping Car Porters, reduced in numbers by the slashing of rail passenger service but still working the equivalent of a 51-hour workweek, were assured of the AFL-CIO's full support in their drive for shorter hours, higher pay and greater job security.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany joined Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Porters in a news conference called to serve notice that the union is prepared to strike, if necessary, to win "economic and social justice."

He also accompanied Randolph to the final public session of the Presidential Emergency Board set up to make recommendations to settle the dispute and avert a nationwide rail shutdown. The board's report is due Oct. 20, and the Railway Labor Act bars a strike for 30 days thereafter.

Meany told newsmen it is "high time" the sleeping car porters achieved parity with other railroad workers and with workers in other industries, many al-

(Continued on Page 3)

THE FINE ART of filleting meat is taught by Executive Chef Marcel Haentzler of New York's Americana Hotel (in tall hat, center) to one of the first trainees in new apprentice training program for cooks and other hotel workers. The program, first of its kind in New York under the Manpower Development & Training Act, is sponsored by Hotel Workers Local 6, the New York Hotel Association, the U.S. Labor Dept. and the State Labor Dept.

Union 'Fry Cooks' Get Haute Cuisine Course

New York—An on-the-job training program to help make fine chefs out of so-so "fry cooks" is under way at the Americana Hotel here under the sponsorship of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, the hotel industry and the federal and state governments.

The union and the industry, concerned over the dwindling supply of local talent and great European chefs, applied for a federal subsidy and got one—the first of its kind in New York hotels under the Manpower Development & Training Act, according to Regional Dir. Neil Kort of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

The union's Local 6, with 27,000 members in hotels, motels and clubs here, has asked for similar apprentice-training programs in 20 other major hotels and, with the help of the New York Hotel Trades Council and the employers' association, plans to sponsor on-the-job programs also in hotel dining rooms and white collar departments.

By opening time for the World's Fair, an enlarged corps of skilled chefs should be ready for the expected influx of extra visitors, union and management are confident.

The pilot project at the Americana started with six trainees. Enrolled for a 40-week course, they will work seven hours a day at their regular jobs and two hours, at straighttime pay, in one kitchen skill after another, to qualify as roundsmen—all-around cooks qualified to star in any culinary task.

James Walker, relief fry cook in the Americana kitchen and one of the trainees, was asked by the Local 6 publication, "Voice," why he volunteered for training. He holds a college bachelor of science degree, took courses in dietetics and catering.

"I never got a chance to apply what I learned until this chance came along," he said. "I seemed to be stuck with fry cook jobs—and I was ready to quit."

The other trainees are Victor Lassiter, pastry cook; Domingo Rivera, oven man; Jack Nell, cold cuts manager; Rene Ramos, kitchen helper, and Silfredo Santana, poultry man.

Said Executive Chef Marcel Haentzler of the Americana: "The only way really to train cooks and chefs is in a great kitchen." On-the-job training, he observed, is the key.

Handicapped Hiring Film to Be Shown

The first showing of "They Have What It Takes," new labor-sponsored film on the hiring of handicapped workers, has been set for Oct. 8 at Washington headquarters of the Motion Picture Association of America, Inc.

The showing will be for members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council; the executive board of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and top government and civic leaders during the week set aside by Congress, and proclaimed by the President, as National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week.

The film was produced by Gerald Productions, Inc., for the AFL-CIO in cooperation with the IBEW and the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, of which IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman is vice chairman.

College Tuition Rates Show Sharp Increase

Median tuition charges for undergraduates at 851 private colleges and universities have jumped $206 in the last four years—from $534 for the 1958-9 school year to $740 for 1962-3, the U.S. Office of Education has reported on the basis of a new survey.

Increases by 514 publicly-supported colleges and universities in the same period were considerably less—from $134 to $183, or $49, for state residents, and from $338 to $449, or $111, for out-of-state students, the study showed.

The figures reflect only returns from educational institutions which responded in both years—about two-thirds of all those queried.

They showed that 98 percent of the private colleges and universities raised tuition and fees over the period. At the same time 81 percent of the publicly-supported institutions boosted charges to state residents and 91 percent increased fees for students from other states.

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly expressed concern that rapidly rising tuition rates make it increasingly difficult for the sons and daughters of workers to attend college, regardless of how well qualified they may be. The 1961 convention of the federation called for a program of federal scholarship aid to assure qualified young people full opportunity for higher education.

The survey showed that 19 percent of the private institutions managed to hold their cost increases to $100 or less for a two-semester academic year; 32 percent raised fees from $101 to $200; 26 percent from $201 to $399, and slightly more than 20 percent by $301 or more.

On the other hand, increases for state students were held by the public colleges and universities to $100 or less in more than 7 out of 10 instances. Boosts ranged from $101 to $200 in 8 percent and from $201 to $300 in 1 percent.

Half the institutions in the same group held increases to $100 or less for out-of-state residents; 29 percent put into effect increases of $101 to $200; 10 percent from $201 to $300, and 2 percent $301 or more.

Indiana Court Clears Head Of Carpenters

Indianapolis—The Indiana Supreme Court, throwing out a trial court conviction, has cleared Carpenters Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson of alleged conspiracy to bribe state highway officials.

A four-judge panel in a unanimous ruling held that the record of the 1960 trial was "simply devoid of facts and circumstances" establishing the charges of conspiracy, involving real estate transactions with the state.

The state Supreme Court's decision, written by Judge Frederick Landis, went on to observe that funds received by Hutcheson in the transactions "might well have been merely a reward for the risking of his personal capital in an ordinary business venture."

He rejected testimony concerning a conversation between Hutcheson and another union official over where county roads were to be built, holding that the discussion "could as well have pertained to a plan to put carpenters to work."

40-Cent Raises Won In First Agreement

Toronto, Ont.—Wage increases up to 40 cents an hour were won for members of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 540 in a first contract at the Holophane Co.

Concert Season Threatened:

National Symphony Offer Turned Down

Members of Washington's National Symphony Orchestra voted in a secret ballot referendum to reject the "ultimate final" contract offer of the Symphony Association and left for later determination a decision on whether the players will report for rehearsals and the opening concert later this month.

The vote to reject was 67 to 2, officers of Musicians Local 161 announced. They expressed willingness to resume negotiations and determination to get a "professional" scale of wages and conditions for the 94 members of the orchestra, whose conductor is Howard Mitchell.

Management's "final" offer called for a new three-year contract with weekly raises of $5 the first year, $5 the second year and $6.25 the third; a minimum annual salary of $5,000 a year and a 32-week season, as against last year's $4,480 and 32 weeks.

Union Pres. Sam Jack Kaufman and Executive Sec. J. Martin Emerson said the musicians have been asking weekly raises of $10, $12.50 and $15, or a guarantee of about $6,000 a year for a longer season of 33 to 37 consecutive weeks, plus a number of other contract improvements.

Although negotiations began last January at the height of the orchestra season, members of the symphony disbanded in mid-May without knowing if they would have jobs in the fall, union spokesmen said.

They accused management representatives of "deliberately stalling" the negotiations to bring economic pressure on orchestra members, through fear of loss of employment, to get them to agree to an inferior contract. They cited the "casual" attitude of management and infrequent meetings despite union pleas that the negotiations be stepped up.

During the summer off-season, the union said, a few players were "fortunate enough to find occasional musical employment," but most musicians were forced to take jobs unrelated to their skills and experience.

A union survey showed that to supplement their annual guaranteed salary base, some National Symphony members drive taxicabs, one is a baker, another a construction worker, several are guards in public buildings, others sell cars, brushes and encyclopedias. A number live with their parents or try to collect unemployment insurance, the survey showed.

"It is this sort of lackluster future that the players, most of whom are college graduates owning costly instruments, with years of dedicated learning and practice invested, are trying to improve," the union negotiators said.

$21.1 Billion In 100 Largest Welfare Plans

The 100 largest employe welfare and pension plans in the U.S. had total assets of $21.1 billion at the end of 1961—more than the combined assets of all other private plans which reported to the Labor Dept. under the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

Only one of the plans was administered by a labor organization. Eight had joint labor-management administration, and the remaining 91 plans were solely in the hands of employers.

Assets of the 100 largest plans increased during the year from $17.8 billion, or 53.3 percent of the total assets of the more than 120,000 plans covered by the tabulation, at the end of 1960. Projections indicate the same plans will have total assets of more than $25 billion by the end of 1963.

All plans included in the study provide pension or retirement benefits save one, a supplementary unemployment benefit plan.

Investments in bonds and stocks accounted for 88 percent of the assets; mortgages and real estate 8 percent, cash 1 percent and all others 3 percent.

Copies of the analysis are available from the Labor Dept.'s Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports, Washington 25, D. C.

Philadelphia Orchestra Signs 52-Week Contract

(Continued from Page 1)

No other major orchestra has a guaranteed 52-week year of employment, although members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have work for practically the full year.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is conducted by Eugene Ormandy, who was one of the instructors at the past summer's session of the Congress of Strings, which the international union holds at Michigan State University for the free instruction of budding players of string instruments.

"This new arrangement," he said, "brings to realization a lifelong dream for me.

"It places the musicians of the orchestra on a professional plane comparable with that of senior professors and other faculty members in leading universities. It gives them a dignity and security which, in some degree, they have heretofore lacked."

Ormandy said that 35 and 40 weeks of work a year "has forced many of my employes to seek outside work . . . in order to make ends meet."

"Very often," he added, "this extra work has not been compatible with professional standing which should attach to membership in a great symphony orchestra. It has also placed an intolerable burden upon their strength and endurance."

Paul Hume, the noted music critic, writing in the Washington Post, said a Philadelphia-type agreement "is a step which is absolutely necessary for any orchestra which wishes to call itself first-class." He maintained there is no argument but that musicians who are forced to spend half the year, or nearly half, away from their music "do not remain in top form."

"It is also one of the manifest injustices of our present state of musical development," he observed, "that we do not offer this as a minimum to our musicians, from whom we ask literally everything at the time of performance."

At Parley on Seniors:

Unions Seen Using Skills of Retirees

Detroit—Wider use of retired union members to teach new skills to others and continued efforts by labor to improve its services to retired workers were called for here at the AFL-CIO's first National Conference on Senior Citizen Centers.

"We must find ways to serve the retired worker as well as ways to use the retired worker," said Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities in a keynote address to more than 100 delegates from labor, health and welfare agencies, and government.

One desirable way, he said, would be to permit retired workers to transmit their skills and knowledge to others, including minority group members and school dropouts.

"A person who has no purpose is not served," said Perlis.

Pointing out that labor has shown a continuing concern for the retiree, he called for new ways to improve services to such workers, particularly through senior citizen centers.

"We all share the same fears," he said, "fears of loss of job, health, youth and, most important, the loss of purpose in life."

Labor, he continued, wants to help the senior citizen overcome these fears.

Jack Ossofsky, director of retirement and community services for Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Dist. 65, New York City, suggested pre-retirement instruction programs to prepare workers for a more enjoyable life in retirement.

Programs should "encourage senior citizens to use their time, rather than to kill it," he said.

Other major points developed at the conference:

- Persons over 65 frequently have a highly developed interest in political activity.

In past national elections they have represented up to a fourth of those voting, according to a report by Executive Dir. James C. O'Brien of the Steelworkers' Committee on Older & Retired Workers.

- The number of centers for retired and older workers exceeds 700, and the number is growing every year.

This figure was provided by Jean Maxwell, consultant for the National Council on Aging, who reported also that union leaders are playing a major role in developing services for the aging.

- Labor should be encouraged to develop better programs at its centers.

Julius Rothman of the AFL-CIO-CSA staff reported a growing interest in senior centers on the part of local labor groups.

Chicago Hails Joint Board's 50-Year Role

Chicago—For 50 years, jurisdictional disputes in Chicago's construction industry have been settled peacefully through a labor-management Joint Conference Board.

More than 900 union, management and civic leaders hailed this half-century record at an anniversary dinner, and Mayor Richard J. Daley expressed the city's thanks for what he termed "the best labor-employer relations" in the nation.

Harvard Prof. John T. Dunlop, impartial chairman of the national Construction Industry Joint Conference, told the gathering that the Chicago board "was born out of travail and turmoil—now it serves as a model for the entire nation."

A telegram from Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced that the board, in "special recognition" of its achievement over the years, will be presented with the Labor Dept.'s Award of Merit.

Earl J. McMahon, president, and Thomas J. Nayder, secretary-treasurer, of the Building Trades Council, also addressed the anniversary dinner. Both are members of the Joint Conference Board by virtue of their union posts.

SUPPORT FOR Sleeping Car Porters' drive to reduce their 51-hour workweek is voiced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at joint news conference with Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Porters, right.

New Training Center Planned by Seafarers

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Plans to build a tuition-free training school here on the waterfront for merchant marine seamen have been announced by the Seafarers.

On completion of a new $250,000 building on Flatbush Ave. with piers extending into Mill Basin, the union will move its present training facilities from 675 Fourth Ave., Brooklyn.

The project was announced by SIU Pres. Paul Hall and Leo Brown, city commissioner of marine and aviation, after approval by the city Board of Estimate of a 10-year lease to the union of city-owned waterfront property at annual rental of $1,200.

The school will prepare apprentices for shipboard services in the U.S. merchant marine, with a training course for higher ratings up to second and third engineers and mates, a lifeboat-manning school, and upgrading courses for deck, engine and steward personnel.

The center will be open to all applicants who are members of, or registered with the SIU or affiliated unions without regard to race, color or creed, it was announced. No state or federal subsidy will be provided.

All costs will be administered under joint trusteeship by the SIU and the maritime industry. The building program, scheduled for completion next summer, includes school buildings, a cafeteria, piers, parking facilities and landscaping. The union said it will involve dredging, construction of a rigging loft, rehabilitation of bulkhead walls and fenders, and other improvements. Upon termination of the lease, title to the property, comprising 50,000 square feet of upland and 30,000 square feet under water, will revert to the city.

Maritime Administrator Donald W. Alexander said the training school will benefit the city, the industry and the nation because of the need for skilled seamen. The center also is significant, he said, for opening apprenticeship and job advancement opportunities to minority group members.

The latter point "strongly influenced" the city's Board of Estimates in approving a lease, said Brown.

"Experience has proved there is a constant need for trained, efficient shipboard personnel to serve as a reservoir of manpower for the American merchant fleet," Hall added.

The union has an option to renew its lease for an additional 10 years at $1,320 a year.

Meany Backs Shorter Hours For Porters

(Continued from Page 1)

ready on workweeks below 40 hours.

There is "absolutely no justice" in the railroads' refusal to reduce hours, Meany said.

Randolph declared that winning a reduction of hours is "a life and death economic struggle" for his union.

'No Hope' Without Cut

With the job-displacing pace of technology, Randolph declared, there is "no hope for our men unless there is a reduction of the workmonth."

The union's members, employed by the Pullman Co. and three railroads which also operate sleeping cars, now work a basic 205-hour month and are paid only straight-time rates for overtime up to 35 hours a month.

The union is also asking a 25-cent wage increase to restore the relative age level which existed prior to 1960.

The third demand, for job security in the face of mergers and technological displacement, is "of special importance to the Sleeping Car Porters," Randolph said. The union, he pointed out, is the only railroad brotherhood not covered by the Washington Job Protection Agreement of 1936 which protects employes displaced by mergers.

Randolph said his union's membership had voted 98 percent to strike in support of their demands and a walkout had been called for July 1, when Pres. Kennedy intervened through the appointment of an emergency board.

Meany agreed, in response to a question, that a strike by the Porters might again lead to management demands for congressional action to avert a nationwide rail shutdown. He said that if rail workers must "forego the right to strike because of a paramount public interest, then we must consider whether the public interest calls for public ownership."

That may be the answer for the rail industry, Meany said, "much as we would hate to see it come about."

Metalworkers Pledge Program to End 'Want'

Geneva—The central committee of the Intl. Metalworkers Federation mounted an attack on "want and hardship" in the countries where they still prevail at a meeting here at which time nine new organizations were accepted as affiliates.

"The IMF will redouble its efforts, by promoting strong, democratic trade unions, independent of employers, governments and external influences, to awaken social conscience throughout the world, advance social progress and bring about welfare and peace," the resolution said.

Approval was given to a program that highlighted increased educational and organizational activities, with special emphasis on the developing countries.

Daniel Benedict, IMF assistant general secretary, and Ben D. Segal, education and international affairs director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, reported on organizational and educational activities in Latin America. Segal also outlined the dangers faced by the trade union movement in British Guiana.

The committee had a one-day session with Pres. Arne Geijer and Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions at which relations of the international trade secretaries to the ICFTU was discussed. The IMF, composed of unions with more than 8 million members, is the largest of the trade bodies.

In addition to Segal, the U.S. delegation included Victor G. Reuther and Nat Weinberg of the Auto Workers; Ray Pasnick, Eugene Maurice and Meyer Bernstein of the Steelworkers, and Harold Buoy of the Boiler Makers.

Kaiser Bonus $39 for August

Oakland, Calif.—August sharing plan bonuses for Steelworkers at Kaiser Steel Corp.'s Fontana, Calif., plant averaged 24 cents an hour, or $39 per man.

The bonuses, based on savings in the cost of material, supplies and labor, were at the lowest level since the labor-management sharing plan began six months ago.

Prior payments had ranged from 66 cents an hour in April to 40 cents in July, or from $95 to $65.

The August savings totaled $480,000, with $189,000 of that amount going to eligible employes under the formula agreed to by management and labor.

'Brotherhood' Film For Sale and Rent

"In Common Brotherhood," the film produced by the AFL-CIO to tell the story of labor's contribution toward building a free world, has been released for use by unions and in the community.

This 27-minute film was first seen on television by millions of Americans on Labor Day. It depicts the AFL-CIO's worldwide activities designed to help the free trade union movements of other countries develop themselves into stable, democratic institutions.

"In Common Brotherhood" is being distributed by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. It can be rented through the film division for $3. Reservations should be made three weeks in advance and alternative dates should be given. Prints may be purchased at $50 for affiliates and $95 for other organizations.

Rail Arbitration Hearing Opens Up with Clash

Rail unions and management clashed at the opening of arbitration hearings over the scope of the work rules issues to be decided by a seven-man panel.

Management wanted to start from the beginning, arguing that all firemen-helper positions in freight and yard service should be abolished.

The rail brotherhoods reminded the arbitration panel that Congress "deliberately confined the scope of arbitration to the narrowest possible area" and directed the board to include in its decision "any matters on which the parties were in agreement."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has submitted to the arbitrators a memorandum showing areas of agreement and near-agreement reached through mediation and negotiation.

Lester P. Schoene, one of the union attorneys, told the arbitration panel that both sides had earlier accepted the principle that jobs could be eliminated only if it would not have an adverse effect on safety, put an undue burden on other employes, or interfere with adequate services to the public.

Meanwhile, in another development having a bearing on railroad employment, the Justice Dept. told the Interstate Commerce Commission that a merger of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York Central Railroad "would not be in the public interest."

Railroad unions have vigorously opposed the merger application, contending it would lessen service to the public, throw thousands out of work, and weaken the financial stability of other railroads.

The Justice Dept. said it had no objections to a number of other proposed mergers but feared that amalgamation of the two giant systems would "eliminate a vast amount of beneficial rail competition" and deprive important areas of a choice of service.

Human Rights Aide Named by Brown

Sacramento, Calif.—Gov. Edmund G. Brown has appointed William Becker, Sonoma, to the newly-created position of assistant to the governor for human rights.

Becker is a member of Cemetery Workers Local 265 and was its business representative from 1953 to 1957. He has been Jewish Labor Committee area representative since 1953, and also has been secretary and legislative advocate for the California Committee for Fair Practices.

Productivity and Jobs

THE EVIDENCE is mounting that rising and sustained productivity, triggered by automation and technological change, is taking its toll of factory jobs and propelling corporate profits to record-shattering heights.

Latest report is a conservative estimate from the Labor Dept. that in the four-year period 1957-61 a minimum of 200,000 factory jobs a year were eliminated by rising productivity. The increase in output per manhour during those years is based almost completely on introduction of automated processes and equipment.

A rise in productivity is normal as the economy swings upward from a recession period. But in the past year or two, instead of dropping off, the productivity rate has continued to maintain a high sustained level, and there are indications that it is continuing to rise.

This trend has been visible as profit reports continue to shatter previous records at the same time workers are knocked off payrolls.

The job loss figures are a serious cause for concern. When coupled with the continuing increase in the labor force and an economy burdened with a high and persistent rate of unemployment and less than maximum use of all its resources, the outlook is far from the optimistic one voiced in current predictions for a continued high level of economic activity.

Tax and manpower policies hold some of the answers to the problem. The economic stimulus provided in the House-passed tax bill is vitally needed to help create jobs for the new members of the labor force as well as those displaced from other jobs. Training and retraining programs are essential to bring workers with required skills into the job market.

All these plus movement toward reducing the workweek are critical elements of an overall approach if automation and rising productivity are to be used to benefit the entire nation.

The Battle Shifts

A TAX BILL designed to stimulate the economy and create jobs has cleared its first hurdle with House passage of the $11.1 billion tax cut measure by a handy margin.

There is little doubt that the measure, improved to provide greater equity in the tax system, can win Senate approval when it is sent to the floor. The problem at the moment is the delaying tactics of the Senate Finance Committee and its chairman, Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.).

Byrd and other conservative Democrats and all Republican members of the committee have indicated that they plan long and extended hearings on the tax bill, hearings designed to delay action on a bill they basically oppose. They hope to prevent a vote during the current session of Congress.

There is a need for short, intensive hearings on the House-passed measure so that some of the weaknesses of the bill can be strengthened and the measure improved. This can be done quickly and the measure sent to the full Senate for a vote.

Congressional action is essential this year on a tax measure that will provide the economy with the strength and vitality to turn back the threat of a new recession. The Senate must not be denied the opportunity to vote on a tax cut bill because of the obstructionist tactics of a handful of men whose economic theories date from another century.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Oct. 5, 1963 No. 40

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Something's Out of Whack

Idaho Democrat Finds:

Nostalgia, Oversimplification Bane of Western Republicans

The following is excerpted from an address by Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) at the recent Western States Democratic Conference at Salt Lake City.

THE WESTERN and midwestern segments of the Republican Party seem never to have wanted to grow up. The Republicanism of the Mountain and Prairie states has never gotten over its nostalgic romance with the lawless, trigger-happy days, the careless exploitation, the get-rich-quick temperament of the old frontier. Neither has the western branch of Republicanism ever managed to shake off its addiction to oversimplification.

Politics, like any western shoot-'em-up, is divided between the good guys and the bad guys. Republicans are good; Democrats are bad. State and local governments are good; the federal government is bad. Spending for warfare is good; spending for welfare is bad. All foreigners who side with us are good; all who do not are bad.

This is their prescription. It affords an easy sanctuary for those who prefer not to face up to the complexities of our time. It is a prescription which leads inevitably to extremes. How else could it happen that so broad a segment of the Republican Party could seriously espouse, glorify, and thrust up a man for the presidency of the United States, who has said: "I fear Washington and centralized government more than I fear Moscow."

My friends, this is not the calm voice of conservatism; it is the frantic voice of fanaticism. It does not represent the mainstream of Republican tradition. It is, rather, a repudiation of responsible Republicanism and all for which it stands.

Walter Lippmann, the dean of American journalists, brilliantly contrasts the Goldwater doctrine with the historic role of the Republican Party in national affairs. The core of the senator's philosophy, Lippmann writes, "is opposition to the federal government as a guarantor of personal freedom and as protector of the national welfare."

"To the senator the federal government is a kind of foreign power which must be reduced and distrusted," Lippmann continued. "Sen. Goldwater regards himself as a Republican. But to be the kind of Republican he professes to be, he must disavow and disown the whole heritage of Hamilton, Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt. For Hamilton was the principal founder of the federal union. Lincoln was the preserver of the federal union and Theodore Roosevelt was the first President to see that the United States would be involved as a world power and that the federal government would have to become the regulator of an industrial society. These men, the greatest of the Republicans, stood for a strong and evolving federal power, not for a loose and impotent confederation of states."

IT IS THE GOLDWATER brand of Republicanism against which we must prepare to wage the coming campaign. We must examine its tenets with care, and prepare ourselves for the political spookshow with which it hopes to frighten voters into the Republican column in 1964.

We westerners bear a special responsibility for Barry Goldwater. As matters now stand, he is the West's gift to the country. He has presumed to claim that this is Goldwater territory.

Let's let the country know that most Westerners have staying power; we're confident that we can win over communism because we have faith in the strength of freedom. Let's let the country know that the western tradition means more than trigger-happy gunmen, blackjack dealers, and the flash of gold in the pan; it also means good farms where the land is loved and cared for, great cities built brick by brick, and kids who can look forward to a life worth living.

There was a high price tag on this western country. It wasn't easy to get here, when our ancestors came, and it hasn't been easy to stay. It's taken a lot of time, and a lot of faith, to make it the sweet land it is. Let's not forsake it for fools-gold when history calls us to account.

Morgan Says:

Education, Culture, Success Give No Haven from Prejudice

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THERE were nine men around the table besides myself. The host, an internationally known chemist and pharmaceutical manufacturer, is a Rotarian, churchman and philanthropist who prides himself on being able to speak German and quote precisely, at some length, philosophers and poets. His son, also present, is an Oberlin graduate now studying law at the University of Wisconsin.

Morgan

The others included a federal judge, a broker, an attorney, the executive director of an extremely active civic organization, an insurance executive who is also a member of the Chicago school board, a minister who is also vice president of the city's church federation, and the editor and publisher of a daily newspaper.

All nine were unusually serious-minded, dedicated citizens. The eight older men are recognized distinguished community leaders of the nation's second largest city. They are well established on the upper edge of the American middle class. But one aspect of their prominence is a painful one. It is what Martin Luther King has called the "high visibility" of the Negro minority. For all nine of these men, of course, are black, or varying shades of brown.

Their minds can contribute to the decisions in the board rooms of big corporations, to jurisprudence, journalism and other callings. The energy of their hearts has gone toward the enrichment of education, religion and other aspects of metropolitan life. Their presence can grace the drawing rooms of presidents and prime ministers.

But in Birmingham they would be the targets of fire hoses, police dogs and bombs. In Prince Edward County, Va., they would find no public schools for their children. If they were residents of Mississippi they would find it extremely difficult to exercise their constitutional right to vote. Even in Chicago, where color bars are being energetically assaulted, their poorer colleagues still live in slums and ghettos which Mayor Daley says do not exist.

In restricted housing and countless other ways these leading citizens themselves are still subjected by practiced prejudice to the indignities of second-class citizenship. Educated, cultured, traveled though they are, many hostesses of high society who call themselves sophisticated would have nervous prostration before inviting them to dinner.

There was a time when the Negro power structure of an urban community, such as it was, centered in smalltime gambling kings, numbers game operators, bordello proprietors and maybe a preacher thrown in as a character reference. City Hall of Big Town, U.S.A., deliberately winked at their activities and even threw a few miserable, menial patronage jobs into the bargain by which the white power structure kept the Negro minority "quiet."

SUDDENLY THE HOT LAVA of direct action, erupting from a volcano of social change, has engulfed this whole rotten structure. Here in Chicago, for example, the civil rights drive has all but left the Negro "Uncle Toms" on the city council standing on the curb. Only one out of six Negro aldermen really fought for a mild fair housing ordinance.

Mayor Daley, one of the last masters of machine politics who is nevertheless basically a conscientious and fair-minded man, tried to get a stiffer fair housing law through the state legislature so it would apply to suburbs too but Republican opposition killed it.

The charge often leveled at successful Negro business leaders for "failing to help their own people," does not apply in Chicago—at least not with any valid force since "Birmingham One," as last spring's crisis is now being called to distinguish it from "Birmingham Two," the murderous bombing. Thirty-five hundred Chicago Negroes joined the Washington March. Most of them were from the middle class.

One of the minimal duties of the American white citizen in the social revolution which has seized the country is to discover the American Negro. It is an exciting, shocking but imperative and rewarding adventure.

"It is my deep conviction," one of the most formidable of my Negro companions said sadly, "that the white man dislikes and distrusts the black man and wishes he would disappear." Later he said, "I consider myself an American first and a Negro second."

How was he able to develop the broad rather than the narrow outlook? Perhaps the human character is tempered and strengthened, up to a point, by the fires of oppression. Certainly the Negro leadership is not growing less militant or less determined. The graduate school son of my host has been a freedom rider and a sit-inner and he got part of his education in jail.

Spending a Phony Issue:

Where Would GOP Start Paring Budget?

TELEVISION SCREENS throughout the nation recently carried a handsome, middle-aged congressman, mirroring a sincerity hard to match, discussing the tax issue.

He was Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.), selected by the Republican National Committee to answer Pres. Kennedy's plea for a tax cut prior to House passage of the measure. His oratorical skill may have carried some citizens along with him, but for many his line of argument belongs in a by-gone age. For what Brynes was saying was that we are "gambling" with our future if we have a tax cut without an accompanying cut in government spending.

He and his conservative colleagues view a budget deficit as one of the greatest evils, although they remained quiet about this when we had the largest peacetime deficit in the history of this country under Pres. Eisenhower.

The Louisville Courier-Journal says that the Republicans can't oppose the tax cut for political reasons so they throw in the spending gimmick. Says the Courier:

". . . the basic problem is economic, not political, and to demand that the Administration cut back domestic spending as a condition of a tax cut is to miss the point. The purpose of the proposed $11 billion reduction in income taxes is to stimulate the economy through increased spending by consumers and increased investments by business and industry. Pres. Kennedy describes it as 'insurance for prosperity'."

No one seeks to defend waste or reckless waste of federal funds. But Byrnes, in his address, tried to give the impression that all federal spending lies, to some degree, in this category. He refrains from dealing in specifics.

For example, what would he do about educating our children? Our schools are overcrowded, many of them are obsolete and many of our teachers are underpaid. Every year we fall behind in failing to build new classrooms and our teachers are constantly being lured away to better-paying job.

Is Byrnes satisfied with our housing situation? The Census Bureau reports that over 16 million homes are either dilapidated, substandard or overcrowded. To meet this problem and to construct additional needed units for a growing population we must build 2.4 million homes annually. Last year we had 1.5 million starts.

Are we doing enough in public health? The U.S. Public Health Service estimates we must make up a shortage of well over a million hospital and nursing home beds. We also need some 2,000 public health centers, nearly 2,500 diagnostic or treatment centers for non-hospital patients and over 200 comprehensive centers to assist handicapped people.

Just where would Byrnes and his friends start paring?

In fact and in reality the spending issue is a phony issue, since real spending has been steadily declining on a per capita basis since World War II.

Of course, the federal budget grows, but so does our population and so does our gross national product—the sum total of all our goods and services.

In mid-1949 the federal debt held by the public represented 84.1 percent of one year's total output of the economy. By 1962 it represented only 44.9 percent of one year's total output.

This means that it would have taken the full value of all the goods and services produced in the country for a period of 308 days in 1949 to have paid off the national debt. Today it would require only 164 days' production.

Even with all the vast outlays for military and space expenditures it is apparent that our federal debt is becoming increasingly less burdensome. The great danger is that through some imaginary fear of high federal debt we cut back essential services and thus lead to a recession which, as does a war, leads to a spiraling of the debt, in addition to all other hardships. (PAI)

Washington Reports:

Reform of Congressional Rules Held Needed to End Obstruction

"THE SENATE is the only legislative body in the civilized world which cannot act when its membership is ready for action."

"Congressional rules have made it possible for the American people to duck action" on our civil rights problem "for 100 years or more."

The first comment came from Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), and the second from Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.), both members of the Senate Rules Committee, who were interviewed on needed changes in congressional rules on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on almost 700 radio stations.

Clark was talking about Senate Rule 22, which permits unlimited debate until two-thirds of the members present and voting agree to invoke cloture.

Case referred to "congressional procedures, committee prerogatives, and the prerogatives of the chairmen of committees, the rule of unlimited debate and all the rest of it."

"We have to change the rules which make it easy to put off important issues," he declared. "When important issues are ducked long enough, we have an eruption of violence and have to make changes by revolution, instead of by orderly step-by-step processess."

Clark suggested that congressional rules reform is "the single most important measure necessary to get not only Pres. Kennedy's program through, but that of any future President."

"SO LONG AS WE HAVE obstructionist procedures, which govern in both the House and Senate, just so long is Congress going to be a roadblock to the progress of needed legislation in the national interest," he declared.

Case, discussing the power of committee chairmen to block legislation sought by a President, asserted that Congress should have the opportunity to make up its own mind on the President's recommendations.

"Also I think that any member of Congress has the right to have his proposed legislation seriously considered by committees and voted on by the Senate and the House," he added.

"Plenty of time should be taken, but I don't think a single member of a committee, the chairmen, has the right to prevent the House or the Senate, the whole Congress, from acting."

Clark and Case co-sponsored a resolution calling for a broad study of congressional rules reform, but the proposal was stripped down in committee to permit only a study of Senate rules.

CONGRESSIONAL ROADBLOCKS to progressive legislation must be removed through rules reform, said Sen. Joseph Clark (D-Pa.), left, and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. They are co-sponsors of a resolution calling for a study of needed rules changes.

Key Rollcall Vote in House on Tax Cut

Here is the rollcall vote by which the House defeated an attempt to block a tax cut unless a rigid ceiling was clamped on the federal budget. The vote was 226-199. Democrats voted 225-26 against the crippling spending curb; Republicans voted 173-1 for it.

On labor's scoreboard a vote against the budget ceiling was a right vote (R), while a vote in favor was a wrong vote (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

ALABAMA

AL Andrews (D) R
AL Elliott (D) R
AL Grant (D) R
AL Huddleston (D) W
AL Jones (D) R
AL Rains (D) R
AL Roberts (D) R
AL Selden R

ALASKA

AL Rivers (D) R

ARIZONA

1. Rhodes (R) W
2. Udall (D) R
3. Senner (D) R

ARKANSAS

1. Gathings (D) W
2. Mills (D) R
3. Trimble (D) R
4. Harris (D) R

CALIFORNIA

1. Clausen (R) W
2. Johnson (D) R
3. Moss (D) R
4. Leggett (D) R
5. Shelley (D) R
6. Mailliard (R) W
7. Cohelan (D) R
8. Miller (D) R
9. Edwards (D) R
10. Gubser (R) PW
11. Younger (R) W
12. Talcott (R) W
13. Teague (R) W
14. Baldwin (R) W
15. McFall (D) R
16. Sisk (D) R
18. Hagen (D) R
33. Sheppard (D) A
34. Hanna (D) R
35. Utt (R) W
36. Wilson, Bob (R) W
37. Van Derlin (D) R
38. Martin (R) W

Los Angeles County

17. King (D) R
19. Holifield (D) R
20. Smith (R) W
21. Hawkins (D) R
22. Corman (D) R
23. Clawson (R) W
24. Lipscomb (R) W
25. Cameron (D) R
26. Roosevelt (D) R
27. Burkhalter (D) R
28. Bell (R) W
29. Brown (D) R
30. Roybal (D) R
31. Wilson, Charles (D) R
32. Hosmer (R) PW

COLORADO

1. Rogers (D) R
2. Brotzman (R) W
3. Chenoweth (R) W
4. Aspinall (D) R

CONNECTICUT

AL Grabowski (D) R
1. Dadario (D) R
2. St. Onge (D) A
3. Giaimo (D) R
4. Sibal (R) W
5. Monagan (D) R

DELAWARE

AL McDowell (D) R

FLORIDA

1. Sikes (D) R
2. Bennett (D) R
3. Pepper (D) R
4. Fascell (D) R
5. Herlong (D) R
6. Rogers (D) R
7. Haley (D) W
8. Matthews (D) R
9. Fuqua (D) R
10. Gibbons (D) R
11. Gurney (R) W
12. Cramer (R) W

GEORGIA

1. Hagan (D) R
2. Pilcher (D) R
3. Forrester (D) R
4. Flynt (D) R
5. Weltner (D) R
6. Vinson (D) R
7. Davis (D) R
8. Tuten (D) R
9. Landrum (D) R
10. Stephens (D) R

HAWAII

AL Gill (D) R
AL Matsunaga (D) R

IDAHO

1. White (D) R
2. Harding (D) R

ILLINOIS

12. McClory (R) W
14. Hoffman (R) W
15. Reid (R) W
16. Anderson (R) W
17. Arends (R) W
18. Michel (R) W
19. McLoskey (R) W
20. Findley (R) W
21. Gray (D) R
22. Springer (R) W
23. Shipley (D) R
24. Price (D) R

Chicago-Cook County

1. Dawson (D) R
2. O'Hara (D) R
3. Murphy (D) R
4. Derwinski (R) W
5. Kluczynski (D) R
6. O'Brien (D) PR
7. Libonati (D) R
8. Rostenkowski (D) R
9. Finnegan (D) R
10. Collier (R) W
11. Pucinski (D) R
13. Rumsfeld (R) W

INDIANA

1. Madden (D) R
2. Halleck (R) W
3. Brademas (D) R
4. Adair (R) W
5. Roush (D) R
6. Roudebush (R) W
7. Bray (R) W
8. Denton (D) R
9. Wilson (R) W
10. Harvey (R) W
11. Bruce (R) W

IOWA

1. Schwengel (R) W
2. Bromwell (R) W
3. Gross (R) W
4. Kyl (R) W
5. Smith (D) R
6. Hoeven (R) W
7. Jensen (R) W

KANSAS

1. Dole (R) W
2. Avery (R) W
3. Ellsworth (R) W
4. Schriver (R) W
5. Skubitz (R) W

KENTUCKY

1. Stubblefield (D) R
2. Natcher (D) R
3. Synder (R) W
4. Chelf (D) R
5. Siler (R) W
6. Watts (D) R
7. Perkins (D) R

LOUISIANA

1. Hebert (D) R
2. Boggs (D) R
3. Willis (D) R
4. Waggonner (D) W
5. Passman (D) W
6. Morrison (D) R
7. Thompson (D) R
8. Long (D) R

MAINE

1. Tupper (R) W
2. McIntire (R) W

MARYLAND

AL Sickles (D) R
1. Morton (R) W
2. Long (D) R
3. Garmatz (D) R
4. Fallon (D) R
5. Lankford (D) R
6. Mathias (R) W
7. Friedel (D) R

MASSACHUSETTS

1. Conte (R) W
2. Boland (D) R
3. Philbin (D) R
4. Donohue (D) R
5. Morse (R) W
6. Bates (R) W
7. Macdonald (D) R
8. O'Neill (D) R
9. McCormack (D) (Speaker) NV
10. Martin (R) W
11. Burke (D) R
12. Keith (R) W

MICHIGAN

AL Staebler (D) R
2. Meader (R) W
3. Johansen (R) W
4. Hutchinson (R) W
5. Ford (R) W
6. Chamberlain (R) W
7. O'Hara (D) R
8. Harvey (R) W
9. Griffin (R) W
10. Cederberg (R) W
11. Knox (R) W
12. Bennett (R) W
18. Broomfield (R) W

Metropolitan Detroit

1. Nedzi (D) R
13. Diggs (D) R
14. Ryan (D) R
15. Dingell (D) R
16. Lesinski (D) R
17. Griffiths (D) R

MINNESOTA

1. Quie (R) W
2. Nelsen (R) W
3. MacGregor (R) W
4. Karth (D) R
5. Fraser (D) R
6. Olson (D) R
7. Langen (R) W
8. Blatnik (D) R

MISSISSIPPI

1. Abernethy (D) W
2. Whitten (D) W
3. Williams (D) W
4. Winstead (D) W
5. Colmer (D) W

MISSOURI

1. Karsten (D) R
2. Curtis (R) W
3. Sullivan (D) R
4. Randall (D) R
5. Bolling (D) R
6. Hull (D) R
7. Hall (R) W
8. Ichord (D) R
9. Cannon (D) W
10. Jones (D) R

MONTANA

1. Olsen (D) R
2. Mattin (R) W

NEBRASKA

1. Beermann (R) W
2. Cunningham (R) W
3. Martin (R) W

NEVADA

AL Baring (D) W

NEW HAMPSHIRE

1. Wyman (R) W
2. Cleveland (R) W

NEW JERSEY

1. Cahill (R) W
2. Glenn (R) W
3. Auchincloss (R) W
4. Thompson (D) R
5. Frelinghuysen (R) W
6. Dwyer (R) W
7. Widnall (R) W
8. Joelson (D) R
9. Osmers (R) W
10. Rodino (D) R
11. Minish (D) R
12. Wallhauser (R) W
13. Gallagher (D) R
14. Daniels (D) R
15. Patten (D) R

NEW MEXICO

AL Montoya (D) R
AL Morris (D) R

NEW YORK

1. Pike (D) R
2. Grover (R) W
3. Derounian (R) W
4. Wydler (R) W
5. Becker (R) W
25. Barry (R) W
26. Reid (R) W
27. St. George (R) W
28. Wharton (R) W
29. O'Brien (D) R
30. King (R) W
31. Kilburn (R) W
32. Pirnie (R) W
33. Robison (R) W
34. Riehlman (R) W
35. Stratton (D) R
36. Horton (R) W
37. Ostertag (R) W
38. Goodell (R) W
39. Pillion (R) W
40. Miller (R) W
41. Dulski (D) R

New York City

6. Halpern (R) W
7. Addabbo (D) R
8. Rosenthal (D) R
9. Delaney (D) R
10. Celler (D) R
11. Keogh (D) R
12. Kelly (D) R
13. Multer (D) R
14. Rooney (D) R
15. Carey (D) R
16. Murphy (D) R
17. Lindsay (R) W
18. Powell (D) R
19. Farbstein (D) R
20. Ryan (D) A
21. Healey (D) R
22. Gilbert (D) R
23. Buckley (D) R
24. Fino (R) W

NORTH CAROLINA

1. Bonner (D) R
2. Fountain (D) R
3. Henderson (D) W
4. Cooley (D) R
5. Scott (D) W
6. Kornegay (D) R
7. Lennon (D) W
8. Jonas (R) W
9. Broyhill (R) W
10. Whitener (D) PR
11. Taylor (D) W

NORTH DAKOTA

1. Vacancy
2. Short (R) W

OHIO

AL Taft (R) W
1. Rich (R) W
2. Clancy (R) W
3. Schenck (R) W
4. McCulloch (R) W
5. Latta (R) W
6. Harsha (R) W
7. Brown (R) W
8. Betts (R) W
9. Ashley (D) R
10. Abele (R) W
11. Bolton, Oliver (R) W
12. Devine (R) W
13. Mosher (R) W
14. Ayres (R) W
15. Secrest (D) R
16. Bow (R) W
17. Ashbrook (R) W
18. Hays (D) R
19. Kirwan (D) R
20. Feighan (D) R
21. Vanik (D) R
22. Bolton, Frances (R) W
23. Minshall (R) W

OKLAHOMA

1. Belcher (R) W
2. Edmondson (D) R
3. Albert (D) R
4. Steed (D) R
5. Jarman (D) W
6. Wickersham (D) R

OREGON

1. Norblad (R) W
2. Ullman (D) R
3. Green (D) R
4. Duncan (D) R

PENNSYLVANA

6. Rhodes (D) R
7. Milliken (R) W
8. Curtin (R) W
9. Dague (R) W
10. McDade (R) W
11. Flood (D) R
12. Whalley (R) W
13. Schweiker (R) W
14. Moorhead (D) R
15. Rooney (D) R
16. Kunkel (R) W
17. Schneebeli (R) W
18. Corbett (R) W
19. Goodling (R) W
20. Holland (D) R
21. Dent (D) R
22. Saylor (R) W
23. Vacancy
24. Weaver (R) W
25. Clark (D) R
26. Morgan (D) R
27. Fulton (R) W

Philadelphia

1. Barrett (D) R
2. Nix (D) R
3. Byrne (D) R
4. Toll (D) R
5. Green (D) R

RHODE ISLAND

1. St. Germain (D) R
2. Fogarty (D) R

SOUTH CAROLINA

1. Rivers (D) R
2. Watson (D) W
3. Dorn (D) W
4. Ashmore (D) W
5. Hemphill (D) R
6. McMillan (D) R

SOUTH DAKOTA

1. Reifel (R) W
2. Berry (R) W

TENNESSEE

1. Quillen (R) W
2. Baker (R) W
3. Brock (R) W
4. Evins (D) R
5. Fulton (D) R
6. Bass (D) R
7. Murray (D) R
8. Everett (D) R
9. Davis (D) R

TEXAS

AL Pool (D) W
1. Patman (D) R
2. Brooks (D) R
3. Beckworth (D) R
4. Roberts (D) R
5. Alger (R) W
6. Teague (D) R
7. Dowdy (D) W
8. Thomas (D) R
9. Thompson (D) R
10. Thornberry (D) R
11. Poage (D) R
12. Wright (D) R
13. Purcell (D) R
14. Young (D) R
15. Kilgore (D) R
16. Foreman (R) W
17. Burleson (D) R
18. Rogers (D) R
19. Mahon (D) R
20. Gonzalez (D) R
21. Fisher (D) R
22. Casey (D) R

UTAH

1. Burton (R) W
2. Lloyd (R) W

VERMONT

AL Stafford (R) W

VIRGINIA

1. Downing (D) R
2. Hardy (D) R
3. Gary (D) R
4. Abbitt (D) W
5. Tuck (D) W
6. Poff (R) W
7. Marsh (D) W
8. Smith (D) W
9. Jennings (D) R
10. Broyhill (R) W

WASHINGTON

1. Pelly (R) W
2. Westland (R) W
3. Hansen (D) R
4. May (R) W
5. Horan (R) W
6. Tollefson (R) W
7. Stinson (R) W

WEST VIRGINIA

1. Moore (R) W
2. Staggers (D) R
3. Slack (D) R
4. Hechler (D) R
5. Kee (D) R

WISCONSIN

1. Schadeberg (R) W
2. Kastenmeier (D) R
3. Thomson (R) W
4. Zablocki (D) R
5. Reuss (D) R
6. Van Pelt (R) W
7. Laird (R) W
8. Byrnes (R) W
9. Johnson (D) R
10. O'Konski (R) R

WYOMING

AL Harrison (R) W

Repeal Still Labor's Goal:

Fear of L-G Lawsuits Justified, Woll Says

Four years of experience with the Landrum-Griffin Act and its so-called "Bill of Rights" have confirmed labor's fears that unions would be harassed by ill-founded lawsuits and their flexibility restricted, according to the AFL-CIO's legal counsel.

While harm to unions has been held to a minimum by "sound and reasonable interpretations" of the statute by the courts, labor's goal must continue to be repeal of the law, Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll declared in the September issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO monthly magazine.

'Largely Unnecessary'

Writing on "The Legal Thicket of Landrum-Griffin," Woll said that the law "is largely unnecessary; it is confusing; it invites harassing litigation; it requires the most careful handling by the courts to prevent widespread damage to traditional union structures and procedures."

He cited two recent cases demonstrating how the defects of the law can be compensated for by "judicial common sense."

In Parks vs. IBEW, the U.S. Court of Appeals in Richmond upheld the right of the IBEW president to deny strike sanction to a Baltimore local which had refused to follow the traditional policy of referring disputes to arbitration. Woll termed this "an overwhelming victory" for the international union and the cause of unionism.

Despite "the good result eventually reached," he said, the case illustrates how a union may be forced to spend much time and effort in overcoming a challenge to "its right to carry on its affairs in the customary way."

Dispute Over Dues

In Ranes vs. Office Employes, OEIU convention delegates voted to increase the minimum dues payable to all local unions and members of one local then filed suit to force a membership referendum. The appellate court in Chicago said Congress "presumably" did not intend to strip unions of their power to set dues limits.

Woll concluded, however, that two other court decisions indicated how the law could be applied to "interfere sharply with customary union procedures" or to "provide unnecessary federal penalties in situations where state remedies are wholly adequate."

In Salzhandler vs. Caputo, the Court of Appeals in New York "flatly ruled" that L-G's so-called Bill of Rights "prevented a union from disciplining a member for criticizing the officers, even though the criticism may have been libelous," Woll said.

In this case a union member distributed a leaflet to fellow local union members, accusing the local president of misappropriating union funds and calling him a "petty robber." The member was found guilty by a trial board of slandering the local president and he was ordered excluded from union affairs for five years.

The appeals court reversed a lower court, saying that L-G permits a member to accuse union officers almost with immunity from internal discipline. The court, however, did acknowledge that local union officers still have a right to sue members for libel or slander in the courts, Woll pointed out.

He said another example of the misapplication of the "Bill of Rights" is provided by U.S. vs. Roganovich, the first criminal prosecution to reach the appellate courts under this part of the law. The Court of Appeals in Chicago upheld the conviction of two union members for attacking another because of a speech he made at a local union meeting.

'New Federal Law'

The effect, said Woll, is "to turn a plan, old-fashioned bit of assault and battery . . . into a new federal crime."

This result—involving not union officers, but "a couple of fractious individuals"—is entirely unnecessary to protect individual rights and puts a further load on the already heavily burdened facilities of the federal authorities and the federal courts, Woll observed.

AT ARLINGTON CEMETERY, 250 delegates to the Packinghouse Workers' national legislative conference assembled in solemn tribute by the grave of Medgar W. Evers, slain Mississippi civil rights leader. The wreath, with inscription in Spanish, was presented by UPWA delegates from Puerto Rico.

Civil Rights Commission Urges Stronger Laws, Executive Action

(Continued from Page 1)

. . . the right to vote alone cannot break the vicious cycle in which Negro Americans have so long been trapped."

Following is a summary of the commission's findings and recommendations in major areas:

EMPLOYMENT—Negroes suffer heaviest from unemployment because of "inadequate education, inferior job training, discrimination by private employers, and discrimination in state and local administration of federal programs."

Congress was urged to pass legislation establishing a right to equal opportunity in employment affecting interstate commerce. The commission called for a combination of administrative and legislative action to provide training and vocational education on a nonsegregated, nondiscriminatory basis and to terminate federal assistance where these conditions are not met.

VOTING—In seven states, the right to vote "is still denied to many citizens solely because of their race . . . The conclusion is inevitable that present legal remedies for voter discrimination are inadequate."

The commission renewed recommendations for uniform voting qualifications, including acknowledgment of a sixth-grade education as proof of literacy. It asked strong federal powers to register persons unjustly disqualified by state or local registrars. As a final resort, it suggested that Congress act to reduce representation in the House for states which deny the franchise to Negroes, as authorized by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution.

The commission's two white southern members—Robert G. Storey and Robert S. Rankin—noted that they had opposed similar proposals in the past because they believed voting rights could be secured "without disturbing, even temporarily, our long-standing federal-state relationships."

Now, they declared, they have concluded "sadly, but with firm conviction," that further federal action is necessary to achieve equal voting rights.

EDUCATION—Southern school boards continue "to employ every contrivance to evade or avoid desegregation."

The commission recommended legislation requiring local school boards to adopt "within 90 days" a desegregation plan and authorizing the Civil Rights Commission to provide technical and financial help to school districts facing desegregation problems.

JUSTICE—In a number of southern cities, law enforcement agencies have infringed on the constitutional right of civil rights supporters to protest and peacefully demonstrate against discrimination, the commission found. It also warned that the lack of Negro law enforcement officers "throughout most of the nation" influences the attitude of Negroes toward local police officers.

Recommendations included congressional authorization for the attorney general to initiate civil proceedings to prevent denial of constitutional rights and a grant-in-aid program to improve the professional quality of police forces on a nondiscriminatory basis.

HEALTH SERVICES—Race discrimination against both Negro patients and Negro doctors can be found "in every region of the nation," the report said.

It recommended that the President direct the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to refuse applications for federal grants submitted under the "separate-but-equal" provision of the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act.

ARMED FORCES—Both the Army and Air Force were praised for largely-successful elimination of race discrimination and segregation, but the Navy's record came in for some criticism.

Recommendations included more active participation by defense installation commanders in efforts to end off-base segregation and a cut-off of federal "impacted area" grants to segregated school systems.

Finally, for its own role, the commission endorsed Kennedy's recommendations that it be given additional functions beyond its present fact-finding role.

It asked for authority to serve as a national civil rights clearinghouse, and to provide guidance and assistance to communities facing civil rights problems.

Labor Urges More Aid To Needy D.C. Children

The AFL-CIO and its Greater Washington Central Labor Council have appealed to Congress for adequate welfare funds to care for the destitute children in the nation's capital.

Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee that aid to dependent children grants should be extended to homes where the father is unemployed, as well as to fatherless families.

Pres. J. C. Turner of the central labor body joined in this request and pointed out that the present regulations barring aid when there is an employable man in the household "often acts as an incentive for the father to leave home and may lead to the breakup of the family."

There is a "hard core of unemployment" in the District of Columbia, Turner emphasized, "and these children must be provided for."

Fair urged also that welfare allowances be raised to meet "minimum healthful standards" and called for establishment of a city-wide program of public day care centers for children of working parents.

He asked the Senate panel to approve higher payments for foster care of children to attract the needed number of foster parents "oriented to the welfare of children."

Turner told the subcommittee overcrowded classrooms and understaffed schools are "tragic" for the District of Columbia.

He cited classes of 40, 50, 60 and even 90 students and emphasized the "frustration" of slow learners unable to get the individual attention they need to keep up with their grade levels.

"Bringing these children back to school after they're dropouts is not the answer," Turner said; "prohibiting classes over 30 is a wiser and, in the long run, a more economical way."

The two labor spokesmen appeared before the Senate subcommitee because Congress, in addition to dealing with national legislation, is also forced to serve as a city council for the voteless residents of the District of Columbia—one of the nation's largest metropolitan areas.

Church Leaders Ask Strong Rights Bill

Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders joined in a telegram urging members of the House Judiciary Committee to approve "the strongest possible civil rights legislation."

The bill, they said, should include a fair employment provision, a ban on discrimination in all places of public accommodation "without exception," and authority for the attorney general to intervene "in all violations of constitutional guarantees."

Race discrimination is "immoral and blasphemy to God and man," declared Msgr. John F. Cronin of the National Catholic Welfare Council, Pres. J. Irwin Miller of the National Council of Churches of Christ, and Rabbi Uri Miller, president of the Synagogue Council of America.

Medical Education Act Seen Easing Shortage

The new federal aid to medical education program will help meet the need for more doctors, dentists and nurses, an AFL-CIO spokesman predicted.

Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, praised Congress "for taking action, finally, on a really acute social problem." The United States, she said, has been slipping behind other nations in caring for the health of its people.

Miss Bamberger, interviewed on the Mutual Broadcasting network's Labor News Conference, said there is an immediate need for 50 percent more medical students and double the present number of dental students.

The $175 million in matching construction grants authorized by Congress, she said, will enable schools to expand their teaching facilities and the student loan provision of the bill will allow more students to undertake a medical education. She quoted government estimates that the cost of a medical education exceeds $11,000.

This means, she added, that "up to now, training in medicine has been largely limited to people in upper or upper-middle income families."

Bargaining a Help:

Automation Panel Cites Growth Need

Philadelphia—Collective bargaining can make important contributions to meeting the problems of automation, but the overriding factor is a full employment economy, participants in a panel discussion at the Federal Bar Association convention here agreed.

Representing labor, management and the public, the panelists tackled the knotty problems posed by introduction of new technology with Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service acting as moderator.

Simkin noted that the impact of automation on jobs is being felt more and more at the bargaining table and that at times wages are not an issue at all, with major attention given to labor force problems arising from technological change.

Collective bargaining, he emphasized, cannot solve all the problems of automation although solutions have been worked out in the areas of separation pay, early retirement, supplemental benefits and retraining.

The government, he said, is striving to implement programs to secure full employment, the public area of responsibility in the situation.

Victor G. Reuther of the Auto Workers, presenting the labor viewpoint, said the resistance to technological change is caused not by the introduction of new machines but by the fact that the full cost is paid by the worker who becomes unemployed.

He urged a greater sharing of information between labor and management and advance notice to unions of technological changes and how they will affect the work force.

He stressed the magnitude of the problem resulting from automation, noting that in the 1960s there is a need for 40 million new jobs if the nation is just to stay where it is now, let alone reduce the volume of unemployment.

Theodore W. Kheel, representing the public viewpoint, noted that automation is contributing to the problem of integration because job opportunities are decreasing at the same time new efforts are being made to bring the Negro into the labor force. Kheel pointed to the railroad work rules dispute as an illustration of the challenge automation poses.

Frederick R. Livingston, representing management, said that the pressures of competition at home and abroad have forced industry to introduce technological change at an accelerated rate and that management is now taking the initiative at the bargaining table.

"Realistic unions," he said, have not rejected change but have concentrated on negotiating agreements to ease the impact.

Armed Forces Get Pay Hike Of $1.2 Billion

(Continued from Page 1)

thirds vote but bypasses the Rules Committee.

After a White House meeting with the President, congressional Democratic leaders reaffirmed the Administration's determination to enact this year both of its top-priority programs.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield told newsmen: "It is the intention of Congress to pass not either a tax bill or a civil rights bill, but both bills, before the year is out."

House Majority Leader John W. McCormack (Mass.) joined in to say: "We know that the tax and civil rights bills must pass. There is no valid reason why they should not pass this year."

Despite these reassurances, the timetable remained uncertain and an attempt by Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) to commit the Finance Committee to a firm schedule for bringing a tax bill to the floor was rejected 11-4.

Meanwhile a House Judiciary subcommittee passed on to the full committee its draft of a broad omnibus civil rights bill, including a fair employment provision. Committee Republicans are expected to seek to soften the measure before sending it to the Rules Committee and several weeks of intensive hammering and shaping are expected before the committee reaches a decision.

On the Senate side, a public accommodations bill is expected to be approved shortly by the Commerce Committee, but other portions of the President's civil rights program are bottlenecked in Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland's Judiciary Committee.

DOZENS OF MEMBERS of building trades locals are donating their labor for the construction of a new Center for the Blind in Phoenix, Ariz. Workers shown above include members of Bricklayers Local 3, Laborers Local 383, Carpenters Local 1089, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 640 and Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 469.

Kennedy Foresees Shorter Workweek

"As machines take more and more of the jobs of men, we are going to find the workweek reduced . . ." Pres. Kennedy said on his western trip dealing with conservation problems.

At Whiskeytown, Calif., where he was dedicating a new dam, the President commented: "This country is changing. We had a 58-hour week, a 48-hour week, a 40-hour week." As this trend continues, he said, "we are going to find people wondering what they should do."

The need is to set aside recreational areas and preserve natural resources, he declared, to prepare for a population of 350 million by the year 2000 and an increase in leisure time.

September Jobless Rate Remains High at 5.6%

(Continued from Page 1)

percent range recorded so far during 1963, the report added. The teenage unemployment rate of 15 percent compared to 12.6 percent a year ago.

Women and young persons continued to account for much of the rise in unemployment since 1957, the report said. Their jobless rates were well above those recorded in early 1957, before the 1957-58 recession, while September's 2.9 percent jobless rate for married men was close to the level at that time, the report said.

Longterm unemployed remained stubbornly high. The report said those jobless for 15 weeks or longer totaled 900,000 in September. This group has shown "only seasonal changes since early 1962," the Labor Dept. said.

The longterm unemployed also totaled 900,000 in September a year ago. This group numbered 456,000 in September 1957 before it tripled to 1.5 million by September 1958. It had registered a postwar low for the month of 194,000 in 1951.

Of the 900,000 longterm jobless in September, the report noted, some 500,000 had been out of work six months or longer.

Employment Down

On the employment side of the picture, the number of jobholders declined as expected by 1 million to 69.5 million, the report said.

About 1.8 million teen-agers left their summer jobs to return to school. There was a net increase of 700,000 adult women workers, chiefly due to school reopenings. Most of the job decline occurred in the non-farm sector, where there was a drop of 850,000 to 64.2 million. Farm employment held at 5.3 million.

The employment totals included some 2.3 million non-farm workers on short workweeks for economic reasons, the report noted. The total labor force, down by 1.4 million to 75.8 million in September, was 900,000 higher than a year ago.

10-5-63

Democratic Parley Backs 'Work' Repeal

Salt Lake City—Repeal of existing "right-to-work" laws and opposition to the adoption of similar laws in Far West states was called for by delegates to a conference of Democrats from western states.

The conference also voiced opposition to "the efforts of anti-union groups to the use of special circumstances to end the railroad deadlock as a wedge to promote legislation" requiring compulsory arbitration in labor disputes.

In a resolution citing efforts of "Republicans and far right groups" in opposition to the "progressive programs of the President and the Democratic Party," the conference warned that the same alliance is seeking to pass anti-union shop laws in other western states.

Emphasizing the conference's agreement with the Democratic party platform of 1960, the delegates said 'we support repeal of existing 'right-to-work' laws and we oppose their adoption in the states where the Republican Party and the radical right are working for their adoption."

"The fact is," they said, "that the mis-named right-to-work laws are actually restrictions on free and fair collective bargaining, designed cynically and deliberately to prevent collective bargaining by unions."

Productivity Increase Peril to Factory Jobs

(Continued from Page 1)

margin for increasing employment was very small," Greenburg noted.

The figures demonstrate, he continued, "a relatively higher impact of technological change or of other laborsaving factors in the manufacturing process . . . and the problem of job opportunities for blue-collar workers."

If productivity is increasing at about 3 percent a year, Greenberg said, and with about 60 million persons employed in the private economy in 1962, output has to expand sufficiently to provide 1.8 million additional jobs per year or else "unemployment will increase."

In terms of the job displacement impact of automation in 1957-61, Greenberg presented these figures:

In the five years involved, output of goods and services went up 7.8 percent and output per man-hour of production workers increased 17.7 percent.

"Thus, there was a decline of 8.4 percent or 1.1 million in production-worker employment," he said.

Of the total decrease, 576,000 jobs were associated with lower output and 747,000 with higher productivity.

Reduced to an annual basis, said Greenberg, the figures indicate employment decline in manufacturing industries of 331,000 production workers a year, 144,000 because of declining output and 187,000 because of increasing productivity.

The decrease in employment is not the equivalent of layoffs because some workers retire and some leave voluntarily for other jobs, he said.

"More detailed compilations on a plant-by-plant, year-by-year basis would show additional job decreases and job increases, and, therefore, indicate a greater degree of dislocation and job shifting," he added.

Building Unions Sign Provincewide Pact

Toronto, Ont.—Six building trades unions have signed a provincewide agreement under which the Piggott Construction Co. has agreed to employ only union members and to negotiate wages and working conditions in different areas.

In return the unions agreed that a strike in any locality would not affect the Piggott company. Signers of the agreement were the Bricklayers, Carpenters, Iron Workers, Laborers, Operating Engineers and Plasterers.

Union Leaders In South View Rights Gains

Gatlinburg, Tenn. — The AFL-CIO's Southern Advisory Committee on Civil Rights met here in an all-day session to review labor's progress towards equal opportunity and take a realistic look at the problems.

Union leaders from nearly all southern states took part in a searching appraisal of local union adherence to the AFL-CIO civil rights policy, labor's drive to win employer acceptance of fair employment and apprenticeship training practices, and civil rights progress in public accommodations, schools, and voting.

Pres. Harold B. Boyd of the Virginia AFL-CIO served as chairman, with Dir. Boris Shiskin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights as secretary.

The committee took note of the fact that all leading hotels, motels and restaurants in Gatlinburg have accepted a no-discrimination policy as a direct result of recent efforts by the Tennessee AFL-CIO.

LOOK for the UNION LABEL
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Oct. 12, 1963 | No. 41

Council Presses Passage Of Tax Cut and Rights Bill

Education Aid Passed By Senate

The Senate has given near-unanimous approval to legislation expanding and modernizing vocational education programs. The three-part bill also increases funds available for loans to college students under the National Defense Education Act, and extends for three more years subsidies to federally-impacted school districts.

To a vocational education bill passed by the House early in August the Senate added new programs requested by Pres. Kennedy in his civil rights message. These include work-study projects and grants for establishing live-in vocational institutions in areas with heavy unemployment and a high rate of school dropouts.

The final shape of the vocational education program will depend on a House-Senate conference. Both versions, however, free the present federal-state program of its top-heavy emphasis on dwindling agricultural needs and home economic courses unrelated to job training. In addition to a more flexible use of existing funds, new money would be provided for training geared to a fast-changing job market.

This "new approach" to vocational education "has been long overdue," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote each senator before the vote. He termed the bill "an essential step" towards "comprehensive aid for education."

The Senate voted 80-4 for final passage after rejecting, 52-23, a move by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) to slash the spending figures drastically. Also defeated, by a 54-

(Continued on Page 12)

UNDERSEC. OF LABOR John F. Henning, center, receives first print of film on employment of handicapped workers from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (right). The film, "They Have What It Takes," was produced by the AFL-CIO, in cooperation with the IBEW, to help promote the hiring of handicapped workers in jobs for which they qualify. Freeman is vice chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Expert Challenges 'Myth':

Massive Job Loss Put to Automation

A maker of automation equipment, asserting that automation is the chief factor in the wiping out of 40,000 jobs a week, has urged Congress and labor and management to face up to "the human problems" caused by rapid advances in technology.

John I. Snyder, chairman and president of U.S. Industries, Inc., testified before a Senate Labor subcommittee and assailed myths which, he said, have "tranquilized" those who might have acted on the human problem.

"To tell the truth about automation," he said, is the main task of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, of which he and Machinists' Pres. A. J. Hayes are co-founders and co-chairmen.

'Myths' Cited

Technologists are developing equipment that "works miracles," Snyder said, and man's ability to cope with it has failed to keep pace because of many misconceptions.

"The most seductive of these myths," he declared, "is the claim that, for a number of reasons, automation is not going to eliminate many jobs.

"Last week, before a Senate Labor subcommittee, a top productivity expert for the Bureau of Labor Statistics stated that the Department (of Labor) felt that rising productivity—another way of describing automation—would eliminate 200,000 jobs a year—or 4,000 jobs a week.

"Personally, I think this is a gross underestimate of the real situation and that automation is a major factor in eliminating jobs in the U.S. at the rate of more than 40,000 a week, as previous estimates have put it.

"We must also keep in mind

(Continued on Page 11)

Action This Year 'Overriding' Need

Both a tax cut and an effective civil rights bill are of "overriding importance" to the nation and must be enacted this year, the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared.

Failure to pass the rights bill at this session of Congress would be "a cruel punishment to millions of Americans," the council said in a unanimous statement. It would leave a "shadow of hyprocrisy" over constitutional government.

Civil rights legislation, including an equal employment opportunity guarantee, could prove a "hollow" victory without a tax cut "to put the nation back on the road to economic health, the statement added.

"If no jobs are to be had, the Negro will have achieved only the equal opportunity to be unemployed, and if he has no income, he cannot spend it on public accommodations," it went on.

The council firmly rejected the contention that one or the other of the Administration's two top-priority bills must be sidetracked for lack of time. There is "ample" opportunity for both measures to be considered "and to have them both on the statute books by New Year's Day. Neither Congress nor the nation can face the new year with hope or pride unless this has been done," the statement concluded.

Public Works Urged

An accompanying statement reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for "continuance and expansion" of the accelerated public works program, which is scheduled to expire in January. Its termination "would be a tragedy," the council said.

"No better program to put people to work and to permanently enrich the nation could possibly be conceived," it declared.

The council urged Congress to extend the program through 1964 with a $2 billion appropriation.

(Continued on Page 2)

2 Groups Ask Quick Tax Vote

Two important citizen groups have called for prompt enactment of tax cut legislation to shake the nation out of its economic lethargy, boost consumer spending power and provide jobs for the unemployed.

The Citizens Committee for Tax Reduction & Revision in 1963 warned bluntly that "if the tax cut fails this year, we can expect an economic downturn and increased unemployment that can lead to a recession in 1964."

The committee, whose 48 members include prominent leaders from small business, labor, education, agriculture and other groups, expressed support for the key portions of the House-passed tax bill and urged the Senate Finance Committee "to expedite hearings" so that Congress can complete action this session.

The nation's officially-designated spokesman for the American housewife—the Consumer Advisory Council established by Pres. Kennedy last year—declared in a report that a tax cut coupled with government spending for public services is the key to economic growth.

The council emphasized that the

(Continued on Page 5)

Meany Assails Canadian Sea Union 'Control' Plan

The AFL-CIO is absolutely opposed to proposed legislation to place maritime unions under government control in Canada and views as "deeply disappointing" the rejection by the Canadian Labor Congress of voluntary trusteeship proposals to end the dispute on the Great Lakes, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

In a statement reviewing the history of the dispute dating back to 1962, Meany said the Seafarers Intl. Union "deserves the support of all AFL-CIO affiliates in its fight against the destruction of free trade unionism in the Canadian maritime industry."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said at a press conference that "I consider the AFL-CIO to have cooperated fully and fairly in the attempt to work this problem out."

Wirtz issued a statement to make clear "the facts in this situation." He noted that Claude Jodoin, president of the CLC, had attributed failure to reach an agreement to "other trade union parties who could not be convinced to cooperate."

Any proposal for government control—in Canada, Honduras, Peru "or any other place on earth—" is "absolutely inconsist-

(Continued on Page 3)

ICFTU Protests to UN On Rights Session Ban

United Nations, N. Y.—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has protested a decision by a United Nations body to cancel the annual session of the UN Commission on Human Rights.

Irving Brown, ICFTU representative to the UN, said that not only should the commission convene as scheduled but that the scene of its deliberations should be Berlin.

"The ICFTU cannot but protest," he said, "against the decision of the Economic & Social Council not to convene the Commission on Human Rights in 1964, and we call upon the General Assembly to overrule it."

In a memorandum to the current session of the General Assembly, the IFCTU, spokesman for free trade union organizations throughout the world, stressed that the UN should transform the Human Rights Commission into a UN specialized agency so that it could have some independence.

Issues dealt with by the ICFTU included improvements in the UN organizational structure, international trade and commodity agree-

(Continued on Page 2)

PRESS FILL-IN was given by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at news conference following one-day meeting of federation Executive Council in Washington.

Tax Cut, Rights Bills Pressed by Council

(Continued from Page 1)

Combined with an additional $1 billion in state and local matching funds, this would create hundreds of thousands of badly-needed jobs, the statement said.

In calling for prompt civil rights action, the Executive Council praised the bill drafted by a House Judiciary subcommittee as deserving of "the support of every member of Congress and of every American citizen." It called for prompt approval by the full committee, quickly followed by House and Senate action.

Negroes Still Humiliated

Negro Americans, the council emphasized, still face the "humiliation" of being denied equal access to public accommodations, the "economic hardship" of job discrimination, the "denial of the right to vote" and the lack of "equal educational opportunities."

This is a "shameful list of demials," the council said, "which no human being should be asked to bear and no citizen of a free nation can conscientiously condone."

In emphasizing that there is no need to shunt aside tax legislation, the council pointed out that the House-passed bill now in the Senate Finance Committee has already had "extensive hearings" in the House Ways & Means Committee, "where witnesses from every walk of life have stated their views."

The "groundwork" for both bills has been laid, the statement pointed out, and both should be promptly enacted.

The council's separate public works statement noted that two-and-a-half years after the low-point of the last recession, "the jobless rate still exceeds 5.5 percent of the labor force."

"Long-term unemployment has not diminished for over a year and is particularly acute among Negroes," it added. "Unemployment among young people is on the rise."

Action Needed Now

Warning that "all evidence indicates this course will continue unless action is taken now," the council added:

"A great backlog of public works already exists in areas of substantial unemployment on which planning is completed and work could get quickly underway if federal funds become available."

Continuation of the accelerated public works program deserves "high priority," the statement concluded.

Council Backs Union-Aided Kenya Project

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has given its backing to a project to provide 287 single family housing units in Nairobi, Kenya, to be financed by loans from American and West German unions.

The $896,000 project will involve a loan of $375,000 by AFL-CIO affiliates and a similar amount by a banking organization owned by West German unions. The Nairobi City Council is putting up $20,000 and guaranteeing the loans by the union groups.

The housing project is estimated to provide badly needed employment for approximately 300 persons over a two-year period.

The union loans will be for 15 years and pay an annual interest of 4 percent.

Factory Hiring Rise Less Than Seasonal

Factory hirings increased less than seasonally between July and August and failed to meet seasonal expectations in most of the 21 major industry groups, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The hiring rate rose from 43 to 47 per 1,000 workers, or three below the level for the comparable period in 1962.

At the same time the layoff rate remained static at 20 per 1,000 workers, instead of declining as it usually does in August, and remained below the 1962 level, as it has for the past four months.

Council Urges Full Budget For NLRB

Congress has been urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to restore $600,000 trimmed from the appropriation for the National Labor Relations Board so the NLRB can effectively carry out its administrative duties.

A statement adopted by the council called for restoration of the funds, trimmed from the board's request for $23,060,000, when House and Senate subcommittees take up the supplemental appropriation for the year ending next June 30.

The council observed that because of the cutback "the NLRB will fall further behind in its case load" at a time when stepped-up organizing drives of the AFL-CIO, its trade departments and affiliates will be adding to the board's work load on election petitions.

The statement noted further that widespread employer opposition to the organizing campaigns could be expected to bring a rise in the number of unfair practice cases, and that equal rights cases also probably would increase.

"It is imperative," the council declared, "that the NLRB have sufficient funds to expeditiously handle the increased business before it. The public interest can only be served when the NLRB has the funds to properly perform the very duties assigned to it by the Congress."

Voluntary Assessment To Finance Vote Drive

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has approved a 5-cent-per-member voluntary assessment to finance a major register and get-out-the-vote campaign for the 1964 elections.

Pres. George Meany told reporters that the campaign, initiated on a major basis in 1960 and given a top priority in the 1962 campaign, is now a permanent activity of the AFL-CIO.

The drive will be concentrated in major industrial states, he said, to raise registration and voting among trade union members to a higher level for the 1964 elections. He noted that in the past two elections participation by trade unionists was at about the same level as other groups in the community, but it should be higher.

He emphasized that the register-vote drive is a nonpartisan activity and will be directed to all citizens on the basis that the widest possible participation in elections is vital to American democracy.

In 1960 the council approved a similar 5-cent voluntary assessment. In 1962 the assessment was set at 3 cents.

Shipbuilders' President:

John Grogan Named As Council Member

John J. Grogan, president of the Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, has been named a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and a vice president of the federation.

Grogan was named to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of L. S. Buckmaster in February 1962.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference at the conclusion of a one-day meeting of the council, which dealt with current legislative problems and initiation of a register and vote campaign, that Grogan was elected unanimously on the basis of his selection by a nominating committee.

Five Abstentions

The federation president reported that five council members abstained from voting—Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, Karl F. Feller and Jacob S. Potofsky. The nominating committee was composed of Vice Presidents George M. Harrison, Harry C. Bates and Joseph A. Beirne.

Meany said that the nominating committee had received a wire from Vice Pres. David J. McDonald, who normally serves on it, urging the naming of Grogan.

In reply to a question he commented that there was a consensus on the council that the balance of former AFL and CIO unions represented on the body at the time of merger should be maintained and that the entire council had the right to elect successors to members who resigned or died.

Grogan, 49, has been president of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers since 1951 and is now serving his third term as mayor of Hoboken, N. J.

Mayor of Hoboken

He joined the AFL Steamfitters Union in 1930 and served as executive secretary-treasurer of IUMSWA Local 15 from 1937 to 1942. The following year he was elected vice president and an executive board member.

He has served as president of the Hudson County Industrial Union Council and was a member of the New Jersey State Assembly from 1943 to 1947. Elected Hoboken city commissioner in 1947, he ran for the mayor's post and was elected in 1953 and twice re-elected.

In 1954 he was on the U.S. worker delegation to the Intl. Labor Organization. He is a vice president of the Urban League, has served as chairman of the United Jewish Appeal and has held posts in a number of Catholic organizations. He has participated in U.S. cultural exchange programs in Europe and the Far East and is an Army veteran of World War II.

JOHN J. GROGAN

ICFTU Protests to UN On Rights Session Ban

(Continued from Page 1)

ments, discrimination, political prisoners, Berlin wall, capital punishment, colonialism and disarmament.

Under the topic of employment, the ICFTU rejected Soviet claims that full employment has existed for the last 10 years or so without being given serious consideration by government authorities. The memorandum declared:

"The specific methods used in democratic industrial countries to eliminate unemployment, the inadequate scope of which has been criticized by free labor in those countries, are simply ignored in the USSR where indeed this social evil is officially treated as non-existent. Although scattered information on unemployment has frequently appeared in the official Soviet press for many years, no statistical data or systematic analyses have been released."

On the question of discrimination, the ICFTU called upon the General Assembly to draft a declaration on religious intolerance despite Communist opposition to giving this violation of human rights any consideration. The ICFTU also urged the UN to place on its agenda "the alarming problem of political prisoners" and urged that an international convention on political prisoners be adopted in the near future.

The ICFTU said that while it supports the proposal to expel South Africa from the UN, "we would be less than frank not to admit that this is insufficient and inadequate to achieve its humanitarian goals."

The memorandum said specific boycotts would have "a meaningful effect upon the South African economy," particularly in petroleum and its by-products.

"But in order to realize such a goal," said the ICFTU, "it would be necessary for the UN to have sufficient maritime and aircraft power to enforce such a boycott which in time would bring the South African government to a point where either they would have to concede or face internal pressures threatening the very existence of the present regime."

Test Ban Endorsed

The ICFTU reiterated its support of the nuclear test-ban treaty as "a first step which can lead to greater achievements in the eventual elimination or reduction of all weapons of war, whether nuclear or not."

"It is to be hoped," the memorandum continued, "that the totalitarian powers will break with their past of blackmail, aggressive designs and activities, as well as their unsavory record of breaking agreements."

Winnipeg Carpenters Go Back to School

Winnipeg, Man.—A six-month course aimed at raising the standards of work in their trade is being given for members of Carpenters Local 343 at the Manitoba Institute of Technology. More than 50 members are studying two full days a week.

In Maritime Dispute:

Voluntary Plan Rejected by CLC

(Continued from Page 1)

ent with our philosophy," Meany stressed.

To avert such legislation in Canada, he said, the AFL-CIO "cooperated fully" in an effort to reach agreement on a proposal to set up "a voluntary joint AFL-CIO and CLC trusteeship" over the SIU. The proposed trusteeship "would have full and complete authority over the officers and operations of the union" and would function with the complete support of the AFL-CIO and the SIU.

The discussions for a voluntary trusteeship failed, Meany reported, because of disagreement on these issues:

• Composition of the trusteeship. The AFL-CIO proposed a two-man trusteeship, one from the AFL-CIO and the other from the CLC with provision for a four-man committee composed of the presidents of the AFL-CIO and the CLC, the U.S. secretary of labor and the Canadian minister of labor to settle any disagreements or refer the question to an impartial arbitrator "drawn from a list unrestricted as to nationality."

The CLC "would not agree to this proposal," and insisted the two trustees turn directly to a third party in event of disagreement and that "this third party must be a Canadian national."

The AFL-CIO believes, said Meany, that the "primary factor" in the choice of a third party should be "impartiality rather than nationality.'

• Removal of officers. The AFL-CIO proposed that trustees have full power to remove any officials or employes of the SIU of Canada who were guilty of any of these acts: violation of the SIU constitution; violation of any of the standards of the AFL-CIO ethical practices codes; conviction of a criminal or other offense which "renders the individual unfit for union office"; wilfully obstructing the trustees in the performance of their duties.

The CLC position was that the trustees should have the power to remove SIU officials "for any cause or for no cause whatsoever, without reference to any standards or criteria of conduct," Meany said. He added: "This we could not agree to under any circumstances."

Effective Plan Cited

"The standards proposed by the AFL-CIO would, in our opinion, be entirely adequate to insure not only an effective trusteeship and the removal of any individuals found on the record or in subsequent conduct to warrant removal, but equally important, protect the rights and interests of the members and the rights of individuals to a reasonable measure of due process."

Meany noted that throughout the discussions the SIU was "fully cooperative" and agreeable to any reasonable proposal for voluntary settlement.

Wirtz termed the disagreement "exceedingly unfortunate." He said it would have laid a firm basis for the development "of a permanent policy of cooperative relationships between the AFL-CIO and the CLC."

Declaring that he still hopes an agreement may be reached, he declared he did not want to say anything which might interfere. However, in view of public statements "which have been made regarding responsibility for the breakdown," Wirtz noted the necessity to stress the full cooperation of the AFL-CIO.

The dispute originated when a Canadian steamship company terminated a bargaining relationship of 10 years standing with the SIU in Canada and signed a contract with a newly-created union sponsored by the CLC. The SIU struck the company. A committee of inquiry in July 1962 established these facts and noted that the CLC is "determined" to support the new CLC affiliate in displacing the SIU of Canada which had been expelled by the CLC.

A subsequent one-man commission appointed by the Canadian government, Meany said, "became the vehicle for a vitriolic and vengeful attack upon the SIU of Canada and its leadership" and included demands to place the SIU and other maritime unions in Canada "under the most sweeping and direct government controls ever undertaken in the North American continent."

BRAZILIAN LABOR LEADERS visiting the U.S. sat in on negotiations between Office Workers Local 153 in New York and the Pabst Brewing Co., believed to be the first time a foreign group sponsored by the Labor Dept. has participated in a bargaining session of a U.S. union. Al Addeo, Local 53 business agent and chief union negotiator, is on the right side at the head of the table.

Drastic Aerospace Pay Review Proposed by UAW and IAM

Los Angeles—A drastic overhaul of the "antiquated and outmoded" wage and hiring system in the aerospace industry has been asked by two big unions representing 500,000 workers in the industry.

The Machinists and the Auto Workers, charging that the 20-year-old system of determining wage rates has been a "constant source of disturbance, friction and conflict," urged that Pres. Kennedy establish immediately a commission representing labor, management and the government to recommend a new wage system.

The union representatives, meeting here in the third joint IAM-UAW Aerospace Conference, proposed that the commission begin work this year "before the pressures for negotiating new agreements in 1965 begin to mount and a new crisis is upon us."

The 300 delegates, from plants all over the nation, called on the U.S. government, as the only major customer of the air-space industry, and on management to join with union representatives in a "thorough study" of the causes of labor-management conflicts.

The conference urged the President to establish a tripartite commission with authority to:

• "Study and make recommendations for a more equitable and up-to-date system of determining wage rates."

• Examine industry manpower needs "so all parties may gain a better understanding" of problems created by irregular employment and make recommendations "for an employment security program for laid-off workers comparable to" those in other industries.

System 20 Years Old

Observing that in an era of spacecraft, missiles, rocket engines and related products, most aerospace workers are "saddled with a 20-year-old system of determining wage rates," the conference declared:

"The injustice suffered by aerospace workers is compounded by the extreme fluctuations of employment caused by changes in military needs, and placement of defense contracts with little consideration for the security" of workers.

Workers in other industries have been able to find solutions by "direct economic action" but areospace workers, because of the essential nature of their industry, are denied the freedom to use normal collective bargaining weapons, the delegates said.

The system they object to was fathered by a group of large airframe manufacturers, producing the P-38 fighter plane and the piston-engine B-25 bomber in Southern California, the Conference recalled. It was adopted by the War Labor Board in 1943 to stabilize wages during World War II and since has been a "constant source of disturbance, friction and conflict," the conference said.

"It has been misused by individual companies to gain competitive wage advantage at the expense of workers," delegates charged. "It has kept workers from keeping pace with normal increases in wage rates enjoyed by workers in other industries. . . .

Many Rates for Same Job

"This system of determining wages permits confusing and overlapping job descriptions. It enables the classification of the same work at several wage rates so that in some plants different rates are paid for identical work requiring the same basic skills.

"Abuses of the wage system have accumulated over 20 years without reform or progress. Inequities for workers have multiplied.

"Through the use of vague and contradictory job descriptions and multiple classifications, workers' earnings are constantly being cut. General wage increases, negotiated through collective bargaining, are soon dissipated by reclassification and management gerrymandering of job descriptions."

The conference recalled that mediators twice have noted the unfairness in aerospace wages. In a 1952 dispute at North American Aviation Corp., a panel awarded extra money to narrow the differential between aerospace wages and others in comparable industries. In 1962 a presidential panel headed by Dr. George W. Taylor concluded that the wage system is antiquated and warrants a thorough overhauling by the parties.

"This kind of task cannot be performed in a few weeks of crisis bargaining," it said, or in a few days of hearings called to mediate a large number of issues.

"The avoidance of future crises," the Taylor panel said, "will depend upon careful work by the parties in the three-year period" before contract reopenings. It was on that basis that the IAM-UAW conference made its new proposals.

'Backward' Trend Seen In State Aid to Jobless

Omaha—Unemployment insurance programs in many states have "started to go backward," an AFL-CIO spokesman told state employment directors at their annual meeting here.

Raymond Munts, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, told the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies that the trend towards increased disqualification rules is a "perversion" of the program.

He noted that North Dakota, Tennessee and Wyoming have imposed harsher qualification standards this year, that Wyoming became the first state in the history of the program to reduce benefit amounts and Colorado cut back on the maximum duration of benefits.

While several states enacted "the usual small increases in maximum weekly benefits," Munts said that this merely represented a "catching up" to standards of a few years ago and "in no case" came close to the relationship between maximum benefits and average state wages which existed when the program began.

Only Alabama and North Dakota saw the "wisdom" of tieing maximum benefits to a percentage of state wage levels, he noted.

Munts warned also that pressures to keep unemployment insurance taxes low have resulted in a steady decline of reserves.

"Underfinancing has depleted the reserves in 23 states to the point where they are insufficient to pay benefits for 18 months under recession conditions, and in seven of these states, cannot even pay for 12 months," he asserted.

Munts called on the state directors to fight vigorously against attacks by fee-charging agencies and to "step up the reforms on which you have embarked" to improve the quality and service of state employment offices.

The attacks on the public employment service, he said, are "directly against the interest of workers and employers who use the service" and contradict the need for "efficient manpower utilization through a free, open, informed and honest labor market."

Supreme Court to Hear Five Labor Law Cases

The Supreme Court has docketed five cases involving labor law for its present term and has invited the government to file briefs in two other cases, Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman of the National Labor Relations Board told a labor law forum.

Three of the cases involve the secondary-boycott provisions of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, Ordman said, including the legal right of strikers to request support from members of other unions and to publicize disputes by distribution of consumer handbills.

In another case the labor board is challenging a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision overturning an NLRB ruling that an employer commits an unfair labor practice by announcing economic benefits just before a scheduled representation election and issuing statements promising employes that it is "unnecessary for them to have a union to obtain future benefits."

A fifth case—also arising from the 5th Circuit Court—deals with whether a federal district court can enjoin a representation election scheduled by the NLRB. The board is arguing that a district court has no such power.

Ordman listed these two cases in which the NLRB and the Dept. of Justice were invited to file briefs:

• A Florida case involving the Retail Clerks where the issue is whether a state law forbidding the agency shop shall be enforceable in state courts, through the NLRB alone, or both.

The RCIA, backed by a brief filed by the AFL-CIO, argues that enforcement should be by the NLRB alone. The government argues, with reservations, that enforcement rests with state procedures.

• A New York case in which state courts said an arbitration dispute was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the NLRB, whereas the Dept. of Justice argues that state courts have full authority to entertain suits involving arbitration disputes.

Ordman's remarks were made at a Washington, D. C. forum on recent labor law developments sponsored jointly by the Georgetown University Law Center, Federal Bar Association and Bureau of National Affairs.

Wayne State U. to Get Michigan Labor Files

Port Huron, Mich.—The executive board of the Michigan AFL-CIO at a meeting in the FDR Labor Center near here designated the labor archives section of Wayne State University as the official depository of the state labor body's records and files.

Denver School System Infiltrated by Confucius

Denver—The small but lively AFL-CIO Denver Federation of Teachers is ignored by the city school administration in favor of the "sweetheart" Denver Classroom Teachers' Association, though even the latter is not privileged to negotiate salaries and conditions on a formal basis.

Each autumn the DCTA gives an indoctrination luncheon for new teachers. This year a fortune cookie lay on each plate, and the guests, pleased at this little extra attention, seemed still more pleased as they read the messages in the cookies.

Someone tipped off the hosts. They broke a cookie and read its message:

"Confucius say: School superintendents never recruit for unions."

Others read:

"Confucius say: There's a secret ballot election in your future."

"Confucius say: Only in unions is there strength."

Horrified officialdom swooped along the tables and scooped up the remaining unopened cookies, of which there were not many. DFT officials would say nothing, save:

"Confucius say: Truth in fortune cookies may sometimes embarrass sweethearts."

"Confucius say, too: Other unions might well note success of tactic and start thinking how to apply it."

Textile Workers Win Holdout Georgia Mill

Canton, Ga.—A plant that "everyone" said would never be organized—Canton Cotton Mills, Inc.—has been won by the Textile Workers Union of America in a National Labor Relations Board election, 654 to 373.

Canton Cotton workers "sort of organized themselves," with the help of TWUA members and nearby union people. But the key factor was identified this way by TWUA Pres. William Pollock at a spontaneous victory celebration here:

"Sometimes the boss is our best organizer."

The boss is Louis L. Jones, Jr., grandson of the man who started Canton Cotton in 1899 and a first cousin of Robert T. "Bobby" Jones, famous golfer. The Jones family runs the mill, a hotel, an insurance company and other power centers. The only union organizer to show up in many years was escorted out of town during World War II.

But the spirit of independence is growing in the South, even in company towns, and Jones helped by increasing the work load to a point the workers found intolerable, union sources indicated.

Canton is only 42 miles from Atlanta, and the word had trickled in of a better climate for union organization—a Chemical Workers victory at the Scripto Pen Co. in Atlanta, with 1,000 workers; the Meat Cutters winning 400 poultry workers in an area election, and the Sheet Metal Workers adding 70 members at a chicken wire plant.

It was at that psychological moment that a TWUA member, heading back to Atlanta from a trip through the non-union wilderness, found himself going through Canton with almost 1,000 handbills and passed them out at shift change time on the off chance that a few workers might be interested.

Two days later the office of TWUA Reg. Dir. Michael Botelho in Atlanta received about 300 coupons, clipped from the union "flyer" and asking more information. A hurriedly organized team sped to Canton, rounded up 100 more names on membership cards and petitioned for an election. The employer consented, and the rest is history.

For TWUA the immediate job ahead is to get a better deal for Canton Cotton workers via a contract. Beyond that, at least 25,000 millhands in Georgia work at low wages and need the advantages of organization urgently.

Botelho has expressed appreciation for the help of the Stone Cutters, Clothing Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and other unions, including the Auto Workers at the nearby Lockheed plant in Marietta, Ga.

Phil Murray Life Film To Be Shown

The George Meany Foundation, in cooperation with the Jewish Theological Seminary, will present a televised film based on the life of Philip Murray, late president of the former CIO.

The foundation-sponsored program, entitled "A New Earth," was written by Joseph Mindel and will be presented on "The Eternal Light" television series over the National Broadcasting Co. TV network on Nov. 17.

The half-hour program will be shown at 1:30 p.m., (EST).

This year's program will be the second of the annual broadcasts to be presented by the foundation. Last year's film, entitled "Never Ask What Country," was devoted to the life of William Green, late president of the former AFL. "The Eternal Light" series has for more than 16 years been recognized as one of television's leading public service presentations.

The George Meany Foundation was established last year by trade union friends of the AFL-CIO president to "further the understanding of the ethical principles by which all moral men live."

August Stoppages At Postwar Low

The number of work stoppages that began in August, and workers involved, reached their lowest levels for any August since the end of World War II.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said 325 stoppages involving 75,000 workers began this August. Another 250 stoppages, continuing from July, brought the total number of workers affected to 185,000—15 one-hundredths of 1 percent of total working time.

The total of 1.62 million mandays lost was the second lowest level for the month in postwar years.

Total Now $780,000:

Fugitive Firm's Backpay Bill Boosted by NLRB Examiner

Sidele Fashions, Inc., runaway blouse manufacturer, owes more than $370,000 in backpay to the garment workers it stranded almost four years ago when it moved from Philadelphia to Ware Shoals, S. C., a National Labor Relations Board examiner has found.

The findings, by Trial Examiner Benjamin B. Lipton, brought to $780,000 the total penalties levied on Sidele by the labor board, the courts and an impartial arbiter, all upholding charges by the Ladies' Garment Workers that the firm broke the labor law and its ILGWU contracts when it moved out in 1959 and 1960 and closed its Philadelphia plant.

After Lipton's backpay computation, Sidele filed a bankruptcy petition in U.S. District Court at Greenville, S. C., in which it listed assets of $93,000. The ILGWU then asked the court for permission to examine Sidele's books to make sure no assets have been diverted.

The union will continue, Vice Pres. William Ross said, to make every effort to win back the wages lost by 206 former Sidele workers. He said the fate of the firm should be "an object lesson" to all runaway employers.

Lipton took testimony in Philadelphia last summer for the sole purpose of determining the amounts of backpay due 223 employe-claimants under a board order of Oct. 2, 1961, enforced by the U.S. 3d Circuit Court of Appeals on Aug. 14, 1962. He recommended that the NLRB direct payment of lost wages in these amounts:

Amount Recommended

Approximately $140,000 in full payment of the claims of 114 workers, $212,000 for the claims of 81 workers up to Dec. 31, 1961, or Mar. 31, 1962, plus additional amounts to be estimated later, for those who have not found comparable jobs.

Lipton recommended that $18,517 be held in escrow for 11 former employes whom the NLRB and the ILGWU have been unable to locate. No backpay is due 17 other ex-employes, the examiner concluded.

The history of the dispute shows that the employer and the union had lived "peaceably" for 20 years, enjoying good contract relations marked by a short plant closing and a 10 percent pay cut, agreed to by the union to save jobs.

In mid-1959, however, the employer secretly arranged for the construction of a plant in a distressed area of South Carolina, surreptitiously moved his women's blousemaking operations there one weekend during contract negotiations, and shut up shop in Philadelphia.

The union brought two legal actions—one before the industry arbiter, who ordered Sidele to pay $410,000 for violating its agreements; the other before the NLRB. The result was a finding by Trial Examiner Ramey Donovan in 1961 that Sidele, doing business in South Carolina as Personality Sportswear, Inc., should bargain with the ILGWU on layoff pay and rehiring rights for former employes.

Donovan held that Mac J. Cahn and Sidney I Schiro, the owners, had moved their operations for economic reasons. NLRB members later agreed that moving the plant was not unlawful but held that closing the Philadelphia operation was. They ordered the firm to rehire its former employes at Ware Shoals or at Philadelphia, and to give them back pay from date of layoff to date of rehire.

The latest proceeding was to estimate the amount of backpay due under the board's order.

Lipton pointed out that the board order plainly stated that backpay would be counted from the date of discrimination until the date equivalent employment was found.

As to employes who accepted the offer, Lipton added that the job terms were not equivalent to those enjoyed at Philadelphia, under union conditions. The examiner also held that the backpay should be based on Philadelphia wages, since the employes would have got those wages except for the discrimination against them.

The firm offered employment to its former workers at Ware Shoals on Sept. 4, 1962, but only nine accepted. The examiner said Sidele did not offer to pay moving expenses, as the board and the court directed.

Insurance Workers Win Metropolitan Election

Chicago—The Insurance Workers have won bargaining rights for 800 agents and consultants in 33 Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. offices here.

The vote, conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, was 410 for the IWIU, 317 against and 21 challenged.

The election was the last and largest, in a series that followed IWIU organizing campaigns in 10 Metropolitan offices. The union won eight, lost two, in the series and now represents 1,745 more employes in new bargaining units.

Still to be resolved is a legal battle over the union's right to represent the new units. Metropolitan, one of the leaders in the insurance industry, has challenged NLRB decisions on the size of bargaining units and has been charged with refusal to bargain in several cases.

Appeals are pending, the union said, in U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals in Cincinnati, Philadelphia and Boston. The appeals revolve around board determinations that bargaining units can be smaller than statewide. The union filed for elections in citywide units and the elections were held over management objections.

Other recent elections the IWIU won were in Metropolitan offices in Detroit, Cleveland, Toledo, Wilmington, Del., Meriden and New London, Conn., and Woonsocket, R. I. Elections were lost in Sioux City, Ia., and Olean, N. Y.

The Chicago organizing drive was headed by IWIU Vice Pres. Robert J. Nicholson, with more than half the union staff assisting. It was a cooperative effort, Nicholson said, with AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Daniel J. Healy and his staff.

Tax Base Rise Called Social Security Need

Social security benefits, totaling more than $13.5 billion last year, could be even higher if the taxable wage base were raised, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson A. Cruikshank declared.

Cruikshank, interviewed on the Mutual radio network's Labor News Conference, emphasized that the social security trust funds are in sound financial condition, as certified by the recent report of the trustees.

He pointed out, however, that the present $4,800 ceiling on taxable wages represents a much smaller proportion of the income of workers covered by the program than did the $3,000 ceiling established in 1939. A comparable proportion today would require a wage base of approximately $9,400 and the AFL-CIO has urged Congress to raise the limit on wages subject to the social security tax to $6,000.

A higher wage level, the AFL-CIO expert pointed out, would permit greater maximum benefits and would serve as a hedge against dilution of the buying power of benefit dollars through inflation.

As for the future of social security, Cruikshank expressed confidence that there is no danger of any Congress abolishing the program.

"Any Congress that would ever try to destroy the social security system would find itself out of office en masse in two short years," he observed.

Kennedy Acts To Forestall Airline Strike

Pres. Kennedy has ordered establishment of a special emergency board to investigate a contract dispute between the Machinists and United Air Lines and said he will name the three board members soon.

The President's order headed off a strike scheduled to start at midnight Oct. 10. The order was urged by the National Mediation Board, which said the dispute threatened to interrupt interstate commerce "substantially."

Its effect is to "freeze" the status quo for 60 days unless the parties reach agreement in the meantime.

Last month the IAM, asserting that seven airline managements had refused to make any counter offers to union proposals during 16 months of negotiations, set Oct. 10 as the deadline for a strike against United.

'Deadman' Switch Fails, Rail Fireman Cited

Boston — David H. Fabricius, member of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, was honored here with his union's safety award for the action in stopping a train after its engineer became incapacitated and slumped over the controls with his foot on the "deadman" control. The train with 180 passengers aboard was running out of control when Fabricius brought it to a stop.

No Contract, No Work:

National Symphony Season Threatened

Washington's National Symphony Orchestra Association, locked in a contract dispute with the Musicians, canceled two concerts when symphony players refused to attend the first scheduled rehearsal of the season.

Spokesmen for the players, who have been seeking at least 33 weeks of work a year and a minimum wage of $6,000 so members will not have to "moonlight" at other jobs, said the association's refusal to make an acceptable contract offer has placed the symphony season in doubt.

Cancellation of the rehearsal and two concerts—one for the American Bankers Association convention and the other for Maryland school children—constituted the first time in 33 years that the orchestra's 94 players missed a scheduled engagement.

The cancellation followed a vote by the players to reject management's "final" offer in negotiations that started nine months earlier. Present pay is $4,480 for 32 weeks of work.

The association, headed by H. Gabriel Murphy as president and Charles C. Glover III as chairman of the executive committee, has offered a three-year contract which would bring wages to $4,640 the first season, $4,800 the next and $5,000 the third.

Though negotiations began last January, spokesmen for AFM Local 161, representing the players, said management has maintained a "rigid" position from the start and, since members rejected their "final" offer, has proposed to resume negotiations but will not discuss more money.

Union Sec. J. Martin Emerson said he saw little hope for an early settlement—or any settlement—of the dispute.

Both sides in the disagreement were called to the White House Oct. 8 for a conference with Charles A. Horsky, special assistant to the President, who listened to a recital of the position of union and management without indicating his opinion or future course of action.

Union members believe their training and skill entitle them to a professional wage from the orchestra association, and that they should not be forced to take part-time jobs outside the music field to make a living.

A union survey showed that some National Symphony members have been required to take jobs as taxi drivers, bakers, construction workers, guards or part-time salesmen in order to "subsidize" their jobs with the nationally noted orchestra.

Emerson and union Pres. Sam Jack Kaufman said some players are beginning to make other plans for the season. The absence of the National Symphony Orchestra from new concert-season agendas is "already conspicuous" despite management advertisements to the contrary, they said.

31 YOUNG UNION LEADERS, from 10 Latin American nations, are welcomed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to a new class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Two Major Citizen Groups Urge Tax Cut

(Continued from Page 1)

bulk of the tax cut should be in the lower-income brackets, where the savings will be most quickly pumped back into the economy to stimulate business and industry.

It warned that "much, if not all, of the stimulating effect of a tax cut might be nullified if it were accompanied by a reduction in spending, by a balanced budget, or by tax reforms which aim solely at redistributing, rather than reducing, the total tax burden on the economy."

At the same time, the statement declared, "needed public services should be pushed forward and everything possible should be done to help the public to recognize that these also contribute to economic growth."

The statement from the Citizens Tax Reduction committee stressed the need for prompt Senate action after a "reasonable" period of deliberation by its Finance Committee.

The "current economic upswing," the committee said, "is to a substantial degree based on anticipation of a tax cut."

In order to help expedite the Senate hearings, the committee said a statement by its chairman, Pres. Howard R. Bowen of Grinnell College, would be submitted "for the record" to the Senate panel, rather than presented in person.

Build Strong Unions, Meany Urges Latins

A strong, free trade union movement is the best assurance of a democratic society, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told 31 youthful union leaders from 10 Latin American nations.

Welcoming the group to the American Institute for Free Labor Development, Meany stressed the common desire of workers the world over for a better life—and the AFL-CIO's conviction that this can be achieved only through a free trade union movement.

"Every dictator, whether of the right or the left, has begun by destroying free trade unions . . . because you can't dictate to free men," he declared.

For this reason, he said, the AFL-CIO views the destruction of unions in any part of the world as "a menace to the future of workers in the United States."

The new class, the fifth to undertake the intensive training program of the AIFLD, includes for the first time a delegation from Mexico. Ten of the students are from that nation and the others come from El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Panama, Paraguay (in exile), Peru and Venezuela.

On completion of their two-and-a-half month program, the graduates will join the 150 young union leaders who have preceded them in helping to build a strong, democratic union movement in the western hemisphere. The institute has drawn students, ranging in age from 25 to 35, from nearly every country in Central and South America and the Caribbean area.

The AFL-CIO, Meany stressed to the new entering class, has no desire to "control" or "interfere" in the Latin American workers' movement.

"It is our hope," he said, "that your studies will be fruitful, not for the AFL-CIO, but for the people of the society in which you live."

The institute's purpose, he emphasized, is "to advance the cause of free trade unions, to advance the cause of worker freedom."

World Labor Standards Held Vital to U.S. Trade

A labor-industry committee has called for establishment of international fair labor standards as "essential" to expansion of world trade and export markets for U.S. goods.

The committee's report, based on meetings held during the recent White House Conference on Export Expansion, declared that once substandard labor conditions are eliminated as a basis for international trade competition, "living standards in countries affected will be improved, purchasing power increased, and export markets thereby opened."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, named by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges as chairman of the committee, was represented on the panel by Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. George M. Harrison brought a message from Meany to the conference. Other labor members present included Joseph D. Keenan, AFL-CIO vice president and secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Intl. Rep. Rudy Faupl of the Machinists; Irving Bluestone, assistant to the president of the Auto Workers, and Mine Workers Pres. W. Anthony Boyle.

The committee noted that the "wage gap" between the U.S. and its trade competitors has been narrowing as labor movements abroad have become stronger "and wage increases have come at a higher rate than wage increases in this country."

Noting that technological advances have kept U.S. unit production costs down despite rising wages, the committee pointed out, however, that there are "problems as well as benefits . . . from an export drive which emphasizes high productivity . . . particularly in view of our persistently high level of unemployment."

The committee stressed that "a national full employment policy is essential to provide the basis for adequate adjustments to rapid technological change."

It called also for "more effective" government programs involving retraining and relocation of workers.

IUE Accepts Westinghouse Wage Offer

Pittsburgh — A Westinghouse Electric Corp. offer of a 14-cent average hourly wage increase over a three-year period has been accepted by negotiators for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and management accepted a union proposal for three weeks' vacation after 10 years, plus an extra day for each year after 15.

But no agreement was reached on other improvements and negotiations continued after the IUE Westinghouse Conference Board rejected other management proposals as "totally inadequate" and "loaded with gimmicks."

The IUE represents 36,000 Westinghouse workers at 28 plant locations. The current agreement has an Oct. 15 termination date.

Conference board delegates adopted a resolution calling on all locals to "take whatever action may be necessary" to get a satisfactory agreement.

Recently the union reached agreement on a new three-year contract with the General Electric Co. and its negotiators here approved acceptance of similar wage terms in the Westinghouse contract—7 cents an hour this year and an additional 5 to 10 cents an hour, for an average of 7 cents, in April 1965.

Pres. Kennedy Clarifies Stand On Workweek

Pres. Kennedy was speaking of the long-range future, not the present moment, when he said on his recent western tour that increased leisure would "find the workweek reduced" below the present 40-hour standard.

The President made this clear at his Oct. 9 news conference in Washington, saying in reply to a question that reduction of the workweek now would be a "great mistake," affecting our "competitive position abroad."

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly urged that chronic high-level joblessness requires reduction of the Fair Labor Standards Act workweek to 35 hours, with double-time pay for overtime.

Kennedy's western speech was cast in terms of the need for steadily improving conservation, resource development and recreation facilities to "prepare us for that period" later on when "machines increasingly take the place of men," the President told reporters Oct. 9.

"I see the time coming at the end of the century—perhaps sooner," he elaborated, "not now."

More Seniors' Housing Backed by AFL-CIO

An expanded program of housing for the elderly, including long-term, low-interest loans to non-profit groups, was urged by the AFL-CIO in testimony before a Senate Banking & Currency subcommittee.

Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee warned that the U.S. is "falling back, not moving forward, in the race with the growing housing need."

The present pace of home construction, he said, is a million units a year less than the number needed to keep up with the needs of a growing population and the deterioration of older homes.

Shishkin, testifying before a subcommittee headed by Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), stressed also that home construction, 'more than any other economic activity" generates employment. In addition to direct construction work and the building materials industry, jobs are created in a wide variety of household furniture and equipment plants, he pointed out.

Included in the bill, sponsored by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and a bipartisan group of co-sponsors, is a provision for extending to nursing homes operated by non-profit groups the federal mortgage insurance now available to profit-making nursing homes for the elderly.

The previous exclusion of non-profit institutions, Shishkin declared, was "indefensible."

He said federal mortgage guarantees for non-profit facilities "can assist in making good nursing home care more available."

Shishkin urged also that "it be provided by law" that federal funds, mortgage guarantees or other financial assistance be given only when the housing is available to all, "without discrimination or segregation."

Appearing with Shishkin were Dir. Alexander Bookstaver of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investments and Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the Dept. of Social Security.

Job Injury Rate Up in 2d Quarter

The job-injury frequency rate in manufacturing rose to 10.8 disabling injuries per 1 million hours worked in the second quarter of 1963 or about 2 percent above the first quarter level of 10.6, according to preliminary statistics compiled by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The rate usually rises in the second quarter, but the average for recent years has been 1 percent, the bureau said. Most of the jump came in April.

For the first six months the cumulative rate was 10.8, the third lowest rate in the past 20 years and 4 percent under the rate for the first half of last year.

Time for Both

TWO BILLS of overriding importance to the welfare of the nation and its citizens are before Congress today. Rarely in recent times has the Congress faced two challenges so great and two answers so obvious.

One of these is the challenge to secure and protect the constitutional rights of all American citizens. In every quarter of our nation minority groups, especially Negroes, are denied in varying degrees the benefits of our society which the majority enjoy.

The civil rights bill which has been reported by House Judiciary Subcommittee No. 5 is a strong, well-balanced bill which should be approved promptly by the full committee, by the House of Representatives and by the Senate. It recognizes the varied nature of the problem of civil rights, and provides reasonable solutions for it.

Failure to pass it in this session of Congress would be a cruel punishment to millions of Americans, and would fail to destroy the shadow of hyprocisy which hovers over our government.

The other bill of critical importance is the tax bill which has been passed by the House of Representatives.

The proposed Revenue Act of 1963 has been urged upon Congress by the President, by labor and by business groups as a means to reduce high unemployment and spur economic growth.

The tax bill passed by the House will, if enacted, go far to provide jobs for those who seek them. Much of the tax reductions in the bill would go to low and moderate income groups. These families will spend their tax savings on consumer goods and services.

This spending will, in turn, provide more jobs for those who make those goods and provide those services, and these new jobholders will in turn provide more jobs through their own increased consumption. The result will be to put the nation back on the road to economic health.

★ ★ ★

IT SHOULD BE pointed out that the success or failure of efforts to pass the tax bill bear heavily on the effectiveness of the civil rights bill now before the House Judiciary Committee. Among other things, that bill provides for federal guarantees of equal employment opportunities and equal access to public accommodations.

If the tax bill fails of prompt passage, however, guarantees of those rights may prove hollow indeed. If no jobs are to be had, the Negro will have achieved only the equal opportunity to be unemployed, and if he has no income, he cannot spend it in public accommodations.

Unfortunately, the civil rights bill and the tax bill have become embroiled in political maneuver. Americans are being told that one or the other can be passed in this session of Congress, but not both. We reject this contention.

The Senate Finance Committee has before it a tax bill on which extensive hearings have already been held in the House of Representatives, where witnesses from every walk of life have stated their views. The House Judiciary Committee has before it a civil rights bill over which its subcommittee has already labored long and arduously. The three months remaining in this session is ample time to give due consideration to both measures.

—Excerpted from a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted Oct. 8, 1963.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Oct. 12, 1963 No. 41

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Let's Get At It

History's Biggest Trade Negotiations:

Bargaining Already Opening In 'Kennedy Round' Tariff Talks

By Bert Seidman

ALTHOUGH THE START of formal negotiations is more than six months off, hard bargaining has been going on in preliminary skirmishes of what has come to be known as the "Kennedy round" of tariff and trade negotiations.

This designation seems appropriate. Last year's enactment of the Trade Expansion Act sponsored by Pres. Kennedy set the stage for what may well be the biggest tariff and trade negotiations in history. The act gave the President authority to negotiate cuts up to 50 percent in most U.S. tariffs and up to 100 percent for products for which the combined trade of the U.S. and the European Common Market is at least 80 percent of the world total.

When Kennedy signed the act, negotiations were in progress looking toward British affiliation to the common market (West Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands and Luxemburg). British accession was expected to be followed by either full or associate membership of most or all of Britain's partners in the European Free Trade Association (United Kingdom, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland, Austria and Portugal) as well as other European countries.

Those hopes were dashed when Gen. Charles de Gaulle announced in his now famous press conference France's veto of British membership in the European Economic Community (EEC), as the common market is officially called.

The first direct impact was all but to eliminate the possibility of 100 percent tariff cuts since combined U.S.-EEC trade without Great Britain and the other EFTA countries amounts to 80 percent of the world total for only two or three relatively minor categories. Thus, tariff cuts in the Kennedy round will be held to a maximum of 50 percent—but far more than in any previous round.

The question still remains how close the negotiators will come to the 50 percent target. The atmosphere has been particularly clouded in recent months by the so-called "chicken war." This conflict stems from a common market decision a year ago to raise its duty on frozen chickens from 4.9 to 13.4 cents a pound.

U.S. producers immediately protested that this would completely nip in the bud their mushrooming exports to the common market, principally to Western Germany, which in five years have reached an annual total of $52.6 million. U.S. trade officials questioned whether the sharp hike was not a forecast of limitations on imports of other agricultural commodities, especially wheat and other cereals.

Under sharp U.S. pressure, including a threat to raise U.S. tariffs on $46 million worth of a variety of industrial products, the common market agreed to reduce its new 13.4 cent duty by 10 percent.

WHILE NEWSPAPERS on both sides of the Atlantic have been focusing on the chicken war, other issues of potentially much greater importance are being studied and discussed in both common market and U.S. Government quarters. Agreements will have to be reached on most of these questions before formal negotiations start. Here are a few of the more difficult ones:

1. Disparities: Average U.S. and common market tariffs are about the same but the U.S. has more very high and very low tariffs whereas most common market tariffs, arrived at by averaging the high and low individual tariffs of the six countries, tend to cluster around the middle. The common market says that the high U.S. tariffs are more protective and keep out more exports than their more moderate ones. They seem to ignore the fact that the U.S. has more low tariffs.

2. Agriculture: The U.S. insists, and the common market agrees, that the Kennedy round must include farm as well as industrial products. However, this will not be possible unless EEC can agree in advance on its own agricultural policy. So far, substantial internal differences have forestalled the solution of this knotty problem.

3. Non-Tariff Barriers: Both sides claim that various non-tariff restrictions can wipe out the beneficial effects of tariff cuts. For example, the common market claims that by basing rates on the "U.S. selling price" American chemicals are given extra high protection. U.S. representatives counter with complaints that all common market tariffs are set after adding to the base price shipping, insurance and handling charges (plus a special "value added" tax in the case of France) while the U.S. includes only freight costs above the base price.

Other non-tariff measures at issue are anti-dumping rules, special taxes discriminating against imports and "Buy American" and equivalent European restrictions on use of imported products in public activities.

Morgan Says:

Revolutions in Latin America Reflect Resistance to Reforms

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

WHILE THE IMPROBABLE ingredients of sweetness and light threaten to color even more our relationship with the Soviet Union for the nonce, the Devil himself seems to have got loose in our hemisphere to menace the Alliance for Progress and there is distressing evidence that he has been busy for some time poisoning attitudes within the great western alliance. In other words, as sometimes happens in life, we are on better terms with our enemies than with our friends.

Morgan

The crises south of the border are beginning to look like TV westerns with Latin accents. In a week, two moderate Central American governments have fallen to the tough guys of the military, in the Dominican Republic and Honduras. Ecuador had a similar if possibly less sinister spasm recently and Peru came under the grip of a military junta earlier, though the story there has taken on a silver lining. Free elections were held and now a civilian regime is uneasily in control in Lima.

But more trouble is almost bound to follow elsewhere. Haiti has been seething for months—although the situation there is reversed: a bad guy, Dictator Duvalier, is already long in the saddle and we would dearly love to unhorse him but internal efforts have been unavailing so far. Brazil, plagued with inflation and weak government, could produce an explosion that would make the Castro revolution look like a wet firecracker.

What these crises and impending crises indicate is not so much a failure of our aid through the Alliance for Progress but the desperate need for it, tied—as the Alliance is supposed to insist—to social and political reform. Paradoxically, it is resistance to land, tax, education and other reforms by governing cliques or would-be governing cliques which has been one of the main underlying causes of the convulsions we have been witnessing.

Confronted with such darkly unfortunate spectacles as the overthrow of Juan Bosch in the Dominican Republic or a Honduran government trying mildly to go along with the Alliance pattern, we are inclined to wring our hands and say "What went wrong? What do we do now? And can't these things be prevented?" In large measure we are reaping the harvest of generations of dollar diplomacy or downright neglect, but instead of pulling back in face of reversals we should press ahead because time to act is not getting any longer; it is, in fact, running out.

Partly because of the legacy of "Yankee imperialism," unjustly exaggerated through the image has become, it is very difficult for us to intervene boldly by ourselves for fear of exaggerating the image even more.

BUT THERE COMES a time when a certain toughness must be displayed and now is the time. Presumably the Administration is intensifying its efforts to get the message across to Latin America that its governments really don't get aid if they don't reform. The State Dept. hopes this will discourage coups from the right—or left—as these elements realize there is no real profit in their kind of revolution.

Sometimes this hope leans on a thin reed. Washington was aware in advance of the actual take-overs that trouble was brewing in Peru, the Dominican Republic and Honduras. American officials did seek to influence those concerned by persuading them such seizures were not the course of progress. But the coups came anyway.

In Peru, however, by no means all has been lost though, as the saying goes, we are not home free either. The fact is that the junta was influenced by our delay in diplomatic recognition and perhaps even more so by the additional action of suspending aid for several months after recognition was finally granted. Some impressive figures are involved here: Aid to Peru in 1962 reached nearly $27 million. For fiscal '63 it was cut drastically, to $3 million, as a consequence of the military takeover. It may take a tremendous leap back upward for fiscal '64 because Washington now feels that Lima, with a civilian government installed after free elections—which the junta under pressure granted—qualifies for resumed assistance.

Even that equation is not so simple as it looks but would that all our problems in Latin America yielded as simply to the pressures of cause and effect as that. One thing that we've got to try increasingly to do, among many others, is to persuade our prospering European allies to help us pick up the tremendous tab of pushing Latin America successfully through its long delayed and urgently needed social revolution.

Ridiculously enough, some of them are so busy disarranging NATO that they have no time for such collaborative efforts. Who said that even a partial lowering of tensions with Moscow was going to be fun?

Washington Reports:

Space Program Seen Creating Opportunities for Employment

THE MOON SHOT has meant 3 million jobs, directly and indirectly, and as space projects develop even more employment will result, Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D-Minn.), member of the House Space subcommittee, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on nearly 700 radio stations.

Rep. James G. Fulton (R-Pa.), also of the Space subcommittee, said on the same program that space activity has stimulated science education. He pointed out that 900 young people are now taking postgraduate work in the field, and that in the coming years 14,000 will be on such rolls.

Karth said the U.S. has the highest standard of living in the world because of earlier research and technological advancements, and that "getting to the moon is not so important so far as the physical act of getting there is concerned."

"What is really important is the expertise, the engineering skills, and so forth, that are developed," he added.

Fulton cited advantages in flood control, storm warnings, and navigation, and some other by-products of the space program. Housewives have heat-resistant and pressure-resistant cooking utensils because of research on space capsules, he noted.

Both congressmen expressed the view that the U.S. could not cooperate completely with the Soviet Union in the moon shot. They said more research projects and findings could be shared in addition to the present ones, but that different systems of measurement, different languages and other variables did not make a joint effort feasible.

FULTON SAID the platform for boosters for the moon shot is as big as a baseball field, with the booster itself 16 to 18 stories high and having a thrust of 20 to 22 million pounds.

Karth said that although the U.S. was behind the Soviet in the giant booster field, this nation has been ahead in miniaturization and micro-miniaturization, in communications satellites, in computers and in guidance control.

Fulton, stressing the need for nuclear weapons agreements, pointed out that manned missiles can fly over "our heads 89 to 100 miles up." He compared that to the threat from Cuban Premier Castro "on a stationary island 90 miles away."

"Cooperation," he said, "is needed to control military space vehicles as well as in developing peaceful ones."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

NO ONE CAN NOW SAY categorically what might have been the difference in the long school desegregation struggle if former Pres. Eisenhower had been willing during his terms of office to give unqualified support to the Supreme Court's 1954 and 1955 decisions as "morally and legally correct."

Perhaps it would have made no substantial difference, but it is difficult to put credence in this theory. The position of an incumbent President as the nation's moral spokesman is significant. His position as party leader is significant. The prestige of his office is vast.

What we do know, historically, is that the desegregation struggle has been long and painful and that during the Eisenhower years it had to be fought almost exclusively through the courts, with all the opportunities litigation affords for appeals, delays and "tokenism."

Mr. Eisenhower was asked often whether he did not consider it important to put his prestige on the line as affirmatively endorsing the principle of the school desegregation decisions. He was asked whether he should not ask Congress to legislate to implement the decisions.

The latter action might have proved premature. But when he refused to endorse the decisions personally—as when he said in 1956 that he thought "it makes no difference whether or not I endorse" them—the implication inescapably was that he had doubts, reservations or perhaps harbored outright disagreement.

The former President has now told two reporters—nine years and nearly five months after the landmark decision of 1954, and after he is more than three years out of office—what he might have said at the time he bore direct responsibility. The decision, he declares, "expressed the intentions of our Constitution and therefore is morally and legally correct." He points out that the decision was unanimous—9 to 0, with "the southerners on the court" participating.

Indeed. "The southerners on the court" have been unanimous in backing subsequent decisions elaborating the theme that the equal protection of the law forbids segregation by race in schools, parks, playgrounds, public buildings, and other public facilities supported by tax funds.

Perhaps as Congress takes up the broad civil rights bills of 1963 the former President's endorsement of the principle involved will be persuasive with members of his party, whose help is most urgently needed for enactment of the legislation.

* * *

THE DARKLING SUGGESTION is thrown out by some observers that Congress is engaging in a "sit-down strike," stalling on tax and civil rights bills and far behind in its work on the simple appropriation bills for the fiscal year that began three and a half months ago, on July 1.

This is, admittedly, a curious session, and people began to be aware of it as far back as February and March.

A senator complained then that "we can't even get members to come to committee meetings," where the basic study of proposed legislation is supposed to be done. Another remarked, with an indication of anguish, that the pressure of visitors from back home demanding time, attention and courtesy had enormously increased—so enormously that those with secret hideouts in the Capitol tended to flee there for refuge. Members became aware very early that this was likely to be a long session, and for the first time in memory staff members of committees were allowed to schedule summer vacations, on the theory that the slow pace of things practically guaranteed nothing would happen during their absence.

This is entirely apart from Senate Finance Committee Chairman Byrd's obvious desire to delay the tax bill with extensive hearings, and the delays of maneuver that have held up the House civil rights bill.

Congress has often shown that as the session nears its end it can move with great speed. But it is a curious way to run a railroad, and it indicates there is substance in the widespread urgency for reform of congressional procedures.

THE MOON SHOT and other space projects have created millions of jobs and can be a means of continued scientific and technical progress in the future, Rep. James E. Karth (D-Minn.), left, and Rep. James G. Fulton (R-N. Y.) declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Statements on Social Security Trip Goldwater Way Off Base

By Sidney Margolius

IN A RECENT national television interview, Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) made some statements about social security which can do a lot of damage if they go unanswered.

He declared that workers who will be paying "10 percent" of their income towards social security will find they can buy similar insurance cheaper from private companies.

Whether the senator, a possible presidential nominee, didn't know what he was talking about or was wilfully exaggerating, his views—if he ever gets into position to enforce them — could cost you $12,000 to $15,000 extra over your working life. For that's approximately how much more it would cost a family man to buy roughly-similar private insurance and old-age benefits.

It is a revealing commentary on television interviews, and shows how you may have to take statements tossed out over TV with a grain of skepticism, that the interviewer, Walter Cronkite, let Goldwater get away with his assertion. Cronkite didn't even ask the obvious next question: "Well, what WOULD equivalent private insurance cost?"

Goldwater said, and this is taken from the script quoted to us by CBS:

"About 1970, the workingman is going to start, I think, on this program, as long as we're taking a look at that 10 percent that'll be coming out of his paycheck at that time, and realize that he can buy a much better program from private companies than he's going to get out of the federal government."

He also said "we're not trying to do away" with social security but that it should be "voluntary."

Perhaps Goldwater may not fully understand what social security actually provides, if he isn't purposefully trying to worry people.

Workers are NOT ultimately going to have to pay 10 percent of their incomes. In the first place, the social security tax is levied only on that part of your income up to $4,800 a year. The tax on your wages up to $4,800 will reach the planned maximum of 4.625 percent beginning in 1968 (the rate for 1963-65 is 3.625 percent).

Your employer pays an equal amount. Perhaps this is why Goldwater said social security taxes will take "10 percent" of your pay. Even if it is conceded that you would get the employer's contribution in the form of wages if he didn't have to pay social security, and there's no assurance of this, the total maximum tax still will be 9.25 percent, or $444 a year ($222 from you and $222 from your employer).

In the second place, a married man with young children could not buy the equivalent in combined insurance and old-age benefits from private companies for the amount of social security taxes you and your employer together pay, let alone "buy a much better program" as Goldwater tells the public.

Social security provides three types of benefits, which many of us do not always realize. They are:

Family insurance, with payments up to $254 a month to your wife and children under 18, and your aged dependent parents, if you die.

Disability payments of up to $254 a month for yourself and your family if you should become permanently disabled or chronically ill to the point where you can't do substantial gainful work. (These payments continue until you become eligible for old age payments).

Old age payments of up to $127 a month for the worker himself, and an additional 50 per cent, or $63.50 for his wife, when she reaches 65, or at 62 in slightly-reduced amount. (If widowed, her payment increases to three-fourths of the amount her husband got—$82.50 in this example. Most industrial workers retiring in the near future will get that maximum of $127 plus wife's payment, or close to it.)

IN COMPARISON, we estimate that similar private insurance would cost a family man not less, but much more than the combined maximum social security taxes you and your employer will pay.

Social security and private insurance and pension plans are not exactly comparable, since the benefits and requirements differ. But we figure that a young family with two or three children would have to pay $200-$250 a year for insurance that would pay similar benefits if the breadwinner died.

He would have to pay an additional $450-$500 a year to provide a supplementary private annuity for himself and wife approximating the retirement benefits of social security.

He also would have to buy a private disability insurance policy which would pay lifetime benefits like the social security disability insurance. Such policies are hard to find. Most pay benefits only for three to five years.

Even if the proposal to include hospital insurance for retired citizens under social security is enacted, this would add just one-fourth of 1 percent to your social security tax, or $12 a year each from you and your employer. This amounts to squirreling away a quarter a week over your working life to make sure you have basic hospital insurance when you get old.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

NAVY REPRESENTATIVES present model of the ballistic missile submarine Alexander Hamilton to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in appreciation of his interest in the Polaris submarine project. Left to right, Navy's Donald V. Geoffrion and Comm. Ken Wade; Meany and Capt. A. S. Goodfellow, deputy director for special projects.

Vestpocket Nonsense:

What Size Hairshirt For a Fat Ghost?

The following is excerpted from the Sept. 21, 1963, issue of the Chicago Federation News.

THE PITCHMEN who hide out in the groves of Santa Barbara, Calif., have spoken again. Paul Jacobs and the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions—prematurely declaring the death of collective bargaining and the withering away of the labor movement in June—find the patient alive but lingering in September, needing only a transfusion of red blood (vintage 1930s) to keep it thriving.

"Labor Looks at Labor" is a vest-pocket sized collection of nonsense, its 32 pages containing a conversation between Mr. Jacobs, identified as a former union organizer, and 10 officers of the Auto Workers.

The trappings of conspiracy are there: the UAW officials are given numbers—from one to 10—theoretically protecting them from each other or the members of the union or the leaders with the power to take them off the UAW payroll.

See this opening paragraph from the press release, and tell us that the objective is not pure sensation:

"U.S. unions are losing their grip on the worker because they are undemocratic, conformist, and are part of the 'establishment,' say a group of United Auto Workers, AFL-CIO officials in a frank discussion of union problems published today by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions."

★ ★ ★

NOW THERE'S GRIST for the anti-union mills. Let the National Right-to-Work Committee raise a toast to the writers of huckstering press releases. Let there be joy in the directors' meetings of companies facing organization, for the voice of the renegade is so useful in creating confusion in people at the point of decision in a labor board election.

The weary organizer of white collar workers, the leaflet distributor at the factory gate will have the glimmer of hope dimmed when the employer puts the press clippings on the company bulletin board or the cafeteria table.

Enlightenment of employers is not a self-generating process. There is a stimulus—and even the unorganized worker finds ways of expressing resentment against conditions.

The talkers who complain there's no talk about the "big" issues are now looking for the class struggle.

★ ★ ★

ALL PASSION SPENT, our worn-out talkative guides carry us back to the 1930's, when the interpreters of Marxist doctrine romantically built barricades out of words. Talk was cheap and who had money? Now they have the luxury of anonymity. What size hairshirt is worn by a fat ghost?

"We weren't willing to run the risks of having the Communist Party guys inside the CIO and inside our own unions," Jacobs says. "We should have been willing to run that risk because when we gave in we became part of the general movement of 'acceptability.' "

UAW No. 5 offers agreement with: ". . . I did not go along with the idea of expelling these people (the Communists). . . . If we grant . . . that they had to be removed from the scene, it seemed to me to be incumbent to put something in there to fill the vacuum that was created. This was never done. I say this is still incumbent upon them."

Who is "them"? Shall we have our unions perform a perpetual twist to match the meanderings of the Marxist line? Must we provide a forum for the tedious, wordy wrangling between the followers of Khrushchev and the Chinese Communists? Are we to be subjected to ideological interpretations of seniority?

These advocates of some kind of rebellion against something they've helped build themselves plead for change in abstract terms. They never get down to cases—perhaps because they've never really learned to know their own people. Now they've been anonymously recorded for posterity. They've been manipulated into a position where their words will have effectiveness only when used by those who still resist organization of workers.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Life's Little Moments of Ecstasy Hold Memories for Tenderizing

By Jane Goodsell

WHILE RUMMAGING through the attic in search of a duffle bag, you find an old summer purse containing a $5 bill.

* * *

At the 20th reunion of your graduating class, you are greeted by a grey-haired woman in a sensible brown suit, who looks 10 years older and weighs 20 pounds more than you do. In momentary confusion, you figure she must be the dean of women. Instead, she turns out to be—of all people!—Angie Peterson, the femme fatale of your class who had a Petty Girl figure, looked like Rita Hayworth and dated the football captain.

* * *

You sit bolt upright in bed, horrified to discover that the alarm didn't go off, it is 8:35, you have missed the bus and will be at least an hour late to work. Then you remember that today is Saturday.

* * *

You are out on the river in outboard cruiser in a booming gale. You are wet, cold, miserable, scared and fighting off waves of nausea. Still, you cringe at the thought of confessing your misery because your companions all seem to be staunch nautical types. As rain lashes the decks and the little pleasure (pleasure!) craft lurches terrifyingly, they bellow their delight at the thrill of it all. Finally, overcome with panic, you swallow your pride and draw breath to admit your cowardice. Then you hear a piteous voice (not your own) bleating, "Please, please, can't we turn back? I don't feel well!"

* * *

It is midnight and you are out of cigarets. After pawing frantically through every drawer, purse and pocket in the house, you find two bedraggled cigarets in the glove compartment of the car.

* * *

As you are driving along in your family sedan at a sedate 45 miles an hour, a horn honks imperiously behind you and a jazzy sports car streaks past with its mufflers wide open. Five miles down the highway, you see the same car parked at the roadside. A policeman is standing beside it, writing out a ticket.

Unions, Employers Agree:

Printers Bar Bias In Philadelphia Pact

Philadelphia—Employers and unions representing some 15,000 printing trades workers have signed a landmark agreement pledging non-discriminatory employment and apprentice training practices.

The 12-point agreement was formulated in a cooperative effort by the Printing Industries of Philadelphia and six unions affiliated with the Printing Trades Council, with the assistance of the AFL-CIO Human Rights Committee, the Negro Trade Union Leadership Conference and the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations.

The signers are pledged to follow a policy of non-discrimination in the employment, and admittance to union membership, of printing trades journeymen and apprentices. The pact also sets up a permanent Graphic Arts Employment Committee to handle all matters relating to efforts to assure equality of employment regardless of race, creed, color or national origin.

The signing unions were the Typographical Local 2; Lithographers Local 14; Pressmen's Locals 4 and 11; Bookbinders Local 2; Electrotypers Local 72; and Stereotypers Local 7. Photo Engravers Local 7 did not sign but said it will negotiate directly with the Commission on Human Relations on terms of a similar agreement.

Terms of the new pact are:

- Each union and employer will post a statement in each shop assuring no discrimination in employment, union membership, upgrading, transfer, rates of pay, and selection for training and apprenticeship.
- All future contracts will include clauses pledging non-discrimination.
- Agreement signers will fill earliest apprenticeship openings under each contract with a qualified non-white worker subject to contract provisions and the agreement.
- The Printing Industries of Philadelphia will recruit, select and test applicants in cooperation with the State Employment Service, and will refer qualified workers on a non-discriminatory basis.
- Apprentice candidates will be selected by the employer or union under existing age requirements and union contracts.
- Applicants not fully qualified for journeyman status will be referred to Joint Apprentice Committees for evaluation of their qualifications.

Other provisions of the agreement require filing of reports with the Graphic Arts Committee; and cooperation by unions and employers in extending terms of the agreement to other shops.

GRAPHIC ARTS unions and employers in Philadelphia sign non-discrimination agreement covering 15,000 printing trades workers. The 12-point pact pledges all signers to a policy of non-discrimination in employment and trade training and creates a permanent Graphic Arts Employment Committee. Shown are representatives of six unions, the Printing Industries of Philadelphia, the local AFL-CIO Human Rights Committee, Philadelphia Printing Trades Council, the Negro Trade Union Leadership Conference and the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations.

Rubber Union Contracts End Kentile Strikes

Akron, O.—Strike-ending settlements covering 1,400 employes at three plants of Kentile, Inc., have been announced by the Rubber Workers.

New three-year contracts were ratified by members of Local 457 at Brooklyn, N. Y.; Local 472, South Plainfield, N. J.; and Local 505, Chicago. The money value was put by the union at 27 cents an hour in Brooklyn and Chicago and 29.5 cents at Plainfield, where there is no bonus system.

At Brooklyn, management refused to rehire 14 strikers but agreed to arbitrate. Arbiter George Moskowitz ruled that 10 were fired without just cause and they have returned to work. Two of the other four did not appear in their own behalf at the hearings, the union said.

The workers walked out Jan. 15 to protest contract offers the union called below-standard. The last local, in Brooklyn, returned to work July 15. Still pending are unfair labor practice charges filed by union and management in Brooklyn. The contract there provides that employes who fail to join the union after 30 days be laid off, and Kentile management has refused to act against 87 strike replacements who failed to join, the local charged.

The settlements give all three locals a 10th paid holiday. The Plainfield local also won its first pension program, with the firm investing 8 cents an hour for that purpose.

Consumer Advisory Group Urges 'Quality Stabilization' Bill Defeat

Pres. Kennedy's Consumer Advisory Council has urged Congress to reject a so-called quality stabilization bill as inconsistent with the free enterprise system and against the interests of consumers.

The bill, approved by the House Commerce Committee, would permit manufacturers to fix the retail selling price of brand-name products.

The advisory council's first annual report gave strong endorsement to pending consumer protection legislation, including the "truth-in-lending" bill of Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and the "truth-in-packaging" bill introduced by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

In a later separate statement, the consumer panel announced it had set up a subcommittee to investigate the current trend towards price increases by manufacturers, including producers of steel, aluminum, electrical equipment and chemicals.

The increases, the council pointed out, have been "in the face of idle manpower, unused productive capacity and a general pattern of falling unit production costs and rising profits."

The consumer panel, established by the President under the Council of Economic Advisers to press the consumer interest in government policy decisions, also emphasized "the relationship of basic human and civil rights to consumer rights."

'Positive Action' Urged

It urged "immediate and positive action . . . to prohibit discrimination against customers on the ground of race by stores, hotels, theaters, restaurants and other businesses."

The council suggested expanded government studies dealing with such matters as consumer-product guarantees, state regulation of electric power rates, standard sizes for children's clothing, uniform poison labels and premarket safety testing of cosmetics.

It also suggested more emphasis on consumer education by the Food & Drug Administration and greater uniformity in grading of meat and other foods.

Dealing with its own role, the council noted that previous federal experiments in consumer advisory panels had proven "temporary."

It said its activities during the first year had been limited by lack of staff and funds and declared:

"One lesson that may be learned from past experience in consumer representation in the federal government is that such representation, to be effective, must be permanent, well staffed, continuous, and at a high level."

In transmitting the report to the President, the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Walter W. Heller, said the group has given "valuable advice on consumer issues confronting the Administration."

Its views, he said, have not always been identical to the position taken by the Administration.

This "independence of spirit," he said, has made "a valuable contribution to public policy discussion" and to achievement "of a proper balance between consumer and producer viewpoints."

$1.25 Minimum Backed In District of Columbia

The AFL-CIO has given a strong endorsement to a $1.25 an hour minimum wage bill for the District of Columbia.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth A. Meiklejohn told a Senate District of Columbia subcommittee that low wages being paid to many thousands of workers are a burden on the entire community since they "must often be supplemented by public or private relief payments."

At present the District has a limited minimum wage law applying only to women and children, with minimums established for various industries by wage boards. One result, Meiklejohn said, is that in some occupations women are paid more than men.

He praised the bill introduced by the subcommittee chairman, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Oreg.), which would establish a $1.25 floor, a 40-hour ceiling, and authorize establishment of higher minimums for certain industries by administrative action.

He pointed out that living costs in Washington "are among the highest in the country."

Despite the high cost of living, Meiklejohn noted, a special survey last year found that 42 percent of employes in eating and drinking places, 29 percent of motion picture theater workers, and 20 percent of employes in real estate occupations earned less than $1 an hour.

Action to raise the minimum wage and make the District law applicable to men is "long overdue," the AFL-CIO spokesman declared.

Union Pact Wipes Out Plant, Job Segregation

Charleston, S. C.—"Segregation by floors" in the plant of the American Tobacco Co. here has yielded to integrated cigar making and packing under a new contract negotiated by Local 15 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

No longer will white employes go to the third floor and spend their days making cigars at an average wage of $1.75 an hour while Negro workers make small cigars on the second floor at an average of $1.60.

Instead, under the new agreement, there will be plantwide bidding for the better paying jobs rather than the former departmental bidding. This will make it possible for some members to improve themselves because they no longer will be restricted to one department.

The separate packing rooms, one staffed by Negroes and one by whites, also have been merged into a single integrated operation which gives all employes a chance to work at the higher rate for packing large cigars. A good packer can make up to $100 a week, according to RWDSU Intl. Rep. Larry Larsen.

Integration of the work processes followed preliminary moves in June that included desegregation of plant facilities, such as the cafeteria, entrances, washrooms and drinking fountains.

The new contract is effective for two years and calls for wage hikes of 5 cents an hour each year. This was doubled for about 100 of the 900 employes. In addition maintenance men got 17 cents, female floor help will get 14 cents after two years, and sick leave was increased from 13 to 15 weeks a year.

Jay Rubin Picked For Hospital Council

New York—Pres. Jay Rubin of the New York Hotel-Motel Trades Council has been appointed to the State Hospital Review & Planning Commission by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller. The council coordinates the activities of seven regional councils in efforts to hold down the cost and improve the quality of hospital care.

Gorman Honored For Hospital Aid

Chicago—Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters has been named "St. Jude Man of the Year" for his "rare devotion and generous support" of the St. Jude Children's Hospital & Research Center in Memphis, Tenn.

Gorman was notified of his selection by Danny Thomas, movie and TV star who has been instrumental in raising funds for the institution and who will make formal presentation of the ward at a dinner

ILPA Parley To See UN In Action

Labor editors will get a first-hand look at the United Nations in action, listen to a group of top newsmen evaluate their publications and take part in a civil rights workshop during the Intl. Labor Press Association convention, Nov. 11-13, in New York.

The ILPA convention call, sent out by Pres. Bernard R. Mullady and Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester, sets the theme of the annual meeting as "Labor: Image and Issues."

Workshop sessions, in addition to civil rights, will include discussions of the radical right movement in America and an appraisal of recent academic criticism of the labor movement.

The Nieman Fellows of Harvard University, top journalists selected for a year of advanced study, and Nieman Foundation Curator Louis H. Lyons, will discuss the labor press and the union publications submitted in the ILPA's annual competition.

An afternoon session, devoted to the UN, will include a visit to a session of the General Assembly.

Labor Backs Income Tax In Oregon

Eugene, Ore.—Labor support for a new Oregon state tax program, up for voter action at a special statewide election Oct. 15, has been recommended by the Oregon AFL-CIO.

Delegates to the eighth annual convention of the state central body voted to back the program, which would be financed by a state income tax, after hearing endorsements by their three top officers and an eloquent plea for support by Gov. Mark O. Hatfield (R).

"If this tax measures goes down to defeat, the day of the sales tax is upon us," the governor warned.

State council leaders recommended support for the measure in spite of inequities. Labor should attempt, they said, to correct the inequities at the next regular session of the legislature and meanwhile support the proposal in view of the need for essential services such as education, health, welfare and public safety.

The convention voted also to sponsor an initiative petition campaign next year for a new state workmen's compensation law. The door was left open for talks with business leaders on a jointly sponsored tax bill.

Re-elected without opposition were Pres. J. D. McDonald, Executive Sec.-Treas. James T. Marr and Political Education Dir. George Brown.

Metal Union Hears Report On Job Gains

Cincinnati—Increased use of chrome and other decorative trim on new model cars has meant more jobs for members of the Metal Polishers, Pres. Ray Muehlhoffer reported to delegates at the union's 24th convention here.

The convention installed Muehlhoffer for another term as president and secretary-treasurer.

These executive board members also were chosen; John Grzenia, Chicago; James Siebert, Toledo; Irving Weisler, New York City; Oscar Wiese, St. Louis; Glenn Holt, Kokomo; Andrew Hay, Buffalo; William Mostyn, Rochester; and Edward Lugo, San Francisco.

While the convention was in session at union headquarters here, H. R. McDermott of Cleveland died after being elected a vice president. The death of McDermott, former union representative, occurred at a Cleveland hospital. The delegates paid tribute to him and directed that a successor should be named by the executive board at its November meeting in New York City.

The union was founded in 1888.

Report Form Set For Union Aides

The Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports has begun distribution of a new form on which union officers and employes will be required to report certain financial transactions which previously had been reportable by letter.

The form, LM-30, must be used by union officers and employes to disclose financial dealings with employers, labor relations consultants to employers, and businesses dealing with their union or with an employer whose workers the union represents.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz in anouncing the new form said more than 500 individuals have filed so far under this section of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act.

CHECK FOR $5,000 is given by Illinois AFL-CIO to the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, treasurer of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, civil rights group headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., to further the conference's work. From left at the Illinois AFL-CIO's 6th annual convention are: State Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson; Abernathy; State Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom; Executive Vice Pres. Stanley L. Johnson.

NMU Convention Hits U.S. Shipping Policies

New York—Foreign flag shipping interests continue to be one of the biggest threats to the earnings and job security of maritime workers, members of the National Maritime Union were told as their union opened its 13th convention here.

In an opening address Pres. Joseph N. Curran asserted that the controversy surrounding the recent cancellation of a voyage by the S.S. America was a "phony cover-up" by the United States Lines to lay the ship up pending getting approval to sell it to foreign flag interests.

Curran was critical of Congress and some federal administrative departments for their failure "to follow the national policy of promoting and fostering a national-flag merchant marine." Noting that total tonnage of cargo carried in U.S. flag ships had dropped from 44.7 million in 1953 to 26 million in 1962, he expressed hope that "the bottom has been reached."

Despite inroads on organizing made by foreign flag shipping and disputes with other maritime unions, Curran reported the following progress made by the NMU since its last convention in 1960:

- Twelve deep sea companies with a total of 42 vessels and 1,447 jobs have been organized.
- The NMU has gained 5,100 new members among seamen employed in the Military Sea Transportation Service on a total of 75 ships.
- More than 1,000 seamen working on government-owned vessels operated by other agencies have been signed up.

Curran reported that more than $12,325,750 has been paid out under the union's pension program to 2,574 retirees who, as of June 1964, will begin receiving one of the nation's highest union pensions —$150 per month. The NMU's new New York City headquarters is being completed and will be ready by the beginning of next year, he said.

Curran lashed out at those persons who are blocking civil rights progress in the nation while paying tribute to his own union as an organization which learned "the bitter lesson of having the races divided."

"If people will learn to live together and work together, if they will learn that workers have only one friend—the worker alongside them, regardless of the color of his skin—there would be no need for the great demonstrations that our brothers put on today to seek what already belongs to them," he declared.

Gulf Oil Sued on Welfare Reports

A suit to compel the Gulf Oil Corp. to file four years' reports and an amended description of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plan in effect in its Philadelphia refinery has been filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

The complaint was brought under the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act, which requires that administrators of such plans file descriptions and annual financial reports with the department's Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports.

The suit alleges that Gulf Oil filed a description of the plan with the secretary, but has refused to file an amended description disclosing that the company is administrator rather than another party named in the report on file. In addition, the government claims, the firm has failed and refused to file reports due at the end of the policy or fiscal years 1959 through 1962.

Political 'Reaction' Hit:

Illinois Labor Adopts Strong Rights Plan

Chicago—A broad equal rights program, expanded political activity and support of state measures to protect the interests of workers were voted by 2,400 delegates to the Illinois State AFL-CIO convention here.

Bluntly charging that a "spirit of reaction" controls the legislature, State AFL-CIO Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom called on labor forces to end what he labeled the state's "political civil war" by defeating reactionary interests at the polls next year.

Labor's major successes in the 1963 General Assembly session came in halting bad legislation, Soderstrom said, rather than in securing the enactment of good social laws such as an enforceable equal pay bill, improved civil rights legislation, the outlawry of professional strikebreakers and legal recognition of collective bargaining rights for public employes.

Gov. Otto Kerner, whose vetoes of some labor-backed bills were criticized in an executive officers' report, nevertheless was warmly received as he was introduced by Soderstrom as a "great friend of labor" and a public official facing elements in opposition that "are the same reactionary forces antagonistic to us."

The major objective of the state government, Kerner told the convention, must be to expand job opportunities and raise the level of income.

Pay Base Law Backed

Pledging an all-out drive to secure passage of a state minimum wage law, beaten in the last two assembly sessions, Kerner also stressed the importance of job retraining programs to assist workers displaced by technical changes in industry. The state's unemployment rate has been consistently below the national average, he said, but 750,000 new jobs still must be created within 10 years merely to keep pace with population increase.

Kerner's pledge of support for a state minimum wage was backed by Illinois Labor Dir. John E. Cullerton, who also pledged a thorough survey of guidelines for public agencies and unions in collective bargaining relationships.

"If earnest work can produce solutions," he said, "working men and women of this state will have benefited."

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), an old and warmly welcomed friend of labor, appealed to the convention to help rouse the conscience of the affluent about the conditions of those still living in difficult circumstances.

"Seventy-five percent of us seem to be doing all right," Douglas said, "while the other 25 percent—some 45 to 50 million people—are in deep poverty. It's time the 75 percent become more concerned over the plight of the other 25 percent, and do something about their conditions."

He cited as major objectives for the alliance of labor and liberals a reduction in the number of poor and unemployed, equal rights for all citizens, hospital insurance under social security and enactment of his own "truth-in-lending" measure requiring the statement of credit and interest charges in terms of truthful annual rates.

A highlight was adoption of an equal rights program creating a special subcommittee of the State AFL-CIO executive board to assist affiliated unions in implementing labor's policy of equal rights in employment, vocational and apprenticeship plans and retraining programs.

Also voted was a resolution urging authority for the state's Fair Employment Practices Commission to initiate investigations rather than wait for the filing of specific complaints, and a second resolution opposing the allocation of jobs by racial quotas.

A check for $1,000 was given to the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, treasurer of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Warning that anti-Negro forces are also largely anti-labor forces, Abernathy pleaded with delegates for both moral and financial support of the equal rights movement and urged full backing of Pres. Kennedy's legislative program.

Operations Streamlined By Wyoming AFL-CIO

Cheyenne, Wyo.—A complete new constitution designed to streamline operations of the state labor body was adopted at the Wyoming AFL-CIO convention which also saw a complete new slate of officers elected.

Key feature in the reorganizing was changing the office of president from a full-time position and establishment of an executive secretary hired by the board as the key operating position.

The new constitution was adopted by a 93 percent vote on a per capita rollcall in the largest convention ever held in the state. Improved financing was also approved with a raise in per capita tax from 20 cents to the new figure of 25 cents a month.

Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) warned delegates that enactment of a compulsory open shop statute in the 1963 legislature was only the beginning of anti-labor efforts in the state, but predicted that "the final outcome will be more favorable."

He continued his attack on right-wing extremist groups which had backed the Wyoming "right-to-work" bill, charging that the "real threat is to the American way of life."

"My concern is not so much that these right-wingers will take over by force of numbers," he said, "but rather that by their shrill outcry they will silence real discussion on the issues between liberals and true conservatives."

McGee urged trade unionists to speak out in opposition to the extremists of the right, noting that "these sloganeers cannot stand firm in the face of a fact."

Resolutions called for reversal of the legislature's approval of three right-wing amendments to the U.S. Constitution, supported the AFL-CIO civil rights program, called for publicizing activities of right-wing extremists, urged reapportionment of the Wyoming Senate which now has a 10-1 disparity in representation, and called for changes in the unemployment compensation law.

Elected president of the reorganized state body was B. J. Rickey of Casper, Dist. 2 director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. Others named to office were Vice Pres. John Holaday of Laramie, Cement Workers; Board Members Tom Lee, Jr., of Cheyenne, Communications Workers; A. J. Mulhall of Evanston, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen; Daniel E. White of Casper, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and Lloyd Canfield of Lander, Steelworkers.

Meany Cites Bible As Source of Hope

The "Word of God" in the Bible was held out by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "a source of hope and inspiration" for workers in a statement urging support for National Bible Week, Oct. 21-28.

"These are days of tense situations in the world," said Meany, who again is serving as an honorary vice chairman of the observance. "They are times of concern for many of us here at home, especially the unemployed and their families.

"We cannot give up the fight. We must continue, no matter how often we are turned back, to try to do what we can for others. I urge the men and women of the labor movement to begin to read and study the Bible regularly, especially during Bible Week."

U.S. Commissioner Says:

'Quality' Education Key to Job Challenge

America can meet the enormous challenges of rapid technological and economic change only by overhauling its educational system and spending what it takes to achieve excellence, declared U.S. Commissioner of Education Francis Keppel.

Keppel, writing in the October issue of the American Federationist, urged passage of the Administration's basic education program, the "National Education Improvement Act." He said past aid-to-education programs have been minuscule and added:

"As a nation, we can afford the costs of high quality education, but are we willing to? The cost of indifference or procrastination is a national failure as well as a crime against the individual.

"Consider this sobering economic fact: The cost of one year's unemployment for one individual is greater than the total cost of his education through the 12th grade."

Keppel said the changes which promise to accelerate are producing problems that can be met only through more and better education for everyone.

"The nation is faced with an enormous challenge and the only way it can respond, broadly speaking, is through education—the chief mechanism of adaptation," he wrote.

"We must demand vital reforms: better educational services, broader access to these services by all citizens without regard to age, race or religion and a deeper commitment by labor, business and the public to education as a life-long enterprise.

"Above all, we must be willing to spend money if we are to achieve intellectual and vocational competence."

Keppel observed that school enrollment reached 51.3 million for the 1962-63 school year. But at the same time that jobs requiring greater education are on the increase, there has been "a definite lag" in schooling, Keppel added. He cited these figures:

- Nearly 1 million youths drop out from elementary and secondary schools each year; 250,000 of these fail to complete even elementary school.
- More than 23 million Americans 18 years of age and older have completed less than 8 years of schooling.
- Only 43 percent of adults have completed high school and only 8 percent have completed college.

Eligibles Miss College

In addition, he continued, nearly one-fourth of the top level of high school seniors fail to go on to college.

Keppel cited the close relationship between lower educational attainment and unemployment. The same applies to the aid-to-dependent children program, he added.

"Low educational attainment, with its resulting personal and social costs, seems to be primarily an environmental disease," Keppel declared.

"It strikes hardest at the families of low-income groups, generally from trade or labor occupations where both education and motivation are low. These people and their children must be helped to make use of the opportunities our society offers."

He outlined the main goals of the National Education Improvement Act: to improve teacher training, to aid states in improving schools in slums and depressed areas, to raise teacher salaries, to aid in the education of the handicapped, to modernize vocational education, to improve adult education programs, to aid students at the graduate level and to help construct academic facilities.

SOURCE: U.S. BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

BLS Study Shows Joblessness Holding Down Wage Increases

High-level unemployment over the past six years has been the main dampener on wage increases, focusing the efforts of union negotiators on job security.

This is the common interpretation of the recent survey by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics which showed that union-negotiated pay raises "have tended to become smaller in recent years."

The BLS study showed a median or mid-point wage adjustment—including increases and decreases and no wage changes—of 5.6 cents in the recession year of 1954.

For the following three years, the increases ran to 10.1, 10.7 and 10.1 cents an hour. For the 1958-60 period, the median increase tapered off to 8.6, 8.8 and 8.5 cents. In 1961 it was 6.9 cents and, in 1962, 7.0 cents.

Labor economists and government officials are in agreement that the basic influence behind the wage trend has been an unemployment rate which has been above 5 percent since November 1957.

The lack of job opportunities affects union strategy at the bargaining table with employed workers supporting greater emphasis on job security measures, in the opinion of these observers.

The BLS study also showed that total wage changes under major contracts, including not only the negotiated wage hikes but cost-of-living escalator adjustments and deferred increases agreed to in earlier years, also declined.

"For those workers receiving increases," the BLS said, "the effective changes amounted to about 11 to 13 cents an hour in 1956, 1957 and 1958; from 1959 to 1962, the corresponding figures have been between 8 and 9.5 cents."

The BLS found the decline in non-manufacturing industries "less consistent" than in manufacturing. This was related by the BLS to the pattern in non-manufacturing of longterm contracts and the practice of negotiating hikes every second or third year and other variations. In this group are trade, transportation, utilities, communications and mining.

In the construction industry, covering seven trades in 100 major cities, the BLS survey showed wage increases holding at high levels in recent years.

The 1954 recession year recorded an average adjustment of 11 cents; the rises for 1955-57 ran to 9.9, 13.6 and 15 cents. For the 1958-60 period, they ran to 14.5, 15.6 and 14.8 cents. Then they declined slightly to 14.2 cents for both 1961 and 1962.

The basic BLS figures were limited to general wage changes and did not include any estimate of the value of changes in supplementary benefits. Information on the extent of fringe benefit changes is unavailable, the BLS said. However, it did list the extent to which major contracts liberalized a variety of fringe benefits.

Brick-Clay Union Sets Member Drive

Louisville—The Brick & Clay Workers, concerned at plant closings and rising joblessness in their industry, adopted a five-point legislative program for action in Congress and state legislatures.

The union's quadrennial convention called for:

- Cutting the social security retirement age.
- Major improvement in the federal-state unemployment compensation program.
- Repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits states to ban the union shop through so-called "right-to-work" laws.
- Enactment of hospital care for the aged through the social security system.
- Improvement of state workmen's compensation laws to meet AFL-CIO standards.

Pres. William L. Griffith and Sec.-Treas. Herbert R. Flegal reported that the 22,000-member union has had a dropoff in membership in recent years because of automation, plant shutdowns, imports and use of substitute materials. The convention authorized an expanded organizing drive to strengthen the union.

Officers had been elected prior to the convention by membership referendum.

UNITED NATIONS DAY will be observed Oct. 24, the 15th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and this poster is one of the means being used to help promote it. It is included in a kit of materials helpful in spreading information about the UN which local unions may obtain from the U.S. Committee for the UN, 375 Park Avenue, New York 22, N. Y.

Automation Seen Cause Of Massive Job Losses

(Continued from Page 1)

that automation is not only displacing people directly, but also indirectly through what are called 'silent firings' in reference to workers who would have been hired for jobs eliminated by automation."

Snyder also made these main points:

- "A second myth is that automation will create jobs for workers not only in running the machines, but in maintaining and building them. The hard truth here is that modern automated equipment requires very little maintenance.

"If it did not, it would not pay to operate it; and if the equivalent number of workers replaced by automation were required to build the machines and systems, there would be no point in automating."

- "A third myth that needs to be laid to rest is the belief that those who lose their jobs to automation can be retrained and put into other jobs requiring higher skills and paying more money.

"As studies have shown, automation is more likely to reduce rather than increase the demands for skills and aptitudes and, besides, many workers are just not retrainable due to their levels of intelligence, education and age."

- "Still another myth is that workers replaced by automation in one part of the country can find jobs in other areas.

"The truth is that the workers thrown out of jobs are usually just those who are least able to move. They are the lower paid, the older, the unskilled. Either they cannot afford to move from an economic standpoint or they are psychologically incapable of beginning a new life in a strange area."

These myths or misconceptions, Snyder said, "are unfortunately serving as easy palliatives for those who either cannot or will not come forward and grapple with the human problems caused by automation."

The growing dimensions of the national manpower problem, he said, make it "too large, too all-encompassing, too serious a responsibility not to be everyone's."

Snyder called for "new sociological and economic ideas" from those in Congress, in unions and in business to help solve the human problems of rapid technological change.

To fail is to invite disaster for the nation, he said.

Canadian Unions Complete Merger

Winnipeg, Man.—Organization of the new Canadian Union of Public Employes by amalgamation of two former rivals was completed at a merger convention here that gave the Canadian Labor Congress its largest all-Canadian affiliate, with 84,000 members.

The new union is composed of the former National Union of Public Employes and the former National Union of Public Service Employes, and like them will operate in the municipal, hospital and public utilities fields. The Steelworkers with 90,000 members is the only larger union in Canada.

Pres. Stanley A. Little of NUPSE was elected president of CUPE and National Dir. Robert P. Rintoul of NUPE was chosen secretary-treasurer of the merged group.

3-Way Bill Approved:

Aid-to-Education Passed by Senate

(Continued from Page 1)

35 vote to table, was a civil rights rider by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) which would presumably have touched off a premature southern filibuster.

Under the Senate bill, the first-year new spending authorization for vocational education would be $108 million, compared with $45 million in the House bill. Both figures are in addition to the continuing $57 million authorization for the present program.

In the fourth year of the program, the Senate bill provides $243 million in new spending compared with $180 million in the House version.

The Senate bill requires that at least 40 percent of the grants to each state be used to train out-of-school youth—either high school graduates or dropouts—compared with a 25 percent requirement in the House bill.

In addition, the Senate bill includes added funds for loans to college students under the National Defense Education Act, raising the present $90 million ceiling to $125 million in fiscal 1964 and $150 million by fiscal 1967.

The bill extends for three years the program of federal grants to "impacted areas" — communities whose school population is swollen by children of federal civilian or military personnel. A significant addition to the program was the inclusion of Washington, D. C., for the first time.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), who steered the three-part bill to passage, said a college aid bill will be the next education measure to be brought to the Senate floor. The House has already passed its version of aid to higher education.

On Civil Rights Front

On the key civil rights front, there were these congressional developments:

- The House followed the Senate's lead and approved, 265-80, a one-year extension of the life of the Civil Rights Commission.
- The House Judiciary Committee began closed door consideration of the broad, labor-backed civil rights bill approved by a subcommittee. It includes a fair employment provision.
- The Senate Commerce Committee, by a 14-3 vote, approved a somewhat modified version of the public accommodations bill sought by the Administration in its omni bus civil rights package. The committee added to the bill a ban on race barriers to membership in unions, business, professional and trade associations.

Present Administration plans are to wait until the House passes a rights bill and then "meet it at the door" and seek to pass it intact, rather than tackle a series of separate filibusters.

It remained uncertain as to whether the civil rights bill or the Administration's other top-priority measure—a tax cut—would reach the Senate floor first.

After a week of staff briefings on the House-passed tax bill, the Senate Finance Committee set Oct. 15 for the start of public hearings. Government officials will lead off, with the first non-government witnesses tentatively scheduled for Oct. 22.

Committee Chairman Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.), a foe of both a tax cut and civil rights legislation, declined to predict when the hearings would end.

'Bracero' Vote Due

The House, which earlier this year voted down a proposed two-year extension of the "bracero" program—the importation of farm workers from Mexico—will vote shortly on a one-year extension bill.

The labor-opposed measure was cleared by the House Rules Committee. The Senate has approved a one-year extension, but imposed a number of restrictions aimed at better protecting the interests of U.S. farm workers.

Bonner Strike Ban Killed in House

The House Merchant Marine Committee has voted down a proposal by its chairman to enact no-strike legislation governing maritime labor disputes.

The original bill, by Rep. Herbert C. Bonner (D-N. C.) would have imposed compulsory arbitration.

He modified it to establish a prolonged period of further mediation and fact-finding after expiration of an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction, with provision for submitting unresolved disputes to Congress.

The committee majority, however, voted to table the measure.

BUSLOAD OF DELEGATES to legislative conference of Government Employes unloads in Washington, D. C. The two-day session, called to press for passage of pay raise and other legislative goals, drew 1,000 AFGE members from points as far distant as Alaska and the Panama Canal Zone.

Becu Urges Action In Dominican Coup

Brussels—Immediate action to restore democratic institutions in the Dominican Republic was urged by Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in a cable to Sec.-Gen. Jose A. Mora of the Organization of American States.

Becu told Mora that the world free labor movement was "deeply disturbed" by the coup "which overthrew the truly democratic regime that freed the Dominican people from a generation-old tyranny."

The cable confirmed a similar appeal to the OAS by the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), western hemisphere arm of the ICFTU.

Bipartisan Pledge Given AFGE on Pay Review

Government employes called on Congress to redeem a pledge to keep civil service salary scales "comparable" with private industry and received bipartisan assurances of support.

The AFGE brought to Washington 1,000 members from all sections of the nation for a two-day legislative conference to press for congressional action on pay and retirement legislation. Similar "grass-roots" rallies were held earlier this year by the principal AFL-CIO postal unions.

Sen. Frank Carlson (Kans.), ranking GOP member of the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, told the delegates that last year's pay legislation "made a commitment" that salaries will be adjusted annually to keep pace with industry.

"We will keep our word," he promised.

Two Democratic members of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee—Rep. Morris K. Udall (Ariz.) and Rep. David N. Henderson (N.C.)—gave similar assurances, as did Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.).

Civil Service Commission Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., said the comparability principle faces an "acid test" this year. He said the Administration strongly supports higher pay scales for all levels of the government service.

Macy termed the establishment of a union dues checkoff system, due to start Jan. 1, a "significant step" in further developing good employe-management relations in the federal service. He said the union recognition policy established by Pres. Kennedy's 1962 executive order was "incomplete" without the dues checkoff.

After receiving reports from delegates on visits to the offices of congressmen and senators from their home areas, AFGE Pres. John F. Griner predicted that "the conference will bear fruit in both this and the next session of Congress."

Patton Takes Post with 'Work' Foes

Farmers Union Pres. James G. Patton will serve with former Sen. Herbert H. Lehman of New York as co-chairman of a citizens' group opposing so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Patton fills the vacancy left by the death of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who had been a co-founder with Lehman of the National Council for Industrial Peace. The Farmers Union president has been a member of the council's executive board since its establishment in 1958.

Following the policy of Lehman and Mrs. Roosevelt, Patton will serve without salary. He will continue to head the Farmers Union, one of the nation's major farm organizations and spokesman for the family-size farm.

In announcing Patton's acceptance of the co-chairmanship, Lehman warned that the drive to outlaw the union shop through state "right-to-work" laws is "disruptive of industrial peace and a brake on the national economy."

The citizens' group, he said, will continue to "vigorously oppose" such laws and preserve "collective bargaining freedom" as "an enduring monument" to Mrs. Roosevelt.

U.S.-Franco Agreement Deplored by ICFTU

Brussels—U.S. renewal of its military agreement with Spain has served to strengthen the dictatorial regime of Gen. Franco at a time when it was "weakened by growing internal opposition," Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions charged.

He recalled that the ICFTU "has never tired" of voicing opposition to the treaty since it was first signed a decade ago..

"At this very moment," he said, "Spanish workers are engaged in strikes not only to obtain better living conditions but also to win for themselves human and trade union rights they are now being denied."

The struggle of the workers, Becu continued, puts them in the vanguard of those Spaniards "trying to restore democracy, justice and freedom" to their country—a struggle in which "they have the full support of the free trade union movement united in the ICFTU."

He recalled that the ICFTU has repeatedly appealed to democratic governments to withdraw their support from "this totalitarian regime which has in no way changed its despotic character."

"All action undertaken to strengthen such a regime," Becu continued, "will earn the condemnation of the workers and other progressive forces of Spain who are longing for democratic rights.

"The free trade union movement, inside and outside Spain, must deplore the latest step undertaken by the U.S. government in its relations with the Spanish government.."

Local Sponsors Lunch-Hour Concerts

New York—Office workers who spend their lunch hour in Bowling Green Park, at the tip of Manhattan, discovered with delight a 42-piece band playing for their enjoyment. The concert came to them through the courtesy of Office Employes Local 153.

Federal Dues Checkoff Effective in January

Most union members in the federal civil service will be able to pay their dues through a payroll checkoff, starting in January.

New regulations issued by the Civil Service Commission authorize government agencies and departments to set up voluntary checkoff systems for members of unions which represent at least 10 percent of their employes.

A presidential task force endorsed a checkoff system nearly two years ago, noting that payroll dues deduction is standard practice in private industry and has been adopted by a number of state and local governments. Last spring, after a determination that a checkoff could be put into effect without the need for special legislation, Pres. Kennedy told the CSC to work out the details in cooperation with unions of government employes.

The regulations require unions to pay the cost of the program and the fee was set, after negotiations, at 2 cents for each deduction. Deductions will normally be made from each biweekly pay check.

Dues deductions must be authorized by the employe and the authorization may be revoked at semi-annual intervals.

Collection of dues—previously permitted only in off-duty hours—has been a perennial problem for unions representing employes at government installations, often covering many miles in area or scattered throughout a number of buildings.

Union membership in the government service, on the upswing as a result of Kennedy's executive order on union recognition, is expected by most observers to take a new spurt as a result of the checkoff authorization.

Ex-Editor at Ole Miss Joins News Guild

New York—Sydna Brower, who as editor of the University of Mississippi student paper last year rebuked segregationist students who rioted over the admission of James Meredith, a Negro, has joined the Newspaper Guild.

Miss Brower is working as a journalistic interne at the New York World-Telegram & Sun.

Nation Called to Act on Women's Rights

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Oct. 19, 1963 | No. 42

Advisory Report Hits Injustices

The President's Commission on the Status of Women has called on the nation to correct ancient injustices burdening its women and give them full opportunity to develop their talents on the job and in the home, thus enhancing "the quality of American life."

In its wide-ranging report to Pres. Kennedy, the 24-member commission issued "an invitation to action" to communities, state and federal governments, businesses and private voluntary groups to join in improving the lot of America's 96 million women and girls.

The commission's recommendations covered a broad spectrum of women's life. At one end, it urged a new Presidential Executive Order stating that equal employment opportunity for women should be "the governing principle" in private employment as well as public and applying this principle to work done under federal contracts.

More Activity Urged

At the other end, it called on women themselves to take a more active part in politics and seek elective and appointive posts at all levels of government.

The report was presented to the President at a White House ceremony on the birthday of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who was chairman of the commission until her death last Nov. 7. Since then the commission has carried out its work under the leadership of its vice chairman, Dr. Richard A. Lester, chairman of the Dept. of Economics, Princeton University, and its executive vice chairman, Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson.

In accepting the report, Kennedy described it as "a legacy" from Mrs. Roosevelt "in a very real sense."

Labor representatives on the commission were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Mrs. Mary E. Callahan, member of the executive board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. More than a score of other union officials and staff members were among some 300 individuals who served on specialized committees or took part in consultations.

The commission, which went out of existence with the completion of its report, urged the President to

(Continued on Page 11)

IUE Extends Westinghouse Contract Talks

Pittsburgh — Union negotiators were armed with strike authorization as bargaining sessions between the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Westinghouse Electric Corp. continued on a day-to-day basis following an Oct. 14 deadline.

Tentative union acceptance of a Westinghouse wage increase offer and company acceptance of a union-proposed vacation schedule failed to produce a settlement of other basic issues. The union charged that the company's vacation agreement modified earlier pension and insurance offers and that Westinghouse continued to ignore issues of job security and left unchanged a "strike-provoking arbitration demand."

Westinghouse on Oct. 14 put into effect salary increases for non-represented employes.

Stepped-Up Public Works Urged to Meet Job Needs

IMPORTANCE OF VOTER registration is stressed to a group of Brooklyn laundry workers by Felisa Rincon de Gautier, mayor of San Juan, Puerto Rico, during the New York City Central Labor Council's registration week drive. She addressed the plant workers during a tour with Anna M. Kross, city commissioner of correction, left, and Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Louis Simon, manager of the ACWA Laundry Workers Joint Board.

Meany Asks $2 Billion Renewal

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appealed to Congress for an immediate $2 billion expansion of the accelerated public works program—"to create jobs where they are needed most."

He told the House Public Works Committee that it would be a "tragedy" if the program were permitted to die early next year "in view of America's continued unsolved and dangerous unemployment rate."

Meany reminded the committee that at his last appearance—to testify in support of the public works bill enacted last year — he had urged a provision extending the program automatically if the jobless rate remained above 5 percent.

"Unfortunately, unemployment still exceeds that rate," Meany said. "All evidence indicates that it will continue to exceed it during the year that lies ahead.

"No amount of wishful, optimistic talk will change the picture," Meany stressed. "Only action can do it."

The AFL-CIO president answered a firm "no" to the question of whether the pending tax cut bill is an "alternative" to further federal spending for public works.

"Both are necessary," he declared, "if an adequate effort to roll back unemployment is to be maintained."

The tax cut is "essential," Meany said, to give a quick lift to sales, production and employment. He emphasized, however, that a tax cut "is not a cure-all for the con-

(Continued on Page 12)

Branded 'Management Consultant':

National 'Work' Committee Hit with L-G Filing Charge

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has asked a federal court to compel the National Right to Work Committee to register as a management consultant and to disclose details of services it has provided to employers.

He charged that the "work" committee is violating the Landrum-Griffin Act by refusing to file the disclosure report required from consultants and other "middlemen" used by employers to influence workers in matters dealing with organization or collective bargaining.

It was an employer's listing of money paid to the National Right to Work Committee on a disclosure report which led to the Labor Dept. investigation and court action against the committee.

The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Corp., in a routine report of its use of outsiders in the months preceding a 1960 union representation election at its Polk County, Fla., plant, disclosed that it had paid the expenses of W. T. Harrison, who was then president of the National Right to Work Committee, to address a picnic and barbecue the company held "for all its white employes."

R-T-W 'Reimbursed'

During the same pre-election period, the company reported that it also employed the firm of Patrick B. Comer, Jr., whose services included advice on handling grievances, methods for "evaluating the attitude of employes towards the company," suggestions for "replying to issues raised by the unions during the campaign," and advice on "company campaign literature."

The company said it had paid the Comer firm $800 for the portion of its services dealing with influencing employes and reimbursed the National Right to Work Committee $160.90 for Harrison's "traveling expenses."

Harrison's speech, the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports indicated after an investigation, in-

(Continued on Page 4)

State-by-State Survey 'Flunks' Kerr-Mills Health Care Program

Albany, N. Y.—The New York State Dept. of Social Welfare has declared that the Kerr-Mills program of Medical Assistance to the Aged isn't doing the job it was designed for and that "the soundest approach" to old-age health care would start with an insurance program under the social security system.

The social security approach is embodied in the King-Anderson bill, which would provide up to 180 days of hospital care and other benefits to persons over 65 who become ill, with costs borne through social security contributions during the individual's working life.

Under the Kerr-Mills MAA program, which the American Medical Association defends, the federal government makes grants to states to help pay for medical aid to old people who meet a means test.

New York was one of the first states to implement Kerr-Mills fully. To get "an accurate picture" of how the program was working in the state in relation to the national scene, the Office of Medical Economics of the social welfare department compared experience of the 25 states having MAA programs with that of the 25 states which did not during the first quarter of 1963.

It concluded that the way Kerr-Mills works, "it is a matter of geography rather than of physiology whether a sick low-income aged person will receive care at public expense in this country."

The comparison showed, the office said, that "MAA's primary objective, helping a large proportion of low-income aged persons obtain medical care, has not been realized. Adoption of MAA programs by states not presently hav-

(Continued on Page 5)

NEW JERSEY LABOR PRESS Council's new president, George K. Ehrhart of Communications Workers Local 1060, receives the congratulations of Basil Blackman, left, assistant secretary of education for the Caribbean Congress of Labor, who addressed the council's fall business meeting and education conference at the Rutgers Labor Education Center. Other council officers shown are Vice Pres. George Meisler, second from left; Sec.-Treas. Charles Biagi and Vice Pres. Nick Menzo, right.

September Job Report Reflects School Opening, Auto Changeover

Non-farm jobs rose a little more than seasonally in September, influenced by the return of school employes to their jobs and the recall of auto workers after the model changeover, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The detailed job report for the month, based on payroll data, showed an increase of 554,000 over August to a total of 58.2 million on non-farm payrolls. The rise was about 100,000 more than the usual increase from August, the report said.

The largest gain was registered in state and local government jobs with a rise of 438,000 to a total of 7.2 million as schools reopened.

The report noted "a comparatively sharp increase of 120,000 in automobile plants with the recall of workers laid off in August." This large rise, the Labor Dept. explained, compensated for a larger than usual drop in August.

The pickup in auto jobs accounted for most of the gain of 186,000 in manufacturing to a total of 17.4 million. The changes in manufacturing were mostly seasonal, the report said, adding:

"However, steel employment continued to edge down, lagging behind the pickup in production, which was still fairly small by mid-September."

Other principal changes showed a seasonal drop of 65,000 in construction to a total of 3.4 million after a steady climb since March and a seasonal pickup of 62,000 to a total of 8.7 million in retail trade.

The factory workweek gained by 6 minutes to an average of 40.6 hours instead of declining by about 12 minutes on the basis of past movements for the month, the report said. Adjusted for seasonal influences, this put the factory workweek at a peak for the past year.

Factory overtime also rose by 6 minutes to 3.0 hours in September, the highest level since overtime has been measured, the report observed.

Average Hits $2.46

Average hourly earnings of factory production workers rose 3 cents to $2.46 an hour in September. This rise, combined with the increased workweek, pushed weekly earnings up by $1.46 to $99.88, the report added.

As reported earlier in a summary report based on census surveys, both employment and unemployment fell off in September as school reopenings removed large numbers of teenagers from the labor force.

The key seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment moved up slightly to 5.6 percent as the jobless total dropped by 350,000 to 3.5 million. The jobless rate has been holding high at 5.5 percent and over throughout 1963. It was 5.6 percent in September a year ago.

The Labor Dept.'s detailed report said "the relatively high rate" of unemployment which dominates the job scene is largely attributable to young people and women unable to find jobs.

Comparing the jobless rates of the third quarter of 1963 with those recorded just before the 1957-58 business recession, the rate for all teenagers jumped from 9.8 percent in 1957 to 13.8 percent in 1963; the rate for adult women swung upward from 4.1 percent to 5.8 percent in 1963.

Adult Rates Off

In contrast, the report noted, the rates for married men and all adult men showed much smaller increases. The jobless rate for adult men rose from 3.0 percent in 1957 to 3.7 percent in 1963; the rate for married men rose from 2.3 percent to 2.6 percent in 1963.

In numerical terms, the number of unemployed adult women jumped by about 50 percent—from 812,000 in 1957 to 1.2 million in 1963; the total for all teenagers jumped from 612,000 in 1957 to 1 million in 1963. On the other hand, jobless adult men totaled 1.3 million in 1957 and rose to 1.6 million in 1963; married men rose from 817,000 in 1957 to 956,000 in 1963.

The duration as well as the level of unemployment has risen, the report also pointed out, with the sharpest increases among women and young people.

But adult men are still taking the brunt of longterm joblessness, the report added. This group made up one-fourth of the rise in the unemployed since 1957 but accounts for half the boost in longterm jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or longer.

Adult men now account for half the 900,000 jobless in September who have been seeking work futilely for 15 weeks or longer.

Of this longterm jobless group, 500,000 have been seeking work unsuccessfully for six months or longer. Three-fifths of these are adult men, the Labor Dept. reports.

The divergence in these jobless rates and totals was explained as follows by a Labor Dept. manpower expert: Teenagers and women are in the labor force in greater numbers and, with job opportunities generally lacking, show higher unemployment totals. Their higher jobless rates may be explainable on the basis of their holding short-term jobs, moving in and out of the job market. Adult men with families to support usually do not have this option. In addition, adult men may be taking downgraded jobs and this may explain their lower jobless rate.

37 Distress Areas

In a separate report, the Labor Dept.'s survey of 150 major job areas showed 37 in September with substantial unemployment—6 percent or more jobless. This was the same as in August, which equaled the previous low reached in July 1960. A year ago, there were 44 such areas.

The Labor Dept. reported "small overall job gains" in most areas. Four areas were reclassified. Fall River, Mass., Duluth-Superior, Minn.-Wis., and Wheeling, W. Va., improved from the 9-to-11.9 percent jobless grouping to the 6-to-8.9 percent category. Greensboro-High Point, N. C., slipped from the 1.5-to-2.9 percent jobless group to the 3.0-to-5.9 percent grouping.

Wirtz Tells Conference:

Unskilled, Untrained Lose Out to Machines

The development of automation contributes "quite significantly" to the "strong, dangerous, bitter concentration of unemployment today in the uneducated, in the unskilled, in the untrained," Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has declared.

He told a Washington press conference that "the machines are driving out the unskilled and the untrained" from the ranks of jobholders and that there is a "strong coincidence" between the increase in productivity and the concentration of unemployment among the unskilled and under-educated.

Wirtz cited the following figures to support his conclusions:

- Thirty-four percent of the unemployed today are either unskilled or semi-skilled but only 25 percent of the jobs in the work force can be put in that category.
- Two-thirds of today's unemployed have less than a high school education but this group makes up only 45 percent of the work force.
- Twenty-three percent of the unemployed are non-white; they make up only 10 percent of the population.

The percentage of long-term unemployed—15 weeks or more—has risen from 12 percent of all unemployment in 1952 to 18 percent in 1957 and 27 percent today, Wirtz said.

The labor secretary cited the productivity increase of the last two years of about 4 percent and commented that 1963 would see a similar increase. He noted "we have never had back-to-back years of that kind before. That is quite substantially above the norm."

The first approach to this problem is passage of the pending tax cut bill, Wirtz asserted. More jobs is the primary need, supplemented with more education, training and retraining, he added.

"The figure that haunts me," said Wirtz, "is that there are three million people in the work force with less than a fifth grade level of educational attainment. I don't think there will be work for them unless that problem is met in two ways. First, more jobs, and educate them up to the level necessary."

Canadian House Adopts Maritime Trustee Law

The Canadian House of Commons has adopted legislation imposing a sweeping and unprecedented government trusteeship over maritime unions operating in Canada.

The trusteeship is expected to become operative as soon as the government formally proclaims it. The three-man board of trustees would take over the management and control of maritime unions including the Seafarers Intl. Union in Canada and four other Canadian unions for a period of five years.

The AFL-CIO has strongly opposed the legislation providing for government control and tried to work out an agreement for a voluntary trusteeship with the Canadian Labor Congress in cooperation with the U.S. and Canadian governments.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the federation viewed as "deeply disappointing" the rejection by the CLC of the voluntary trusteeship plan. The discussions with the CLC failed over composition of the trusteeship and the grounds for removal of officers, Meany said.

Under the Canadian legislation, the trustees will be granted the authority normally vested in the officers of the unions under constitutions and bylaws, as well as additional powers to permit them to appoint advisory committees and bargaining committees, to remove or suspend officers and employes in any union and provide replacements.

Penalties Provided

The legislation provides for a $10,000 fine or two-year imprisonment for anyone convicted of obstructing the operations of the trusteeship.

About 20,000 maritime workers would be covered by the government trusteeship in five unions. In addition to the SIU, the unions are the Maritime Section of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers; Canadian Maritime Union; Canadian Merchant Service Guild; National Association of Marine Engineers.

Meany's statement on the Great Lakes dispute as to the breakdown of the talks with the CLC was supported by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who told a press conference: "I consider the AFL-CIO to have cooperated fully and fairly in the attempt to work this problem out."

The dispute originated in 1962 when a Canadian steamship company terminated a bargaining relationship of 10 years standing with the SIU and signed a contract with a newly created union sponsored by the CLC. The SIU struck the company.

Meany's statement called on all AFL-CIO affililates to support the SIU "against the destruction of free trade unionism in the Canadian maritime industry."

Stage, Screen Stars Tell Musical 'Fable' for UN

"Three Billion Millionaires" is the title of a new recording sponsored by the U.S. Committee for the United Nations to promote understanding of and support for the UN, which celebrates its 18th birthday Oct. 24.

The committee says this original musical fable "disarmingly describes some of the basic problems confronting our world: hunger, color, war, the population explosion—and our relations with one another. Yet this is in pure entertainment form that will appeal to both young and old."

Written by Diane Lampert and Peter Farrow, the fable is presented by such volunteer talent as Bing Crosby, Jack Benny, Carol Burnett, Wally Cox, Sammy Davis, Jr., Judy Garland, Danny Kaye, George Maharis, Terry-Thomas and, not least, Adlai Stevenson.

The fable concludes by relating mankind's efforts to build, through the UN, a safe and secure world for children to grow into.

Copies of the recording may be obtained through the U.S. Committee for the United Nations, 375 Park Ave., New York 22, N. Y. Prices are $4.98 for monaural records, $5.98 for stereo, with a 20 percent discount on orders for 10 or more.

LOOK for the UNION LABEL
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Boycott Called Off:

Gould Battery Pact Ends IBEW Strike

Ratification of a nation-wide agreement between the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Gould National Battery Corp. ended a 22-week strike and sent employes at 15 plants back to work Oct. 15.

The new 30-month pact brings major gains to more than 1,600 workers. It includes wage hikes averaging 35.1 cents an hour, according to an IBEW estimate, and a single contract with one terminal date instead of separate contracts at each plant—a major objective of the strikers.

Workers at Gould's plant in Leavenworth, Kan., struck when their contract expired May 22. The other 14 plants were struck June 13 after a bargaining stalemate caused by the refusal of management to agree to a single contract with the Gould Battery Workers Council for all plants.

Basic wage increases agreed to are 10 cents an hour this year, and an additional 10 cents on Jan. 15, 1965 at all plants except the Nicad unit at St. Paul, Minn., where the second round increase will be 13 cents. Inequity increases will bring total wage boosts as high as 72 cents in some classifications, the union reported.

Other improvements include an eighth paid holiday—each worker's birthday; full job-bidding rights, up, down and horizontal; and a six-cent increase in fringe benefits including improved health, welfare and hospitalization provisions for all workers and their families.

Agreement was reached with the aid of William Rose of Washington and Thomas Cleland of Chicago, both with the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. The union announced it has called off its recently launched "Don't Buy" campaign against battery products made for some 60 nationwide firms.

The strike was prolonged, union sources said, by the refusal of local plant managements to implement an agreement reached in New York by top management with IBEW Pres. Gordon Freeman on recognition of the Gould Battery Workers Council.

Gould plants are at Denver, Colo.; East Point, Ga.; Chicago Heights, Kankakee and Rock Island, Ill.; Marlboro, Mass.; Zanesville, O.; Salem, Ore.; Memphis, Tenn.; Dallas, Tex., Leavenworth, and St. Paul.

The firm makes batteries under other names for major retailers including Montgomery Ward, Standard Oil Co. and Western Auto Supply Co.

Union Upheld in Right To Strike or Arbitrate

Company insistence on a no-strike clause in a labor-management agreement while refusing a union request for an arbitration clause for settlement of disputes and grievances constitutes failure to bargain in good faith, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled.

The case involved a charge by the Steelworkers that the H. K. Porter Co. violated the Taft-Hartley law by these bargaining attitudes at the company's Disston saw plant in Danville, Va., from November 1961 to November 1962.

Examiner Ramey Donovan agreed that the firm was "free to reject a proposal for arbitration. It was free to insist on a no-strike clause." But by insisting on both it was "emasculating" the principles of the law, he said.

The double demand by the company, the examiner observed, meant that "decisional authority on all matters" would rest with the company alone and "there was no right" on the union's part to strike even in the absence of an arbitration clause.

It is difficult to conclude, Donovan said, that "the price of a contract" should be "the destruction and relinquishment" of union rights under the T-H Act.

The company, he ruled, also violated the law by unilaterally changing an existing insurance plan and by insisting for an entire year "that it could not and would not meet except during the afternoon of certain mutually convenient days." The examiner recommended that the company be ordered to bargain on request by the union.

25c Package Ends One-Day Biscuit Strike

New York—A one-day strike of 9,000 workers at 11 plants of the National Biscuit Co. produced a 25-cent package settlement for members represented by the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

ABC Pres. Daniel Conway listed these features of the new two-year contract: wage hikes of 8 cents an hour this year and an additional 10 cents next Sept. 1; 1.5 cents an hour in company payments for improved insurance and hospital benefits, and an additional 3 cents an hour toward pensions to bring benefits to $125 a month in the second year of the contract.

A ninth holiday was added, the day before New Year's Day, and wage adjustments were made for several classifications under the contract. Agreement was reached, Conway said, with the aid of Reg. Dir. Frank H. Brown of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and Conciliator John M. Wilson.

Plants affected by the work stoppage are in Atlanta, Buffalo, Chicago, Denver, Houston, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia; Portland, Ore.; Oakland, Calif., and Fairlawn, N. J.

ICFTU Condemns Coup in Honduras

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has appealed to the Organization of American States for "prompt action" to safeguard human rights and restore democratic rule in Honduras after the recent military coup.

Gen.-Sec. Omer Becu of the ICFTU, in a message to Sec.-Gen. Jose Mora of the OAS, said the ICFTU "condemns" the military coup in Honduras because of the organization's firm opposition to "the use of force to effect political changes in violation of the constitution and of democratic principles."

"We appeal to the OAS," Becu said, "for immediate action to safeguard human rights and to restore democratic rule in Honduras, and also call for energetic steps to end all dictatorships and guarantee democracy, freedom and progress throughout the whole of the Western Hemisphere."

LEADERSHIP TRAINING institute for 117 union stewards and officers at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard is discussed by five of the men who helped plan it. Left to right: Otto Pragan, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Paul R. Hutchings, research director of the sponsoring AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.; Paul Warner, president of the Bremerton, Wash., Metal Trades Council; George Giblett, Machinists grand lodge representative, and Thomas Landon, secretary-treasurer of the Bremerton council.

Metal Trades Launch Naval Shipyard Classes

Bremerton, Wash.—Union shop stewards and officers at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard here used some 350 days of their vacation time to study how to do a better job of representing 9,500 shipyard workers covered by a first contract negotiated by the local Metal Trades Council.

The three-day leadership training institute was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Education. The 117 participants, all Navy civilian employes, came from 16 unions which share bargaining rights as part of the Bremerton Metal Trades Council.

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept. said in a keynote address that the institute was the first of 10 to be held in the nation's naval shipyards, where exclusive union recognition and written contracts have changed the pattern of government labor-management relations.

The department's eventual goal, Gritta said, is to remove present "limitations" on the scope of local shipyard bargaining by obtaining exclusive recognition as nationwide bargaining representatives of all Navy hourly-paid employes.

The faculty for the institute was made up of leading trade union educators who taught classes dealing with the federal government's collective bargaining policies, grievance handling, understanding of the contract and union history and organization.

Instructors included Otto Pragan, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Paul R. Hutchings, research director of the Metal Trades Dept.; William Kuhl, Boilermakers' research and education director; Orren Burrows, director, and George Knally, assistant director of government operations for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Mike Gross of the Machinists Education Dept.

A special feature of the final day's program was a joint labor-management panel discussion. Participants included Rear Adm. Floyd B. Schultz, the shipyard commander.

The New York Naval Shipyard at Brooklyn is next in line for the traveling leadership institute. Its program is scheduled for Nov. 19-21.

Florida Rail Dispute Again Sent to Mediation

A new effort to settle the 10-month-old Florida East Coast Railway strike got under way in Washington, after a special board of inquiry reported to Pres. Kennedy that the dispute is "detrimental" to the nation's defense and space programs.

Kennedy instructed the National Mediation Board to renew its settlement efforts, declaring that the "public interest" demands that the dispute be "promptly resolved."

If negotiations again break down, Kennedy said, both parties should give "serious consideration" to arbitration.

Non-operating rail unions, which are striking to obtain the same 10.3-cent hourly raise granted by every other major railroad in the nation in 1962, several months ago accepted a proposal by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to arbitrate the dispute.

The company turned it down.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the mediation board was awaiting a reply from the railroad to its request for new meetings. The rail unions have said they are ready to resume bargaining immediately.

The White House entered the dispute after informational picketing by the unions resulted in a work stoppage at a space agency installation near Cape Canaveral, Fla., protesting use of trains operated by strikebreakers to carry goods to the base.

The pickets were withdrawn after two days and Kennedy named an inquiry board to consider the strike's impact on the defense program.

The board recommended that, pending settlement of the dispute, government agencies should bypass the railroad on delivery of all goods ordered for the space and defense installations and that government contractors should be informed that "delays encountered due to the use of the FEC Railway will not be recognized as an excusable cause for extension of time" under their federal contracts.

Throughout the long dispute, members of rail operating unions have observed the "non-op" picket lines.

Union Skills Sought for Peace Corps

American "savvy" and know-how are still in heavy demand in other lands, a Peace Corps volunteer reported after a two-year stay in East Pakistan.

Roger Hord, 26-year-old bricklayer from Portland, Ore., said the need for building tradesmen, nurses, laboratory workers and others with a skill they can teach is still "tremendous" in many areas.

Since he can report first hand on the need, Hord has been reassigned to this country as a Peace Corps recruiter. He will give talks on his experiences in colleges, schools, labor central bodies and local unions.

Hord was a member of the first group of 28 Peace Corps volunteers. After two months of training in this country, he went to Dacca with a construction team to build a village for homeless refugees.

At the start he had to make his own bricks. A third-generation bricklayer, Hord was next put in charge of brickwork at a hostel in Comilla, part of the Pakistan Academy for Village Development, after the hostel had been destroyed in a fire.

Hord's later work included building culverts, sluice gates and embankments for a rural public works program. He was called on to help build and organize a medical clinic and ended up writing a bricklaying manual, he told Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

A new group of 60 men and women is now working on what Hord's group started in East Pakistan. He pointed out that such Peace Corps teams are assigned only on request by the national government involved.

Gift Wraps Offered By Refugee Committee

New York—Refugees need help desperately, the United States Committee for Refugees said in an appeal for support through purchase of its "Tree of Life" gift wrapping paper for holiday packages. The committee offers 10 sheets for $2 and says payments above that figure are tax-deductible.

The committee, at 20 W. 40th Street, New York 18, is headed by Maxwell M. Rabb and includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers and Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers among its leaders.

CURRENT TRENDS in National Labor Relations Board and court decisions on labor-management relations were discussed at one of the sessions of a three-day meeting of AFL-CIO research directors in Washington called by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. Discussing the situation are David Feller (left), general counsel of the Industrial Union Dept. and the Steelworkers, and Theodore St. Antoine, assistant to the general counsel of the AFL-CIO. Other sessions touched on productivity, defense procurement and economic policy issues.

Rockefeller Assails 'Work' Laws, Pledges GOP Convention Fight

Buffalo, N. Y.—Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R-N. Y.) gave a cold shoulder to a warm embrace from the National Right to Work Committee and declared in a speech here that he still strongly favors the right of workers and employers to negotiate a union shop contract.

In fact, Rockefeller told a Steelworkers' dinner meeting, one of the reasons he wants to debate Sen. Barry Goldwater is to point up the differences between them on the "right-to-work" issue.

New York State Republicans, Rockefeller declared, are "united" in opposition to so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Furthermore, the governor pledged, he will make "every effort" to see that the national Republican Party does not backslide from its 1960 platform declaration opposing "right-to-work."

Rockefeller's speech came only a few hours after Reed Larson, executive vice president of the National Right to Work Committee, had made public a letter commending Rockefeller for having "at last relented in your determination that Americans should be forced to pay dues to a union."

Larson claimed an earlier speech by Rockefeller took a "neutral" position on "right-to-work" laws.

In his public letter to Rockefeller, Larson congratulated the governor on "joining a distinguished company of senators, congressmen and political leaders." These include, Larson said, Winthrop Rockefeller, a brother of the governor; Sen. Frank Lausche (D-O.), and Goldwater.

Goldwater for R-T-W

The New York governor said in his Buffalo speech that the union shop "is one of the issues on which I feel the party needs to be clear in its position." He and Goldwater are considered top contenders for the 1964 GOP presidentail nomination, although neither has formally announced his candidacy.

Goldwater in 1958 introduced a federal "right-to-work" bill; this year he sponsored a bill barring union shops unless explicitly permitted by state laws.

The 1960 GOP platform position, which Rockefeller said he will endeavor to maintain, declared:

"Republican policy firmly supports the right of employers and unions freely to enter into agreements providing for the union shop."

Rockefeller's key political strategist, GOP National Committeeman George Hinman, has publicly blasted Goldwater's advocacy of "right-to-work" laws and warned that it could be a "fatal" issue for the Republicans in the 1964 campaign.

Larson, in his letter professing joy at Rockefeller's purported change of heart, urged him to "communicate immediately" with Hinman, "advising him of your new position."

Rockefeller's challenge to Goldwater to debate the issues has been rejected by the Arizona senator who said that such a debate would tend to divide the GOP.

'Right-to-Work' Group Sued by Labor Dept.

(Continued from Page 1)

cluded a general attack on unions and the "power of labor bosses" and was designed to influence the decision of employes on the question of organization and collective bargaining.

Harrison, a former accounting clerk with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad who was expelled by his union, has made a career of fighting for compulsory open shop laws. After leaving the National Right to Work Committee in 1961 he became associated with an assortment of similar groups including the Council for Industrial Freedom in Indiana, the National Labor-Management Foundation in Chicago and, most recently, a new group called the Kentucky Freedom to Work Council.

The National Right to Work Committee, meanwhile, announced that it will fight the attempt to force it to file Landrum-Griffin reports and accused the Kennedy Administration of "harrassment."

Although the suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for Washington, D. C., was brought by the Secretary of Labor, the "work" committee issued a statement charging "persecution . . . by Bobby Kennedy's Justice Dept."

The committee also has been engaged in a running battle with the National Labor Relations Board, which has repeatedly invalidated representation elections because employers have shown anti-union films produced by the National Right to Work Committee.

The Labor Dept. suit, in addition to seeking a court order requiring the "work" committee to file reports on any arrangements it has made with employers, also asks an injunction against "any future failure and refusal to file the reports."

Disaster Plan Links Labor and Red Cross

Harrisburg — Sixteen AFL-CIO Community Services representatives in Pennsylvania will be available for Red Cross disaster assignments during any emergency, under a plan developed by the two groups.

The national Red Cross has issued identification cards for all community services representatives in the state. In any emergency, Pennsylvania Red Cross representatives will call on Charles F. Ferguson, State AFL-CIO community services director, who will assign staff representatives to the disaster area.

Deckhands On Railroad Vote for SIU

New York—Deckhands of the Erie-Lackawanna Railroad's marine division have voted for the Seafarers as their collective bargaining representative to replace Local 518 of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The balloting was conducted by Alfred Della Corte, mediator for the National Mediation Board. He said the vote was SIU 80, Teamsters 58. The latter union was expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt elements.

The SIU represents deckhands on seven other railroads in the New York harbor area and two railroads in Norfolk, Va.

Also it announced the signing of a new agreement with the Sabine Towing Co., Houston, Tex., for 200 tugmen who choose that union in a National Labor Relations Board election, according to SIU.

At Oklahoma Hearing:

R-T-W Petition Foes Cite Fraud Evidence

Oklahoma City—The Oklahoma Supreme Court was asked to declare a "right-to-work" initiative invalid on the ground that 104,806 names on the petition have been proved to be "fraudulent or irregular."

The challenge to the validity and legality of the initiative petition was issued in a brief argued before Supreme Court Referee Marian Opala by attorneys for citizens groups opposing the so-called "right-to-work" law proposal.

The initiative petition, which seeks to place the proposal for a compulsory open shop before the state electorate at a special election, has been under challenge for 16 months. Today's argument that the initiative petition is illegal because of "wholesale fraud" in its circulation resulted from a directive by the Supreme Court to the referee that he make a recommendation to the high court based on the evidence presented in lengthy hearings.

Referee Opala was directed to report to the Supreme Court "his findings of fact and his conclusions" as to whether there is sufficient evidence that the initiative petition contains the number of valid signatures required by law.

A total of 77,229 names on the petition must be judged illegal to invalidate it.

If the Supreme Court should find the initiative petition valid, the issue would go to Gov. Henry Bellmon to set an election date.

William C. Kessler, attorney for the citizens groups challenging the legality of the petition, argued that evidence already placed before the court proved the illegality of more than 100,000 purported signatures.

Kessler said that 70,000 of the names were those of non-registered voters and that there were 20,000 other instances of prima facie fraud. The attorney argued that approximately 14,000 additional names were illegal because of other irregularities by the petition cirlators, including improper notarizations.

He asked that the referee rule that these are "findings in fact" and that the initiative petition, therefore, should be judged invalid.

The attorneys also argued that the "right-to-work" forces circulated an illegal petition form printed in the national colors of red, white and blue. This was done, they said, to create an impression that it was a patriotic gesture to sign the petition and un-American not to sign it.

Sharp Drop in Income Marks Over-65 Group

Families and individuals aged 65 and over had less than half the incomes of younger persons in 1961, the Health, Education & Welfare Dept.'s Office of the Aging has reported.

In a report titled "Income of Older People, 1960-61," the Office of the Aging said Census Bureau data showed that aged families—those whose head was 65 or older—made up 14.5 percent of all American families in 1961, and the median income for the group was $3,026 a year. This was 49.6 percent of the median for younger families—$6,099 a year.

Among unrelated individuals, the 35.4 percent who were 65 or older in 1961 had a median income of $1,106, the report said. This was 42.7 percent of the median for younger individuals —$2,589 a year.

The study also showed, among other things, that:

- About 31 percent of older families had 1961 incomes of less than $2,000, against only 10 percent of younger families.
- Only 22 percent of older families had incomes of $6,000 or more, whereas more than half the younger families—51 percent—had such incomes.
- Close to half the older unrelated individuals — 45.2 percent — had incomes of less than $1,000, as compared with about one-fourth —25.3 percent—of younger individuals.
- Only 10 percent of the aged individuals had as much as $3,000 in annual income, as against some 45 percent of younger individuals.
- The 1954-61 trend in median income has been upward for all groups, but has been less for elderly persons than for those under 65. The median for older families rose 32 percent over the period, against 38 percent for all families. The median for older unrelated individuals rose 39 percent, as compared with 43 percent for all such individuals.
- Older families headed by college graduates had a median income of $6,750 in 1961, against a median of $2,419 for such families whose heads had less than eight years of schooling. A consistent increase in median income was evident for each increase in years of schooling.

Insurance Pact Boosts Wages For 17,000

The Insurance Workers have reached agreement with the Prudential Insurance Co. on a new two-year contract improving the wages and working conditions of 17,000 "debit" agents in 34 states and the District of Columbia.

The new agreement, reached a day after the old contract was due to expire, provides wage increases totaling $5.12 a week and several improvements in working conditions sought by the IWIU, acording to Vice Pres. Joseph Pollack, who headed the union negotiators.

Pollack, reporting that settlement was reached without serious difficulty, said the union hopes the pact will mark the beginning of a new era in relations between the union and management.

3-Man Board Named In United Air Dispute

Paul D. Hanlon, a Portland, Ore., lawyer, was named by Pres. Kennedy as chairman of an emergency board set up under the Railway Labor Act to investigate a contract dispute between the Machinists and United Air Lines. Other members appointed were Laurence E. Seibel of Washington, D. C., and Eli Rock of Philadelphia.

Kennedy invoked emergency board machinery when the Machinists set Oct. 10 as deadline for a strike.

15,000 Covered by Group Health Plan:

New Ontario Medical Center Hailed as Steel Union 'First'

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.—The Steelworkers have introduced the most comprehensive prepaid medical plan in Canada with a group health program that covers 15,000 union members and families in this big steel center.

USWA Pres. David J. McDonald, the main speaker at the dedication of an $800,000 medical center, the base of the group care program, forecast that the plan may become the model for future medicare programs in the North American steel industry.

"This program is a first in social achievement, but only the first of many to follow as the USWA seeks to solve some of our more pressing health problems by ourselves," said McDonald.

The Human Relations Committee, through which the union and the basic steel industry in the U.S. maintain continuing discussions on matters of mutual concern, has assigned a sub-committee to study and inspect the Sault Ste. Marie health care program.

Prevention Stressed

The program is the first by the Steelworkers and the first consumer-sponsored medical care plan in Canada. Subscribers paid $135 each to build and equip the center, which has consulting rooms for six family doctors, seven specialists, and facilities for eye examinations, X-rays, laboratory tests, medical records, and physiotherapy. Although the cost of drugs is not included in the plan, the center has a pharmacy that will dispense medicine at the lowest possible cost.

The monthly premium for complete medical care, including costs of specialists, is part of the health and welfare package negotiated by the USWA. Subscribers work at Algoma Steel Corp. Ltd., Canada's second largest steel producer; Algoma Contractors Ltd., Mannesmann Tubes Ltd., and Northern Ontario Gas Ltd. The program includes unionized white collar workers at Algoma and Mannesmann.

The big feature of the plan is that it encourages frequent check-ups and preventive medicine. "We want to keep the healthy well, as much as we want to meet the costs of illness," said McDonald.

He told a banquet here that the health center is the fulfillment of the prophecy he made five years ago when he warned organized medicine to stop resisting change or the union would have to establish its own group health care programs.

"We want to say to our doctors: 'Let us, the patients, do the worrying about running a business. Your skills and your expensive training demand you be free of these concerns and capable of devoting yourselves exclusively to the task of healing the sick and keeping the healthy well. You deserve and shall have higher than standard income. You deserve and should have the best possible equipment and facilities,'" said McDonald.

The group health medical care formula is financially just to consumers and doctors alike, Mr. McDonald said, since salaries and equipment of physicians can be on a high level and costs will increase on "an orderly, controlled and negotiated basis."

Dr. Frederick Mott, representing the Group Health Association of America, said he was "terribly pleased" to see the start of such a program in Canada. "This is a pioneering effort, for you are coping with some of the unsolved problems of medical care in our time," he said.

Subscribers voted for the group care program when employers offered them a choice between it and a special privately run medical insurance plan. At the brief dedication, McDonald snipped a ribbon at the center while congratulating USWA staff Rep. John Barker, chairman of the program's board of directors, which includes a businessman, priest and minister as well as union officials.

The center received its first patient Sept. 1 but the dedication was postponed until contractors completed work on the three-story building. The Steelworkers hope it will expand into a community-wide group medical care program.

50-State Survey Shows Kerr-Mills Plan Fails

(Continued from Page 1)

ing this program would not improve the situation any."

Furthermore, the oft-repeated claim of the AMA that private insurance can do the job and there is no need for social security hospital insurance, gets no support from the New York agency, which observed:

Premiums Average $225

"The 50 percent of the aged covered [by private insurance plans] is heavily weighted with aged persons under 70 years who are still in the labor force, whose premiums are paid in full or substantially by their employers. As to the new insurance plans, they are beyond the means of most aged persons. Annual premiums average $225 for plans that pay only a fraction of medical costs."

The report on the New York study also made these observations:

"The proportion of the aged with adequate incomes relative to ordinary living costs in fairly uniform among the states.

"The quantity of medical services required by the aged, per person, in a given period of time should not vary at all among the states, yet it has—from as little as 22 cents to $109.48 per month per person on the public assistance rolls.

"Under current federal regulations, although the federal government underwrites from 50 to 80 percent of medical payments, each state is free to decide which aged are eligible for medical care at public expense as well as the scope and quantity of services."

"Under this system, it is a matter of geography rather than physiology whether a sick low-income aged person will receive care at public expense in this country."

The study also found that some states were actually profiting from Kerr-Mills and using it "as a vehicle" to reduce their expenditures for the needy aged, against the intent of Congress.

"The federal regulations governing the administration of the MAA program," the report said, "allowed the states such wide latitude that, by maneuvering skillfully, states were able to write MAA plans that would yield them increased federal aid without increasing either the size of their caseloads or medical care outlays."

The report went on to observe that Kerr-Mills also has failed to meet another objective of its supporters—that it would serve as an alternative to health care under Old Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance (the social security system).

"In the first place," the New York report said, "under OASDI auspices, the means test required by Kerr-Mills provisions would be eliminated. Secondly there would be equitable treatment of all the aged in the country regardless of state of residence . . .

"There appears little doubt that the soundest approach to providing medical care for the aged is for basic care to be covered by OASDI; residual care by private insurance for those who have the means to pay premiums; and, for those unable to buy insurance, an MAA program revised for that purpose."

Better Offer Ends Strike In Dye Shops

New York—Improved contract offers by employers in 250 dyeing and finishing shops in the New York area brought an end to strikes of 8,000 members of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Members of eight locals previously had rejected a three-year contract with raises totaling 20 cents an hour. They accepted a new employer offer of 12 cents the first year, 8 cents the second year and 7 cents the third year and returned to work after a one-week walkout.

Other improvements include a third week of vacation after five years' service, and an additional $1 each year to a top of $3 as employer payments into the pension fund.

GUEST OF HONOR Golda Meir, Israel's foreign minister, is congratulated by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky at the All-American Salute to Israel's Pioneers which opened the 40th anniversary year of the Israel Histadrut campaign. Seated left of Mrs. Meir are Joseph Schlossberg, president of the National Committee for Labor Israel, sponsor of the campaign, and Mrs. Schlossberg.

Histadrut Salute Marks 40th Year of Campaign

New York—The National Committee for Labor Israel kicked off the 40th anniversary year of the Israel Histadrut Campaign with an "All American Salute to Israel's Pioneers."

All segments of the New York Labor movement were represented among the 16,000 persons who gathered at Madison Square Garden for the tribute.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message read by Federation Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, hailed Histadrut, Israel's labor movement, as "the very sinew and fiber of that democratic nation." He noted that Histadrut is constantly striving for a better standard of living for Israel's workers and "is a vital part of that citadel of democracy so vital to the free world."

Meany observed that the free labor movement in many parts of the world is under "severe attack" and faces destruction where constitutional governments have been swept away by "the military, the power-hungry and totalitarian political forces."

"More than ever before," he declared, "Israel and Histadrut stand as proof that democracy and free trade unions are inseparable."

Guest of honor at the celebration was Mrs. Golda Meir, Israel's foreign minister, who was presented to the audience by Joseph Schlossberg, president of the National Committee.

The committee was formed four decades ago by the United Hebrew Trades of New York and in that time its Israel Histadrut Campaign has raised more than $60 million. These funds have helped Histadrut build a comprehensive program that now includes medical services for 1.8 million Jews and Arabs, cultural centers in 400 towns and villages throughout Israel and a network of 17 vocational schools that train thousands of teen-agers in industrial skills.

Louis Segal, vice president of the National Committee and secretary of the Farband Labor Zionist Order, noted that Histadrut had grown from "6,000 workers in a few fields to nearly a million workers covering the entire spectrum of creative labor."

Through the Israel Histadrut Campaign, he said, "Americans have been full partners in this process of performing miracles."

Firm NMU Stand Urged Against Foes of Labor

New York—The National Maritime Union ended its 13th National convention with a plea from Pres. Joseph Curran to stand united against all forces that imperial not only the rights of organized labor but American democracy as a whole.

In a report to 476 delegates, 402 of whom had been elected on individual ships to represent their crews, Curran cited the federal government's efforts following the NMU convention of 1960 to void the union's election.

The suit, which was eventually dropped "without prejudice," presented "a serious lesson about relations between labor and the government and about labor's responsibilities in connection with legislation like the Landrum-Griffin Act," the NMU president declared. "It is a lesson which should be taken to heart."

Curran emphasized the importance of union members' support of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, complimenting maritime workers for their record of achievement in this area.

He devoted part of his report to discussing honest labeling legislation, suggesting that Americans who travel in ships should know about minimum safety standards required by international safety codes.

He deplored techniques employed by foreign shipping companies which, he said, anxious to take advantage of cruise trade, "are being formed to cash in on this business, with ships being taken out of lay-up and boneyards and rushed in to make a fast buck."

NMU delegates approved 29 resolutions, including union statements on civil rights, promotion of the American flag merchant marine, using American ships for sugar, oil and other imports, and the establishment of a formal school for training and upgrading seamen.

The civil rights resolution reaffirmed the NMU's position on equality of opportunity for all Americans. It also urged the Kennedy Administration to press vigorously for effective civil rights legislation; "to enforce firmly the constitutional rights of all Americans in all parts of the country; to use all necessary means to protect every citizen in every part of the country against violence and bloodshed. . . . and to put the weight of the United States firmly on the side of freedom and justice and against any regime which deprives any of its citizens of basic civil liberties."

New Seniors' Film Ready for Rental

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education now has available for rental the new film on the King-Anderson Bill, "For All the Rest of Your Life," produced by the National Council of Senior Citizens.

A discussion guide on hospital care for the aged under social security, for use with the film, has been prepared by the department to aid unions in their educational programs on the issue. Rental fee for the 14-minute film is $3 per showing. The film should be reserved three weeks in advance of showing through the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Copies of the film may be purchased for $25 a print from the NCSC, 1627 K St., N.W., Washington, D. C.

The First Target

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION on the Status of Women has produced a notable report directing attention to the exploitation of and discrimination against women workers.

The high concentration of full-time women workers in low-paying occupations has held down their average income to 60 percent of the average pay drawn by male workers. In many cases where men and women do the same work on the same jobs, the wage scales discriminate against women.

There are about 6 million women, the commission's report points out, working at jobs unprotected by the federal wage and hour law—occupations that are specifically exempted from the present coverage of the statute. This exemption includes the requirement of equal pay for equal work, written into the wage and hour law in 1963.

To end this exploitation and discrimination, the immediate need is to expand minimum wage and maximum hours legislation to cover the millions of women employed in hotels, restaurants, laundries, retail establishments, agriculture and non-profit organizations, to give them the basic protection of $1.25 an hour and overtime after 40 hours a week.

The commission recommends extension of the federal wage-hour law and strengthening of state laws. It urges also extension of state laws to protect the right of all workers to join unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively.

This is the key to improving the status of women in America—stamping out the exploitation of women workers, eliminating substandard and poverty-line wages. A strong floor under wages in the industries where women workers are concentrated must be the first target if the opportunities for all women are to be advanced.

Not So Neutral

THE HYPOCRITICAL PRETENSIONS of neutrality that emanate from the National Right-to-Work Committee have been blown clear and the committee stands fully revealed for what it is—an anti-union operation.

The Labor Department has filed suit to compel the committee to register as a management consultant under the Landrum-Griffin Act and to disclose details of services it has provided to employers. The committee has refused to file as an employer consultant as specified by the act on the ground that its only purpose is to seek enactment of laws to bar union shop agreements.

The so-called "right-to-work" laws it so fervently espouses are designed to weaken and destroy unions. But the committee maintains that it is not opposed to unions; it just wants to prevent them from signing freely bargained union security agreements with employers, agreements that result in free, strong and responsible trade unions.

The Labor Dept. suit discloses, however, that officers of the committee are not content merely with seeking destructive "right-to-work" laws but are actively helping employers to block organizing drives. An employer's report, filed under Landrum-Griffin, reveals that a committee official delivered an anti-union speech at a meeting set up by the employer in the period preceding a union representation election.

The National Right-to-Work Committee is up to its ears in labor-management relations covered by the Landrum-Griffin Act and should be required to file a disclosure report. The phony neutrality has gone on long enough.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Oct. 19, 1963 No. 42

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Going Up!

Patton New NCIP Co-Chairman:

Farmers Union Leader Known As Long-Time Foe of Injustice

THE NEW CO-CHAIRMAN of the National Council for Industrial Peace, named to replace Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, is James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers Union and an original member of the Council's executive board since the founding of the organization in 1958.

Patton is not a Johnny-come-lately to the cause of liberalism and democratic practices. And his relationship to organized labor is solid and of long standing. The Council is dedicated to the freedom of labor and management to engage in collective bargaining unhindered by so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Speaking of the drive for a compulsory open shop law in Oklahoma recently, Patton declared:

"Farmers must realize the target of this propaganda campaign is destruction of the same kind of security for wage workers that farmers have fought to achieve for themselves in the form of marketing agreements.

"Lowering wages of workers in industry will hurt the farmers' best customer—the working man and woman who buy the farmers' produce.

"It is imperative to understand that the attack on working people by means of a so-called 'right-to-work' law is being waged at the very time when the same promoters, wearing different hats, are attacking farm cooperatives."

Through the years Jim Patton has urged "all farmers to stand firm with organized labor for the improvement of living standards of both groups . . ."

His reputation as a living exponent of democracy goes far beyond our borders. As president of the American Freedom from Hunger Campaign his name became an international symbol of humanitarianism. He was a founder and served as president of the Intl. Federation of Agricultural Producers, the organization of farmers through the free world.

Last year he received the French Croix d'Officier du Merite Agricole, the highest French agricultural award, for his "contributions to international understanding of farm problems."

Domestically he has been in the leadership of groups devoted to the support of public schools, for vocational and adult education. He has served the nation on the National Labor Management Policy Committee, the National Economic Stabilization Board and numerous other governmental bodies.

In Henryetta, Okla., last Labor Day he spoke at a large gathering, warning workers and farmers—all citizens—against the so-called "right-to-work" laws.

He took off on the extreme right wing, saying that while the John Birch Society may be the best known of the extremist groups "the big business-professional coalition is as dangerous as the right wing movement itself—it's against anything that might help our nation move forward—for it is the financial heart of the far right."

HE TOLD HIS AUDIENCE that "our "farmers and our city workers must stand together to defeat the forces of reaction, corporate monopoly and right wing radicalism that blindly believe they can have the cake and eat it, too, by exploiting both the farmer and the city wage earner."

Born on a farm near Bazer, Kans., in 1902, Patton was graduated from Western State College in Gunnison, Colo. From an early age he worked to help his family and to obtain an education. Following college he taught and coached in school athletics, selling insurance at the same time to supplement his income.

In 1932, in the midst of the depression, he helped organize the Colorado Farmers Union, now the Rocky Mountain Farmers Union. Two years later he was named executive secretary of the organization and served until elected president in 1938. Two years later he was elected president of the National Farmers Union.

He has grown from a regional, to national, to international figure. His name is associated with the fight for freedom, the fight against poverty and injustice and, as his co-chairman former Sen. Herbert Lehman said, it seems fitting that he should be taking over where Eleanor Roosevelt left off (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Simple Truths of Old Can Help In Solving Today's Problems

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

I SUPPOSE ALL AUTUMNS are gorgeous but this one seems to be particularly splendid, perhaps in part because my wife and I have just spent 10 days in New England where the season apparently was invented. Fall has been early this year, on the Atlantic watershed at least, and a dangerous dry spell has menaced the beauty of the woods with fires but we were lucky: the only conflagration we saw in the Adirondacks or the Green Mountains of Vermont was flaming foliage.

Morgan

Where did I read the observation of some knowing citizen that Americans, having no ancient ruins handy to gaze upon, go instead to the great monuments of mountains to seek their connections with the past? Thoreau had something. I thought about him as I canoed across, not Walden, but a gem of a pond below Lake Champlain I think he would have approved of.

This golden juncture between summer and winter seems to gently mellow the wilds and ripen the cultivated countryside, distilling from nature a delicious nourishment humans vitally need, and in this frenetic era forget to partake enough of.

An outing like ours produces an interesting juncture too between the past and the present. A cleared field above the pond bounded by scrub apple trees marks the place where, only a few generations ago, a whole pioneer family died of malaria. Now, so far have the frontiers of medicine been advanced that the disease is not only a rarity in the entire United States but is rapidly being conquered in all but the farthest reaches of the world.

While I sat on a log, casting for rainbow trout in the pond, a jetliner wrote its muffled whisper in white contrails across the blue dome of the sky. In the time it took me to reel in the spinner, the aircraft had traveled farther than a team of oxen could make in a day.

The human mind boggles over these vast differences, over the distances between where we were and where we are, and is spun by them into a confusing ambivalence. A day in the woods is apt to produce not just the delayed discovery of nature but an unreasoned longing for the "simple things" of the past. It's one thing to be refreshed and stimulated by closer communion with the wonderful mysteries and reliable rhythms of the universe. It's quite another to insist that what this country needs is a return to primitivism, as some political soothsayers, with beguiling oversimplification, are advocating.

THE ATOM HAS BEEN SPLIT and the population is multiplying like so many lemmings but before the more sinister aspects of science and an impulse of blind despair—or blind smugness—drive us suicidally into the sea, we ought to be able to realize that merely turning our backs on the increasing complexities of life is not going to solve anything.

Perhaps this realization can be made less difficult if we accept the fact that, radically as our lives have been materially transformed, certain basic human truths have not changed and we can apply these principles to today's problems.

This prospect pricked my thoughts as we started homeward from New England and paused in Deerfield, Mass., a lovely, carefully preserved town, rich in the lore of American history from the coming of the Pilgrims to the 19th century days well past the Revolutionary War. In a church near the spot where one of the Mathers had preached nearly 300 years ago, a minister noted what an amazing thing it would be if the Sermon on the Mount could have been filmed with a full sound track at the time and reproduced today.

The minister suggested that the production would fill movie houses, draw record television and radio audiences and receive major attention in the press but then what? His barbed conclusion was that we would do little more than pay lip service to the basic ethics of Christianity from the Golden Rule onward.

Would we, for example, have a crisis on race relations if we practiced what Christ preached? Would politics be so full of hypocrisy, would international affairs even in the nuclear age be so tangled in deceit, would labor-management relations in the era of automation be so strained with suspicion and selfishness if we applied the spiritual and ethical tenets we profess to believe? The answer is no; they would not. We shouldn't even need a sojourn in the inspiring wilderness to reach such an obvious conclusion, but it helps.

Washington Reports:

AID Fund Cut Called Serious For U.S. Image in Latin America

THE HOUSE CUT of $500 million in the AID program is already having a serious psychological effect in Latin America, Teodoro Moscoso, U.S. coordinator of the Alliance for Progress, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

Ambassador Moscoso said that Latin American countries are, as a result, uncertain whether the U.S. will carry out the promises made at the conference of U.S. and Latin American countries at Punta del Este, Uruguay, in August 1961.

"I think our image can be restored," he added, "if the Senate gives us back a substantial amount of the cut made by the House" in Agency for International Development funds.

Recent military takeovers in Latin America "have set us back politically; however, I can see where the democratic forces in Latin America will rally to the threat that democracy may disappear from the hemisphere unless those who believe in democracy defend it," he declared.

Moscoso said he believes a "greater degree of political stability will be achieved by the knowledge that the U.S. will not give economic assistance to military governments that unseat a democratically elected government."

The coordinator said that jobs in the U.S. are dependent on the Alliance for Progress because under the program, "we send machinery, equipment, commodities" to Latin America and "obviously in the production of these commodities and this equipment, Americans are employed."

MOSCOSO REPORTED that "a number of wealthy Latin Americans are beginning to realize their social responsibilities, which come with great wealth, and not only are they no longer opposing reforms, but in some instances they are espousing them or even leading" reform movements. They are "beginning to see that it is in their self-interest to see that the masses of the people get a better break."

More than 11 countries have instituted "very substantial and badly needed tax reforms or have them under way," he said, noting that hitherto, most Latin American countries have lacked tax laws based on ability to pay.

Moscoso praised the American Institute for Free Labor Development, sponsored by the AFL-CIO and leaders in American business, saying that in its schools in the U.S. and Latin America the institute has trained "democratically oriented labor leaders," and also has aided in social projects, such as housing developments.

So far the alliance has brought about the building of 140,000 houses, 8,000 schools and 12,000 miles of roads, and is conducting school lunch and other child-feeding programs among some 15 million people of Latin America, Moscoso declared.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE QUESTION on civil rights legislation in this session of Congress remains what it was last June, when Pres. Kennedy launched the drive for a bill more extensive in its provisions than any the legislators have ever previously been willing to pass. It is the issue of how many Republican senators will vote for cloture when the inevitable southern Democratic filibuster operates against whatever rights bill is eventually passed by the House.

Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy made a frank bid for House Republican support when he urged the Judiciary Committee to trim back the measure approved by a subcommittee—a measure that went beyond the President's recommendations.

The ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio, had made it publicly clear that he thought the bill was more all-inclusive than he considered wise.

It may well be that the bill could have been cleared intact, on something approaching a straight party-line vote, but that would have shifted the battle to the Rules Committee and the floor itself.

The chairman of the Rules Committee, Rep. Howard W. Smith of Virginia, has infinite capacities and skills in tactics of delay and frustration. And a heavy Republican vote against the bill on the floor, on the ground that concessions had been rejected, would form a precarious base for seeking GOP support of cloture in the Senate.

* * *

THE ARGUMENTS against compromise at this stage are obvious, and civil rights leaders were critical of the Administration for the Attorney General's proposals. Once the process of cutting back begins, they argue, it may prove difficult to halt. Those who have genuine doubts may ask additional concessions—elimination or separation, for example, of fair employment practice provisions or of even a modified public accommodation section.

This seems to put the problem up to the Republican leadership, including both McCulloch of Ohio in the House and most especially Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois in the Senate.

A strong bipartisan push in the House can produce a bill that has heavy Republican backing to lay the foundation for the Senate battle. And Dirksen, who has repeatedly expressed doubts about the public accommodations proposals, has his own responsibilities.

The process of compromise and concilation is a familiar one in the legislative operation. It is clear that a significant bill—the strongest obtainable—can be passed only if it can be presented as genuinely bipartisan, the product of exchange and understandings between leaders of the two parties. But it requires movement on both sides, not just on one.

A minimum of 22 Republican senators is considered necessary to achieve the requisite two-thirds vote for cloture—22 out of 33. It is virtually certain that 22 can be obtained only if Dirksen backs cloture, and this places the Illinois senator in the key position.

* * *

ARNOLD ORDMAN, the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, defended the agency's reputation for fairness and objectivity by pointing out that a "distorted" record could be produced to show that the present five-member board is "anti-labor" rather than "pro-labor," as some critics have charged.

His point is well taken in the sense that House time has been occupied for the last two years in a laborious effort by the Landrum-Griffin twins—Representatives Landrum of Georgia and Griffin of Michigan—to charge a watering-down of the intent of Congress in the L-G Act of 1959. No doubt a "distorted" record from the NLRB decisions during the Eisenhower years could have been produced to demonstrate almost anything.

It nevertheless seems fair to note that the Eisenhower board suffered severely in the Supreme Court for many of its decisions and was most categorically reversed and told, in effect, to go reread the law. The present board may also suffer reversals from time to time, but there is a difference. It has not overlooked the unchanged and basic declaration of policy in the Wagner Act of 1935—that collective bargaining and untrammeled self-organization of workers are protected under the law of the land.

THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE for Free Labor Development, co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO, is of major assistance to the Alliance for Progress, the U.S. coordinator of the Alliance, Teodoro Moscoso, left, asserted during an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Harry W. Flannery was the interviewer.

How to Buy:

Teen Agers Are Avid Spenders, Need Information on Budgeting

By Sidney Margolius

BUSINESSMEN LOVE the country's currently huge group of teen-agers. The youngsters are a big market and big spenders. They have more money in their pockets nowadays (from both parents and jobs). They get married earlier. They always have been clothing faddists but now they are more fashion-conscious than ever.

Most of all, they use more toiletries and cosmetics — everything from hair spray to eye makeup, and abundant use of hair dressings by the boys. Television is the chief influence now — note those bouffant hair styles.

Not long ago teen-age girls used very little cosmetics until they were 17 or so. Now they more often start at 14, even earlier. A survey by Seventeen magazine, which reigns profitably over this huge group of avid spenders, found that while the country's ten million teen-age girls still comprise only ten per cent of the population, they do 25 per cent of the buying of all cosmetics and toiletries.

Teen-agers also have become the mainstay of the record and music business. Liquor distillers and brewers avoid advertising directly to teen-agers, and cigarette manufacturers this year quit advertising in college newspapers. But teen-agers both drink and smoke earlier nowadays.

A study of teen drinking in one eastern and two midwestern states shows that three out of five kids aged 14 to 18 admit to drinking alcoholic beverages, with or without parental consent, Scholastic Magazine's Youth Letter reports. The most immediate danger is reckless driving.

COSMETICS AND TOILETRIES manufacturers have leaned heavily on television to develop teen-agers' present high expenditures on their products. Just one manufacturer, the Alberto-Culver Co., is reported to be spending $30 million this year on television—more than such huge corporations as G.E., Ford or U.S. Steel spend.

Alberto-Culver, which sells VO-5 hair dressing and other products of that type, actually spends on advertising 20 cents of every dollar you pay for such products; more than it costs to manufacture them. As an example of the drain on family money, in seven years Alberto-Culver sales have spiraled from less than half a million dollars a year to $57 million. Nor is Alberto-Culver the biggest manufacturer of toiletries; simply the one with the most dramatic TV-based rise.

This situation may represent two perils for your own family. One is the diversion of money from such more-basic and much-wanted goals as educating the family's children. Another is that when the youngsters get married, they know relatively little about handling money and encounter serious problems. We have reported several times that the majority of today's wage-earner bankruptcies are in the younger families.

The youngsters themselves often realize their lack of economic education and would like to have more of it.

Eugene E. Gilbert, perhaps the country's leading researcher on teen-age attitudes, has told this department that over and over again, his surveys find there is no real communication between family and teen-ager. The youngsters want to talk to their parents, but generally go elsewhere.

One of the most effective ways to train teen-agers in handling money is to help them plan or budget in advance how they will spend their money. The Cornell survey found most of the youngsters felt planning would make them more careful with money and reduce family bickering over how they spend it.

A survey by the Ohio Experiment Station of 150 young married couples found that, while the husbands usually felt confident of their vocational ability, many of the wives felt they lacked training in money management and housekeeping methods. Significantly, most of the husbands had had some job training in school or college, but relatively few of the young wives had training in home management subjects.

Most urgently, the youngsters need guidance in buying toiletries, cosmetics and shampoos without overpaying, especially in comparing the TV-advertised products with the private brands sold at lower prices by many retailers, and the lower-priced national brands like Ponds, Jergens, Lady Esther and Woodbury. Too often —in over 50 percent of the cases according to Scholastic Magazines' survey—the children buy these products themselves or someone in the family "buys the brand I specify."

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

From Soup to Nonsense:

For Writing Notes to Aunt Lucy, How About a Nice Form Letter?

By Jane Goodsell

MOST ADVICE on how to write letters doesn't face up to the real problem. The books tell you how to answer formal wedding invitations, how to phrase bread-and-butter notes and how to write to a congressman.

Such advice is helpful, no doubt about it. But then, problems of this sort don't come up very often.

What does come up (and hangs like a cloud over your head) is the problem of how to get yourself to sit down and write that letter you owe Aunt Lucy, and how to keep on top of your correspondence with your mother-in-law, who answers your letters with horrifying speed by return mail.

Why, I'll bet that right this very minute you owe letters to five or six people. You probably intend to take pen in hand and write them any day now. Maybe even tomorrow, huh?

To ease your task, I have composed a form letter, leaving blank spaces to be filled in with specific details. It ought to allow for everything you have to say in the ordinary course of events. Should you have some extraordinary, dramatic news to report (and the unlikelihood of this is exactly what makes letter-writing so difficult) you can tack it on in a postscript or send a wire.

Dear .....:

Please forgive me for not writing sooner, but I've been so busy ..... that I haven't had a spare minute. Nothing much new here. We are all fine except last week the children came down with ....., and my ..... has been acting up again. However, we are all better now.

I hope you are fine, and that you're not having any more trouble with your .....

The weather has been very ..... lately.

I am on a diet and trying to lose ..... pounds, and ..... is trying to give up .....

Little ..... is now in the ..... stage, and getting more ..... every day. ..... is now in the ..... grade, and taking ..... lessons.

The ..... broke down, and we had to get a new one.

I guess that's all the news, and I must dash because it's time .... Write soon.

Love and kisses,

.....

P.S. Please give our love to .....

MORE THAN 100 LOCALS in Detroit donated $3,772 to "Operation Wheelchair," a campaign sponsored by the Wayne County AFL-CIO Community Services Committee to raise funds for the purchase of wheelchairs, hospital beds and other equipment for union members in need of such equipment. Looking over some of the purchases are (left to right), W. E. Snider, Sister Kenny Foundation director; Community Service Activities Staff Rep. Eric DeRoss; Vice Pres. Mike Novak of the County AFL-CIO, and CSA Staff Rep. Whitey Dancey.

Consumer Survey Shows:

Buying Demand Up But Still Below Peak

CONSUMER DEMAND will continue to show strength for at least the next half year, according to The University of Michigan Survey Research Center in Ann Arbor.

Consumer sentiment was found to be "cautiously optimistic" in August and September, SRC economists report in the center's latest quarterly survey of consumer attitudes and inclinations to buy.

The SRC Index of Consumer Attitudes, however, still is below the peak level of November 1962, recorded after settlement of the Cuban crisis. The latest index, based on consumer attitudes toward key questions, stands at 96.2, compared to 98.6 in November 1962 and 95.5 in May 1963.

The judgment that it is "a good time to buy" is at peak levels for cars, houses, and household goods, the report states. Plans to buy new cars were as frequent in September 1963 as they were a year ago.

"In 1962 and in 1963 the consumer sector played a leading role in bringing about the upsurge of business activity," the SRC economists conclude. "Now, with the Index of Consumer Attitudes somewhat below peak levels, more vigorous aid from the business and government sectors seems to be needed to sustain a high rate of economic expansion.

"About two-thirds of the American people believe, as they did earlier in 1962 and 1963, that the proposed tax cut is a good idea. Concern that a tax cut would hurt vital defense and government programs appears to have diminished."

Only slightly over one-fourth of respondents said they expect that Congress will pass the tax cut, however. The SRC economists say that if the tax cut should become law, it would be "good news" whose "effect would be to strengthen confidence, in addition to the extra dollars put into people's pay envelopes."

Over 40 percent of all those polled expressed the belief in August that a tax cut would have a favorable effect on business conditions, and among people with incomes over $10,000 this proportion was over 55 percent. The report says that hardly anybody was of the opposite opinion—that the effect would be harmful, although a sizable group said it would have no effect or were unable to give a clear-cut answer.

When asked what "most people" would do with their tax savings, three out of four said they "would spend the money." Increased spending by consumers is strongly associated in people's minds with improved economic conditions, the report says.

Of market conditions, the report states: "The explanations which people provide for their judgments of favorable buying conditions for durable goods suggest that there is a growing feeling that prices are low or reasonable and that good buys are available. Such attitudes have, of course, favorable implications for demand in the months ahead."

Hidden Impact:

Shifting Job Pattern Seen Eroding Skills

The increasing shift in American jobs from industries that produce goods to those that provide services "has had very serious—though perhaps hidden—implications for the economy and the workforce," according to an article in the October issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

"The Erosion of Jobs and Skills," an Economic Review feature prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, noted that it has been unskilled and semi-skilled blue collar workers in factories, mines and on farms and railroads who have suffered most since 1953 from the limping economy and the expansion of automation.

"And while the employment of skilled craftsmen has not decreased, neither has it increased," the article observed. "With the workforce growing, the craftsmen also are becoming a relatively smaller part of the total job picture."

Over the same 1953-62 period, employment in the service-producing industries has registered growth that has been "little short of dramatic," the magazine noted. This, it said, has often been regarded as a net gain for the economy and partial compensation for the displacement of factory jobs by machines.

"This is not necessarily the case," it continued, "because a large proportion of the jobs in these [service] industries—such as retail store clerks, parking lot attendants, counter and fountain workers, charwomen, hospital attendants, janitors, watchmen and bus boys—includes relatively unskilled occupations which pay low wages."

And while there has been a sharp increase in employment opportunities for workers with college education or specialized training, workers without such advanced training who make up most of the labor force face a growing scarcity of jobs or the prospect of low pay and part-time work.

Plight of Laid-Off

For example, the Federationist analysis noted, the average factory worker earned $2.57 an hour last year. If he is laid off, with factory employment declining and unemployment running at the rate of 5 percent or more for 70 consecutive months, the odds are against his finding another factory job in keeping with his training and experience.

If he turns to retail trade, which aside from local and state governments has shown the largest job growth since 1953, his wages will probably be much lower. The average retail employe received $1.75 an hour in 1962, the magazine noted.

The article pointed out that the job picture is further clouded by the jump in the proportion of part-time workers since 1953. The increase of 5.8 million in total employment over the last nine years, it said, "hides the fact that perhaps 50 percent of the total net increase in jobs—including state and local government jobs—was in part-time work only."

As for the future, the prospects for workers without college or advanced training are not bright, the Federationist observed, adding:

"The large body of unskilled and semi-skilled, blue-collar workers cannot qualify for . . . professional and technical jobs. For them, the outlook is very often downward movement—in the types of jobs they will be able to find and in the wages they will receive. And the youngsters who enter the workforce with only a high school education or less—as millions do—face an equally dismal future unless they return to school."

Economic Push Needed

The answer to these problems, the magazine declared, is a sharp increase in economic activity and an expansion of job opportunities.

It reiterated the AFL-CIO's call for government action to "push" the economy into more rapid growth through a tax cut concentrated where it will spur purchasing power, plus expansion of public works, manpower training and area redevelopment.

It urged further that the government institute relocation allowances to give workers the incentive to move to available jobs and that it help improve vocational and technical training to encourage young people to enter the labor market only after adequate preparation for a highly automated society.

UN Benefit Concert To Be Held Oct. 21

American performing artists who reflect the nation's musical culture from "Basin Street" to the Metropolitan Opera will appear in the third annual United Nations concert for the benefit of the United States Committee for the United Nations, Oct. 21 in Washington, D. C.

The artists are Louis Armstrong and his concert group; the Martha Graham dancers; Hal Holbrook; the Howard University Choir under the direction of Dean Warner Lawson; the Juilliard Orchestra, conducted by Jean Morel, Eleanor Stever and Richard Tucker.

The sponsoring committee is a nonpartisan, non-profit committee of national organizations to disseminate facts, arouse interest and promote observance of United Nations Day, Oct. 24.

NDP Picks Up 2 Seats in Ontario

Toronto, Ont.—The labor-backed New Democratic Party picked up two additional seats as the Conservatives swept to another victory in Ontario's provincial elections.

The new legislature will have 108 members compared to 98 members in the old, reflecting redistricting based on gains in population.

The New Democrats went from five to seven members. The Conservatives picked up seven seats and will have 78, while the Liberals went from 22 to 23 seats.

Herman Finkelstein, Hatters' Officer, Dies

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Herman S. Finkelstein, for 25 years a vice president of the Hatters, died of cancer at his home here. He was 67.

He left a hat factory as a young man to become an organizer for the union and was secretary and treasurer of Hatters Local 3 for 22 years. He also was a member of the Union Hatters Sick & Benevolent Association and a former member of the Progress Brotherhood Credit Union.

Surviving are his widow, Dotty; two sons, a daughter and four grandchildren.

LABOR'S CAMPAIGN to build the AFL-CIO Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund through voluntary membership contributions is being promoted by this poster and a new pamphlet, "She Was One of Us. . . ." Copies of both the poster and the pamphlet may be obtained without cost by writing the fund, 1200 Fifteenth St. N.W., Washington 5, D. C. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan is chairman of the fund committee.

Air Line Dispatchers Fill 3 Posts

St. Louis—The Air Line Dispatchers, representing the operations control specialists on the nation's airlines, held a two-day "strictly business" convention here, including discussions of flight problems with government and airline officials.

The 750-member union changed its procedures for electing executive board members. Previously the five vice presidents had been elected by geographical regions. This year, for the first time, elections were at-large, by all convention delegates.

George Kinley of Eastern Airlines was named to a full five-year term, and William B. Dunne of United and Charles McIntyre of Mohawk Airlines were elected to fill four-year and two-year vacancies respectively.

The union's two top officers, Pres. Robert E. Commerce and Sec.-Treas. Ernest A. Bressin, were not up for re-election this year.

G. R. Atkinson Dies, Rail Clerks Official

Covington, Ky.—Glenn R. Atkinson, vice president of the Railway Clerks, died suddenly at his home here, just five days before his 62nd birthday.

He had served on the BRC staff since 1927, with interruptions for public service including an assignment as labor attache with the U.S. Embassy in London from 1950-53.

'Moderate' Budget Cost Jumps to $6,268 a Year

New York City—A family of four requires $6,268 a year to maintain a low-to-moderate standard of living here, according to the new "Family Budget Standard" issued by the Community Council of Greater New York.

The 1963 standard represents an 18 percent rise over the $5,325 a year required by the 1955 standard for a family of four.

The updated standard states that a retired elderly couple requires $3,141 a year, compared to $2,535 in 1955. A young couple, both employed, now requires $5,507 compared to $4,563 in 1955. A young unemployed widow with a four-year-old child now needs $2,847 compared to $2,441.

The council, planner and coordinator of the city's health and welfare services, provides the budget yardsticks primarily for the use of city agencies in assessing income adequacy and a family's use of money.

The 1963 standard reflects changes in living habits and takes account of the availability of a greater variety of goods, according to Eleanor T. Lurry, chief of the council's budget standard service.

The new standard includes more meat and other preferred foods, a larger allowance for household operation and higher fuel and utility consumption. The allowance for recreation now provides for a television set.

The cost of living needs are based on prices for October 1962 and include personal taxes, social security, New York State disability insurance, life insurance and occupational expenses. The prices are updated annually.

The Council said the standard helps city agencies to establish a basis for setting fee scales consistent with ability to pay for services rendered by public or voluntary agencies and to determine eligibility for free services.

Firm's Scholarship Honors Union Aide

Cleveland. O.—A college scholarship fund has been established by an employer in memory of a labor leader.

Pres. Paul L. Shapiro of the Lake Auto Radiator Mfg. Co. announced a gift of $500 in tribute to the late Stanley Kwiat, with whom he had negotiated contracts for 12 years.

Kwiat died Aug. 13. He had been for many years on the staff of Reg. Dir. Patrick J. O'Malley of the Auto Workers and was assigned to Amalgamated Local 217. Shapiro said Kwiat was noted for his "high integrity, good manners" and as a "man of his word."

SUPPORT FOR the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation fund-raising drive so it can carry on the work of the "first lady of the world" was urged by Pres. Kennedy at a White House ceremony marking the issuance of a commemorative stamp honoring Mrs. Roosevelt on her 79th birthday. At the left of the President is Postmaster General John Gronouski; at the right, Adlai Stevenson, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and chairman of the foundation. Labor members of the board of trustees present for the ceremony were AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther (behind Stevenson), David Dubinsky (behind Gronouski), Joseph D. Keenan and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, representing Pres. George Meany.

Commemorative Stamp Honors Mrs. Roosevelt

A commemorative postage stamp issued on Eleanor Roosevelt's 79th birthday in a special White House ceremony has opened a month-long observance to carry on the unfinished tasks she "bequeathed to us" through the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

The "memorial month" will end on Nov. 7, the first anniversary of her death, and will be marked by a number of activities to honor the memory of the "first lady of the world."

At a Rose Garden ceremony Pres. Kennedy called on all Americans to support the fund-raising campaign of the foundation "because in that way we will be able to make more real and more present the work which she engaged in" during her life.

Adlai Stevenson, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and chairman of the foundation, said the "major focus" of the program will be in "the field of human rights with which she was so long identified and where the useful and the necessary work to be done will be limited only by the funds that we can raise to do it."

"Her memory will endure and her work must go on."

The AFL-CIO is strongly supporting the foundation and four of its leaders serve on the board of trustees—Pres. George Meany and Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, Joseph D. Keenan and David Dubinsky. A special AFL-CIO Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund has been created with Keenan as chairman to urge every union member to contribute an hour's pay or $1 to the foundation.

Postmaster General John Gronouski said the new stamp "will once again bring Mrs. Roosevelt's image into millions of American homes, which her spirit has never left."

Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), Mrs. Roosevelt's son, speaking for the Roosevelt family, recalled the interest of his father, Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in stamps and stamp collecting. He commented:

"If he happened to be here today, don't you think a little thought would have passed through his mind and that he might have taken mother by the hand and said, 'Just think of all the people who are going to lick you?' "

FTC Crackdown Hits Racket 'Labor Digest'

The Federal Trade Commission has cracked down on Labor Digest magazine, ordering the self-styled "labor publication" to stop claiming union endorsement and to cease using "threats" to obtain advertising from business firms.

The AFL-CIO Intl. Labor Press Association, which wages a continuing campaign against "racket" publications, first called the FTC's attention to the Labor Digest operation.

After an investigation, the government charged that the New York City publication had sought to sell advertising by falsely claiming on various occasions that it was published or endorsed by the AFL-CIO or affiliated unions.

Furthermore, the FTC complaint said, the publication's representatives "threatened, directly or by implication, that if business concerns did not purchase such space their products would receive unfavorable treatment by union members."

Labor's Digest also was charged by the FTC with having "engaged in the unfair and deceptive" practice of running advertisements without authorization and then trying to bill the companies for the cost.

All of these techniques, ILPA Pres. Bernard R. Mullady said, are typical of "racket sheets" which the ILPA has exposed or helped prosecute over the years.

The FTC's final order, which the Labor Digest did not contest, directed the company to "cease and desist" from the practices itemized in the complaint.

Named in the order were Ernest J. Modarelli and Harry B. Simon, identified as officers of the publishing firm; Charles Cole, listed as editor; Alex Adler, identified as office manager, and Ralph J. De Meo, described as a former officer of Labor Digest.

Unions Urge U.S. Shipping For Wheat

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. has urged members of the Senate Commerce Committee to support a resolution introduced by Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) providing that at least half the cargoes of American wheat sold to the Soviet Union be carried on U.S.-Flag vessels.

Scott's resolution, which was referred to the committee, called attention to the depressed state of the American maritime industry and to a declaration by Pres. Kennedy that wheat sold to the Soviet Union "will be carried in available American ships, supplemented by ships of other countries."

Pres. Paul Hall and Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the Maritime Trades Dept., in telegrams to Commerce Committee members, also expressed agreement with another provision of the Scott resolution "that the ships which have engaged in transportation of cargoes to Cuba since Jan. 1, 1963, be barred from participation in the delivery of such wheat."

The telegrams warned that unless the policy was fixed by law, the Soviet Union might try to trim costs in the wheat deal by arranging for shipment on foreign-flag vessels "that can offer cut rates because of the miserably low standards inflicted upon their crews and because they escape paying high American income taxes."

Machinists Chosen By Treasury Group

The Machinists have won exclusive recognition as bargaining representative of more than 1,500 non-craft employes of the Treasury Dept.'s Bureau of Engraving & Printing. In a representation election, 995 out of 1,275 employes voting cast ballots for IAM Lodge 174.

Pocketbook Workers Urge End of Tax

New York—Pocketbook workers here have asked New York congressmen to press for elimination of the 10 percent excise tax on ladies handbags and action to limit imports which their union contend threatens thousands of jobs in the industry. The appeal was made by Local 1 of the Leather Goods, Plastic & Novelty Workers.

Schnitzler on Grievances:

Organize to Win, U. S. Women Told

A male member of the President's Commission on the Status of Women—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler—has called on American women to "get themselves organized" to fight against "the grievances and abuses" that beset them.

Paid maternity leave, improved education and counseling facilities, employment in more responsible positions are only a few of the benefits women can realize in the future, Schnitzler declared in an interview on the Mutual radio network program, Labor News Conference, produced by the AFL-CIO.

To achieve these benefits, however, the nation's women must join forces and demand action on the recommendations of the commission, Schnitzler said.

"The women have got to get in the forefront and push for the elimination of their grievances," he declared, noting that there are some 50 million women in the nation who are members of organizations which could eliminate the "pockets of resistence against equality for women across the country."

Schnitzler predicted that the 5th constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO in New York next month would give the commission's recommendations close examination and would make many of them part of the federation's legislative program.

In response to questions from Bonnie Angelo of Newhouse Newspapers and William Eaton of United Press Intl., he repeated the commission's emphasis on the need for "drastic" revision of the U.S. approach to adult education to help working women and housewives maintain their skills and improve their capabilities.

A major problem confronting American women, he observed, is the loss of job skills by those who leave the labor force and then return after a long period as homemakers.

Return to 'Menial' Work

"When they are ready to go back to work they have to start at the lowest menial type of work," Schnitzler said.

Schnitzler singled out maternity leave as an example of the benefits women could achieve for themselves through organization. Noting that 70 countries already provide such benefits for their working women, he said "it is time we learned something" from the nations the United States has been helping.

A start toward widespread paid maternity leave has been made by a number of unions, he observed. Some of them have negotiated from two to four weeks pay during maternity periods, and others have made a minimum beginning through the accrual of vacation credits during maternity periods.

Schnitzler suggested that critics who argue that there are already too many women in the labor movement are trying "to turn the clock back."

Higher Social Security Proposed for Widows

Broad changes in the social security and tax laws are needed to provide income security for most American women, the President's Commission on the Status of Women said in its report to Pres. Kennedy.

A major recommendation of the commission was that social security retirement benefits for a widow should match the amount her husband would have received at the same age, had he lived.

The commission said it was aware that such a provision would cost as much as one-fourth of 1 percent of taxable payrolls, but declared that it would "mitigate existing dependency" and "should be approached as rapidly as may be financially feasible."

The commission's report noted that a widow now becomes eligible at age 62 for a social security retirement benefit equal to 82.5 percent of her husband's primary benefit and that the average benefit of such widows is $66 a month as against $76 a month for all retired workers.

"An aged widow should not have to live on less than her husband would receive if he survived her," the commission declared.

It also urged consideration under the social security laws for dependents, other than parents, of unmarried working women and men.

Insurance Needs Listed

In the area of unemployment insurance, it noted that most of the remaining uncovered groups of workers are composed largely of women, and urged the states to correct this by extending the system to cover workers employed by small firms, non-profit organizations, and state and local governments, plus at least some household and agricultural workers.

It also urged that unemployment compensation be made available to women, or to any persons seeking work, who are temporarily jobless because of a family move. Such benefits, the report said, need not be charged to a former employer's account but should come out of the state's general unemployment fund.

It suggested, too, that the lack of paid maternity leave for most American working women is "one of the major remaining gaps in the protection of workers against loss of income." It urged employers, unions and governments to explore the best means of providing maternity leave payments or comparable insurance benefits.

The governments of about 70 other countries already provide such protection for their working women, the report pointed out.

Another section of the report called attention to the federal income tax limitation of $5,100 on a couple's income, above which a working woman may not claim a deduction for child care expenses.

Other Changes Needed

This limitation was imposed in 1954 when the median income of working couples was $5,336, the commission observed, but that median had risen to $7,188 by 1961, and the tax law ceiling should be increased accordingly.

The commission further urged that child-care deductions be allowed for children beyond the first, that the 11-year age limit on children subject to deduction be raised and that child-care deductions be permitted where the wife is institutionalized or otherwise incapacitated.

Nation Called to Act on Women's Rights

Economic Lag Seen Holding Back Gains

(Continued from Page 1)

designate an inter-departmental committee, consisting of heads of appropriate agencies under the chairmanship of a cabinet member, to follow through on the recommendations set forth. It also urged establishment of a citizens committee to advise the government group and evaluate its progress.

Pervading the report was the recognition that in many areas progress for women hinges on progress for society as a whole.

Regarding employment, for example, it cited a warning by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz that "there is not going to be much in the way of expanding opportunities for women unless we are ready and able to assure the jobs which the economy as a whole requires."

Because women make up a large number of the workers now exempt from federal minimum wage and maximum hours laws, the commission urged that this legislation be extended to include work in hotels, motels, restaurants, laundries, additional retail establishments, agriculture and non-profit organizations. It called, further, for enactment or strengthening of state laws setting floors on wages and ceilings on hours to complement the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act.

And because women in employment not subject to federal jurisdiction, in many cases, have no legal protection from anti-union employers, the report urged that state laws "protect the right of all workers to join unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively."

In the field of education, the commission declared that "nothing it can recommend to meet the special needs of women is of greater importance than improvement in the quality of early education available to all of the nation's youth."

It urged local, state and federal governments, private groups and foundations to provide the financial support needed for a "drastic" revision of adult education to help prepare today's women for the "three decades of life after 40 when she will be relatively free to use her abilities and will wish to use them as constructively and as interestingly as possible."

This, the report said, should include "vocational training adapted to the nation's growing requirement for skilled and highly educated manpower."

The report laid heavy stress on "the oppressive dual burden" on the 7 million non-white women and girls. It declared that in too many Negro families, lack of opportunity for men as well as women, linked to racial discrimination "has forced the women to assume too large a share of the family responsibility." These women, it said "are twice as likely to have to seek employment while they have preschool children at home."

Discrimination based on color," the report asserted, "is morally wrong and a source of national weakness."

The commission rejected proposals for an equal rights amendment to the U.S. Constitution on behalf of women, declaring that the principle of equality already is embodied in both the 5th and the 14th amendments.

It called on interested groups, however, to bring test cases through the federal courts to fight certain "laws and pratices which discriminate against women" and seek an "early and definite court pronouncement, particularly by the U.S. Supreme Court."

Other major recommendations of the commission included:

- Maintenance of high-standard child-care facilities for the benefit of children, working mothers and society, with costs met by fees adjusted to parents' ability to pay, contributions from voluntary agencies, and public appropriations.
- An increase in the income limitations for working mothers claiming tax deductions for child care, and additional deductions for children beyond the first.
- "The imaginative and prudent use" of part-time employment by the federal services, especially among the "many able women, including highly trained professionals, who are not free for full-time employment."
- Establishment of state laws setting forth the principle of equal pay for comparable work, similar to the federal Equal Pay Law of 1963.
- Amendment of the social security laws to permit a widow to receive the same amount in retirement benefits that her husband would have received at the same age had he lived.
- Extension of the unemployment insurance system to include small business, non-profit organizations and at least some household workers and agricultural workers.
- Provision of paid maternity leave or comparable insurance benefits for women workers. Employers, unions and governments were urged to explore the best means of accomplishing this purpose.
- Leadership by the United States, particularly in the United Nations, in formulating international agreements "to improve the status of women throughout the world."
- Elimination of laws which impose legal disabilities on women, especially in the areas of family law and personal and property rights of married women.

LEGACY FROM MRS. ROOSEVELT, the report of the President's Commission on the Status of Women is presented to Pres. Kennedy by Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson, right, the commission's executive vice chairman. Also taking part in the White House ceremony were, from the left, Dr. Richard A. Lester of Princeton University, vice chairman of the commission; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges and Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson. Lester and Mrs. Peterson provided leadership to the commission following the death of Mrs. Roosevelt, its first and only chairman.

Surveys Show Women's Incomes Average 60 Percent of Men's Pay

The average income of full-time women workers in the United States is only 60 percent of the average pay for male workers, largely because women are clustered in low-paying occupations.

Even when women and men work in the same jobs, the earnings of women are markedly lower, with one survey of 1,900 companies revealing that a third of the firms had dual pay scales for similar office jobs.

These are among the key findings of the President's Commission on the Status of Women in the section of its report dealing with women in employment.

It noted that employers offer many reasons for giving different treatment to women workers, arguing that they represent higher non-wage costs because of their rates of absenteeism, sickness and turnover, that men prefer to work for men, that protective legislation applying to women workers disrupts work schedules.

The commission observed, however, that available statistics on absenteeism and turnover show that factors such as the level of skill of the job, the individual's age, length of service and record of job stability, "all are much more relevant than the fact that the worker is a man or a woman."

Qualifications Stressed

It urged private employers to disregard general attitudes when hiring women and, instead, concentrate on the individual applicant's job qualifications.

The commission noted that at its suggestion, the U.S. Employment Service already has instructed its offices in the states to base referrals solely on qualifications, regardless of sex, and to ask employers using USES to specify sex only where genuinely warranted.

Executive Order Asked

"Equal opportunity for women in hiring, training and promotion should be the governing principle in private employment," the commission declared. "An executive order should state this principle and advance its application to work done under federal contracts."

This would affect only about 20 percent of the 24 million women workers in the country, however, and without supplying a blueprint, the report suggested that additional action be taken to encourage other employers to follow the federal policy of nondiscrimination.

The report noted that the role of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity could be expanded to cover job discrimination based on sex as well as on race, creed, color or national origin, but it suggested the problems involved were "sufficiently different" to make separate treatment preferable.

In another section of its report, the commission noted that 24 states now have equal pay laws and that 19 years of effort by many groups and individuals had culminated in the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which amended the Fair Labor Standards Act to require equal pay for equal work in jobs covered by the law.

Nevertheless, more than half the states still do not have equal pay legislation on their books and an estimated 6 million women workers are in occupations not covered by the federal law.

For those reasons, the commission recommended that equal pay laws be enacted in all states and that the coverage of the FSLA be extended to many of the jobs still exempt.

Many Earn Under $1

It noted, for example, that many women are employed by hotels, motels, restaurants and laundries and that surveys have shown that large percentages of them are earning less than $1 an hour. In one city, chambermaids average 46 cents an hour and in another dishwashers get 48 cents an hour, the report said.

In addition, it went on, "state laws should protect the right of all workers to join unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively." This recommendation is particularly important to low-paid women in work solely under state jurisdiction, the commission said, since the risk of possible loss of earnings has made them difficult to organize. Yet their employers are under no legal obligation to bargain or refrain from anti-union activities, including discharge.

The commission also observed that excessive hours for women are best discouraged by requiring premium pay for work beyond 40 hours a week or 8 hours a day. Until that goal is achieved, however, "states should maintain and strengthen maximum hours laws, permitting safeguarded flexibility when genuinely needed."

WOMEN'S EARNINGS ARE LESS THAN MEN'S AND.....

Sources: U.S. Bureau of the Census
U.S. Dept. of Labor

HOURLY PAY IN RETAIL TRADE ILLUSTRATES WHY

Hears Attorney General:

House Group Seeks 2-Party Rights Bill

The House Judiciary Committee began a new effort to hammer out a bipartisan civil rights bill after a plea by Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy for Republican support of major Administration proposals and for Democratic concessions to win GOP votes considered essential to passage.

Key committee Republicans had indicated dissatisfaction with a subcommittee bill, strongly supported by civil rights groups, which went beyond White House recommendations. The subcommittee had broadened the proposed ban on discrimination in establishments serving the public to cover virtually every type of business, made civil rights voting guarantees applicable to state as well as federal elections, and added a section authorizing the Justice Dept. to seek court injunctions to prohibit denial of any constiutional or legal rights.

It also included a fair employment provision endorsed by the Administration but not part of the White House omnibus bill. The AFL-CIO has urged the equal job opportunity guarantee as a keystone to civil rights progress.

Kennedy told the committee that he feels "most strongly that action should be taken now with respect to fair employment practices." He expressed the hope that the omnibus civil rights bill will include this provision, but said in effect that the decision is up to the Republicans.

Whether an FEP provision would make it more difficult to get the omnibus bill through the Rules Committee or "jeopardize ultimate passage," Kennedy said, "obviously depends upon the bipartisan support which a fair employment practices provision can secure in this committee, in the Rules Committee, and on the floor of the House."

The Administration, he declared, will support a fair employment measure either as part of the committee bill, as an amendment to be offered on the House floor or as separate legislation.

Kennedy's appeal for modifying the bill to attract more GOP votes was endorsed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of both the full Judiciary Committee and the subcommittee which wrote the stronger bill. He declared that the "urgency" for enacting legislation this year "is so strong that I intend to put aside my own feelings with respect to the desirability of provisions in addition to those recommended by the Administration."

While the subcommittee bill had a sprinkling of GOP support, the committee's ranking Republican, Rep. William M. McCulloch (O.) had criticized it as too sweeping and called for "compromise" and "moderation."

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate passed, 69-11, a bill to strengthen the federal role in keeping the nation's water supply free of pollution. It establishes a new Federal Water Pollution Control Administration under the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, increases grants authorized for municipal sewage treatment facilities and sets up a research program to seek an answer to contamination by detergents which don't dissolve under normal sewage treatment.
- A controversial amendment designed to force a court test of the constitutionality of federal grants and loans for academic facilities of colleges operated by religious groups was added to the college aid bill by a Senate vote of 45-33.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), manager of the college aid bill, warned that the amendment could result in a deadlock with the House, which rejected a less restrictive amendment in passing its version of the bill. A final Senate vote on the measure was put off until Oct. 21. Meanwhile a House-Senate conference on the vocational education bill was temporarily blocked by a Republican objector in the House. This requires Rules Committee clearance for appointment of conferees.

- The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee began closed door consideration of an omnibus bill including pay raises for federal employes, for top government executives including Cabinet members, and for House members and senators.
- Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon urged the Senate Finance Committee to approve the House-passed tax cut bill with a capital gains tax change. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was scheduled to testify Oct. 24.

SPONSOR of a bill to extend the federal government's accelerated public works program, Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), right, confers with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller prior to Meany's testimony in support of the measure before the House Public Works Committee.

DEDICATION of new classroom facilities for the American Institute for Free Labor Development drew some 200 labor, government and business representatives. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who is also president of the AIFLD, is shown addressing the group. Others are, from the left, Serafino Romualdi, executive director of the institute; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, institute secretary-treasurer; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Rep. John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), speaker of the House.

City Mayors Join In Works Plea

The U.S. Conference of Mayors has urged Congress to extend the accelerated public works program, declaring that it has brought "many immediate benefits to hundreds of communities" and the nation.

Mayor Joseph Barr of Pittsburgh, chairman of the conference, told the House Public Works Committee that the federal matching-grant program has not been "spending for spending's sake" but spending for necessity.

Free Labor Institute Dedicates New Center

The American Institute for Free Labor Development dedicated new classrooms in Washington before a gathering of some 200 representatives of labor, business and government.

In welcomning the guests, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed the hope that the building, leased from Johns Hopkins University, would become the "permanent home" of the institute. After next Jan. 1, he said, it will serve as a "post-graduate" center for Latin American trade unionists taking part in the AIFLD courses. By then, he added, most of the institute's students would be getting their basic AIFLD training at a number of Latin American centers.

Meany noted that the institute had been established jointly by the AFL-CIO and representatives of American industry who recognized that "it is in their best interests" to contribute to the development of trade union democracy in the Western Hemisphere.

The purpose of the institute is to help democratic trade unions in the Latin American countries and to impart the idea "of what trade unions can do in building a democracy," he emphasized.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who pledged the cooperation of the Kennedy Administration in helping the institute meet its goals, described it as "one of the great germinal sources in the Western Hemisphere today." The new quarters, he suggested, represent a "bridge" between the North and South American continents.

The building taken over by the institute formerly housed the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, which has moved to new facilities.

Ambassadors of a number of Latin American countries were present for the dedication, along with the 31 members of the institute's fifth three-month training course, the last basic program to be given in Washington.

Taking part in the fifth course are 10 students from Mexico, four from Colombia, four from Peru, two from Venezuela, two from El Salvador, three from Honduras, two from Costa Rica, one from the Dominican Republic, one from Panama, and two in exile from Paraguay.

10-19-63

Meany Asks Extension Of Public Works Plan

(Continued from Page 1)

tinuing and serious problem of unemployment. Additional measures are needed, such as extension and strengthening of the job-creating Public Works Acceleration Act."

Meany strongly supported the objectives of a bill by Rep. John A. Blatnik which would extend the present program of short-term public works in areas of heavy unemployment and authorize an additional $900 million in federal matching funds. Meany told the committee that the need and the proven value of the program justifies a new $2 billion authorization.

"The plain fact is that there has been no meaningful improvement in the job picture," he declared.

Four million new jobs a year must be created in order to reduce the present high level of unemployment, provide for a growing labor force and offset the jobs lost through increased productivity, Meany told the committee.

The effect of a tax cut alone would meet only about half this need, Meany indicated.

The tax slash would prevent "a recession and rising unemployment" next year, he said. But it would bring only "a modest improvement" in the job picture. A public works program "continues to be indispensable."

Meany noted that the existing program, financed by $850 million in federal appropriations, had already provided more than 100,000 on-site and off-site jobs as of last September, with the total expected to pass the 200,000 mark before the program expires.

It has resulted, he said, in 8,000 job-creating projects "of enduring value" in more than 3,000 communities "where unemployment is most severe." It has enriched communities with new public buildings and libraries, helped create the basis for industrial growth through water supply, waste treatment and sewer developments, and provided "long-needed health and recreation facilities," Meany pointed out.

The AFL-CIO's proposed program, Meany said, including $1 billion in local matching funds, would create "approximately 300,000 badly needed jobs" directly and another 150,000 to 300,000 generated by the increased purchasing power.

In reply to questions from committee members, Meany said he didn't dispute the argument that job-creating investments by private industry would be a more permanent stimulus to the economy than government spending, but emphasized: "We've got to look to the government" because the private sector of the economy is "not" generating the jobs needed.

If the intent of Congress is to reduce government expenditures to an amount equal to the tax bill, "then we should forget the tax cut," Meany said. The two steps would "cancel each other out," he said.

Until recent years, Meany noted, productivity advances have resulted in wider markets and economic expansion. In today's era, he said, it has meant producing more with fewer workers.

Meany warned that this could lead to a "vicious cycle" in which "unemployment feeds upon unemployment" until it leads the nation into a depression.

"A very sobering statement," Blatnik, the acting committee chairman, observed, pointing up "the need to do something now."

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Oct. 26, 1963 | No. 43

Quick Tax Action Pressed To Forestall '64 Recession

Bipartisan Bill Sought On Rights

The Administration stepped up its efforts to win a bipartisan commitment to support Pres. Kennedy's civil rights package, warning both Democrats and Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee that approval of a broader subcommittee measure would endanger the bill in the House Rules Committee and on the House floor.

After a White House meeting with the President, attended by House Democratic and Republican leaders, Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) postponed, for the second time, a scheduled "showdown meeting" of his committee. Previously a committee majority appeared ready to vote immediate approval of the subcommittee bill. The meeting was reset for Oct. 29.

Others at the White House meeting were Speaker John W. McCormack (Mass.), Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.), and, for the Republicans, GOP Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.), Assistant Leader Leslie C. Arends (Ill.), and William M. McCulloch (Ohio), ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee.

Celler has said that he personally favors most of the additions made by the subcommittee to the Administration's rights program, but agrees with the President that it risks defeat.

Complicating the committee nose-count was uncertainty as to the strategy planned by southern opponents of any civil rights bill. One committee southerner, Rep. Basil L. Whitener (D-N.C.), told

(Continued on Page 12)

$250,000 CHECK to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, earns a founder's scroll for the Ladies' Garment Workers. ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky (left) is shown accepting the scroll from Adlai Stevenson, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and foundation chairman, at a dinner meeting of the foundation's trustees in New York. The check represents contributions from ILGWU members ranging from $1 to an hour's pay as part of the AFL-CIO Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund drive. (See other picture, page 12.)

Strong Bill Urged On Senate Panel

Prompt passage of a tax cut geared to create "badly-needed jobs" is essential to prevent "recession and rising unemployment" in 1964, the AFL-CIO has again told Congress.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called on the Senate Finance Committee to strengthen, not weaken, the House-passed tax bill.

Unemployment is still the nation's "number one problem," he declared. "Drastic action" to stimulate the economy is "long overdue."

Biemiller said the effectiveness of the House-passed bill would be improved by shifting a larger share of the tax cut to low-income and middle-income families who will "most surely spend" their extra money, thus "lifting sales, production and employment."

The AFL-CIO, he said, is under "no illusion" that a tax cut alone will solve all problems of an economy too sluggish to provide jobs for those now unemployed, for a growing labor force, and for workers facing technological displacement.

Other measures are needed, Biemiller said, including public works acceleration. But a "substantial tax cut is one of the most hopeful steps we now can take to quickly boost sales and jobs," he added.

The House-passed bill "would do much that is desirable" but "important improvements" can be made without additional revenue loss to the Treasury, he declared.

Proposals Offered

He listed these specific suggestions:

- Increasing the minimum standard deduction for persons who do not itemize their tax returns. Under the House bill, this would be $300 plus $100 for each dependent; the AFL-CIO asked that it be raised to $400 plus $200 for each dependent.
- Dividing the existing lowest tax bracket (now taxed at a 20 percent rate) into two, with the lowest

(Continued on Page 12)

Apprentice Proposals Modified

By John Barry

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has announced revision of proposed new standards and compliance procedures aimed at assuring equal opportunity in the federal apprenticeship system.

Wirtz's proposals represent modification of standards originally issued last July and provide that federal certification of an apprenticeship program be withheld unless it meets the following criteria:

- "The selection of apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone, in accordance with objective standards which permit review after full and fair opportunity for application, unless the selections otherwise made would themselves demonstrate that there is equality of opportunity.
- "The taking of whatever steps are necessary, in acting upon application lists developed prior to this time, to remove the effects of previous practices under which discriminatory patterns of employment may have resulted.
- "Non-discrimination in all phases of apprenticeship and employment during apprenticeship after selections are made."

The new standards were issued in accordance with a June 4 directive from Pres. Kennedy

(Continued on Page 11)

Goldwater Slash Beaten:

Senate Votes 60-19 For College Aid Bill

The Senate voted 60-19 for a five year, $1.9 billion program of federal grants and loans to help colleges build more classrooms, laboratories and libraries.

An attempt by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) to chop the program in half by cutting out all grants was roundly defeated, 53-21. Goldwater was supported by only seven of his fellow Republicans, while 17 GOP senators opposed his amendment.

The dollar amount of the Senate bill did not differ greatly from the totals in the bill approved by the House in mid-August. Other differences between the House and Senate versions, however, could delay—an conceiveably block—a House-Senate conference agreement.

Appointment of conferees, normally a routine procedure, was held up temporarily in the House by a Republican objection. However the Rules Committee, on the following day, cleared the way for conferences on both the college aid bill and a labor-backed vocational education bill which had been similarly delayed.

The most controversial difference is a Senate amendment designed to invite a court test of the constitutionality of federal aid to colleges operated by religious groups.

This provision, sponsored by Senators Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N. C.), and John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.), authorizes any taxpayer to sue in federal court to block allocation of funds on constitutional grounds. It would require that the money be held up until the issue is

(Continued on Page 12)

Symphony Wins Raises, Opens Season

National Symphony Orchestra musicians, relying on pledges of support by the Washington community, the Kennedy Administration and their union, called off a contract dispute with the symphony management and started the concert season on time.

When Music Dir. Howard Mitchell raised his baton Oct. 22 to start the season before a packed house in Constitution Hall, all 96 players were present. A week earlier, chances of saving the season or starting on time seemed dim.

"We didn't get all we wanted," said a union spokesman, "but now we know the community is behind us."

What they got was a minimum

(Continued on Page 2)

Four AFL-CIO Affiliates Granted Rights at Norfolk Naval Shipyard

Portsmouth, Va.—Four AFL-CIO affiliates have been granted exclusive bargaining recognition among some 10,000 federal employes at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard here.

Biggest segment of the group consists of 7,738 blue collar employes for whom the 5th Naval Dist. Metal Trades Council was recognized as bargaining agent.

Other unions granted exclusive recognition, in accordance with Pres. Kennedy's executive order spelling out the collective bargaining rights of federal workers, include Government Employes Lodge 22, representing clerical workers; Technical Engineers Local 1, representing engineers, and the Pattern Makers League, representing pattern makers.

Recognition of the four groups represented a victory for employe organizations at this largest of all Naval repair shipyards. They were forced into a lengthy arbitration to reverse the Navy's position that yard employes should be represented in a single unit. Arbitrator George S. Ives, son of the late Sen. Irving M. Ives (R-N. Y.), cited precedents set by the National Labor Relations Board in his ruling upholding the four union groups.

Pres. George P. Knecht, of the local Metal Trades Council said the letter from Rear Adm. James M. Farrin, commanding officer of the shipyard, awarding exclusive recognition was the "culmination of a year of good hard work."

Negotiations are expected to begin before the end of the year.

The campaign for bargaining rights was coordinated by AFL-

(Continued on Page 3)

PRESIDENT OF BOLIVIA, Victor Paz Estenssoro, was welcomed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other federation officers on a visit to the AFL-CIO building. At left is AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan. At right, next to Pres. Paz, is the U.S. Ambassador to Bolivia, Ben Stephansky.

Bush Killing Verdict Denounced by Labor

Kapuskasing, Ont.—The Lumber & Sawmill Workers have called for a Royal Commission investigation of court actions growing out of the fatal shooting of three union members during a strike early this year against the Spruce Falls Power & Paper Co.

Three of the 20 farmer-settlers arrested for non-capital murder following the shooting recently were fined $100 each on the lesser charge of possessing an offensive weapon after a grand jury found no basis for prosecuting the group for murder.

Earlier, 138 members of the union, a division of the Carpenters, were fined $200 each on charges of unlawful assembly in the biggest mass trial in Canadian history.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress termed the disparity in penalties "outrageous" and supported the union's demand for an investigation.

The strike was called last January when Spruce Falls and an associated firm, Kimberly-Clark Canada, Ltd., refused to go along with a 40-hour week pattern negotiated by the union with the Abitibi Power & Paper Co.

When the strike was a month old, it flared into a pitched battle between the unarmed strikers and the non-union settlers at the wilderness hamlet of Reesor Siding. The settlers, who had continued to stockpile pulpwood for shipment to the mill, opened fire with rifles, shotguns and small arms, shooting indiscriminately into the assembled pickets, killing three and wounding nine.

The strike was settled shortly thereafter with an agreement to submit all issues to arbitration.

In the aftermath, the Lumber & Sawmill Workers accused the Ontario Dept. of Labor of failure to bring the full force of its conciliation powers to bear on the dispute, charged the Dept. of Lands & Forests with ignoring "full-scale bootlegging" of timber-cutting permits in the northern reaches of the province, and denounced the provincial police for failing to conduct a thorough investigation of the circumstances surrounding the shooting incident.

Joseph Laforce, president of the union's Local 2995, declared that "if the province wants to clear up this whole dirty mess, a Royal Commission should be appointed to get to the bottom of everything on both sides."

Symphony Wins Raises, Cabinet-Level Backing

(Continued from Page 1)

wage of $147.50 a week the first year of a three-year agreement and a reopener on wages and length of season on next Mar. 2, if the union requests it. Also assured was a 32-week season this year, 34 weeks the next two years with raises of $6.25 or more in 1964, $7.50 or more in 1965.

What they wanted—and boycotted rehearsals for a week to get—was at least 33 weeks of work a year and a minimum wage of $6,000 so members would not have to "moonlight" by taking supplementary jobs as salesmen and cab drivers.

The key that unlocked the dispute was a pledge by Pres. Kennedy's adviser on District of Columbia affairs, Charles A. Horsky, and a Cabinet-congressional committee headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, that they will sparkplug enough support pledges before next spring to give musicians a decent contract for the first time in 33 years.

Besides the promises of support, Horsky got pledges of cash —$100,000 a year for three years for five weeks of Music for Young America concerts; and a pledge by an unidentified out-of-town donor to provide an extra $2.50 a week for players' salaries this year.

The $100,000 pledge came from Mrs. Herbert A. May, first vice president of the Symphony Association, who has financed children's free concerts for eight years. This year, to meet the emergency, she made her pledge for three years instead of one, and in October instead of later in the season.

The musicians expressed appreciation to all who helped break the stalemate, including Horsky and Henry Kaiser, AFM counsel. Sec. J. Martin Emerson of AFM Local 161 summed it up as follows:

"The musicians have agreed to work for wages and conditions less than those they reasonably demanded because they wanted, first to preserve the National Symphony, second to show their responsibility to the community."

Last season the players worked for $140 a week, Emerson said. He observed that Congress could play a part in the symphony's future by passing a bill, among a number of those introduced, to give the orchestra an annual grant of at least $75,000.

Union Gets Hearing:

Trustees' Inquiry Plan Ends Arkansas University Strike

Fayetteville, Ark.—Striking maintenance and other non-professional employes of the University of Arkansas, with strong public opinion backing them, returned to work here after winning assurances of an investigation of their wages and working conditions by the university trustees.

Gov. Orval E. Faubus asked them to return for 30 days pending the outcome of an inquiry by three board members. A condition of the governor's appeal was that all strikers must be taken back to their jobs, without prejudice, including some who had been "fired."

University Pres. David W. Mullins had refused to recognize the employes' union, or even to meet with them. About 75 members of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 965 went on strike on Oct. 4 and were joined by about 125 employes who were not members of the union.

The executive committee of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO met at Little Rock on Oct. 12 and issued a vigorous appeal backing the union and urging Faubus to use his influence to produce a settlement of the issue.

The strikers' cause was also supported by religious, student and faculty groups. Four religious groups issued statements calling for recognition of the union, and both the Young Democrats and the Young Republicans on the campus backed recognition demands. More than 40 professors signed a statement supporting the strikers, and a number made cash contributions. The Arkansas Association of University Professors put discussion of the strike on the agenda for a meeting late this month.

Mullins, the university president, had steadily declared that state law forbids recognition of the union by the school. Labor officials were unable to find any support for his argument.

The three-member trustees' group promptly arranged to meet with union Pres. Rex Rice and the local's attorney.

In the background of the strike was the fact that university employes had been forced to work as long as 14 hours a day though receiving pay for fewer hours, a violation of Arkansas state laws.

State Labor Commissioner Bill Laney acknowledged to members of the State AFL-CIO executive committee that violations had been found at the university, and that an investigation of conditions was continuing.

University employes tried as individuals for months to get something done about their grievances and finally organized their union about a year ago. Officials immediately refused to meet with them, instead setting up meetings to advise workers against joining. Employes were told that it was "against the rules" to collect and pay dues and warned that they were not to talk about the union on the job, during their lunch hours, or "at any other time," under threat of being fired.

State AFL-CIO Pres. George Ellison met with a university vice president in an attempt to avert the strike, but his appeal was ignored by Mullins. Ellison said the strike was called as "a last resort."

The university obtained an injunction against picketing, but failed to get the employes back to work.

The strike was under the direction of SCME Intl. Rep. John Hale. Strong assistance was given by Pres. Robert Parker, of Food Handlers & Meat Cutters Local 425, the largest local union in the state, who is also president of the Northwest Arkansas Labor Council and a member of the executive committee of the State AFL-CIO.

Organizers Welcomed —At Last—in Hartwell

Hartwell, Ga.—Things were different when union organizers came here Oct. 21 to handbill the plant of the Monroe Shock Absorber Co.

With police of four jurisdictions parked nearby, organizers—who had been attacked in July and last spring by a howling mob from inside the plant—got a friendly reception this time.

Several workers welcomed the union men, asking them to "stick with us" and saying "we need a union." The visitors included Richard Mooney, assistant to Auto Workers' Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse; Organizational Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Sec.-Treas. John Chupka of the Textile Workers' Union of America; and Jim Pierce, IUD Carolinas' coordinator.

It was the third IUD visit to the plant here. On the two previous occasions, mobs of workers poured out of the plant gates on company trucks and fell on the handbillers. In July, Chupka was knocked down with a stick and five other union men were slugged repeatedly and ordered to "get out of town."

Between the second and third visits, officials of the firm, whose headquarters are in Monroe, Mich., agreed in a signed settlement to stop permitting or encouraging similar mob action in future. In a consent order issued by the National Labor Relations Board, the firm agreed to cease and desist from the following actions:

- Permitting and encouraging its employes by mob action during working hours to assault union representatives passing out union organizational leaflets; to seize and burn union leaflets, or to threaten to kill union representatives.
- Interfering with, coercing and restraining its employes in the exercise of their rights to form, join or assist labor organizations . . . and to engage in other concerted activities.

The firm also agreed to post copies of the NLRB order, which was issued by Members Boyd Leedom, John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown.

In the first Hartwell handbilling, the union men were met by a large group of company employes who stripped the organizers of their handbills, threatened them with knives and crowbars, and warned them to "clear out or be killed."

On the second visit, members of the Georgia Highway Patrol and town police stood by and watched another mob "work over" the union spokesmen. The police patrol on the third visit consisted, the union men said, of the state patrol, the county sheriff, the local police chief and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

John H. Conroy Dies in Nashville

Nashville, Tenn.—John Howard Conroy, president of the Nashville Building & Construction Trades Council and business agent of Plumbers Local 352, died after a heart attack at his home here. He was 63.

He helped organize Local 352 as a young plumber, and during the 1930s was chief of the state factory inspection service and city plumbing inspector. He was elected secretary-treasurer of the former State AFL in 1947 and became business agent of his local in 1952, holding the post most of the time since then.

He also was secretary-treasurer of the Tennessee Pipe Trades Association and three weeks before his death was elected a vice president of the Tennessee AFL-CIO. His death was mourned by Matt Lynch, whom he had helped win election as president of the state body, as "a big loss for the (labor) movement here; he was the outstanding labor man in this area."

CERTIFICATE OF MERIT for saving the life of Carl Reiter, business representative of St. Louis Carpenters' District Council, is given to Patrolman Thomas Jenneman by St. Louis Red Cross chapter. Left to right: Jenneman; Police Chief C. H. Brostron; Police Board Pres. H. Sam Priest; Reiter; and Louis H. Antoine, safety services chairman, St. Louis Red Cross. Reiter collapsed June 20 while addressing meeting of Carpenters' Local 185, was revived by mouth-to-mouth resuscitation by the patrolman, trained in Red Cross advanced first aid methods.

At Fitzgerald Mills:

Court Order Sought To Guard Backpay

Fitzgerald, Ga.—The Textile Workers Union of America has asked the National Labor Relations Board to seek an injunction against the Fitzgerald Mills Corp. to safeguard a $250,000 backpay award due 125 workers illegally discharged during a 1959 strike at the cotton mill here.

The union request that the NLRB seek a U.S. District Court order followed these happenings:

- The employer posted notices informing workers that he planned to "run out" work now on hand and then stop production.
- The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review a 2d U.S. Circuit decision of January 1963 holding that Fitzgerald Mills must rehire the illegally fired workers, pay them their lost wages and engage in good-faith bargaining with the TWUA.

In telegrams to NLRB Chairman Frank McCulloch and Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman, TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the union is "gravely concerned at the possibility that assets are being dissipated" and that before the backpay is distributed "the company will be a hollow, judgment-proof shell."

"If the company is acting in good faith, which would be shown by its having established a special reserve to pay the judgment, it should be willing to enter into a consent decree protecting the judgment funds," he said. "If the company is not acting in good faith, an injunction is urgently needed now."

Pollock followed his injunction request with a further plea that if dissipation of the funds has begun, the board prosecute the firm for contempt of court.

The NLRB replied that it believes the corporation is in good financial condition and can meet the backpay award. The TWUA then scheduled a meeting for Oct. 25 between a union committee headed by Regional Dir. M. Michael Botelho and company representatives to work out details.

The $250,000 backpay order by the NLRB late in 1961 hinged on a series of unfair labor practices committed by the firm immediately prior to and during an eight-week strike in the summer of 1959.

The union had had contractual relations with Fitzgerald Mills Corp. starting about 1952, but in 1959 could not agree on renewal terms and voted to strike. The management hired strikebreakers in what the TWUA called a union-busting attempt and refused to restore 300 Fitzgerald workers to their jobs. Charges were filed and have been persistently pressed, the union said, though the firm for the last four years has failed to enter again into a collective bargaining relationship.

A three-man labor board panel, upholding the TWUA charges, ruled in 1961 that company representatives had made no genuine effort to reach agreement, made no concessions before the strike began May 11, 1959, and did not bargain in good faith.

Local management had no real authority to reach a settlement, the board found, but followed telephoned orders of Pres. Floyd W. Jefferson, Jr., in New York City, or Sec.-Treas. Mark M. Horblit in Boston, Mass. The strike, it ruled, was a protested unfair labor practice strike.

EXCLUSIVE RECOGNITION for blue collar workers at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard is granted to the 5th Naval Dist. Metal Trades Council in a letter presented to Council Pres. George P. Knecht, left, by Rear Adm. James M. Farrin, yard commandant. At right is Roy Stober, coordinator for the Metal Trades Council in Portsmouth-Norfolk, Va., area. Three other AFL-CIO unions were recognized as bargaining agents for the balance of the yard's 10,000 civilian workers under the terms of Pres. Kennedy's executive order on federal employes' unions. The entire campaign for recognition was coordinated by AFL-CIO Reg. IV, Oliver Singleton, director.

AFL-CIO Affiliates Win Shipyard Rights

(Continued from Page 1)

CIO Region IV, of which Oliver Singleton is director. Roy Stober is coordinator for the Metal Trades Council in the Portsmouth-Norfolk area.

The award brought to 14,000 the number of blue collar workers represented by the Metal Trades Council in the military complex that dominates the economy of tidewater Virginia. Other installations where representation rights have been acknowledged are the Portsmouth Coast Guard Base, the Public Works Center and the Naval Supply Center in Norfolk.

An election is to be held soon among 280 blue collar workers at the Oceana Naval Air Station, Virginia Beach, and a petition has been filed for a unit of 480 workers at the Naval Amphibious Base, Little Creek.

Affiliates of the council include Fire Fighters Local F-25; Technical Engineers Local 34; Boilermakers Local 57; Asbestos Workers Local 9; Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 272; Sheet Metal Workers Local 393; Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Locals 403 and 734; Painters Local 474; Carpenters Local 1086; Machinists Lodges 441 and 1481; Iron Workers Local 228; Molders Local 278; Operating Engineers Local 922; Upholsterers Local 648 and Hod Carriers Local 649.

Unaffiliated Teachers Set Vote on AFT

New York—The New York Teachers' Union, an unaffiliated local since its expulsion by the American Federation of Teachers 22 years ago, will vote Nov. 15 on an executive board recommendation that remaining members dissolve the local and apply for membership in the United Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO local which won the right to represent all city teachers here two years ago.

The United Federation is chartered as AFT Local 2.

The TU board action was taken at a special meeting Oct. 3 but membership action at a later meeting was deferred when a minority group called for further study.

The board declared in a resolution that, in view of the UFT's success in organizing teachers and winning a two-year contract with the city Board of Education, the "most effective way for union members to carry on the fight for better schools" is to "unite with all other union-minded teachers" in one union.

The ousted teacher local was once the dominant group here but has been replaced by the UFT. It lost its AFT charter on charges of Communist domination in a nationwide union referendum in 1941.

In a 1961 election the teachers chose the UFT as bargaining agent by a vote of 20,045 for the UFT, 2,575 for the expelled group and 9,770 for the Teachers Bargaining Organization, a hastily organized group allied with the National Education Association.

Train Crew Cut Seen Peril to Rail Safety

Rail unions have told the Work Rules Arbitration Board that both safety and efficiency would be sacrificed if railroad management were permitted to reduce the size of train crews.

The board, set up by Congress to rule on two of the key issues in the four-year-old rail work rules dispute—the use of firemen-helpers and the size and composition of the new train crew—wound up its fifth week of hearings. One more week of testimony was scheduled, followed by written rebuttals, before the board sits down to reach its conclusions. Its report is due by Nov. 26.

A union exhibit presented to the seven-member board graphically illustrated the length of a "not uncommon" 250-car freight train as equivalent to 740 automobiles lined up bumper to bumper.

In weight, the train matches 8,500 autos which, end to end, would stretch from Washington to Baltimore. Yet the standard train crew, the unions pointed out, is only five men.

Hearings on the firemen-helper issue were ended as the board moved into the size-of-crew discussion.

The board also must decide between conflicting union and management accounts of areas of agreement reached through negotiations and mediation before the arbitration board was brought into the picture. Congress specifically directed the arbitrators to take these tentative agreements into account.

The attorney for the railroads claimed, in direct contradiction to detailed union testimony, that "as far as I know, we were not in agreement on anything."

Union witnesses testified that differences had been significantly narrowed during the long dispute.

Meat Cutters Locals Set Union Guidelines

Chicago—Sharply expanded union activities financed if necessary by an increase in per capita taxes were recommended here at a meeting of local union representatives called by the Meat Cutters.

Surveying a wide range of union activities in the fields of wage improvement, organizing, civil rights, legislation and job losses due to automation, some 200 delegates made recommendations for the guidance of union officers in the months leading up to the next convention in July 1964.

Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, calling the conference "unusual," said the thinking of rank-and-file representatives would help make the convention "more meaningful and more effective" in dealing with critical problems confronting the union and the nation.

The conference called for:

- A sharp increase in civil rights activity by the union—legislatively, by opposing any watering-down of the civil rights bill reported by the House Judiciary subcommittee; economically, by accelerating present union programs to increase job opportunities for all minorities in industries organized by the Meat Cutters.
- Consideration by the convention of a per capita dues increase to finance expanded organizing activities by the international union. An important goal, they indicated, was improving pay and working conditions among low-wage workers in the food industry.
- Renewed talks with officers of the Packinghouse Workers on possible merger of the two unions and a report to the 1964 convention on the results of the talks.
- Steps to mobilize local union support of legislation in Congress to improve and expand federal food inspection laws, and other programs to protect consumers.

Job losses caused by automation and technological changes were discussed and delegates urged union officers to plan programs which the convention may consider to reduce unemployment, plant removals and shutdowns—a serious hazard to workers in the meat packing industry.

The conference urged maximum effort on behalf of a tax reduction bill which will concentrate tax cuts among lower and middle income groups. Only such a tax bill can increase consumption and provide more jobs, delegates agreed.

The conferees asked the executive officers to keep a close watch on European Common Market developments involving poultry and other food sales and to suggest action to the convention for increasing employment in the food, leather and fur industries through foreign trade.

Norwegian Whalers Win 3.5% Pay Hike

Oslo, Norway—Norwegian seamen who pursue the elusive whale during the current season will find it 3.5 percent more profitable than last year under a new agreement based on proposals by a state mediator.

The contract, between the Seamen's, Engineers and Mates unions and the whaling shipowners, also increases overtime rates by 4 percent and improves holiday pay.

Clothing Store Workers Win Wage Raises

New York—Eight thousand clothing store workers here will receive wage increases of $5 to $10 a week plus improved vacations in new three-year contracts.

The employes, members of three locals of the Clothing Workers, include salesmen, clerical workers and bushelmen—the tailors who adjust off-the-rack clothing to fit the customers' measurements.

Twenty-five hundred bushelmen in ACWA Local 25 received an immediate pay raise of $7 to $10 a week under a contract negotiated by the union's New York Joint Board. The same contract provides an immediate $6 increase for office workers, with an additional $2 in the third year. The office workers will also be brought under the ACWA insurance and welfare program for the first time, with employer payments to finance benefits scheduled to begin Jan. 1.

Both groups will be entitled to a third week of vacation after five years' service, starting in the third year of the contract.

A similar vacation improvement was won by 4,000 salesmen, members of ACWA Local 340, employed in 400 stores in the New York metropolitan area. They will receive $5 weekly raises, retroactive to Sept. 1, and other benefits.

Pact Enforcement Upheld by NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board ruled 4 to 0 that Carpenters Local 1102 had a legal right to enforce its contract with the Planet Corp. by demanding that the Lansing, Mich., firm lay off five workers who privately waived a subsistence allowance called for in a contract between Planet and the union.

Wilbur Baxter, one of the five, filed the charge which the board voted to dismiss. Living in a trailer near a job site, Baxter waived the subsistence allowance. Overruling Trial Examiner Lee Best, the board concluded that the union could properly police and enforce contract provisions "with which, as it honestly believed, Planet and Baxter were failing to comply."

TV Broadcast Set On Murray's Life

A Television film based on the life of Philip Murray will be shown on "The Eternal Light" program over the National Broadcasting network on Nov. 17 at 1:30 p.m. (EST).

The biographical film of the late president of the former CIO is sponsored by the George Meany Foundation, in cooperation with the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Purpose of the foundation, established last year by trade union friends of the AFL-CIO president, is to "further the understanding of the ethical principles by which all moral men live."

The first of the annual film presentations in "the Eternal Light" series was a biography of the late Pres. William Green of the former AFL.

HOLLYWOOD MEETING brings together government officials and Joint Labor-Management Committee on Foreign Film Production in effort to cut trade barriers to U.S.-made films and encourage production in this country. Shown are, from left, Pres. Pat Somerset of the Hollywood AFL Film Council, co-chairman of the committee; David Thomsen of the State Dept.; Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver; Executive Vice Pres. Charles Boren of the Association of Motion Picture Producers, co-chairman of the committee; William Diehl, U.S. Treasury; Richard Conn, assistant to Weaver.

New Approaches Urged In Community Agencies

Philadelphia—A four-point program for improving the work of community service agencies was proposed by AFL-CIO Sec.Treas. William F. Schnitzler in a speech at a Labor-Management Day luncheon during the $14 million United Fund Torch Drive here.

Explaining that trade unionists believe "the only way to live in our community with our fellow man is to join with him in a united effort" to meet common needs, Schnitzler suggested:

- "That your federation resolve to take the lead in a comprehensive, communitywide program for identifying and attacking the community's disorders—the causes of juvenile delinquency, divorce, mental illness, school dropouts and so on.
- "That a year-round United Givers Fund committee be organized, composed of representatives of all health and welfare agencies, public and private, which would be responsible for drafting and carrying out its programs while working closely with the Social Welfare Planning Council.
- "That a conference be held each year on community planning and health and welfare. This conference should be representative of the community as a whole, with all economic and social groups represented.
- "That the conference examine and act upon reports and recommendations of the committee, and have available the same intensive promotional efforts in carrying out its recommendations that are now exerted for fund raising."

The United Givers Fund, on a year-round basis, is the "ideal vehicle" for keeping abreast of change and for planning improvements, Schnitzler said.

"The American labor movement was among the first to support the philosophy of a United Fund as a means of achieving a common goal through more efficient utilization of our resources and elimination of needless administrative costs," he said.

"Here in Philadelphia labor accepts its share of responsibility for meeting the goal. As we do throughout America, we will utilize the machinery of our unions to bring the story of the United Fund to our members."

Schnitzler recalled that last year one-third of the $520 million raised by community chests and united funds in the U.S. came from the 13.5 million union members.

"And I say that," he added, "not as a pitch for an award or a pat on the back, but merely as an explanation of the basic philosophy of the AFL-CIO."

Pres. Norman Blumberg and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Kelley of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO are vice chairmen of the fund-raising campaign.

Schnitzler described as "the bridge between labor and social work" the 155 men and women in 91 cities who as full time AFL-CIO representatives serve as liaison officers between the union movement and social work agencies. In addition, he recalled, more than 60,000 union volunteers work in community service activities.

"We believe the same motivation that makes a man desire to serve his fellow man as a union representative can also be utilized to service his community," he said. "Therefore, whenever union representatives are asked to participate by serving on community service agencies or boards, they will accept.

"And I think you will find they do a good job."

Mental Health Bills Signed By Kennedy

Two "landmark" bills establishing new programs to study, combat and cure mental illness and mental retardation have become law. Both were requested by Pres. Kennedy early this year as part of a "bold new approach" to mental health and quickly won wide support.

Federal grants, ranging from 45 to 75 percent of the cost, are authorized to help construct community mental health centers as part of a $329 million program. It also includes grants for research centers on mental retardation and for the training of teachers for both the mentally and physically handicapped.

Omitted from the bill, however, was an Administration request for $429 million to help with the initial staffing of the new community mental health centers. The Senate approved the program, but the House turned it down in the face of opposition by the GOP Policy Committee and the American Medical Association.

A companion bill, also enacted, authorizes an expanded $355 million program over five to seven years to improve maternal and child health services and to combat mental retardation through prenatal and infant care.

'The Unionism of the 1960s':

Philadelphia Unions Open New Hospital for Members

Philadelphia—Described as one of the world's "most modern" institutions for caring for the ill and the injured, the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Hospital was dedicated with words of hope for the future and words of praise for the vision of its labor sponsors.

On hand were two U.S. senators, Mayor James H. J. Tate of Philadelphia, top officials of several AFL-CIO international unions, the president of the Group Health Association of America, and some 500 proud local well-wishers.

Sponsored, owned and operated by the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Hospital Association, the gleaming 220-bed facility incorporates many details designed to ensure that its patients get the best and most comfortable care that science and thoughtful hospital administration can assure.

A dominating feature of the architecture is a series of three inter-connected circular wings. In the center of each, on every floor, is a spacious nurses' station, so designed that nurses on duty can see all 26 patients in the dozen rooms that fan out from the center core.

There are no private rooms and no wards. The rooms accommodate either two or three patients.

"Dual-matic" beds permit a patient to change his position electrically. Each room has private bathroom facilities, a television set with pillow speakers and remote controls, and a number of devices for providing oxygen and medical aids.

Health Center, Too

On the ground floor is a walk-in health center, with 14 treatment and examination rooms geared for diagnosis and treatment of patients—including members of labor groups affiliated with the hospital.

Many of the labor leaders involved in the hospital project had helped pioneer the Philadelphia Labor Medical Center 12 years ago.

The labor hospital cost close to $6.5 million. A Hill-Burton grant from the federal government and the sale of bonds to numerous unions in the Philadelphia area raised most of the required money.

Two of the unions most closely identified with the project were the State, County & Municipal Employes and the Building Service Employes. A considerable number of other organizations, however, have participated.

Best Designed

William J. McEntee, head of the municipal workers organization, is president of the hospital association, and Pres. Norman Blumberg of the city's AFL-CIO Council is vice president.

A prime mover in the hospital project is Isadore Melamed, a former Ladies' Garment Workers official, who played a big part in the city labor medical group and is now executive director of the hospital association.

At the dedication ceremony, Sen. Hugh Scott (R) called the AFL-CIO Hospital the "best designed I've ever seen," and hailed it as a demonstration of labor's community interest.

Tate saw the hospital as "gratifying proof" of "labor's progressive thinking," and Dr. Frederick D. Mott of the Group Health Association of America—to which the hospital is affiliated—described the facility as "a giant step toward making possible a complete health program for union members in Philadelphia."

"Here in this hospital we find the unionism of the 1960s," said SCME Pres. Arnold Zander. "This is unionism with a heart."

Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes noted that the "hospital will serve the whole community," and observed that its sponsors should find "great satisfaction" in its success. Sec.-Treas. Pat Gorman of the Meat Cutters said the hospital is a symbol of labor's interest in community progress.

Canadian Sea Unions Put Under Trusteeship

Ottawa—The Canadian government has put into operation a sweeping and unprecedented trusteeship over maritime unions operating in Canada and named three trustees to administer the affairs of the five unions involved.

The trustees were named by Labor Minister Allan MacEachen after a week of talks designed to create a voluntary trusteeship fell through and the government invoked the law adopted by Parliament on Oct. 11.

The legislation gives the trustees sweeping powers over the affairs of 20,000 members of the five unions, the overwhelming majority of them in the Seafarers Intl. Union of Canada, and provides large fines and imprisonment for anyone convicted of obstructing the trustees' operations.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the legislation for government control and tried to work out a voluntary trusteeship with the Canadian Labor Congress and the U.S. and Canadian governments. The CLC objected to some of the provisions in the voluntary plan and the proposal fell through.

The trustees under the Canadian law, which was supported by the CLC, are Justice Victor L. Dryer of the Supreme Court of British Columbia; Rene Lippe, a Montreal magistrate, and Charles H. Millard, a former director of organization for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and onetime Canadian director of the Steelworkers.

SIU members in Canada staged a peaceful demonstration in Ottawa against the legislation, urging the government not to invoke the trusteeship.

The Canadian maritime unions placed under the trusteeship in addition to the SIU are the Maritime section of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Transport & General Workers; Canadian Maritime Union; Canadian Merchant Service Guild; National Association of Maritime Engineers.

The situation that led to the government-imposed trusteeship originated in 1962 when a Canadian steamship company terminated a 10-year bargaining relationship with the SIU and signed a contract with a newly created union sponsored by the CLC. The SIU struck the company and the dispute has been raging ever since over the handling and manning of ships on the Great Lakes.

Phony Labor Papers Again Seeking Ads

AFL-CIO unions are being alerted to a new outbreak of ad solicitations by a few phony papers posing as labor publications keyed to the upcoming AFL-CIO convention.

No paper has the right to use the name of the AFL-CIO, or any reference to its convention, for the purpose of soliciting advertising. AFL-CIO publications do not accept advertising, and anyone misusing the AFL-CIO's name to solicit ads is guilty of fraud and misrepresentation.

Ad solicitations using the name of the AFL-CIO or the coming convention should be reported to the federation immediately.

ONE OF THE MOST MODERN institutions of its kind in the world, the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Hospital was recently dedicated to the service of the ill and the injured. The 220-bed, $6.5 million facility is sponsored, owned and operated by the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Hospital Association and includes a first-floor walk-in health center.

'Ability, Not Disability, Is What Counts'

FACTORY SCENE for "They Have What It Takes" is set up at the Pleasantville Instrument Corp. by the film's director, Gerald Auerbach of Gerald Productions, Inc., and Hal Seiden, cameraman. Plant's workers are members of IBEW Local 1783.

The physically handicapped worker has the same right as any other worker "to be judged solely on the grounds of what he can do," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declares in a scene from a new film, "They Have What It Takes."

"His ability, not his disability, is what counts," Meany adds, declaring that "all the handicapped worker asks is a fair chance," and labor will do its "utmost" to see that he gets it.

The 13-minute film, which details "the how of hiring the handicapped," was produced for the AFL-CIO in cooperation with the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Scenes show handicapped workers on the job and feature a discussion of what is involved in employing them. Taking part are actors playing the roles of a plant personnel manager, a local union representative and a social worker from a community rehabilitation or placement agency.

IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, who is vice chairman of the President's Committee, in another segment of the film urges all of the AFL-CIO's 60,000 local unions to cooperate with the committee by encouraging formation at the plant level of union-management committees on employment of the handicapped.

"One of the strongest supports a handicapped worker can have is the help and understanding of his fellow workers in organized labor," Freeman declares.

The film may be rented from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education at $3 per showing. Reservations are urged three weeks in advance. Prints may be purchased from the department at $25 each.

HOW OF HIRING the handicapped is under running discussion in the film. From the left are the union local representative, portrayed by Sam Gray, personnel manager, played by Charles Gaines, and a social worker from a community agency, played by Anita Kole.

WHAT HE CAN DO, not what he can't do, is the key to Al Curcio's job as expediter at the Pleasantville plant. A double hand amputee, he is shown in scene from the film checking on-the-job production problems with workers and supervisors.

GETTING OFF to the right start in the right job is important to the physically handicapped worker, the film emphasizes, and labor, management and the community all can help him do it. Here Tom Cooper, a paraplegic, is shown at work at a wiring assembly bench. Being accepted as someone who is pulling his own weight eases the early stages on the job.

ADJUSTMENTS in the plant and its routine need only be minor to accommodate handicapped workers. Here Bob Stokes punches out five minutes early to get ahead of the rush. He'll report five minutes early next day for the same reason.

Byrd's Sitdown

A CASE STUDY in how to obstruct the legislative process is unfolding on Capitol Hill as Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) continues what would be called in the industrial world a "slowdown" on the House-passed $11 billion tax cut bill.

The Administration and reputable economists have warned that unless the tax measure is enacted this year, the possibility of an economic slowdown or recession looms in 1964.

Yet Byrd, the representative of poll-tax Virginia, continues to build up an endless witness list and to limit testimony before the Senate Finance Committee to a few hours a day. He is imposing his personal views and opposition to any tax reduction measure—except perhaps only for corporations and high-income earners—to prevent Senate action this year.

The House Ways & Means Committee spent nine long months studying the tax problem and taking exhaustive testimony. The record is clear: a tax cut is imperative. But Byrd doesn't think so and the legislative charade continues.

The country cannot afford the luxury of a legislative process that allows one man to thwart the program of a nationally elected Administration and the vote of the nationally representative House.

Big, Bad Wolf

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION of Manufacturers has found a new devil—the Consumer Advisory Council and its recommendations for legislation to protect the consumer from exploitation.

The first report of the council, says the NAM News, is a cause for "apprehension and concern in the business community" and adds to the "doubts which inhibit bold and forthright planning by business managers."

The recommendations that have the NAM so deeply concerned include opposition to the new version of price-fixing, masquerading under the name of "quality stabilization," that would cost consumers untold billions, and support for "truth-in-lending" and "truth-in-packaging" legislation.

This, says the NAM, is interference "with the operations of the free market," and business should be left alone.

If that means "taking" the consumer for all he's worth, according to NAM reasoning, that's the price the consumer should cheerfully pay. For there is nothing holier to the NAM than the "free market."

Children of the Jobless

THE HARSH AND INHUMAN regulations governing welfare funds for destitute children in the nation's capital are undergoing national scrutiny as the District of Columbia's budget requests are reviewed by congressional committees.

With Congress acting as the district's city council in the absence of home rule, its action on the request for adequate welfare funds will set a tone for treatment of this problem across the nation.

A key question is extension of aid for dependent children to homes where the father is unemployed. There is a hard core of unemployment in the district and the children of these unemployed must be cared for.

To deny these children of the unemployed the minimum existence presently set up under the district's welfare regulations is to perpetuate injustice in the capital of the nation that leads the free world.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Oct. 26, 1963 No. 43

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

I Need to Get Moving!

Rep. Sickles Says:

Plight of Appalachian Region Calls for Joint U.S.-State Efforts

The following is excerpted from a broadcast by Rep. Carlton R. Sickles (D-Md.) outlining a bill he has introduced in the House to promote economic development of the Appalachian region.

ONE OF THE MOST DIFFICULT problems in recent years has been the persistence of pockets of unemployment despite general national prosperity. Most people are better off today than they ever were, yet some of our citizens lack both jobs and hope for the future.

One area where these pockets of unemployment exist is the Appalachian region, which stretches from Pennsylvania to Alabama. In this region, unemployment is more than twice the national rate, and many communities are dying a slow economic death, with their young people going or gone, mines closed, industry declining, and farm income down.

The governors of the area have formed a conference of Appalachian governors to work together on the problems of the region. Within the federal government, agencies like the Area Redevelopment Administration, which will create 15,000 jobs in the region, are attempting to meet the problem of persistent unemployment.

Pres. Kennedy, who met earlier this year with the governors, has established a joint Federal-State Commission on the Appalachian Region, which is now drawing up plans to coordinate state and federal efforts and accelerate federal help to the area.

But more must be done. There is a need to create a half-million jobs for the 17 million people who live in this region. How can we do this? First, we have to count our blessings, so to speak. The area is blessed with huge coal deposits for which new uses must be found. There are vast timber resources which, if properly utilized, could mean hundreds of thousands of jobs for the area. And the timber, combined with the abundant rainfall and water resources, gives the area great recreation potential.

We must provide the programs needed to enable this area so rich in natural resources to develop. This means new roads, that will open the door for private industry. Roads that will enable tourists coming from the heavily populated areas, both east and west of the Appalachians, to view some of the most beautiful country in this great land of ours.

We need programs to develop skills of the people, skills that will attract industry, and keep talented young people in the communities by providing them job opportunities.

We need coordinated efforts on the part of federal, state, and local officials in attacking the problems of the region. TVA has proved that these officials can work together for the general good of the community, and similar cooperation is certainly feasible in the Appalachian region.

THERE HAVE BEEN MANY, perhaps too many, surveys and plans in the past, but there has never been a coordinated regional approach developed to meet the problems of this area. To promote this regional approach, I have introduced a bill which would:

1—Establish by law a joint federal-state commission on Appalachia, to draw up an economic development plan for the area. The commission would be directed to report to the President and Congress within two years and would undoubtedly draw heavily on the work that has been done by Pres. Kennedy's Appalachian Committee.

2—Give the consent of Congress to the 11 states in the area to enter into compacts and agreements which will enable them to better carry out the economic plans drawn up.

3—Establish a federal coordinator for the region so that the various federal programs affecting the area will fit in with the general economic development plan.

4—Establish an Appalachian Research Institute which would work with the universities in the area on long-term solutions to economic problems by conducting research on the basic natural resources, especially coal and timber.

5—Provide for an immediate investment of $500 million by the federal government through existing federal programs, especially those providing highway and airport construction and those designed to develop the human resources.

This bill is based on the idea that the economic progress of the region requires the wholehearted cooperation of local, state, and federal officials dealing with the problems of Appalachia, and the leaders of business, industry, labor, and the local communities in the region.

The special needs of this area justify a special approach. The entire nation, not only the people of the region, have a stake in what is done there. In addition to the fact that development of this area will provide new markets for industries all over the country, the people here must be given the opportunity to fully enjoy the productive fruits of American society.

Morgan Says:

For a So-Called Literate Nation, A Lot of Us Can't Read or Write

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

NOT LONG AGO, according to Editorial Research Reports Service, one local employment office had to interview 500 women before it could find 30 who had enough education to qualify to enter a class in practical nurse training.

In another instance, so many applicants for a new training course for semi-skilled maintenance and service jobs couldn't even read the labels on cans of cleaning materials and insecticides that the course had to be changed to include basic education. Yet, as Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz has noted, "More than one-eighth of the young men rejected for the military draft last year on the ground of illiteracy actually had high school diplomas."

Morgan

Well, what's going on here? The dismaying fact is that in this land of ours where we take so much talking pride in the educational system, there are still, according to the 1960 census, more than 3 million illiterates, and that figure doesn't really mirror the intensity of the problem.

Actually the United States didn't begin to concern itself seriously with the fact that too many of its citizens cannot read or write until the Army was confronted with this massive ignorance in World War II. It became the first government agency to undertake a major anti-illiteracy program when it discovered that hundreds of thousands of recruits who had had some schooling could not read a basic order or write a simple sentence. The Army termed them "functional illiterates." Census data indicate that there are now more than 8 million Americans, age 25 or older, who have had no more than a 4th grade education, and who cannot make ready use of the most meager reading and writing skills.

Even the fact of a longer education may turn out to be a meaningless technicality, such are the pressures in some communities simply to go through the motions of classes. Problem children are so difficult and numerous in some schools that teachers become, in effect, nothing more than disciplinarians trying desperately to keep order. Johnny doesn't even learn how to read, and he becomes an illiterate—with a diploma.

Editorial Research Reports points out that to an increasing extent a connection has been established between illiteracy and dependency, delinquency, illegitimacy and even disease. A large percentage of the 7.25 million persons receiving welfare payments costing the taxpayer a total of $4.5 billion are under-educated. And the irony now arises that the people who most need to take advantage of the government's incipient manpower retraining efforts so they can get another job won't be able to do so until they can move out of the classification of functional illiterate. They will have to be trained to read and write before they can be retrained for another job.

SOME COMMUNITIES have tackled the problem of illiteracy. Last year, for example, Chicago authorities established special literacy and vocational courses and made it a revolutionary requirement that all ablebodied but undereducated persons on relief take these courses on pain of having their welfare checks cut off.

Television is helping. Operation Alphabet, developed for adult classes by educational authorities in Philadelphia, has been screened by both educational and commercial stations in various other parts of the country too.

In his 1962 State of the Union address, Pres. Kennedy called for a massive attack to end illiteracy. But a bill to help the states help all their citizens to become literate was strangled in the House Rules Committee. This session, legislative prospects are in disarray. A bill to aid basic adult education is again bottled up in the Rules Committee. There has been one hopeful development. Approved by the Senate and standing presumably good chances in the House is an amendment to the Manpower & Development Retraining Act making adult education a prerequisite to retraining.

As for the literacy measure incorporated in the Administration's omnibus education bill, it is still tied up in the Senate Education Committee, with no movement on it indicated since hearings in August.

What this proviso calls for, if it ever sees the light of day, is a program of instruction for adults who can't read or write. Rather than limit the eligibles to those without a sixth grade education, as last year's legislation did, the revised section makes an eighth grade education the cut-off point. It would give the states $5 million the first year to organize classes and get experimental projects going.

Imperfect as these and other efforts may be, one wonders how anybody can oppose their purpose without being pretty uneducated himself.

Washington Reports:

Congress 'Should and Must' Act On Rights, Taxes, Senators Say

CONGRESS "SHOULD AND MUST" act on both civil rights and the tax cut this year, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) asserted in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) pointed out on the same program that present tax rates "are simply too high." The rates were set during World War II "to meet conditions that no longer exist," he explained.

Javits said that if both civil rights and the tax cut are not taken care of this year, "then it is a real failure on our part and government in not doing the job we have to do for the people."

He declared that a kind of filibuster is taking place in congressional committees to hold back enactment of civil rights.

"Personally, I think they are very unwise," he said, "because I think we are running a terrible risk in terms of public tranquility and order, as the Negro gets more and more disillusioned about when the federal government is going to act."

Ribicoff advised those who wished to get the tax bill on the Senate floor for a vote to "let their senators know how they feel about it."

He said the tax bill passed by the House is "the biggest ever—it cuts taxes by $11 billion." The savings to individual families are "significant," he continued.

"TAKE A COUPLE with a taxable income of $4,000—their tax bill is reduced $180," he said. "A couple at $8,000 saves $300. A couple at $20,000 saves $900. A single person over 65 with an income of $2,000 would have his taxes cut in half."

The tax cut "would stimulate new production," Javits declared, but warned that it will not do the whole job of ending high chronic unemployment. He argued for retraining workers, upgrading skills, stimulating export trade.

A ceiling on spending as proposed in the House, Ribicoff asserted, is a mistake that could increase government costs, and because some expenses are set, could result in reductions in essential programs "such as defense, housing, etc."

He advised instead that "Congress take a good look at each appropriation bill as it comes along and make every possible saving. A ceiling could end up costing us more money."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IT IS THE THEORY of states-righters that their states, their people and the American system would be well off if the federal government would simply retire from the field of legislation for the general welfare. The theory doesn't stand up on the basis of what has happened since Congress amended the aid to dependent children program to authorize federal funds for the children of a jobless breadwinner.

Pres. Kennedy pointed out during the 1960 campaign that the existing aid to dependent children program had the appalling effect of inducing jobless fathers to "desert" their families in order to make them eligible for federal ADC funds. The law as written at the time authorized federal grants to the states for aid to children only if the father was dead, incapacitated or "absent."

There was then, as now, a high level of joblessness. When Mr. Kennedy became President he recommended that the law be amended to include unemployment of a father or other breadwinner as a condition justifying federal funds in the aid to children program. Congress passed the amending legislation.

The catch was that the 50 states, as in all the rest of the aid to children program, could either take it or leave it. The federal grant is fourteen-seventeenths of the basic payment per child, but the states had to amend their own laws and, possibly, to vote more money from the state treasuries.

* * *

TWENTY-FIVE states, two and a half years after Congress amended the law, have no observable plans to revise their own statutes and make it possible for the children of unemployed parents to receive the largely federal grants that might keep the families together on a reasonable subsistence basis.

Seven other states considered enabling legislation in the 1963 sessions of their legislatures and turned it down.

One state, the District of Columbia and Guam are reported as giving "official" consideration to the program but have reached no decision. Three other states are represented as being on the point of action. Three others have passed authorizing legislation but for various reasons the program has not gone into effect.

There are only 19 states that have passed enabling legislation, have submitted plans formally approved for purposes of federal grants and have the plan actually in operation.

All the states, of course, have public assistance programs of one kind or another through which destitute families can get relief money. But the aid to dependent children program provides larger sums and is deliberately designed to make it possible for families to stay together.

It is still true that an unemployed father should not have to remove himself from his family, to make himself "absent," to abscond and run away, so that the family may obtain the benefits of the aid to children program. But in all but 19 states, that's the way it is despite amendment of federal law.

* * *

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA situation is particularly distressing because Congress may be said to have a reasonable obligation to make the nation's capital a showcase.

The states can argue that a program Congress refuses to approve for the district is not one which they have any urgency to adopt.

The House and Senate are in the position of having passed legislation on a national level, encouraging the states to cooperate, and then reversing themselves when acting in the status of a local legislature and refusing to cooperate with their own national program.

For this anomoly the credit goes largely to one of the capital's "absentee landlords," Sen. Robert C. Byrd, a West Virginia Democrat, who wields power as chairman of the Senate's Appropriations subcommittee on district affairs. Even the existing welfare program has been troubled and confused by Byrd's insistence that the eligibility rules be rigidly enforced.

A welfare or relief cheater should be removed from the rolls—in the district or elsewhere. But there would be less temptation to cheating if an unemployed husband could legally stay with his family, instead of being "absent," and the children could get the benefit of the ADC program.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION on a tax cut this year can be assured only if businessmen, trade unionists and others interested write their senators, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), left, and Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

College Tuition Loan Extension Endangered by House Delay

By Sidney Margolius

IN AN ERA of booming college fees, National Defense Act loans have become one of the most important lifelines for moderate-income college students. For many children of working families, these loans have made the actual difference between getting a college education and dropping out.

But right now the colleges are fretting and students who need these loans are worrying because Congress is dallying over renewal of the program.

The program is limited enough. In only two of the five years it has been in existence has the U.S. Office of Education been able to supply as much loan money as the colleges requested for needy students. But even the present limited program is due to be "phased out" June 30, 1964, except for applications already approved, unless the House acts to extend it. The Senate voted early in October to extend the program, and also to increase the amount available from the present $90 million a year to $125 million next year, and $150 million by 1967.

Everybody expects, or at least is hoping fervently, that the House, too, will approve a continuation. Any other prospect is potentially too disastrous to contemplate.

But as well as renewal of the program, an increase in the amount available is urgent too.

An increase in the present ceiling of $90 million a year is especially necessary to help moderate-income families. This year some 1,500 colleges requested a total of $126 million in loan funds. But all that was available was $90 million plus a few million already repaid by borrowers or on hand from previous authorizations.

The irony of the overly-tight limit is that this is a program that really costs very little tax money. These are loans, not grants or scholarships. Most of the money eventually comes back.

The loans have been especially useful in helping the neediest 5 percent of U.S. college students. Over 70 percent of the students who have borrowed through this program so far have come from families who had incomes of $6,000 or less.

One boon of the loans is that they cost only a moderate interest rate of 3 percent a year. Nor does the interest start accruing until a year after graduation. In contrast, some of the tuition loans offered by commercial lenders cost as much as 16 percent a year, when you calculate the true interest rate, and the interest does start accruing immediately.

Too, students may take up to 10 years after graduation to repay Defense Act loans. For students who intend to teach, these loans also can serve as a partial scholarship. Ten percent of the loan is cancelled for each year of teaching, up to 50 percent of the total.

THE PUBLIC itself sometimes is confused about the Defense Act loans and how they are arranged.

While the government puts up most of the money, it does not arrange the loans. The colleges administer them and application must be made to the college itself, usually to the student aid officer. But you can't just walk into the student aid office, or in the case of parents, write, and automatically get a "federal loan."

Just one word of advice to parents: See that your kids get good marks and that your local schools provide good-quality education. Schools in moderate-income neighborhoods often are not as good as those in the suburbs.

For the present fact of life is, not only does academic achievement and the quality of your local schools determine who gets scholarships, but now even who qualifies for a loan or a campus job. All are limited, as more and more youngsters seek to go to college.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

MEMBERS of the President's Commission on the Status of Women met for a luncheon before presenting their report recently to Pres. Kennedy. In the group above are, from the left, Margaret Hickey, public affairs editor of the Ladies Home Journal; Mrs. Esther Johnson, secretary-treasurer of the Government Employes, a member of the committee on federal employment headed by Miss Hickey; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Civil Service Commission Chairman John W. Macy, Jr.; Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson, executive vice chairman of the commission; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

The American Woman:

Report Spells Out 60 Years of Change

The following is excerpted from "The American Woman," the report of the President's Commission on the Status of women."

CONSUMER GOODS have always been conspicuous in U.S. national production, and the American woman has been in large part responsible for their form. But over the last 60 years, her ways of supplying family needs have changed out of all recognition.

At the turn of the century, the popular assumption about the dowry of skills a young woman would bring into marriage anticipated that the young farm wife knew how to cook and bake, keeping the wood or coal stove stoked to the proper temperature; how to can and preserve the annual yield of orchard fruits and garden vegetables to supply a family requirement calculated at 125 quarts per person.

She would use a sewing machine to make her long-sleeved blouses, her floor-sweeping dresses, her children's pinafores and her husband's shirts and nightshirts—his Sunday suit might be bought through the catalog of a mail-order house. She expected to nurse the family ailments prevalent at the time—children's diseases, pneumonia, typhoid fever, malaria, tuberculosis.

Her home was largely self-sufficient, her outside activities chiefly in her church, its missionary society and its women's circle. Neighboring families, however, could rely on mutual aid at times of crisis—illness, accident, or death; fire; or crop failure.

Today's image of young married women is very different. It shows suburban mothers reading directions on packages or cans as they cook frozen or otherwise preprocessed food by gas or electricity. To buy it, they bundle the children into the car and set forth to market at the local shopping center.

They make the rounds from supermarkets to 5-and-10, from drug store to branch department store. Services are there, too: laundromats, and drycleaning establishments, banks, dentists' and lawyers' offices, and beauty parlors.

The appeal to the modern young housewife of instant coffee and minute rice is a vivid indication that time is always short: perhaps that is why her hair is short; her dresses are short; at home or at play she is likely to wear shorts—and on occasion her temper is short, too. Since ironing is one of the least mechanized and most time consuming of household tasks, she likes drip-dry fabrics and contour sheets.

Except for minor childhood illnesses, suburban wives' nursing is likely to be as aides at the local hospital. But they are expected to be active in sales of TB seals at Christmas and Crippled Children's seals at Easter and to engage in fund drives for research and assistance to sufferers from diseases such as cancer and heart.

The advertisements of a $20-billion business suggest that the family's recreation take the form of outdoor excursions to national parks, beaches, or city recreational areas, sandlot softball, bowling, golf, tennis, fishing or boating, water-skiing or skindiving. For most members of a family, football and baseball are spectator sports. So is horseracing. At home, many women are knowledgeable and avid gardeners; many men officiate as the family chef at cookouts.

Their cultural interests may lead them to library or museum, amateur theatricals, schoolband performances, the movies, or, depending on where they live, presentation by stock companies, visiting stars of stage and concert hall, or first-run casts with top billing in major centers.

TV sets in the home are omnipresent, with commercially sponsored women's fiction and children's programs of widely varying quality or lack of quality by day, major newscasts and a range of fare from westerns and comics to prestige programs of national corporations by night.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Learning How to Play Pinochle Is a Reward for Jury Service

By Jane Goodsell

WANT TO HEAR about my life in court? Well, I'll tell you anyway. I recently served a month's term on a jury and, while I don't suppose this qualifies me as an expert on jurisprudence, I'm pretty good at spotting technical errors on the Perry Mason program.

Being on the jury involves — as most things in life do—a lot of waiting around. You sit in the jury room, waiting for your name to be drawn for a case, and a homier place to wait would be hard to find. There are bridge, pinochle and gin rummy games going on. Some people knit, some do their nails, some read or work jigsaw puzzles or drink coffee and gossip. One man sat quietly in a corner reading Plato.

When your name is called you are hustled off to a courtroom, where you sit around some more, waiting in the back of the room for the case to start. Finally, the clerk of the court draws the names of the jurors from a wooden box. If yours is one of those chosen, you move into a seat in the jury box. After the seats have been filled, the judge explains briefly the general nature of the case—which is most likely to involve an accident or a personal injury, and most unlikely to resemble the sort of cases Perry Mason handles.

Then the attorneys start questioning the jurors to find out if there is anything that would make it difficult for them to be fair and unprejudiced judges of the facts. If the defense hopes to prove that the plaintiff fell down the stairs because he wore bifocals, and you wear bifocals, you're likely to be sent back to the jury room to play pinochle.

Now it's a strange thing about getting bounced off a jury. The first time it happens, a juror feels unwanted and rebuffed—even a bit trembly-lipped. But, as the month wears on, jurors become hardened to rejection—even a little proud of it. They swagger back to the jury room, boasting that they were kicked off the case because their brother-in-law knew a member of the defendant's firm or because they'd once been involved in a lawsuit or because they had a shoulder injury similar to the plaintiffs.

With only a couple of exceptions (a man who always voted against truck drivers on principle, and a woman who held the unshakable conviction that all back injuries were faked) my fellow jurors seemed to me as fair a group as you'd be likely to find. They tried terribly hard to be unemotional and to judge the cases on the facts.

OFTEN THIS was upsetting because their sympathies pulled them in one direction, and the evidence in another. One woman confessed that she cried most of the night because she'd voted against the plaintiff, whom she liked, and for the defendant, whom she couldn't stand. "But," she said, "if I had it to do over, I'd vote the same way again. I'd just have to."

I've heard people say that they found jury service a disillusioning experience that weakened their faith in democracy. I have no way of knowing whether my experience was typical, but I found it quite the opposite.

During my month in court, I had my faith in democracy reaffirmed. I also made several new friends and learned to play pinochle.

If you get a chance to be on a jury, do it!

At Kentucky Convention:

Keyserling Warns of Economic Drift

Louisville—Unless the federal government takes decisive economic steps, joblessness could double in the next decade, a Washington economist told the sixth annual convention of the Kentucky State AFL-CIO here. About 400 delegates attended the two-day session.

The economist, Leon Keyserling, served as adviser to Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman. He is now president of the Conference on Economic Progress, a research organization.

Two-fifths of all Americans are living in poverty and deprivation, Keyserling said. He called for realistic measures in terms of health and welfare legislation and charged that "not enough money is going to the people," with the result that the nation lacks adequate purchasing power to employ all its manpower.

"Our job," Keyserling pointed out, is to educate our officials to the fact that "we know the score and are keeping count."

"Direct benefits to American workers" come from the work of the Intl. Labor Organization, an agency of the United Nations, a second speaker told the delegates. The speaker, Ralph Wright, directs the ILO's Washington office.

Wright described ILO efforts to "help reduce unfair competition based upon human exploitation in international trade," thereby narrowing the gap in labor costs between countries.

Citing ILO encouragement of trade unions, he called them "a part of freedom and progress."

Race Discrimination Opposed

In resolutions, the delegates called for enactment of a state law prohibiting racial discrimination in public accommodations and in employment. Hesitation in recognizing the right of "our Negro brothers . . . cannot be justified," declared William Billingsley, Steelworkers official and executive board member. Billingsley compared Negro demonstrations to the union fight for recognition 25 years ago, using sit-ins, sit-downs, picketing, and demonstrations.

Other resolutions called for a minimum wage of $1 an hour for hotel and restaurant workers, revised and updated registration and voting laws, and increased benefits in workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance. The convention voted also to support state and federal "truth-in-lending" legislation.

Amending the organization's constitution, the delegates voted to hold conventions bienially instead of annually, starting in 1965, with a legislative conference scheduled in alternate years. The change was undertaken as a cost-cutting measure.

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Edward T. ("Ned") Breathitt, endorsed by the state Committee on Political Education, told the convention: "I believe a clean, vigorous, progressive trade union movement is just as indispensable to a private enterprise economy as free management and free agriculture. . . . Freedom for one requires freedom for all, or freedom will lose its meaning."

State labor commissioner Carl Cabe outlined Kentucky's needs for expanding and improving its Labor Dept. Existing labor laws cannot be properly administered with limited funds and personnel, he said, and called for trained specialists to man divisions of prevailing wages, safety, wage and hour inspections, research and statistics, and a legal unit.

Added FHA Safeguards Endorsed

The AFL-CIO has endorsed two Senate bills which would protect homebuyers by authorizing payment of claims for major defects in houses covered by mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, told the Senate Housing subcommittee that legislation to make the words "FHA Insured" truly meaningful "is long overdue."

He cited examples of "shady practices and shoddy performances" by some builders, "under the cover of FHA approval," where the homebuyer is forced to assume the burden of costs to correct faulty construction.

A bill introduced by Sen. Ernest Gruening (D-Alaska), and a similar measure sponsored by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), would do much to correct this situation and "enhance the usefulness and the effectiveness of the FHA mortgage insurance system and to expand its coverage," Shishkin declared.

The Gruening bill would authorize the Housing Commissioner to pay claims for structural or other major defects in one to four-family homes covered by FHA-insured mortgages. It would also require builders to post indemnification bonds on new construction of such homes.

Shishkin said abuses have been prevalent enough to warrant the bonds, which he said would have a nominal cost yet result in rewarding benefits to the homebuyer.

Citing an AFL-CIO resolution, he also urged inclusion of provisions to bar so-called "sweat equity" practices—making financial allowances to homebuyers for accepting uncompleted housing.

AFSCME Acts to Revise Challenges of Elections

A proposal to write into the constitution of the State, County & Municipal Employes a procedure for challenging of the district council election results will be submitted to the next convention at the recommendation of the union's ethical practices consultant.

Eliot Bredhoff, successor to Supreme Court Justice Arthur J. Goldberg as the union's one-man Ethical Practices Committee, made the recommendation to the AFSCME executive board in a report on a case which had been assigned to him.

He urged adoption of "a clearly spelled out procedure for challenging elections." The board then proposed that such a constitutional amendment be drafted by Bredhoff and Henry T. Wilson, the union's general counsel, for submission to the forthcoming convention, to be held next spring in Denver.

Trust Suit Defeated by Horse Shoers

Baltimore—The U.S. District Court here has found that the Journeymen Horse Shoers is a genuine union of employes and has dismissed an anti-trust suit brought by a group of Maryland and Canadian racehorse trainers.

Six trainers—three from Maryland and three from Canada—sought a court order enjoining the union's boycott of Canadian trainers and seeking damages on the ground that the union and its Local 7 were illegally fixing prices for the shoeing of horses at the tracks.

After a five-day trial, however, Judge Harrison Winter ruled that a sufficient master-servant relationship was evident to make the horse shoers employes within the meaning of the law, and not so-called "independent contractors."

As employes, he said, they are protected by the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts and have a right to boycott trainers who hire non-union farriers at other tracks and to set minimum piece rates for their work.

He rejected evidence that the Ontario Labor Relations Board had ruled that members of the union were not employes, stating in effect that while the conclusion may be true under Canadian law, it's not so under American law.

The Horse Shoers are one of the smallest international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO. They ply their trade chiefly at race tracks in this country and Canada. In Maryland, they must be licensed by the state as farriers before they are permitted to work at flat tracks in the state.

15,000 STEELWORKERS in Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., are being served by this new $800,000 group practice medical center (top photo) recently dedicated by the union. In the bottom photo, USWA Pres. David J. McDonald, left, snips a ribbon to open the center officially. With him is John Barker, USWA supervisor in the area and president of the medical center.

Train Dispatchers Vote $1 Monthly Dues Raise

Chicago—A dues increase of $1 a month, a hospital-surgical plan for retired members and a series of resolutions on rail legislation and internal union affairs were approved by the 135 delegates to the 19th general assembly of the Train Dispatchers Association.

The increase voted at the three-day convention here raises the total dues to $60 a year.

Pres. R. C. Coutts, Chicago; Sec.-Treas. Arthur Covington, Chicago; and Vice Presidents T. C. Garrett, Richmond, Va., and R. H. Hack, Philadelphia, were re-elected to new four-year terms. New vice presidents elected were B. C. Hilbert, Portland, Ore., and J. L. Willett, Murphysboro, Ill.

The delegates urged a speed-up in processing disputes before the Railroad Adjustment Board, asked that the railroad industry be treated with the same consideration given to other modes of transportation, and voted support of the Railway Labor Executives' Association's campaign against rail mergers and consolidations.

Policy statements of the President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee were endorsed. The convention urged the executive board to work toward establishment of a committee of union and management leaders in the rail industry.

The group would explore means to foster free collective bargaining and develop procedures aimed at smoothing the path for negotiators and easing the impact of automation on rail workers.

The convention also voted continued support to organized labor's program of helping to develop free trade unions in new and developing nations.

Coutts reported to delegates that the union has made substantial progress in wages and working conditions since the 1959 convention.

"Basic monthly rates of dispatchers have increased about 7 percent, including the value of health-welfare and group life insurance," he said. "This amounts to an average gain of $77 a month—and in addition, another $34 was secured under cost of living escalator clauses making a total increase of over $111 a month."

Pay Raise for Congress Backed by Union Aide

Congress may have to raise its own members' pay in order to keep its promise to keep the salaries of federal workers "comparable" to private industry, a union spokesman declared.

John A. McCart, operations director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, said higher salaries for congressmen, senators and cabinet members are fully justified in the public interest and should be supported by all citizens.

Unions of federal employes, he said, have an additional reason for urging more money for top government executives and legislators—it would lift the pay ceiling which has held down the salary structure for lower-ranking civil service employes.

McCart was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public affairs radio program, Labor News Conference, carried by the Mutual network.

Congress wrote into last year's government pay law a new policy of annual salary review to maintain comparability with private employment, McCart pointed out. He emphasized that the automatic second-step increases effective in January are based on wage surveys made two years ago.

On the basis of a more recent survey of private industry salaries, he said, the Administration has joined with the unions in calling for a new round of pay raises.

The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee is now considering in executive session a bipartisan omnibus pay bill which would raise the pay of federal civil service employes, top government executives, members of Congress and the judiciary.

There is wide agreement, McCart indicated, as to the need for salary increases for all these groups. A major problem, however, is the reluctance of many members of Congress to raise their own pay. Members are now paid $22,500 a year, with an additional $2,500 for expenses. A bill by Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.) and Rep. Joel T. Broyhill (R-Va.) would boost this to $35,000. It would also raise Cabinet salaries from $25,000 to $40,000 and the pay of Supreme Court justices from $35,000 to $50,000.

LOOK for the UNION LABEL
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Congress Stalls on Funds for Agencies

Shop Steward Choice Ruled Up to Union

An employer has no right to veto union members' choice of a shop steward, a National Labor Relations Board aide has found.

Trial Examiner Phil W. Saunders ruled that such a veto was prohibited even though a union-management contract expressly excluded non-employes from taking part in the grievance procedure.

Carpenters' Local Involved

Saunders' decision involved the Brunswick Corp. and Carpenters Local 824 in Muskegon, Mich., where Brunswick production and maintenance employes elected Volney Swift as their chief steward in 1960 or 1961, and again in February 1963. Swift was a Brunswick employe until Oct. 1, 1962, but management refused to meet with him on grievances this year.

The law is clear, said the examiner, that employes have a right to bargain collectively "through representatives of their own choosing." Who is to represent them, and the manner of his selection, are "matters within the exclusive province of the employes," said Saunders.

Further, he said, the representative selected by the employes need not be an employe of the employer involved, and he found Brunswick had engaged in unfair labor practices. He recommended that the firm be ordered to cease and desist from refusing to settle grievances by refusing to meet with the steward chosen by the workers.

GOP Retains North Dakota House Seat

Fargo, N. D.—In an unusually large special election turnout of voters, Republican Mark Andrews was elected to the House in North Dakota's 1st Congressional Dist., beating Democrat John Hove by approximately 5,000 votes.

The district is normally Republican, going heavily for former Vice Pres. Nixon over John F. Kennedy in 1960 and electing a Republican, the late Rep. Hjalmar Nygaard, to Congress by a 10,000 majority last November. The special election was held to fill the vacancy resulting from Nygaard's death.

Andrews, formerly the state's Republican national committeeman and unsuccessful candidate for governor in 1962, survived the party-splitting threat of a self-styled "conservative" Republican, John W. Scott, who ran as an independent proclaiming adherence to the doctrines of Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.).

Goldwater endorsed Andrews, and the Republican organization worked hard to prevent the Scott candidacy from subtracting enough normally GOP votes to give the election to Hove.

Scott Disappointed

On the basis of nearly complete returns, Andrews had 45,581 votes, Hove 40,844, Scott 5,773. Hove, a political newcomer and university professor, campaigned as a Kennedy supporter.

Scott, who entered the election late to "test conservative strength" in this state, ran a well-financed campaign. Expressing disappointment at his small vote, he commented: "It appears to me that people like and approve of big centralized government."

FIRST AFL-CIO SCHOLARSHIP winner to graduate in three years was Roberta J. Middleton, who recently received her bachelor of science degree in physics from Colorado State University, Fort Collins, Colo. With her is shown her faculty advisor, Dr. Lewis R Weber, head of the Physics Dept., under whose guidance she is now doing graduate work.

Winner of Scholarship Gets Degree in 3 Years

Fort Collins, Colo.—Roberta J. Middleton, winner of an AFL-CIO scholarship in 1960, was graduated with highest honors in physics after but three years at Colorado State University and has returned to do postgraduate work.

The attractive 20-year-old who received her bachelor of science at the head of the physics class is the first winner of an AFL-CIO scholarship to complete her undergraduate work in three years.

"She is by far the most exceptional woman we have ever had in physics here," said Dr. Lewis R. Weber, head of the Physics Dept. and Miss Middleton's faculty advisor. "She was an alternate for a Fulbright scholarship this year—we need more such young women in the field."

Pres. William E. Morgan of CSU called "such excellence a fine example for our high school students of what a college education can offer if an individual applies himself."

Letter from Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. Meany extended his warm congratulations to her. He pointed out that she was graduated at the same time as the first group of AFL-CIO scholarship winners and that like them is engaging in graduate study.

"I want particularly to thank you," he wrote, "for that paragraph of your letter where you wrote: 'I only hope that some day I may help make available to other young people the opportunities which have been given to me.' I am sure that as you begin your career as a graduate teaching assistant, you will find in your work at the Colorado State University ample opportunity to make this a living reality."

Miss Middleton began her studies at CSU in mathematics and switched to physics during her junior year. She expects to complete her master's work in two years and then to acquire a doctor of philosophy degree. After that she hopes to teach at the university level.

Her interest in science first manifested itself 10 years ago, when she became an amateur radio operator. Her father, Donald S. Middleton, associate professor of electronics at Southern Colorado State College, Pueblo, formerly was a member of both the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Meat Cutters.

She also has been active in forensics, plays golf and tennis, and during the past summer worked as a cook at a church guest ranch in the San Isabel forest range of Colorado.

U.S. Mediators Enter Westinghouse Talks

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has assigned a panel of mediators to assist in bargaining at Pittsburgh between the Westinghouse Electric Corp. and three unions representing more than 50,000 workers.

The unions are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and United Electrical Workers, unaffiliated. Negotiations have been continuing on a day-to-day basis since the expiration of contracts, Dir. William E. Simkin said.

Appropriation Bills Stuck in Committee

By David L. Perlman

Government budget experts are deep in preparation of next year's spending estimates—without knowing how much money Congress will finally appropriate for operating the government during the fiscal year which began last July 1.

Although the new 1965 budget will be submitted to Congress less than three months from now, most of the money bills for the current fiscal year haven't been passed and some multi-billion dollar appropriation bills have not even been started on their way.

To keep the government from total collapse, Congress has passed a succession of temporary "continuing" resolutions enabling federal agencies to carry on under strict spending ceilings. This has become an increasingly frequent practice in recent years, but action on regular annual appropriations bills has not been so long delayed.

Here's the current status of appropriations measures as listed by the authoritative Congressional Quarterly:

- Only four of the 12 regular appropriation bills have been enacted. These provide funds for the Defense Dept., and Interior Dept., and in two combinations the Labor and Health, Education & Welfare Depts. and Treasury, Post Office and executive offices. The biggest—$47.2 billion for defense spending—was not approved until Oct. 8.
- Appropriation bills for the Dept. of Agriculture and for the legislative branch have been passed by both houses but, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were still in conference committee.
- The Senate has not yet acted on House-passed appropriations for the State, Commerce and Justice Depts.; the District of Columbia, and for a group of independent agencies.
- The House has not yet even begun action on appropriations for public works, the Atomic Energy Commission and foreign aid.

Under the involved appropriations procedure, every government money request must be scrutinized by four committees and acted on at least twice—most often four times—by both the House and Senate.

The slow-moving foreign aid authorization bill is an example.

Pres. Kennedy in January submitted a $4.9 billion budget request in January, later pared it to $4.5 billion largely on the basis of recommendations made by the Clay Committee, an advisory group. (AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, a member, dissented from the Clay Committee majority.)

The House Foreign Affairs Committee, after extensive hearings, approved a bill authorizing $4.08 billion and sent it to the floor. There, on Aug. 23, the House cut deeper into the program and sent to the Senate a bill which authorized only $3.5 billion.

Twice-Told Tales

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee, after hearing many of the same witnesses who testified before the House committee, voted to restore a large part of the cuts and approved a $4.2 billion authorization bill.

The bill must still be acted on by the full Senate and then be considered by a House-Senate conference committee which will seek to compromise the differences. The conference report must then go back to both the House and Senate for final approval.

That, however, will only be the first stage of the budget action. The authorization bill, handled by the legislative committees, merely sets a ceiling on the amount of money which may be appropriated.

The entire process, including testimony by expert witnesses, begins again in House and Senate Appropriations subcommittees which may—and in fact usually do—recommend less money than Congress has authorized to be spent. Subcommittee actions normally are routinely approved by the full committees.

Both houses act on appropriation bills in basically the same manner as on authorization bills.

The process is further complicated by the fact that spending authorizations may, for some programs, be adopted to cover succeeding years. But with rare exceptions—attacked by conservative critics as "backdoor spending"—the money to carry out the programs must be specifically voted each year by Congress before it can be spent.

The effect has been to make the House and Senate Appropriations committees centers of congressional power and to give senior committee members a virtual veto power over government programs and operations—a power which can be exercised through inaction as well as by action, which is what is happening this year.

LONG-TIME MEMBERS of Carpenters Local 813 were honored at dinner in Carbondale, Pa., marking the local union's 62d anniversary. Service pins were presented by Local. Pres. Patrick H. Gillott and merit certificates by Pres. Clyde O. Fitch of the Carbondale AFL-CIO. Guest speakers included Dr. Thomas H. Coleman and Mayor Frank L. Howard. Honored for longest service were Frank McGurl, 52-year member, Chester Robinson and Edward Roche, 50 years. Most of the 31 veteran members are pictured.

32 Community Groups Join:

Cincinnati Labor Helps Set Up Civil Rights Action Committee

Cincinnati—Organized labor here has joined with 32 other community groups to form the Cincinnati Action Committee for Human Rights, designed to provide a "broad base" of cooperative action in the campaign for full equality for Negroes and other minorities.

Heading the CAC is Rev. Otis Moss, Jr., regional director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Co-chairman is AFL-CIO Assistant Reg. Dir. William L. Kircher, secretary, Mrs. Paul Mosher of the League of Women Voters, and treasurer, Rabbi Albert A. Goldman.

Among other organizations represented are the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality, the Cincinnati Council of Churches, the Jewish Community Relations Committee, the Catholic Inter-Racial Council and the American Civil Liberties Union.

The CAC hopes to play a coordinating role in a community-wide drive by its member groups to assure equality of opportunity for all citizens. Prime targets are "the areas of education, housing and employment," it was announced.

To rally public attention, support and participation, the committee scheduled a "March and Vote for Jobs and Freedom," along a one-mile route from Washington Park to Government Square on Oct. 27.

A diversified industrial complex, Cincinnati was once the end of the "Underground Railroad," which helped fugitive slaves escape from the South.

It was designated by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as the lead-off community, with Washington and Boston next on the agenda, in a program to carry labor's civil rights fight into 30 or 40 of the nation's major cities.

The big-cities drive is under the direction of a special five-man civil rights committee consisting of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and A. Philip Randolph, and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Endorsed by Council

The Cincinnati AFL-CIO Labor Council immediately endorsed the federation program and named its own special civil rights committee composed of Kircher, Council Pres. Albert Bilik, Sec.-Treas. William P. Sheehan, William E. Garmes of the Auto Workers, Jack Kroll of the Clothing Workers, James Gallagher of the Steelworkers, Harry Williams of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Vincent Horan of the Lathers.

Officers of the council then met with leaders of local religious and civil rights groups who had been working in the same direction, and the formation of the Cincinnati Action Committee was the result. Kircher and Bilik represent the council on the CAC executive committee.

Prior to establishment of the CAC, local building trades unions had posted significant progress in labor's civil rights efforts following a series of meetings with contractors, civil rights groups and the Mayor's Friendly Relations Committee.

Bilik reported that "basically all of the local building trades unions have subscribed in writing to the four-point program set forth by their international presidents" to avoid discrimination in membership and job referrals.

The locals, Bilik said, added a fifth point setting up a committee to review the operation of the program. The committee is made up of two representatives of the unions, two for the contractors, two for civil rights groups and two public members.

The building trades program, as adopted by the 18 presidents of the national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. last June 21, urged locals to:

- Accept membership applicants who meet required qualifications regardless of race, creed, color or national origin.
- Refer job applicants under exclusive hiring hall arrangements in accordance with applicable law and the terms of their contracts, without discrimination and without identification as to race, creed, color or national origin.
- Refer job applicants without discrimination where exclusive hiring halls are not operated but where other referral systems are set forth in their contracts.
- Accept and refer qualified applicants for apprenticeship without discrimination.

CINCINNATI ACTION COMMITTEE for Human Rights, composed of representatives of some 32 community groups including organized labor, is led by Rev. Otis Moss, Jr., left, chairman and regional director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; William L. Kircher, co-chairman and assistant AFL-CIO regional director, and Mrs. Paul Mosher of the League of Women Voters, secretary, Not present was the treasurer, Rabbi Albert A. Goldman.

Federal Apprenticeship Proposals Are Revised

(Continued from Page 1)

that in carrying out his duties under the Federal Apprenticeship Act and Executive Order 10925 dealing with equal employment opportunity, the secretary "require that the admission of young workers to apprenticeship programs be on a completely non-discriminatory basis."

Wirtz's statement declares that "discrimination based on race, creed, color, or national origin has no place in American life today, particularly in the programs by which young people acquire the skills that determine their future employment prospects. Full equality of opportunity for all is a goal toward which both labor and management have pledged their efforts and which warrants the full cooperation of labor, management and the community."

Wirtz's directive puts responsibility for enforcing the new standards in the hands of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training. It spells out procedures for achieving compliance, for review of existing programs and for processing individual complaints of alleged discrimination.

Voluntary Compliance First Aim

The bureau is instructed to aim for voluntary compliance as a first step and to seek full federal-state cooperation in states which have apprenticeship committees and agencies responsible for enforcing fair employment practices legislation.

Written comments and arguments on the proposed new standards were allowable for 15 days after their publication in the Federal Register Oct. 23.

Since the first version of the regulations was issued last July, Labor Dept. officials have discussed them in a series of consultations with union and management officials, particularly in the construction industry. The standards will apply to federal apprenticeship programs in other industries as well, however.

In all, there are about 9,000 certified joint apprenticeship committees sponsored by unions and management, plus additional employer-sponsored programs. About 160,000 apprentices currently are enrolled across the nation.

A few weeks after the July regulations were issued, construction unions and management drew up a voluntary non-discrimination plan for industry apprenticeship programs. It was issued through the Construction Industry Joint Conference, made up of representatives of building trades unions and national contractor associations under the chairmanship of Prof. John T. Dunlop of the Harvard University economics department.

The program's major recommendations urged local affiliates of the labor and management organizations to act "promptly" to assure selection of apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone and to establish appeals machinery to review complaints.

A number of differences are apparent between the proposed regulations issued by Wirtz in July and those he has just propounded. One major change is the elimination of language which had been criticized as implying a requirement for "preferential treatment" or a "quota" system for Negro apprenticeship applicants where selection has not been based solely on merit.

The interpretation now reads that in such cases, application lists developed prior to this time "be opened to the extent necessary to provide current opportunities for selection of qualified members of racial and ethnic minority groups."

Examples of standards to be applied in the selection of apprentices "on the basis of qualifications alone," the interpretations state, would include "fair aptitude tests, high school diploma, age requirements, occupationally essential physical requirements, fair interviews, high school grades and previous work experience."

Qualifications Stressed

"Under this test," the statement continued, "both actual selection for and entry into apprenticeship must be on the basis of comparative qualifications alone.

"It is not enough for a program to establish a lengthy list on the basis of minimum qualifications standards and then select apprentices from the list on a basis other than comparative qualifications such as on the basis of time of application."

Wirtz's directive also said that every federally registered program "must contain a formal non-discrimination clause." One version of such a clause already has been circularized and another was suggested as follows:

"Selection of apprentices under the program shall be made from qualified applicants on the basis of qualifications alone and without regard to race, creed, color, national origin, sex or physical handicaps in accordance with objective standards which permit review, after full and fair opportunity for application; and this program shall be operated on a completely non-discriminatory basis."

THE AFL-CIO PRESENTS
Edward P. Morgan
AND THE NEWS
MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY — 7 P.M. E.S.T.
ABC

D. C. Apprentice Study Reveals Negro Gains

Placement of Negro youths in trade apprenticeships in Washington, D. C., has shown a significant gain since the establishment of the D. C. Apprenticeship Information Center last June 17, recent reports reveal.

One survey, undertaken by a joint committee of the D. C. Apprenticeship Council and the D. C. Commissioners' Council on Human Relations, also suggested that earlier studies of the extent of Negro apprentices in the nation's capitol have been incomplete.

The joint study found, for example, that as of July 1, there were 96 Negroes—or 7.8 percent—among the 1,230 apprentices in Washington building trades. This contrasts with a report from the U.S. Employment Service office as of last February that only one Negro building trades apprentice, a carpenter, could be found.

The later survey covered 1,844 of the 1,893 apprentices in all trades registered in Washington as of that date. Of the 1,844, it found that 216, or 11.7 percent, were Negroes.

The study reported that nearly a third, 29.2 percent of the apprentices registered with individual employers, were Negro, compared with 8.5 percent of those registered under joint apprenticeship committees co-sponsored by unions and management. However, it gave no breakdown to show how many of the individual employers were Negro firms which employ only Negroes.

Relatively high proportions of Negro apprentices were found by the survey among bricklayers (14 Negroes out of 52), printer-compositors (50 out of 299), bookbinders (6 out of 15), operating engineers (18 of 95), cement masons (10 of 21), bindery workers (10 of 40), auto mechanics (9 of 37), optical technicians (5 of 8) and pastry cooks (two apprentices, both Negroes).

In releasing the results of the survey, the joint committee noted that a number of Negro apprentices had been registered since the July 1 survey date. It reported, for example, that the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers JAC had added seven Negro apprentices for a total of nine, the Plumbers JAC had added five for a total of seven, the Carpenters JAC had added 15 for a total of 20 and the Pipe Fitters JAC had added two for a total of four.

The survey was terminated just a few weeks after the establishment of the city's Apprenticeship Information Center at the local U.S. Employment Service, and a report on the center's operations through Oct. 4 shows further gains.

H. Robert Borden, director of the center and a former Machinists' business agent, reported that in its first four months, his office had received 534 applications for apprenticeship training, of which 441 were from Negro youths; had qualified 125 persons for apprenticeship training, including 101 Negroes; had made 128 referrals to apprenticeship programs, including 116 Negroes, and had actually placed 34 young persons in employment as apprentices, among them 31 Negroes.

Borden observed that while personnel of the center were pleased by its early operations, "there is a great deal still to be done."

The center grew out of discussions among representatives of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, the Labor Dept., the D. C. Apprenticeship Council and the local Building Trades Council.

It is patterned after a pioneering apprenticeship center established in Los Angeles on the initiative of the AFL-CIO central body there. The Los Angeles center drew praise from the last AFL-CIO convention as a model for all parts of the country "to strengthen and invigorate all apprenticeship training programs and to make training opportunities available to all Americans."

TWIU Local Buys Aids for Members

Durham, N. C.—Tobacco Workers Local 183 has purchased three wheel chairs and three pairs of adjustable crutches for the use of members and their families who may require them.

The wheel chairs and crutches will be kept in the local office in the Labor Temple in custody of Financial Sec. Earl Haywood, who will make them available on a first come, first served basis.

Job Needs Stressed:

Quick Senate Action Pressed on Tax Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

bracket taxed at 12 percent and the upper portion at 15 percent. The House bill sets up four brackets with rates of 14, 15, 16 and 17 percent respectively.

- Modifying the drastic sick-pay exclusion changes made by the House. The House bill would end the present exclusion of sick pay up to $100 a week, except for pay received after 30 days of illness. The AFL-CIO asked that this curtailment of existing benefits be modified so as to apply only to wage continuation plans under which an employe receives his full salary while sick, and not to benefits paid under welfare or insurance plans, which seldom compensate a worker for his entire loss of earnings.
- Limiting the cut in the present 52 percent corporation tax, which the House bill would drop to 48 percent in two stages. Declaring that net corporate profits, dividend payments and retained cash are all headed for "new peaks," the AFL-CIO said the corporate tax rate should not be reduced below 50 percent.
- Dropping from the House bill, as the Administration has asked, a proposed cut in the capital gains tax rate.
- Adopting the "modest" loophole-closing proposals urged by the Administration but skipped over by the House, including a tightening of mineral depletion allowances and stock option provisions.

Biemiller told the committee that if tax cuts are to lead to greater demand for goods and manpower, the "priority need" is to concentrate the tax savings into the moderate-income and low-income groups which will quickly spend the money.

The Senate committee, headed by Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.), an avowed foe of a tax cut at present, has scheduled a marathon list of witnesses and has set no timetable for conclusion of the hearings.

Witnesses Divided

Witnesses, as well as committee members, divided in a number of directions in their evaluation of the House-passed bill.

On Oct. 22, Leon Keyserling, who headed the Council of Economic Advisers under Pres. Truman, termed the cut in corporation taxes and tax reductions for wealthy individuals "unnecessary and wasteful" and called for much bigger cuts for lower income groups.

The next day a former Eisenhower Administration Treasury official, Dan Throop Smith, attacked the tax bill on the grounds that it "discriminates against the middle-income and upper-income brackets."

SCENES FROM THE LIFE of Eleanor Roosevelt are presented in a collection of photographs, part of which is shown here, on exhibit at New York's Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts as part of the observance of a "memorial month" in tribute to Mrs. Roosevelt. Funds are being sought, with AFL-CIO backing, for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

Administration Steps Up Drive For Bipartisan Rights Package

(Continued from Page 1)

newsmen that if the vote had come when scheduled he would have supported the subcommittee bill "along with the other southerners" as the best way of blocking legislation. He indicated, however, that this strategy was subject to change.

On the Republican side, Rep. Arch A. Moore, Jr. (W.Va.) made a formal motion to approve the subcommittee bill and claimed the support of a majority of the Judiciary Committee's 14 Republicans.

However, McCulloch, whose influence with GOP members on the Rules Committee is considered of major importance, has publicly criticized the subcommittee bill as too sweeping.

If the motion to approve the subcommittee bill is defeated, the next step would presumably be a series of section-by-section votes on major provisions. These include bans on discrimination in employment, public accommodations, voting and education, and a proposal to give the Justice Dept. broad authority to seek injunctions to bar denial of constitutional or legal rights.

Included in the subcommittee draft is an equal job opportunity bill previously approved by the House Labor Committee, which the AFL-CIO has strongly endorsed as the key to civil rights progress.

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said the Administration "most strongly" supports action now on a fair employment guarantee but left it to the judgment of the committee as to whether it should be included in the committee's omnibus bill, offered as an amendment on the floor of the House, or considered as separate legislation.

In another area of congressional committee activity, the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee voted to restore most of the slashes the House has made in the foreign aid authorization bill. The committee put a $4.2 billion ceiling on new foreign aid funds, considerably closer to the $4.5 billion asked by the Administration than to the $3.5 billion voted by the House.

The bill faces further cutting attempts on the Senate floor, however, and then a conference compromise with the House version.

Coming up in the House, probably within a week, is a second go-around on continuation of the "bracero" program—the importation of Mexican farm labor for seasonal work in the United States. The AFL-CIO and leading religious groups have called for an end to the program on the grounds that it has held down the conditions of domestic farm workers.

Last May, the House voted 174-158 against continuing the bracero program for two years beyond its scheduled Dec. 31 expiration date. The Senate revived the program by passing a one-year extension, but added a number of reforms to protect U.S. workers.

The House Agriculture Committee then brought out a new bill extending the program for one year, without reforms. Big growers, principal users of imported labor, have been lobbying intensively for the bill.

10-26-63

Aircraft Firm Directed To Bargain on Training

Refusal of the United Aircraft Corp. to bargain with the Machinists on wages, hours and working conditions of employes enrolled in a company-sponsored training school was an unfair labor practice in violation of federal law, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Three board members upheld Trial Examiner Joseph I. Nachman's finding that the firm's refusal to bargain for trainees in the IAM unit at the Hamilton Standard Div. in Hartford, Conn., last year was unfair.

The same three-man panel dismissed Nachman's finding that management broke the law when it refused to give the IAM lodge president time off to discuss the union's refusal-to-bargain charge with an NLRB agent who visited Hartford.

Members Boyd Leedom, John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown said lodge Pres. Butler J. Seedman did not explain why the meeting had to be held during his working hours and in fact did meet with the board agent after work. The evidence, they said, did not clearly disclose a discriminatory motive by management.

The dispute started 11 months ago when management posted a notice saying it would conduct a training school for 22 weeks to provide itself with a supply of machinists. When Seedman inquired, he was told that employes accepted for training would be paid $2.17 to $2.37 an hour and would not be in the union bargaining unit during training nor be subject to dues deduction under the contract "check-off" provision.

IBEW Local Wins Cut in Workweek

New York—A 38-hour workweek is provided in new contracts negotiated by Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers with the Rab Electric Co. in the Bronx and the Advanced Onyx Co. in Brooklyn.

Anti-Union Bonus Pay Knocked Out by NLRB

An employer's refusal of union requests for a wage increase while at the same time hiring unneeded workers, at higher pay, as potential strikebreakers was an unfair labor practice, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled in upholding charges brought by the Potters against the Sunbeam Plastics Corp., Evansville, Ind.

The firm's conduct in negotiations showed, the board said, that its primary purpose was to reach "no agreement at all' with the union.

Members Boyd Leedom and John H. Fanning ordered Sunbeam to stop its unlawful practices and to bargain in good faith. Member Gerald A. Brown agreed but added a partial dissent—he said layoffs of 15 union supporters were made under the pretext of following seniority lines but actually were taken to thwart the union's organizing drive and to avoid the firm's obligation to bargain with the Potters.

In its decision the board found that Sunbeam started unfair labor practices "almost immediately after it learned of the activities of its employes" on behalf of the union. After the Potters won a board-conducted election and were certified in April 1962, bargaining began with company Atty. Arthur Donovan stating the employer "could not see its way clear" to grant any increase in wages or economic benefits.

This, the board held, was an "inaccurate presentation" of the firm's position because Donovan later conceded in testimony before the board that management had given him authority "to give a little bit of wages."

The board majority agreed with Trial Examiner Thomas F. Maher that Sunbeam made promises to employes to thwart the union, threatened a shutdown if the union won, discriminated against union members in recalling workers after the strike, and failed to bargain in good faith.

The firm was ordered to reinstate 12 union supporters immediately and to make up any pay loss they suffered.

Senate Approves College Aid Bill, Court Test Poses Conference Issue

(Continued from Page 1)

resolved, presumably by the Supreme Court.

The House had decisively rejected a milder version of the amendment. In the last Congress, both House and Senate passed college aid bills but were unable to reach final agreement, although the points of conflict were different than this year.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), floor manager of the bill and an opponent of the Ervin-Cooper amendment, told the Senate before the final vote that he did not intend to stand firm for the Senate language at the risk of killing college aid. He said he will be "open-minded" in considering any suggestion by House conferees for modification of the amendment.

Another point of difference is that the Senate bill limits federal grants to the defense-related categories of science, engineering and libraries while the House permits funds for any academic, non-religious facility. The point was made in debate, however, that federal funds for science and engineering classrooms would free a college's own funds for other projects.

Both bills earmark funds for public junior or community colleges as well as public and private senior institutions.

The Senate's vocational education bill, besides including more money than the House version, also extends the National Defense Education Act and the program of school aid to "impacted" communities, where there are large numbers of federal civilian and military personnel.

Fewer problems are anticipated in reaching agreement on vocational education legislation than on the college aid measure, where feelings ran strong on delicate issues of church-state relations.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Nov. 2, 1963 | No. 44

October Marks Sixth Year With Joblessness Above 5%

FREEDOM MARCH in Cincinnati, sponsored by the labor-supported Cincinnati Action Committee for Human Rights, brought 25,000 people into Government Square for a massive, orderly civil rights demonstration. (See story Page 10)

Month's 5.5% Rate Tops 1962 Level

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment situation remained unimproved in October, with the jobless rate holding high at 5.5 percent, according to the Labor Dept.'s summary job report.

The changes in employment and unemployment between September and October were "mainly seasonal," the report said.

"The number of unemployed totaled 3.5 million in October, the same as in the previous month but 150,000 above a year ago," the report added.

With the October jobless rate of 5.5 percent, the nation completed its sixth straight full year of unemployment at 5 percent or over. In November 1957, the jobless rate jumped to 5.1 percent with the onset of the 1957-58 recession. In the past 72 months, the rate has been running double or more than the rate of the early 1950s.

The key jobless rate of 5.5 percent, adjusted for seasonal influences, compared to 5.3 percent for October 1962.

The October rate reached 6.4 percent in the 1961 recession. The postwar low for the month was 3 percent in 1952.

The rate of unemployment during 1963 has ranged from a high of 6.1 percent in February down to 5.5 percent for August and October. It edged up to 5.6 percent in September.

The total of longterm unemployed—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—remained unchanged this month at 900,000. This has been the total for the last few months and is about the same as in October a year ago.

The longterm unemployed, during postwar Octobers, reached a high of 1.4 million in the 1958 recession and a low of 216,000 in 1951.

Among the 900,000 longterm jobless in October, the report noted, were 500,000 "who have been

(Continued on page 5)

Foreign Aid Cut Fought In Senate

The $4.2 billion foreign aid bill now before the Senate represents the "absolute minimum" necessary to assure the "growth of freedom" throughout the world, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller called for approval "without change" of the measure drafted by the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee. In a letter to each senator, Biemiller termed the bill "one of the most important issues to face the American people and Congress this year."

The bill, authorizing $300 million less than the President had asked but $700 million above the amount voted by the House, faced a heavy cross-fire of amendments as the Senate settled down for a protracted debate.

Supporters, fighting motions to cut specific portions of the program plus the announced intent of Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) to force the bill back to committee for a major rewriting, pointed out that whatever amount the Senate voted would face further cuts in conference with the House.

Biemiller said the foreign aid program, backed by labor since

(Continued on Page 12)

Kennedy To Address Convention

Pres. Kennedy will head the list of speakers at the AFL-CIO's 5th constitutional convention, scheduled to open Nov. 14 at the Americana Hotel in New York, Federation Pres. George Meany has announced.

Other major speeches, Meany said, will be given by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, National Cmdr. Daniel Foley of the American Legion, Pres. Arne Geijer of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and ICFTU Sec. Gen. Omer Becu.

Invitations to address the delegates also have been extended to Sec. of State Dean Rusk and Adlai Stevenson, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Opening day greetings will be given by New York Mayor Robert F. Wagner and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, but times of the other speeches have not yet been set.

Meany also announced that the convention would devote a special order of business to a discussion of labor's efforts in the campaign to assure full equality for all citizens in all areas of American life. He said AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph had accepted his invitation to lead the discussion with a major speech on civil rights.

Fraternal delegates to the convention from the British Trades Union Congress will be Harry Douglass, general secretary of the Iron & Steel Trades Confederation, and Dame Anne Godwin, general secretary of the Clerical & Administrative Workers Union. Representing the Canadian Labor Congress

(Continued on Page 2)

House Committee Acts:

Bipartisan Support Clears Rights Bill

By David L. Perlman

A bipartisan label was stamped on civil rights legislation as the House Judiciary Committee approved a bill outlawing discrimination in employment, public accommodations and voting, and giving the federal government new powers to speed desegregation of schools and public facilities.

The bill carried the endorsement of House Democratic and Republican leaders—along with a commitment made at a top-level White House meeting to help push the measure through the Rules Committee and to passage by the House.

A summary of the Judiciary Committee's civil rights bill appears on Page 11.

Before giving 23-11 approval to the leadership-backed bill, the Judiciary Committee voted 19-15 to sidetrack a broader subcommittee measure. The subcommittee bill, endorsed by a number of civil rights groups, was opposed by the Administration after key Republicans had served notice that it could not command the bipartisan support needed to become law.

FEP Included

The final committee bill includes the ban on job discrimination which topped the AFL-CIO's civil rights legislative program. Its enforcement procedure, however, is more cumbersome than that provided in a bill approved earlier this year by the House Labor Committee and incorporated intact into the Judiciary subcommittee's civil rights package.

The original labor-supported measure, modeled after National Labor Relations Board procedure, would have allowed a new Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to order a halt to discriminatory practices and to seek enforcement of its orders through the federal appellate courts.

The new version requires the commission to bring its charges before a federal district court which will try the case and determine the

(Continued on Page 11)

Senate Study Labels Kerr-Mills Act 'Ineffective, Piecemeal Approach'

By John M. Barry

A study of the Kerr-Mills Act's first three years of operations has produced a strongly critical report from a Senate subcommittee charging that the Medical Assistance for the Aged program is "at best an ineffective and piecemeal approach to the health problems of the nation's 18 million older citizens."

The Subcommittee on Health of the Elderly cited seven "major defects" in Kerr-Mills operations, ranging from lack of wide participation to high administrative costs. It declared that its findings "confirm the conclusions of earlier studies that the MAA program did not, and could not by itself, constitute an effective national solution" to the pressing health problems of older citizens.

Subcommittee Chairman Pat McNamara commented that the report "confirms my long standing belief that only through the universal approach of a social security-financed program, can the basic health needs of our senior citizens be effectively met."

The social security approach is the basis of the King-Anderson bill, the subject of forthcoming hearings by the House Ways & Means Committee. Kerr-Mills was enacted in 1960 to provide federal matching grants to states to provide health care to "medically indigent" elderly persons whose incomes and assets fall within limits set individually by the states.

The American Medical Association and other opponents of social security financing have contended that Kerr-Mills, supplemented by

(Continued on Page 12)

N.Y. Times Supplement To Tell AFL-CIO Story

"The Hands That Build America," a 44-page magazine supplement telling the story of the AFL-CIO as it meets for its 5th convention, will be distributed as a section of the New York Sunday Times Nov. 17, and with the Times' West Coast edition the following day.

The rotogravure supplement was prepared as a project of the federation's Dept. of Public Relations under the supervision of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. All headquarters staff departments contributed material, and 26 AFL-CIO unions and affiliated departments purchased space to present their own messages and help cover costs.

These paid messages consume about 20 pages of total space, with the balance devoted to text detailing organized labor's achievements since the early days of the nation, its current programs and problems, and its aspirations for the future.

Major articles deal with the AFL-CIO's objectives, the state of its 131 national and international unions and their 60,000 locals, the federation's efforts to help build democratic trade unionism in the developing nations, its fight for equal rights for all Americans, automation's impact on jobs, labor's role in community services and voter registration drives, and the AFL-CIO's function as "the people's lobby" in pressing for state and federal legislation of benefit to the entire nation.

Following distribution of the supplement by the Times, additional copies will be available from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Single copies will be free. Quantity prices will be 10 cents each in lots of less than 1,000 and $75 per 1,000 or larger orders.

Kennedy, Wirtz, Geijer To Speak at Convention

(Continued from Page 1)

will be Executive Vice Pres. Joe Morris.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council will hold a one-day meeting Nov. 13. The convention will open at 10 a.m., the following day, go into recess Saturday and Sunday while committees are in session, and reconvene Monday morning, the 18th.

A recess is scheduled that afternoon for a meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board, made up of Executive Council members and the chief executive officers of affiliated national and international unions and trade and industrial departments.

In advance of the federation's biennial gatherings, five of its departments will hold their own conventions. The Industrial Union Dept. will meet at the Statler Hotel in Washington, Nov. 7-8. Assembling at the Americana in New York will be the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Nov. 6-8; the Metal Trades Dept., Nov. 11-13; the Maritime Trades Dept., Nov. 11-13, and the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., Nov. 11-12.

In addition, the Intl. Labor Press Association will hold its annual meeting Nov. 11-13 at the Park-Sheraton Hotel in New York, and the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries will meet Nov. 14-19 at the Americana.

International visitors expected as AFL-CIO convention guests include Gen. Sec. Arturo Jauregui, Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers; Joint Sec. Rhaidhri Roberts, Irish Congress of Trade Unions; Gen. Sec. Haruo Wada, Japanese Trade Union Congress; Gen. Sec. J. H. Pollydore, British Guiana Trades Union Council; Gen. Sec. Mamadou E. Jallow, Gambia Workers' Union; Gen. Sec. Habib Achour, Union Generale Tunieienne du Travail.

Other Guests

Also Gen. Sec. Clement Lubembe, Kenya Federation of Labor; Gen. Sec. Raphael Ngamby, Cameroon Federation of Trade Unions; Gen. Sec. A. Kithima, Syndicat National des Travailleurs Congolais; Gen. Sec. Lawrence Borha, United Labor Congress of Nigeria; Deputy Gen. Sec. P. Barreiro Lulendo, Liga Geral de Trabalhadores de Angola (in exile); Pres. Tranquoc Buu, Vietnamese Confederation of Christian Labor; Gen. Sec. Tom Bavin, Intl. Federation of Plantation, Agricultural & Allied Workers.

General Board Meet Is Set for Nov. 18

The AFL-CIO General Board will meet in the Americana Hotel in New York at 2:30 p.m. on Nov. 18, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has notified federation affiliates.

The board is composed of members of the Executive Council and the president or chief executive officer of each affiliated national or international union and each trade and industrial department.

Under Art. X of the AFL-CIO constitution, the General Board is charged with deciding "all policy questions referred to it by the Executive Officers or the Executive Council." The Executive Council has adopted a policy that General Board meetings will be executive in character.

Union Attorneys To Meet Nov. 18

A conference of attorneys representing the AFL-CIO and its affiliates will be held at 2 p.m., Nov. 18, at the Americana Hotel in New York City during the federation's convention there, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced.

The conference will be under the direction of AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll.

Inviting participation by union legal representatives, Meany said the meeting would provide "an excellent opportunity to frankly and candidly review the many vital legal issues that presently affect organized labor and the nation generally."

West Indies Unionists Train in Puerto Rico

New York—Eleven union officals from the British West Indies have enrolled at Puerto Rico's Inter-American University on full scholarships provided by the U.S. Agency for Intl. Development, according to an announcement here by the United Presbyterian Church.

Eight unionists from Trinidad, and three others are enrolled in a 15-week seminar. After graduation they will conduct labor relations courses in their own communities.

Treasury Recommendations Attacked:

Ship Officers' Safety Drive Aimed at Tanker Hazards

New York—The Masters, Mates & Pilots have launched a major campaign to eliminate hazardous conditions and practices aboard tankers and other U.S.-flag merchant ships.

The union's safety committee announced the drive on the heels of a government report that failed to recommend mandatory safety precautions the MM&P regards as essential to guard against explosions from gases given off by highly volatile cargo residues in empty tankers.

The MM&P called on deck officers themselves to see that such vessels are rendered gas free.

Its statement charged that the government panel—the Treasury Dept. Committee on Tanker Hazards—lacked "the single individual most capable of intelligently and objectively serving the committee's function: a qualified tanker deck officer."

Charles M. Crooks, president of the union and chairman of its safety committee, disclosed that he had issued such a warning in a letter to Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon when the government committee was announced Apr. 18, 1962.

His offer to supply the services of an experienced officer, Crooks said, went unheeded, and the Treasury Committee issued its report last Aug. 14.

The MM&P committee said that after a lengthy study of key court decisions and Coast Guard hearings dealing with gas-freeing and other safety precautions, it was convinced "that there are sufficient guidelines established for effective enforcement by officers who are charged with overall responsibility by federal laws."

Where court opinions vary from informal or government-sponsored studies, the committee said, enforcement will be based on the court decisions as representing "the ultimate test."

It contrasted the position of the Treasury committee in declining to recommend mandatory gas-freeing precautions with a federal court ruling in the Mission San Francisco case, which the MM&P committee described as "the classic case" on the lack of safety practices in the tankship trade.

The Mission, a government chartered tanker, was bound from Philadelphia to New York with its tanks empty when it collided with a cargo vessel in the Delaware River, Mar. 6, 1957. Ten crew members including the master, all deck watch officers, pilot and radio officer, were killed in the resulting explosions and fires.

The courts declared that the vessel should not have been permitted to proceed without being rendered gas free and that its condition as it navigated through "relatively crowded narrow channels" made it "as dangerous as a ship laden with explosives." The ship owners, and the government as operators, were found guilty of negligence for failure to provide gas-freeing or inerting equipment.

The MM&P safety committee, which besides Crooks includes Vice Pres. Patrick J. King, Sec.-Treas. John M. Bishop and Marvin Schwartz, the union's counsel, also listed two other targets in its campaign:

- Company pressures on deck officers to maintain speed under low visibility conditions, such as fog, despite court and Coast Guard rulings that the only safe speed is that which enables the vessel to stop within half the distance of visibility.
- The "growing practice" of many companies of failing to provide the watch officer with a full watch on deck at all times during loading or discharging in port, in violation of Coast Guard requirements.

Calling on members to keep the MM&P apprised of all unsafe shipboard conditions and practices, the committee warned that lack of adequate safety precautions not only presents a danger to life and property, but also jeopardizes the Coast Guard licenses of deck officers and, as a result, their livelihoods and accrued pension rights.

3 Unionists Named Federal Conciliators

Three former officials of AFL-CIO affiliates are among 10 new conciliators announced by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

They are Thomas A. Brennan, Elberon, N. J., formerly a Brewery Workers international representative who has been assigned to the FMCS office in St. Louis; Robert E. Crusie, former president of Rubber Workers Local 200, Saint Marys, O., assigned to Washington headquarters; Richard D. Williams, Markham, Ill., a former international representative of the Auto Workers, who will work out of Chicago.

Organizing Campaign Adds 6,000 in Maine

Portland, Me.—A concentrated and coordinated organizing drive by the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions in Maine has brought 6,000 new members into union bargaining units in the last 20 months.

Participating unions have recorded success in 61.9 percent of the 42 elections they engaged in—26 wins to 16 losses—and raised total union membership in the state past the 60,000 mark, greatly improving the organizing climate and the standing of unions, economically and politically, according to drive participants.

Success was credited to the "complete harmony and unity among participating unions," said George Craig of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, headed by Dir. John Livingston.

The organizing effort got under way at a meeting here early in 1962, following guidelines for organizing laid down by the federation's Executive Council and the 1961 convention, which called for more vigorous organizing efforts and cooperation of area unions with each other.

Nineteen unions pooled their efforts in the drive, which brought in new union units ranging from eight to 1,800. One of the results of the campaign was the creation of a new 600-member local in one area with an immediate potential of 1,300 members.

The main "target" areas were Portland and Bangor, which have an unorganized potential of 4,000 more workers. The Maine organizing committee under AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Hugh Thompson and Arthur Lebel, coordinator, has agreed to concentrate on that potential and to leave for later efforts some 4,100 workers who voted against union representation by a margin of 2.5 to 1.5.

A feature of the campaign here was the committee's policy of frank and open publicity—announcing the organizing goals, identifying them by name, and urging workers to cooperate with the committee.

The result was a steady flurry of reports on organizing possibilities and sustained interest by non-union workers in helping the drive.

The first announcement of the drive, in the Portland Evening Express and other newspapers, listed 12 plants for organization, including one plant where workers had turned down three previous union invitations. The fourth time broke the spell—the workers voted last Mar. 15, 195 to 172, for four cooperating unions: the Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Firemen & Oilers, and Carpenters.

The organizing committee won 11 elections in 1962 and 15 this year. It lost 9 in 1962, 7 in 1963.

STARS OF THE STAGE, screen and television helped make the 15th annual exhibit of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO a hit at the Los Angeles County Fair in Pomona, Calif. The picture shows Keenan Wynn, veteran actor who was one of several performers provided by Actors Equity and other unions, passing out a shopping bag to a fair fair-goer.

Office Employes Organize:

Noon-Hour 'Musical' Keys Wall St. Drive

New York—Wall St. got itself an earful and an eyeful when Office Employes Local 153 took a show to the famed financial district.

The earful was a "musical" organizing campaign on the exalted steps of the Subtreasury building, where George Washington was sworn in as the first President of the United States.

During the noon hour, when thousands of bank and brokerage firm employes spill out for the lunch break, Local 153 had a 12-piece band and top recording star Johnny Desmond, who regaled his audience with such pointedly titled songs like, "What Kind Of Fool Am I?"

The eyeful consisted of 25 of the best-looking female members of Local 153, complete with Pilgrim collars, who circulated through the throng distributing membership applications. About 20,000 pieces of literature were distributed. The membership application itself was a rather unique device, printed like a stock certificate which on one side said:

"This certificate entitles the bearer to a large share of benefits through Local 153, Office Employes Union, AFL-CIO. It is redeemable in greater job security, better working conditions, overtime rates, sick leave and vacations, guaranteed bonuses and commissions, salary increases and health care. To be effective, this certificate should be properly executed on the reverse hereof and registered with Local 153, OEIU, AFL-CIO." It was signed by Howard Coughlin, OEIU president. On the back was a stamped and self-addressed application form.

There were two performances to take care of both the 12 noon and 1 p.m. lunch hours. Desmond and the orchestra did both "matinee" and "evening" performances.

Between songs and music, Coughlin told an audience estimated at more than 20,000 that the future of Wall St. employes is grim without the protection of collective bargaining.

The continuing intrusion and spread of automation in banks and brokerage houses, he warned, will more and more weaken whatever job security might exist.

He quoted U.S. Labor Dept. figures, statements by John Snyder, president of U.S. Industries, and Pres. Kennedy in support of the union position that collective bargaining is the only answer to the problems of Wall St. personnel.

Coughlin pointed to the fact that most Wall St. firms are unincorporated partnerships, which divide their profits at the end of each fiscal year. There isn't any provision for retention of surplus to be used for the establishment of a pension plan, he emphasized, and, as a consequence, most brokerage house employes face retirement with only the possibility of Social Security.

"There is no reason whatsoever," he said "why a Streetwide pension plan cannot be established whereby employes working for brokerage houses any place in the financial area can participate and benefit."

He explained that the plan could provide full coverage even if employes change their place of employment within the financial industry.

PREFERRED STOCK

PAR VALUE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

1
SHARE UNLIMITED SECURITY

OFFICE EMPLOYES INTERNATIONAL UNION AFL-CIO LOCAL No. 153 NEW YORK, N. Y.

OEIU LOCAL 153 AFL-CIO

265 WEST 14 STREET • NEW YORK 11, N. Y. • ORegon 5-8585

This certificate entitles the bearer to a large share of benefits through Local 153, Office Employes International Union, AFL-CIO. It is redeemable in greater job security, better working conditions, overtime rates, sick leave and vacations, guaranteed bonuses and commissions, salary increases and health care.

To be effective, this certificate should be properly executed on the reverse hereof and registered with Local 153, OEIU, AFL-CIO.

CERTIFICATE NO. 153

Howard Coughlin
REPRESENTING AGENT FOR LOCAL 153

ORGANIZING MESSAGE of the Office Employes was carried to workers in banks and brokerage houses on New York's Wall St. with lunchtime rallies on the steps of the Subtreasury. As OEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin (speaking) described the advantages of union membership to a total of 20,000 listeners, 25 of the union's prettiest feminine members mingled with the crowd and passed out "shares" of "preferred stock" (lower photo) listing union benefits and carrying membership applications on the reverse side. Singer Johnny Desmond and his orchestra helped draw the audience.

Labor Urges Civil Defense Funds Boost

The AFL-CIO has urged a Senate Appropriations subcommittee to restore $64.1 million cut by the House from the funds sought by the Administration for the nation's civil defense program in fiscal 1964.

"Most important and essential," said AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, is the $46.9 million the house failed to include to cover the government's program of stocking shelter space in existing buildings with food, water containers, and medical, radiation and sanitation kits.

In a letter to Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), Biemiller also noted that the House had trimmed $12.2 million from the $82.2 million sought for operation and maintenance of established civil defense programs, including matching grants to states and local civil defense organizations.

In addition, he observed, the Administration's request for $22.8 million for civil defense research, shelter survey and marking had been cut back by $5 million.

Rail Shop Unions Seek Authorization for Strike

Six railroad shopcraft unions have asked their 160,000 members to vote strike authorization in order to move year-old negotiations on job security off dead center.

The unions, in a joint bargaining drive coordinated by the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept., are seeking to protect shop workers against what the strike vote circular described as "the most serious problem affecting the shopcraft employes . . . the severe decline in jobs and the hardships resulting to employes."

The Machinists, Carmen, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Boilermakers, and Firemen & Oilers are asking:

- A ban on subcontracting out of repair work regularly performed in railroad shops.
- Severance pay for employes whose jobs are abolished because of technological change.
- Extension of the employe protection package which has been provided in railroad mergers since 1936 to cover workers displaced "as a result of any changes in the Presidential Emergency Board and operation" of a railroad.

This provides a guarantee of 60 percent of regular pay for up to five years for workers who lose their jobs.

The unions submitted their demands in the fall of 1962, but little progress has been made in negotiations and mediation.

Since then the non-operating unions have also submitted proposals for wage, holiday and vacation improvements. The negotiations on these issues are being conducted separately and are not involved in the strike vote.

Nov. 21 is the deadline for return of the strike ballots. If a strike is authorized, the unions would then be able to set a strike date if current mediation efforts fail to bring an agreement. That would normally lead to appointment of a

IUE Westinghouse Conference Approves New 3-Year Contract

Pittsburgh—The Westinghouse Conference Board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has approved a new three-year agreement with the Westinghouse Electric Corp. calling for wage increases averaging 13.5 cents an hour, improved vacations, wider service credits for pensions, seniority and vacations, an increase in weekly layoff income benefits and improvements in pension and insurance benefits.

The board gave its approval after 12 weeks of negotiations, including two weeks of talks after an Oct. 14 contract expiration date. The pact provides improved benefits for 36,000 covered workers.

Meanwhile, negotiations between the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Westinghouse continued with the aid of federal mediators. The union said strike authorization votes received from several IBEW locals could signal walkouts at any time after midnight Oct. 31.

The IUE-Westinghouse board said in a statement that while a number of problems fought for in bargaining remain unsolved, gains made during the negotiations will "have a great impact" on Westinghouse workers and their families.

"Through application of an accumulated service provision of the contract," it said, "thousands of workers with interrupted service in the Westinghouse chain will automatically gain in pension entitlements, job rights and vacation benefits."

Medical and hospital benefits have been increased and the coverage broadened, but the board added it was "mindful of the improvements that were not offered" by the company and of other provisions the company insisted on and must "now prove workable and not regressive."

"Westinghouse must show a new spirit," it observed, "in equitable adjustment of grievances, or face continuous court tests on the arbitrability of unresolved complaints.

"In locations where the company may now arbitrarily set the dates of workers' vacations, it must demonstrate equal concern between the needs of the workers and production schedules.

"Incentive systems, particularly in the lamp division, must be reevaluated and overhauled to justify their usefulness. The problem of health and insurance protection for retirees cannot be ignored. And, as one of the major corporations in the U.S., Westinghouse must work with the union in seeking remedies to the job insecurity brought on by subcontracting and automation."

Four More Navy Bases Recognize Metal Trades

AFL-CIO unions have won exclusive bargaining rights at three more naval shipyards and a Navy torpedo station, the federation's Metal Trades Dept. has announced.

Pres. B. A. Gritta said the new recognition agreements cover nearly 6,500 blue collar workers at the Portsmouth, N. H., shipyard, 5,000 workers at the Long Beach, Calif., Naval Shipyard and 6,000 employed at the San Francisco shipyard.

All three shipyards recognized local metal trades councils as exclusive bargaining agents for hourly-paid workers on the basis of membership card checks.

The Metal Trades affiliates, which have been conducting a massive organizing campaign since Pres. Kennedy's executive order on union recognition, now hold bargaining rights for nearly 50,000 workers at eight of the nation's 11 naval shipyards.

At the U.S. Naval Torpedo Station at Keyport, Wash., where the issue of recognition went to an election, the 538 employes voted overwhelmingly for the Bremerton Metal Trades Council, Gritta said.

Contract negotiations will get under way soon at the Navy installations where bargaining rights have been won. Contracts have already been negotiated at two shipyards—at Bremerton, Wash., and Brooklyn, N. Y.

Living Costs Stay Stable In September

The consumer's cost of living remained unchanged in September for the second straight month as lower prices for food and transportation offset price hikes for other goods and services, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Factory workers' take-home pay rose to $87.78 per week as a result of increases in the workweek and hourly earnings, the department said in a companion report.

With consumer prices remaining stable, this rise in spendable earnings represented a gain in real earnings or buying power, it was noted.

The Consumer Price Index stood at 107.1 in September, the report said. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.71.

"The index was nine-tenths of 1 percent above a year ago," the report added, "principally because of higher costs of services, particularly those associated with housing, medical care and recreation."

Union-negotiated escalator clauses tied to the September CPI will bring cost-of-living wage hikes of 1 or 2 cents an hour to some 80,000 workers, most of them in aerospace and public transit firms. Another 22,000 workers in a variety of industries will receive 1-cent or 2-cent hikes based on city indexes.

The report on spendable earnings showed a rise of $1.20 to $87.78 for a factory worker with three dependents. The single worker's spendable earnings—gross pay reduced by federal income and social security taxes—recorded a rise of $1.12 to $80.01 a week.

In both cases, there was a 2 percent increase over the year. Real earnings—take-home pay reduced by any rise in the cost of living—were up 1 percent over the year.

Ontario Hospital Plan Run at Cost of 2.2%

Toronto, Ont.—Ontario's public hospitalization plan has paid more than $1 billion in benefits since it was started on Jan. 1, 1959, an administrative cost of only 2.2 percent, according to a report by the Hospital Services Commission.

In the four-year period ending Dec. 31, 1962, benefits of more than $805 million were paid to cover services to nearly 6.2 million persons, the report showed.

STRIKING MEMBERS of the Communications Workers picket a General Telephone Co. installation in California. Nearly 9,000 employes struck after the company refused to match the "going rate" on wages and benefits established earlier in contracts with Bell System companies.

New York Firemen Mark 45th Birthday

New York—The 45-year history of Local 94 of the Fire Fighters proves that public employes "have a place in the trade union movement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at an anniversary assembly here.

He was addressing a dinner of the Uniformed Firemen's Association of Greater New York, which the local had dedicated to him as guest of honor because, as the citation put it, "There has been no individual in organized labor who has given longer service to the New York City fire fighter."

'Distinguished American'

In a congratulatory telegram to the union, Pres. Kennedy said he was "delighted to send my warm greetings" to Local 94 and to the guest of honor, "a distinguished American I am pleased to call my friend."

"Such an occasion," said the President, "serves to remind the community of its gratitude to those who risk their lives to safeguard their fellow-citizens from what was the great scourge of cities."

A sad note of the evening came when Local Pres. Gerald J. Ryan, the dinner chairman, announced that in the 45-year history of the union, 423 firemen had been killed in the line of duty.

Meany told the 1,800 dinner guests that the AFL-CIO was concerned with building free trade unions overseas and that 25 percent of its budget was spent outside of the U.S. for this purpose.

He was proud of AFL-CIO sponsorship of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which is teaching Latin American workers "the rudiments of American trade unionism and the American economy," he continued.

"No dictator can dictate," he said, "unless he controls the means of production, and he cannot control them if the workers are free to form free trade unions."

Another speaker was Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who described Meany as "at once the symbol of both hard-won battles and the enduring economic and social advances of the American labor movement."

Rockefeller Lauds Meany

"Relatively few are aware," the New York governor said, "of the extent to which the influence of George Meany has extended throughout the world and especially in the western hemisphere."

Mayor Robert F. Wagner expressed pride that the city government's labor relations policy had "greatly stimulated the organization of city employes into unions . . . and today thousands of city employes are organized into locals affiliated with the AFL-CIO."

"I have always supported the position," he said, "that public employes are entitled to organization, so that they may, effectively and in an orderly manner, present their requests for wage adjustments and improved job conditions and their grievances."

The mayor said that "the really big job" facing labor and his own administration is "the fight for state legislation abolishing the onerous and unrealistic penalties in the Condon-Wadlin Act," a state law prohibiting strikes by public employes. Such legislation "must clearly recognize the principle of home rule," he said.

Flight Engineers Elect William Gill President

The Flight Engineers elected a new president at their 15th annual convention, held in Washington, and voted a "substantial" increase in membership assessments to support 600 members on strike since June 23, 1962, against Eastern Air Lines.

The new president is William A. Gill, Jr., previously vice president of the FEIA chapter at Pan American World Airways. He was installed as successor to Ronald A. Brown, who will serve temporarily as assistant to Gill until returning to United Air Lines as a flight engineer.

Brown resigned after serving four years. He said the union will intensify its support of members who struck against Eastern and will continue its efforts to get a contract similar to those reached on Pan American and TWA.

Eastern, said Brown, has refused to accept terms similar to those in a settlement formula worked out by former Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg and urged on the airline by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Delegates agreed to increase picketing at seven Eastern locations. It was agreed also that the new president should work vigorously toward settlement of a contract dispute with American Airlines, where negotiations over working conditions and crew complement have been continuing for more than two years.

Gill, who is 39, has had 11 years of union experience. He did three years of maintenance and flight engineering in the Air Force; six years of maintenance and inspection work for the former Capital Airlines; 11 years as flight engineer for Pan American. He has been an FEIA board member for eight years.

CWA on Picket Lines:

Struck Phone Firm Accused of Threats

By Eugene A. Kelly

Santa Monica, Calif.—A strike of 8,800 Communications Workers against the General Telephone Co. of California has brought union charges of company intimidation in the form of cancellation of life insurance and sick benefits, and deportation threats against workers who are not American citizens.

The union said the campaign started soon after picket lines were set up Oct. 19. It filed a blanket unfair labor practice charge covering "all acts of intimidation, coercion and restraint" and also urged U.S. Attorney Gen. Robert Kennedy and the Federal Communications Commission to investigate company monitoring of union telephone calls and discontinuance of telephone service to several strike leaders.

The walkout was called after five months of unsuccessful negotiations over contract terms. The company, the union said, refused to meet terms similar to those accepted recently by the other big telephone utility here, the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., a unit of the Bell System. Major issues are wages, vacations, pensions, health insurance and extraordinary medical expense benefits.

General of California is the largest unit in the General chain, largest "independent" phone firm in the nation. While pickets marched in this state, talks on new contracts at other General units have slowed almost to a standstill. The other units are General of the Southwest, Southeast, Indiana, Iowa and Wisconsin and the recently acquired Western California Telephone Co., totaling 6,000 CWA members.

The California contract had a July 6 expiration date which was extended from time to time until bargaining was broken off. A major sticking point, the union said, was management's refusal to complete pension plan improvements in less than 10 years. A five-year program was recently negotiated in pacts with Bell System companies.

CWA locals in the California sector of the Bell System have begun a program of "adopting" striking General locals here by covering expenses of "adopted" locals not taken care of by a general defense fund.

Shortly after the strike started, the General Telephone & Electronics Corp., parent company of the General system, reported record sales and earnings for the September quarter and the first nine months of the year—total earnings up from $59 million to $71 million. The General of California president at the same time announced a 21 percent profit increase for the third quarter.

CWA picket lines are being maintained at all company installations, including those at North American Aviation Corp., Douglas-Aerojet General and Vandenberg Air Force Base.

The union charged that company officials have threatened to call on the U.S. Immigration Service to take action against strikers whose visas or other papers are subject to withdrawal or cancellation.

Philadelphia Suspends Fire Fighter Pickets

Philadelphia—A campaign to win better pay for Philadelphia's firemen has produced suspension of 59 members of the Intl. Association of Fire Fighters.

The men received suspensions and notices of intent to dismiss from Fire Commissioner Frank L. McNamee. The action followed decision by the local to spread out its informational picket line from City Hall doorways to a location facing the re-election campaign headquarters of Mayor James H. J. Tate.

Pres. James Forbes of the IAFF local maintained that the pickets were sent to locations where the crowds are. City officials ruled that the local's action constituted a form of political activity ruled out by Philadelphia's civil service regulations. The union went into court and has obtained a temporary restraining order that halts for at least 10 days any action by the city to stop the men's pay.

The national office of the Fire Fighters has appealed to the mayor for new talks to find solutions to the economic problems of the city fire fighting force. Sec.-Treas. John C. Kabachus said that the low Philadelphia salaries for fire fighters have produced "discontent, low morale and unrest." Expressing deep concern over the pickets' suspensions, Kabachus suggested that a quick agreement on wage rates would provide a basis for settling the other matters.

"I feel certain that you, as a conscientious public servant, would agree with me that some method must be found to bring about a fair and equitable adjustment in the pay of Philadelphia fire fighters," the union official told Tate.

Union fire fighters are aware, Kabachus continued, not only of an inequity between their pay and that of firemen in other cities, but of inequities in Philadelphia's own wage structure for city employes.

Surveys made by the IAFF show that basic pay in Philadelphia is $5,540 a year. Los Angeles and San Francisco pay more than $8,000; New York pays over $7,600; Chicago about $5,600 and Detroit over $6,300.

The Philadelphia local has asked for increases of $1,200 a year, but the city's offer has been only $400 for men in the lower brackets and $200 for those now receiving over $5,615 a year.

Chicago Committee To Revamp COPE

Chicago—Pres. William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO has set up a committee to reorganize the Chicago area Committee on Political Education.

Lee and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Faul of the council are ex officio members. Others are Vice Pres. James E. Blakely of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes; Vice Pres. George Bynum of the Barbers; Dir. Joseph Germano of Steelworkers Dist. 31; Financial Sec. James Hill of Bus Operators Div. 241; Pres. William L. McFetridge of Flat Janitors Local 1, an AFL-CIO vice president; Pres. Earl J. McMahon of the Building Trades Council; Vice Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists, and Pres. Richard Wren of Operating Engineers Local 399.

Besides Tax Cut, Public Works:

Step-Up in Wage Increases Held Essential to Growth

Rapid wage increases are a necessary ingredient of the economic program the nation needs to provide jobs for its unemployed, the AFL-CIO's top economist has declared.

Two other major ingredients, said Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger of the federation's Dept. of Research, are tax reduction and larger government investment in public works.

No one single remedy is going to solve the high rate of unemployment, Goldfinger told Hobart Rowen of Newsweek and Mort Singer of Kiplinger's Washington Letter, who questioned him on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program broadcast over the Mutual radio network.

The state of America's business health, he observed, indicates that the economy requires "somewhat more rapid wage increases than we have had in the past because unit labor costs have been declining, profit margins have been increasing, and profits are moving up from one record to another."

Asked whether he agrees with Treasury Sec. C. Douglas Dillon that industry and labor must exercise "restraint" in prices and wages, he responded:

- The size of wage increases has been getting smaller in the past five to seven years.
- The rate of increase in productive efficiency has been rising rapidly during the same period, and particularly in the last three years.
- As a result, unit labor costs have been declining, and the employer's cost per unit of output is less now than it was several years ago, principally in manufacturing.

What's needed, said Goldfinger, is economic balance—a balance between the ability to produce and the ability to sell.

"We have been increasing our ability to produce in this economy year after year, and productivity has been increasing very rapidly," he said. "We have been extending automation from one industry to another and from one company to another. But our ability to sell this growing volume of goods and services . . . has lagged far behind. And what we need is to step up our ability to sell what we can produce.

"It is for that reason that the AFL-CIO strongly supports the tax cut and the accelerated public works extension through 1964; and it is for that reason we believe that consumer buying power also must increase at a somewhat more rapid pace than it has in the past several years."

Goldfinger observed that such a program would not be inflationary because there is no excessive demand for goods and services in the American economy.

He repudiated a suggestion that the accelerated public works program involves "make-work," declaring that such programs are public investments in needed improvements—water treatment programs, sewerage services, public buildings, school repairs, street repairs and maintenance.

"It is time that all of us realize that government investment is, in many ways, as important as or more important than private investments," he said.

100,000 Jobs to Date

The accelerated public works law passed last year, he noted, "has provided 100,000 jobs to date and is expected to furnish an additional 100,000 jobs before January 1964."

If no action is taken to extend the program beyond January, he warned, many of those currently employed on public works projects will again join the ranks of the unemployed.

22-Hour Medical Bills Cost Widow $1,737

Milwaukee, Wis.—More than $1,700 in hospital and medical bills flowing from an illness of less than 24 hours recently produced a tragic case study of the need for social security old-age hospital insurance, as proposed in the King-Anderson bill.

The story came to light when Mrs. Theresa O'Connor Schultz, a 66-year-old Milwaukee widow, wrote her congressman, Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D), appealing for help in meeting the bills she was presented shortly after the death of her husband last April.

Peter Schultz was 67 and had been refused medical and hospitalization insurance by the Blue Cross and two other private companies when he was stricken. He died the day after undergoing heart surgery during a 22-hour hospitalization.

Then the bills descended on Mrs. Schultz—$545 for one doctor, $100 for another, $105 for the anesthetist, $21 for a nurse, $38 for a clinic, and $907.15—including $405 for blood—for the hospital.

In response to Mrs. Schultz's appeal, Reuss enlisted several donors, including himself and his wife, to give replacement blood at the local blood bank and help cut down that part of the staggering bill.

He noted that the blood contributions would be of some assistance to the widow, but pointed out that she has small funds left with which to supplement her social security payment.

"At 66, she expects to encounter difficulty in getting a job," Reuss observed. "So I feel badly that we're not able to do more to help her through this tough situation.

"Unfortunately, Mr. Schultz's case is by no means unusual. It highlights once again the acute need for a program so that all Americans can have the advantages of modern medical wonders in their old age without impoverishing themselves or their families. Every other civilized country has taken care of this problem years ago."

NATIONAL SAFETY COUNCIL honors Pres. Hunter P. Wharton (left) of the Operating Engineers, new council vice president for labor; and Lloyd D. Utter (right), safety director of the Auto Workers, outgoing vice president. Howard Pyle, president of the Safety Council (center), gave Wharton a testimonial plaque in recognition of his service as chairman last year of the Labor Conference and presented Utter with a Safety Council 50th anniversary medallion.

Unions Given Warning On Radiation Problems

Chicago—Sooner or later, "all unions will face a radiation problem," Vice Pres. Elwood D. Swisher of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers warned a labor session of the 1963 National Safety Congress here.

Swisher, co-chairman of the National Safety Council Labor Conference's Radiation Committee, urged unions to begin work now to protect their members against the hazards of on-the-job radiation. He said:

"Radiation exposure through use of atomic energy is the first federally created and controlled job hazard. Labor must see to it that the federal government retains control over safety standards.

"We can live with radiation and push the atomic energy industry forward with proper safeguards against latent health dangers."

Swisher called for repeal of a federal law which permits states to control civilian atom projects. He said the Federal Radiation Council should draft atom safety codes and enforce the rules. The council should be backed up by an advisory group representing labor, management, government, science and religion, he added.

Gordon M. Dunning, deputy director of the Div. of Occupational Safety of the Atomic Energy Commission, shared the platform with Swisher.

Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, of the Operating Engineers, was installed as National Safety Council vice president for labor at a two-day meeting of the Labor Conference held before the Safety Congress opened.

Wharton was given a testimonial plaque in recognition of his work as chairman of the Labor Conference last year. Current Labor Conference chairman is Victor E. Whitehouse, safety director of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Vice Chairman is John Connors, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The Labor Conference suggested:

- That AFL-CIO national and state central bodies put safety in high priority in their programs.
- That AFL-CIO headquarters establish a safety department to work with state central bodies and international unions.
- That international unions establish safety departments to aid local and state affiliates.

The conference voted to continue the Safer Labor Day Campaign in 1964.

TRIBUTE TO HUNGARY'S freedom fighters on the 7th anniversary of their revolt against Soviet oppression is paid by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in what has become a tradition of displaying a cross of lighted windows in the IUE headquarters building, which faces the Soviet embassy in Washington. Connecting the lights is Stephen Serenyi, a member of IUE Local 475, Mt. Vernon, N. Y., a former freedom fighter, Hungarian newspaperman and Olympic athlete. From left are Vice Pres. Dominick Zillini of Local 475, Chief Steward Eric Reitman of Local 475, Rep. Joseph G. Minish (D-N. J.), Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild, Serenyi and Mrs. Serenyi; Rep. Edward J. Patten (D-N. J.), IUE Pres. James B. Carey, and Rep. Carleton R. Sickles (D-Md.).

October Jobless Rate Unimproved at 5.5%

(Continued from Page 1)

without work for six months or longer, about the same number as in September and unchanged from a year ago."

Within the total group of 3.5 million unemployed, there was a slight improvement in some categories and a worsening in others over the month and the year.

The adjusted jobless rate for adult men held at 4.1 percent for the third straight month. The rate for adult women fell from a 1963 high of 5.8 percent in September to 5.4 percent in October, about the level for the first half of the year.

Labor force time lost through unemployment and part-time work amounted to 6.6 percent in October, the same as a year ago and almost unchanged from September's 6.7 percent, the report showed.

Manpower expert Harold Goldstein, asked if labor force time lost is a better yardstick than the 5.5 percent jobless rate, replied "It reflects better than the 5.5 percent the extent to which the economy succeeds in providing full-time jobs for people."

The 6.6 percent labor force time lost means that the economy is operating at 93.4 percent efficiency in terms of manpower.

The teenage jobless rate registered 15.4 percent in October, remaining within the 14-to-16 percent range prevalent all year.

On the employment side of the picture, the total of jobholders rose by 350,000 to 69.9 million in October, a normal change for the month. The rise occurred in the non-farm sector, agriculture holding steady as expected at 5.4 million.

The total labor force was up by 300,000 as expected to a total of 76.1 million, the report said. The over-the-year gain was 1.2 million.

Homework

A SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE has come up with a comprehensive report which should be made required reading for all members of the House Ways & Means Committee.

An intensive three-year investigation of the operation of the Kerr-Mills Act for medical assistance to the aged produces the following conclusion, the subcommittee majority declared:

"Kerr-Mills cannot, of itself, solve that problem which we have found to be the most persistent and frightening one confronting millions of older people in all parts of the country—the problem of assuring economic access to adequate medical care on a decent, self-respecting basis."

The Ways & Means Committee has scheduled for mid-November hearings on bills to provide hospital care for the aged through social security. The evidence contained in the McNamara subcommittee report should dispel any lingering doubts in the House committee and help bring about quick action on reporting out a measure that would meet the critical needs of the elderly.

Price Stagnation

A 4 PERCENT economic growth rate is not enough to make a dent in the nation's current high levels of unemployment.

That's the conclusion that emerges clearly from the latest figures of the Council of Economic Advisers on the gross national product in the third quarter of 1963.

The GNP—the total value of all goods and services produced—hit $588.5 billion in the third quarter, an increase of $31.7 billion from the third quarter a year ago. Adjusted for price changes, the increase is about 4 percent.

This 4 percent represents the growth rate over a 12-month period. The 4 percent figure has been considered adequate in terms of overall progress. But in the past 12 months, the 4 percent rate had absolutely no impact on unemployment—the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was the same in September 1963 as it was in September 1962: 5.6 percent of the labor force.

The inability of the 4 percent growth rate to drop the unemployment rate stems almost entirely from a sharp and sustained increase in productivity, much of it stemming from automation and new technology.

Productivity in manufacturing has been increasing at the rate of 4 percent a year for the past two years—an unusual back-to-back increase in terms of historic patterns. This has produced something of a stand-off.

Given the sharp rise in output per manhour, the economic growth rate will have to be in the area of 6 percent a year for the next several years if unemployment is to be reduced from the average 5.5 percent level of the past six years.

This higher growth rate can be achieved and the economy stimulated into greater activity by enactment of the pending $11 billion tax cut, by greater expenditures for public services and facilities, and by a higher rate of wage increases.

A continued 4 percent growth rate now spells stagnation and may produce the conditions that will lead to an economic downturn and recession.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery, John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Nov. 2, 1963 No. 44

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

'Nonsense, You Must Be Feeling Better'

Horatio Alger Rebuffed:

The Welfare State Is Wonderful —Depending on Who Benefits

IF YOU LOOK closely enough at relations between the American government and the American business community, you can find quite a bit of a "welfare state" for businessmen and a perfect willingness on the part of the business community to profit by that welfare state.

The examples are numerous. In the old days it was land grants for the railroads on which they are still profiting. Today it's immense federal funds to pay for research that benefits business, patent rights to inventions made through public funds, hidden subsidies all along the line.

A striking example of the hidden and not so hidden subsidies that the U.S. government has been dishing out to its business "welfare" clients was described in a recent report of a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

The report dealt with the strategic and critical material stockpiles. The original idea of stockpiling strategic materials was a sound one. World War II had taught us that there were a number of important materials highly important in war but in short supply in the United States. Stockpiling these materials would guarantee that we would never be caught short again. But, it is revealing how quickly the whole program was perverted by some of America's biggest corporations to make themselves what the report called "unconscionable" profits.

A lot of the taxpayers' money was involved—some $9,000,000,000 which, curiously enough, has been largely ignored by the economy bloc in Congress. Almost $3.5 billion of this today is in unneeded surplus while the actual value of the stockpile is estimated to have dropped $1.186 billion.

ON THE URGING of Pres. Kennedy, who didn't like the looks of things—largely inherited from the businessman's Eisenhower Administration—the Senate Armed Services subcommittee made an investigation. And here are some of the things it found:

- Materials such as nickel and aluminum are still being bought under old contracts although we have surpluses of both.
- Originally definite criteria were laid down to govern the purchase of strategic materials. But these standards were juggled for the benefit of suppliers so that $200 million were spent for unneeded lead and zinc.

"These were devices," says the report, "employed to permit additional purchases of materials as a subsidy to mining interests and were unrelated to our national defense needs."

- In the early days of the program we needed rubber imported from Asia, but as the years went on synthetic rubber produced in the U.S. made heavy importations of natural rubber no longer necessary. But the buying program went on, nevertheless, so as not to disturb "our rubber-producing friends in Southeast Asia."
- When it came to prices, the government got it coming and going. When copper prices boomed, copper supposed to go into the stockpile was permitted by the Eisenhower Administration to go into private trade for an $8 million windfall profit for copper suppliers. On the other hand, when tungsten prices went down, the Wah Chang corporation and its Brazilian partners were able to buy tungsten on the world market at a low price and sell it to the government for two or three times what was paid.
- There is a $30 million mountain of low grade chromite sitting in a remote part of Montana 45 miles from the nearest railroad. Nobody wants to haul it anywhere with the result that "its value, if any, is altogether uncertain."
- One of the prize examples of the "welfare" value of the stockpile are the estimated profits made and to be made by the Hanna mining and smelting companies headed by former Sec. of the Treasury George M. Humphrey. The Hanna companies, the report said, "enjoyed excessive and unconscionable profits from their sale of commodities to the government." They got "premium prices," fixed it so they would get maximum income tax benefits, bought for $1.7 million cash a smelting plant that cost the American taxpayer $22 million to build, and in general took a "take it or leave it" attitude toward the government.

Humphrey airily told the committee that government contracts were a minor "tag end" of the business done by the Hanna companies, but the committee estimates that his "tag end" will mean $86 million in profits for the Hanna interests and $4,159,321 in individual profits for the Humphrey family. (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Greater Firepower Seen Cutting Need for U.S. Forces in Europe

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE UNITED STATES is beginning to implement a major change in the size and make-up of American military forces in Europe but, as so often happens in the operation of big government, not all the left hands seem to know what the right hands are doing. The result is that some fingers are being pinched at home and abroad in misunderstandings.

Morgan

Against a background of continued concern over the fact that more dollars are going out of the country than are coming in (our balance of payments problem), of rising impatience that our allies are still not paying their full share toward NATO defenses, and of troubled conviction that the American taxpayer might rebel against supporting forces abroad under such circumstances indefinitely, against such a background, Deputy Defense Sec. Roswell Gilpatric made a policy speech in Chicago important enough to require review by the State Dept. and clearance by the White House.

We are entering, Gilpatric said, "a new phase" in national defense. After beginning successfully to balance our defense capabilities by building up mobile striking forces to deal with so-called "conventional" threats, below the level of all-out nuclear war, we can "hope", he added, for a level-off of military spending "for the next several years."

Behind this is an Administration argument—a favorite one of the President and Defense Sec. McNamara—that we can afford what we need for defense, that it would be false economy to cut spending merely for the sake of balancing the budget. But the line has to be drawn somewhere and the Kennedy regime thinks it has drawn it to secure the most powerful defense that is plausible under changing circumstances.

Therefore, Gilpatric said, "some shifts in the form our military presence (overseas) has taken in recent decades are beginning to be practicable." Specifically, he cited Operation Big Lift which moved an entire armored division from the U.S. to Germany by jet transport. This demonstrates "our ability to project our military power far more quickly over far larger distances than has ever been the case in the past"and thus "the U.S. should be able to make useful reductions in its heavy overseas military expenditures without diminishing its effective military strength" or striking power. In other words an increase in military and firepower may allow a cut in manpower.

GILPATRIC REFERRED primarily, of course, to Western Europe, where we still maintain the equivalent of six divisions—an expenditure which contributes heavily to our imbalance of payments problem. And which contributes heavily also, it should be added, to the already flashily prospering European economy.

But the West German government was quick to register a nervously negative reaction and asked what this really meant in tems of strength to resist a Communist thrust in Europe. Some State Dept. quarters feared this would be interpreted as a decision taken without the "consultation" we always promise. The official State "line" is that there is no present intent to reduce American troop strength in Germany. The Pentagon says there are no plans to take combat divisions out of the "central war front" but adds that Gilpatric's analysis primarily embraced the selective reduction of support and supply troops.

This anxiety was obviously increased by the coincidence that the current Saturday Evening Post carries an article in which ex-Pres. Eisenhower suggests the time may be at hand when one American division in Europe can be sufficient.

A harder fact which must be stressed is that despite its dramatic demonstration of logistical speed and suppleness, Operation Big Lift shows vividly the inadequacies of NATO while stubborn Gen. de Gaulle has counted France out of the picture.

Why was the operation concentrated on Germany, with the air and supply bases in France which we have spent towering millions on as part of NATO's socalled "infrastructure" bypassed? Because, the answer must come, France under the circumstances does not figure in such exercises.

The Gilpatric "new phase" of defense is encouraging in its flexibility, its supposed adaptability to changed circumstances but no amount of flexibility can bend around the fact that a western alliance without France is not a shield but a facade.

Washington Reports:

Manpower Act Expansion Seen Qualifying Unskilled for Jobs

SINCE THE UNEMPLOYMENT rate among the unskilled is double that of other groups, the Manpower Development Act should be expanded to meet their needs, two members of the House Education & Labor Committee declared in interviews on Washington Reports to the People. The AFL-CIO public service program is heard on nearly 700 radio stations.

"Among the jobs added to the economy in the last five years," said Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), "fully 97 percent have been white collar jobs."

Rep. Charles Goodell (R-N. Y.) pointed out that the rate of unemployed among persons 16 to 21 years old is four times the rate among older citizens. He said 600,000 to 700,000 youth in this age range were jobless and seeking work in October after the schools had reopened.

The pending bill, O'Hara declared, would especially aid unskilled youth and heads of families. Retraining allowances would be provided for unemployed heads of families ranging from about $23 to $45 a month depending upon the state. The allowance for an unemployed head of family with two years of work experience varies since it is pegged to unemployment compensation in the states.

"We have proposed an amendment to the retraining provision," said O'Hara, "which will permit the Secretary of Labor to pay up to $10 a month above the average unemployment compensation of the state."

GOODELL POINTED to "a very careful restriction" on the training allowance for jobless 17-to-22-year olds. He said "we are requiring that they be out of school for at least a year before being eligible for a $20 a week allowance—this is so we won't be paying youngsters to drop out of school."

He stressed the importance of youngsters staying in school in these days of technical development so long as they are qualified for further education.

O'Hara said that one out of three of the jobless have only an eighth grade education or less. The new amendments would enable the most needy of these persons to get the basic education necessary before training can begin.

"A South Bend, Ind., survey showed, for instance," he said, "that fully 60 percent of the unemployed there were not able to qualify under the present act. They couldn't pass the tests for training."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ELECTIONS IN A DOZEN STATES on Nov. 5 will offer a preliminary test of the feelings of the voters—and to some degree the test involves the current standing of Pres. Kennedy.

The civil rights issue has stirred up passions in Mississippi and Kentucky, where governors will be elected, and in some northern cities. In both southern states the Republican campaigns are frankly aimed at capitalizing on any resentment among white voters at militant Negro demonstrations.

The President proposed civil rights legislation to meet the legitimate aspirations of minority groups and at the same time to get the issue transferred "from the streets" to the halls of Congress. Democrats are well aware, however, that where segregation feelings are historic and strong the effect of the rights controversy may be considerable.

In Mississippi, indeed, the only issue is whether the long-established conservative Democratic machine can hold its grip on the state by claiming it is even more anti-Kennedy than the Republicans. Democratic voters nominated the most extreme of their segregationists, Lieut. Gov. Paul Johnson, for governor.

The GOP nominee, Rubel Phillips, is nevertheless the first serious Republican candidate for governor in a century, and he is campaigning as a Barry Goldwater conservative. There are 21 Republican candidates for the legislature, with the election of some considered probable as a demonstration of anti-Kennedy protest.

* * *

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ISSUE is also involved—although less blatantly—in the contest for mayor of Philadelphia, where huge Democratic pluralities have been recorded in the last dozen years and where control of the city government could affect Pennsylvania's big electoral college vote in 1964.

Mayor James H. J. Tate, a Democrat, succeeded to the office when former Mayor Richardson Dilworth resigned last year to run, unsuccessfully, for governor. The Republican nominee is James T. McDermott, known previously for a couple of unsuccessful efforts to get elected to Congress.

McDermott has not openly criticized Negro demonstrations, which included sit-ins in Tate's office. But he has accused Tate of failing to forestall them by working closely enough with a citizens' committee on human rights. More significantly, he has complained about the city's "crime-ridden streets."

This is a political euphemism with a clear meaning. It is the same thing southern Democratic segregationists mean when they say in speeches that everything is peaceful and orderly in beautiful Birmingham (except when agitators intervene), while Negro migrants who have fled beautiful, segregated Birmingham to the North are not always law-abiding.

Pres. Kennedy staked his prestige in the contest by going to Philadelphia for a fund-raising dinner Oct. 30. Pennsylvania's Republican Gov. William W. Scranton, who is certain to be a powerful figure in next year's GOP presidential nominating convention, has entered Philadelphia repeatedly to aid McDermott.

* * *

IN KENTUCKY, the Republican candidate for governor, Louis B. Nunn, has helped GOP Senators Thruston B. Morton and John Sherman Cooper win elections by appeals to Negro voters. But Nunn now is criticizing an executive order by incumbent Gov. Bert T. Combs, a Democrat, prohibiting discrimination in businesses licensed by the state.

The Democratic nominee, Edward T. (Ned) Breathitt, has been the victim of unsigned handbills purporting to show interracial scenes at his campaign rallies. Nunn charges that "the Kennedys" were involved in the Combs executive order on discrimination. Morton hasn't criticized the principle of the order, but in fund-raising letters he has accused Combs of being "dictatorial."

Kentucky, a border state, has a tradition of moderation on racial issues, and a Republican mayor of Louisville, William O. Cowger, pushed through an anti-discrimination ordinance last year. The civil rights issue is nevertheless an issue, of undetermined reach and depth, in the contest between Breathitt and Nunn.

MANPOWER TRAINING & DEVELOPMENT ACT, with proposed amendments, is essential to helping a large number of unskilled jobless to get work, Rep. Charles Goodell (R-N. Y.), left, and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Labor, Management Concern Stirred by Gambling Problem

By Sidney Margolius

THE UNITED STATES for some time has been considered by some experts to be the most-gambling of the larger nations. But there is a growing worry about the gambling problem.

For one reason, professional gamblers who recently fled from Cuba now have launched ventures in the U.S., including bookmaking and dice games. For another, rivalry between opposing crime syndicates has been stimulated by the growth of gambling, with a new increase in violence.

Too, the Valachi testimony before a U.S. Senate committee and other investigations, indicate that the crime syndicates increasingly are turning to control of gambling and loan-sharking as safer sources of income than narcotics and prostitution.

Many labor unions, credit unions and employers have become concerned about the inroads professional gamblers sometimes make in factories and shops, and the resultant hardships to workers.

The gamblers chased under cover by the Kefauver investigations in the 1950's soon sneaked back, and many were attracted to industrial plants. The professional gamblers sometimes take jobs in factories. When they can't get jobs, or the thought of work is too revolting, they often operate from nearby soft-drink stands

For example, in the building of a famous New York newspaper, bookies and loan sharks parcelled out the territory with each having jurisdiction over one floor. It took the combined efforts of the management and the plant credit union to stifle this bold arrangement.

Gambling syndicates also have been known to move their personnel right into heavy-industry factories and dominate workers and even supervisors through debts and fear.

Working people, of course, are not the only victims. Professional gamblers milk white-collar people too. A former FBI investigator, Virgil W. Peterson, named gambling as one of the two major causes of embezzlement by executives and other business employes (extravagant living is the other).

But the ruin caused the family of a horse-plunging bank teller is more tragic only because of its suddenness than the erosion of family living conditions by the small but steady gambling on numbers and races practiced by some low-income workers.

WE WANT TO MAKE a distinction between ordinary social gambling, such as a poker game among friends, and professional gambling operations. Obviously, even social gambling can be financially damaging if carried on to excess. But it is the professional gambling operations that really threaten the welfare of working families.

In any professionally-operated gambling, it is impossible for you to beat the odds. Even if you temporarily enjoy a run of "luck," eventually you must lose. In all professional gambling games, the odds are tilted against you so that you never have an even chance. In fact, the smaller bets and the poorer the gambler the worse the odds.

Depending on the type of gambling and how it is operated, the margin the professional operator has against you ranges from 15 to 80 percent. This is true even in the legal, parimutuel gambling at race tracks permitted in many states. The difference is only one of degree.

In legal horse betting, the race track and the state between them may withhold 20 percent of your potential winnings. In the numbers or "policy" game, while your chances of "hitting" are 1000 to 1, the operators usually pay only 600 to 1, less the 10 percent of winnings the runner customarily collects, or actually 540 to 1. Thus, of 1000 bettors who pay 10 cents each or a total of $100 to the numbers operators, on the average one will win, but only $54.

Horse betting is the biggest single form of gambling both in the amounts bet (estimated at from $30 billion to $50 billion a year) and the number of people who gamble.

In betting through off-track bookies, the odds against you are even greater since bookies limit the "payoff." They may pay at the most 20 to 1 on a winner even though the odds at the track are much greater.

Football and baseball pools are stacked even more heavily against the bettor. Ernest Blanche, a government statistician, wrote in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science that the operators "take" from pools often runs as high as 80 or 90 percent, for one reason, because they retain all the money in tie games. In fact, the more winners you try to pick in a pool, the higher the percentage against you.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

SUPREME COURT JUSTICE Arthur J. Goldberg, who during his years as counsel for the Steelworkers and the former CIO had a long association with the late Philip Murray, is shown during production of a television show based on Murray's life, which will be presented on "The Eternal Light" program over the National Broadcasting network Nov. 17 at 1:30 p.m. (EST). The film is sponsored by the George Meany Foundation in cooperation with the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Study of 1,400 ex-GIs:

History of Mental Ills Found No Bar on Job

THE LONG-ACCEPTED NOTION that persons with a history of mental illness cannot perform on the job was shaken by an extensive study of 1,400 ex-GI's who suffered war-incurred psychiatric disabilities.

On the contrary, the study revealed that:

1—Seven out of every 10 non-hospitalized psychiatrically disabled veterans are working steadily.

2—They are employed in as wide a range of occupations as other employed U.S. males, and on all levels from executives to unskilled laborers.

3—Nine out of every 10 are making a satisfactory or better job adjustment.

The study, made by the Veterans Administration, is the largest, most comprehensive investigation ever conducted into the job adjustment of persons with a background of mental illness ranging from neurosis to psychosis. In submitting the report to Pres. Kennedy, John S. Gleason, Jr., administrator of veterans affairs, said:

"The findings are optimistic—more encouraging than might have been suspected. They demonstrate that a history of mental illness need not be a barrier to successful employment."

The VA report also challenged the popular stereotype that psychiatrically disabled persons are "job-hoppers," "quitters," "malcontents," and "unstable workers." Instead, it revealed they have stable work records. Almost two-thirds of them—62 percent—have been working for their current employer for five or more years, the study showed.

Another notion which the study disputed was that persons who have been mentally ill should be relegated to isolated, out-of-the-way jobs, with few personal contacts.

The study showed that one out of every five veterans with psychiatric disabilities was working in a job where person-to-person relationships played an important part of their duties, such as in managerial, supervisory and foreman jobs, in sales work, or in personal service occupations.

Some other findings included:

Fifty percent told their employers the nature of their disability at the time of hiring. Another 8 percent told their employers later.

When asked how they found their jobs, two out of three of the working veterans said they used the do-it-yourself method.

Pre-job training helped. About 50 percent of the employed veterans received VA educational or vocational training. There is an indication that vocational training contributed to higher job status and greater chance of advancement.

"The majority of the working veterans observed in the study were once rated seriously disabled with mental illnesses," Gleason noted.

"There is a challenge, as well as a promise, in VA findings. They point up the need to intensify rehabilitation efforts of the psychiatrically disabled who have not yet been restored to productive living."

The VA Administrator said he hoped the findings will provide "a powerful weapon in the struggle to win public understanding." There is still "a major job to be done," he said, pointing out that the unemployment rate among those rated for psychosis is almost 55 percent as against 24 percent for those rated for a neurosis.

Commenting on the study, Melvin J. Maas, chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped said:

"Another salute to the Veterans Administration for conducting this valuable study—a milestone in the cause of employment equality for the mentally restored.

"Through this study we can see for ourselves that by depriving them of their rightful opportunity to work, we actually deprive ourselves of the service and talents of a valuable and much-needed group of fellow citizens."

From Soup to Nonsense:

New Generation Has No Idea Just How Grim Life Used to Be

By Jane Goodsell

NATURALLY, all parents want their children to realize how soft life is for kids nowadays, and how grim and tough it was back in the days when Mommy and Daddy were young. For those parents who have difficulty remembering their childhood hardships, the following examples may prove helpful:

Life was no bed of roses when I was a kid. Believe me, it was rugged living in a world without:

1. TV dinners.

2. ballpoint pens.

3. spray bottles.

Unlike the pampered kids of today, I had to be self-reliant and stand on my own two feet because:

1. There wasn't any Little League, and us kids had to organize our own baseball games.

2. They didn't teach sex education in schools, and we had to figure things out pretty much for ourselves.

3. We didn't have the sense of togetherness that comes from belonging to a nation-wide fan club or being a card-carrying member of Twixt-Teenies.

My parents were harsh and cruel because:

1. They didn't understand that it was sibling rivalry that made me hit my sister over the head. They thought I was just being ornery.

2. They didn't understand the emotional problems of adolescence, and they thought I was just being ornery.

3. When I got a bad report card, they didn't ask themselves where they'd failed. They blamed me.

I know it's hard for modern kids to believe, but I didn't even have:

1. my own private telephone.

2. stretch ski pants.

3. a portable stereophonic record player with a tape recorder attachment.

Deprived as my childhood was, I honestly believe that I learned fortitude and developed my character by:

1. brushing my teeth with a non-electric toothbrush.

2. changing short-play records on my non-automatic phonograph.

3. driving a car with a manual gearshift.

Meany Tells Doherty Dinner:

1,000 Scholarships Yearly Gift of Labor

More than 1,000 college scholarships and grants are being given every year by the AFL-CIO and its unions, "and the number is growing" constantly, Pres. George Meany told 1,500 members of the Letter Carriers at a dinner inaugurating the William C. Doherty Scholarship Fund and noting the 100th anniversary of free city mail delivery.

The dinner combined salutes to Doherty, to the postal service and to the union itself, with participants including Meany, Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, members of the House and Senate and Sir Neville N. Ashenheim, ambassador from Jamaica to the United States.

NALC Pres. Jerome J. Keating announced receipt of $6,000 in donations to start the scholarship fund and read a message from Pres. Kennedy calling the institution of free city mail delivery in 1863 "an enormous step forward in the achievement of the freedom of intercourse" in news and ideas and citing the nation's letter carriers as the "necessary agents in this great progressive movement."

Doherty, former NALC president who was named by Kennedy last year as the first U.S. ambassador to Jamaica, said he was "delighted and proud" to learn that proceeds of the affair will be used to maintain the fund bearing his name.

Observing that it would have been appropriate to put the name of a "gracious lady who raised nine children on a letter carrier's salary" on the scholarship fund, Doherty added: "I would have named it after Gertrude Dacey Doherty"—his wife.

In 30 years as a national officer of the NALC, Gronouski said, Doherty "played a central role in building unions of government employes into the influential and responsible organizations they are today."

Meany noted that labor looks on the letter carrier "as a neighbor and friend who performs a remarkably important service, and also as a trade unionist making a contribution to society."

Doherty's appointment as ambassador points up, he said, "the stress we of the AFL-CIO place on labor playing its part in world affairs." The trade union movement, he observed, "is part and parcel of the American community, playing a part in all its problems."

The Doherty Scholarship Fund was authorized by the NALC convention last year. Keating and the executive council set up a scholarship committee which named a selection committee to pick six scholarship winners for the September 1964 college semester. No union member is on the committee.

Doherty told the audience that the idea of delivering mail to homes and stores was conceived in 1862 by Joseph W. Briggs, assistant postmaster at Cleveland, and extended to 49 cities in 1863 by Montgomery Blair, Pres. Lincoln's postmaster general, after Congress passed enabling legislation.

The original salary for carriers remained at $800 a year maximum for 25 years, he recalled. At the NALC organization convention on Aug. 29, 1889, in Milwaukee, he said, delegates set three major goals —an annual wage of $1,200, finally reached 18 years later; a guaranteed wage of $200 for substitute carriers; and voluntary retirement on pension after 20 years of service, the latter not yet achieved.

Noting that letter carriers and their families have not had the economic means to send their children to college, the ambassador to Jamaica said even state universities have been beyond their reach.

"I can speak with some authority," said Doherty, "because when I was a boy in Cincinnati, Ohio, I was forced to leave school and go to work to add my bit to the family income."

The NALC now has determined, he said, that at least some of the children of its members shall "have the educational opportunities their parents were unable to enjoy."

LETTER CARRIERS lit a candle on a birthday cake celebrating birth anniversary of Postmaster Gen. John Gronouski, left, and 100th anniversary of free city mail delivery. Ceremony took place at Washington dinner launching union's new William C. Doherty Scholarship Fund. NALC Pres. Jerome J. Keating lights candle with smiling approval of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, right.

Wage Increase Ends Walkout on Seaway

Montreal, Que.—A wage increase of 10 cents an hour retroactive to Jan. 1 as part of a three-year, 56-cent package settlement ended a 10-day strike of some 3,800 members of the Longshoremen employed along the St. Lawrence Seaway.

The contract, with the Shipping Federation of Canada, yields 10 cents an hour for each of its three years plus a total of 26 cents in fringe benefits. The hourly rate will be $2.63 by the time the contract expires, according to union and federation estimates.

Utility Union Parley Votes Industry Study

Chicago—The establishment of nuclear power plants, automation, extreme high voltage transmission operations, and the pooling of resources among neighboring power companies "have seriously affected collective bargaining" in the utility industry, Pres. William J. Pachler of the Utility Workers told the union's 13th constitutional convention here.

To be fully aware of the effects of the new technology and operational developments upon employes, the 450 delegates approved a resolution to "engage and retain an outside firm of consultants . . . to study the industry in general." The study will cover all facets of the industry affecting labor-management relations, safety, stockholders and consumers.

The convention also passed a constitutional amendment increasing the terms of national officers to four years. The union will continue to hold conventions every two years, but national officers will be elected at alternate conventions. The presently elected officers will serve until May 1967.

All executive officers were reelected, including Pachler as president; Sec.-Treas. Andrew J. McMahon; Vice Pres. William R. Munger and Harold J. Straub, vice president and organization director.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) told the delegates he looks to the labor movement to play a significant role in solving the "three great fundamental political issues facing this country—in fact, facing the whole world" . . . human rights, economic and social progress, and peace.

'Most Powerful Force'

"The American labor movement represents the most powerful force of free men and women organized on an economic basis of any group in the world," said Humphrey, and must accept the responsibility to be politically alive, alert and mature.

"If we cannot solve here in America the problems of American citizenship, if we cannot provide equal opportunity for our own people regardless of race, color, creed, or national origin, then how do we expect to offer leadership to a world in which the majority of the people are not Caucasian, are not of our religious faiths, and are not of our color?" he asked.

Much of the deficit in the federal budget, he said, reflects the inadequacies of America in employment, education facilities, and tax program, Humphrey declared, and he urged support of Pres. Kennedy's legislative program in an effort to help progress on the economic and social fronts.

The delegates approved a strong civil rights resolution pledging active support of the national union "to secure full political and social rights for all people," re-emphasized support of the AFL-CIO legislative program, and placed the union on record for stepping up political and legislative activity.

UTILITY WORKERS' Pres. William J. Pachler, left, welcomes Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) to the union's 13th constitutional convention in Chicago. The convention re-elected Pachler for a four-year term, heard Humphrey call on labor to play a more significant role in solving pressing problems of human rights, economic and social progress, and peace.

Telegraphers Pick Hageman As President

Miami Beach, Fla.—E. L. Hageman, head of the Commercial Telegrapers' Western Union Div., was elected president of the CTU without opposition at the union's 30th convention, largest in its history.

Hageman also will continue to lead the Western Union group, having won re-election as president at the division's meeting prior to the convention.

As CTU president, he succeeds W. L. Allen who retired after 22 years in the post and was given a standing ovation by the 256 delegates, plus a number of farewell gifts.

Sec.-Treas. John T. Dowling was unopposed for re-election. Named to two newly created positions were John C. Hemby of Atlanta, as vice president for the U.S., and George R. Pawson of Toronto, as vice president for Canada. The convention also chose members of the international executive board. Terms of office are four years.

The delegates voted to change the frequency of conventions from once every two years to once every four, and set the next session for October 1967 in San Francisco.

Following an address by Wallace Legge, inter-American representative of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., the convention endorsed a proposal that the CTU consider affiliation with that organization. The PTTI is the trade secretariat for free world unions in the communications industry.

A major resolution calling on U.S. members to give active support and participation to the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education was backed up by a COPE collection among the delegates.

Roofers Rally to Fight Anti-Union Legislation

New York—Building and construction workers were rallied against a rising tide of anti-labor legislation by Pres. Charles D. Aquadro of the Roofers at the union's 16th triennial convention.

Noting that there are nine bills pending in the U.S. Senate and 16 in the House which aim at hampering labor organizations, Aquadro called for a continuing program of letter-writing to keep lawmakers informed on how workers feel about such measures.

Aquadro singled out a bill sponsored by Rep. Joseph R. Martin (R-Mass.) which would restrict multi-employer bargaining and prohibit two employers from negotiating jointly with one union, as potentially "disastrous" not only for building and construction trades unions, which deal with numerous contractors, but for scores of other unions which bargain with associations representing many employers.

"All of your jointly administered health and welfare and pension funds would go out the window," Aquadro declared. "The permissible areas of joint negotiation would be so vague as to be worthless or put you in danger of committing a criminal act."

He pointed to the recently-formed Business-Industry Political Action Committee in New York in warning that organized labor may be in for a worse beating than it has suffered so far in the area of politics.

Two hundred and seventy delegates cheered when Aquadro called for a drive to organize new construction workers.

The new member is "basic to our continued existence," he said. He hailed a plan recently adopted by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. for a united organizational campaign. He also disclosed that his union had completed most of the work on an apprenticeship and training manual whose publication awaits only details involving built-in non-discrimination provisions.

Delegates acted on 31 resolutions, most of them relating to rights of members on transfer and withdrawal cards, expenses of international organizers and international union officers, and jurisdictional rights of members. They unanimously adopted resolutions calling for an increase in local union per capita payments of from $1.50 to $2 per month and for cooperation with other building and construction trades unions on hiring and apprenticeship training programs.

Suffridge Named To Arts Panel

James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks and an AFL-CIO vice president, will serve on a panel set up by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund to explore the future of the performing arts in America.

The panel will consider problems dealing with both the quality and financing of the arts. Its chairman is John D. Rockefeller III. Other members, in addition to Suffridge, are Warner Lawson, dean of Howard University's College of Fine Arts, and Helen M. Thompson, a member of the American Council of Arts & Government.

TELEGRAM URGING federal civil rights legislation is signed by Pres. Al Bilik of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO Council, right, at booth set up for participants in the city's freedom march. At left, Sen. Stephen M. Young (D-O.) reads the telegram in his Capitol Hill office as a Western Union messenger holds the long list of signers.

Labor, Civic Groups:

25,000 in Cincinnati 'March for Freedom'

Cincinnati—With the participation of organized labor, thousands of people paraded on downtown streets here on Oct. 27 in an orderly demonstration for civil rights.

An estimated 25,000 persons, about one-third of them white, took part in a mile-long "march and vote for jobs and freedom."

Sponsored by the Cincinnati Action Committee for Human Rights (CAC) the demonstration filled Government Square and overflowed into side streets.

The CAC is composed of local AFL-CIO Council representatives and representatives of 32 other civic, community, and religious groups, but more than 130 separate organizations took part in the parade.

Among the local unions participating were representatives of the Auto Workers, Clothing Workers, Brewery Workers, Hod Carriers, Laundry Workers, Municipal Workers, Meat Cutters, Pressmen, Hotel & Restaurant Workers, Steelworkers, and Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The Cincinnati effort to "accelerate progress" was hailed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

In a telegram to Bishop W. E. Crumes, Jr., general chairman of the march, Schnitzler noted that the changing society has "pointed up the need for new solutions" to the problems of the jobless and the underemployed. The "collective efforts" of all segments of the local community," he said, are needed to effectuate remedial action "which will realistically and effectively wipe out the blight of second-class citizenship so long endured by our minority group fellow citizens."

Highlighting the Government Square program was a speech by the Rev. Otis Moss Jr., chairman of CAC and regional director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Co-chairman of CAC is William L. Kircher, assistant regional director of the AFL-CIO.

"We are here," Moss said, "because we know that the Jim Crow who is on the throne in the South is the same Jim Crow who stands behind the throne in the North."

He pledged that Negroes will fight for their rights with "votes, legal action, direct action, and creative love."

"We must create," he continued, "a society where the blackest child in the dirtiest slum can grow up to believe that he can become president of the United States."

Calling the civil rights movement a "righteous revolution," Moss said that words like tolerance, moderation, and patience are roadblocks along the revolutionary roadway.

"Not Tolerance, But Love"

" I recommend not tolerance, but love," he said. "I recommend not moderation, but dedication and implementation. I recommend not patience, but creative impatience."

Kircher pointed out the need for political action, saying:

"As we struggle for rights which we do not now have, it is important to remember the need to use aggressively a basic right that all of us here have—the right of the ballot.

"We have a built-in means of revolution in our system which can occur every time there is a general election. There can be no greater freedom march in this or any other community than the one where every eligible citizen marches to the polls on election day.

"There is a greater need for our political activity today than ever before. How much more can we aid our Negro brothers in the South who are struggling for the right to vote than by intelligently using the right we have already established here?"

Other speakers included Bishop Crumes, who said "We want freedom and we want it today." The cheering, well-dressed crowd also heard the Rev. Richard D. Isler, executive director of the Greater Cincinnati Council of Churches, Clyde W. (Jimmie) Vinegard of the Congress of Racial Equality, Harold K. Goldstein, Jewish Community Relations Committee; William Bowen, NAACP; William R. Schumacher, president of the Catholic Interracial Council; and Rabbi Murray Blackman, of Rockdale Temple.

Wires to Congressmen

The marchers sent a telegram containing almost 1,500 signatures to Cincinnati congressmen and Ohio senators pressing for immediate action on civil rights. In addition, cards were distributed for a voter education project.

The CAC plans to section off the city neighborhood by neighborhood, hire halls, and carry on a continuing educational program.

Tom Connally Dies; Former Texas Senator

Former Sen. Tom Connally, Texas Democrat who headed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during World War II and most of the critical post-war years, died in Washington Oct. 28 at the age of 86.

Elected to Congress as a Woodrow Wilson Democrat in 1917, he served 12 years in the House and 24 years in the Senate.

Connally was a supporter of the United Nations and an architect of the bipartisan foreign policy that marked a clean break on the part of the United States with the isolationism which kept the country out of the League of Nations.

On domestic issues, his record was mixed. He supported most of the early New Deal measures, but in later years frequently aligned himself with the southern conservative bloc. He was co-author of the wartime Smith-Connally Act requiring rank-and-file authorization of strikes in referendums conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The law died with the end of the war.

Corbett, Rockefeller Tangle at Convention

Kiamesha Lake, N. Y.—A resolution defending New York State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett from a charge of partisanship by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) marked the final session of the state labor body's convention here.

Rockefeller made the charge in addressing the delegates earlier in the day and taking note of Corbett's legislative report criticizing the governor's administration for supporting measures detrimental to labor.

The governor remarked that it was "pretty hard" for him to tell whether Corbett spoke as head of the State AFL-CIO or as a former delegate-at-large to the 1960 Democratic National Convention, or possibly as a candidate for delegate in 1964.

Rockefeller's remarks drew strong protests, following his departure, that he had abused his position as a guest of the State AFL-CIO to attack its president. The censure resolution was adopted at the final session after Corbett spoke in reply.

The resolution declared that having heard Rockefeller and having read the legislative report, which was "necessarily" critical of the state administration's record, the convention "heartily condemns the position taken by the governor and heartily endorses the report of our president and his reply to the governor."

Corbett's report charged that following a New York City hospital strike of July 1962, the Rockefeller administration had used a "meat-ax" approach in legislation granting collective bargaining rights to hospital workers but imposing compulsory arbitration even though "hospital services had continued with little or no discomfort to patients."

Corbett also charged that revisions of the state's unemployment insurance tax formula favored banks, insurance companies and large corporations while imposing new burdens on small and seasonal businesses.

His report said further that the governor had failed to keep a promise to the state labor body to implement proposals of a special committee he had appointed to study abuses in the administration of the state workmen's compensation system.

The governor defended new unemployment insurance laws that eliminate or reduce benefits for certain retired workers who still seek work because of family need, and deprive workers of jobless benefits when an employer designates an economic layoff as "a vacation period."

Rockefeller said this legislation corrected inequities and would help improve the state's business climate.

Other resolutions among the 150 adopted by the delegates called for full civil rights and job opportunities for all citizens, elimination of compulsory arbitration in hospital bargaining, federal standards in unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation, repeal of the new restrictive amendments to the unemployment insurance laws, and an amendment to the U.S. Constitution spelling out a "bill of rights" for labor.

FTC Clamps Down On Phony Labor Paper

The Federal Trade Commission has ordered a New York tabloid calling itself United Labor Management Press to stop representing itself as an official labor paper in its advertising solicitations.

The FTC's cease and desist order upheld an initial decision by a hearing examiner who found such representations to be "false, misleading and deceptive." It noted that Brondabrooks Publishers, Inc., corporate title of the paper, had failed to appeal from the examiner's decision after filing a notice that it intended to do so.

The order also directs the firm, its officers, Joseph Harrow and Harry Brenner, and its advertising manager, Max Strier, to stop printing unauthorized ads from business and industrial concerns and then seeking to exact payment for them. This practice, the examiner found, subjected companies and individuals "to harassment and unlawful demands for payment of non-existent debts."

United Labor Management Press was called to the attention of New York state and federal authorities by the Intl. Labor Press Association, the organization of publications of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates. Since its formation, ILPA has been campaigning to wipe out phony "labor" publications using "boiler room" telephone tactics to harass business firms into buying ads.

ILPA's member publications abide by their own rigid code of ethics in their advertising solicitations.

Noting Harrow's identification as an officer of United Labor Management Press, ILPA Pres. Bernard R. Mullady reminded the FTC that the name "Joe Harrow" had appeared in the records as a staff member of the Trade Union Courier. Some three years ago, the Courier was fined $60,000 by the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia on criminal contempt findings for continuing to represent itself as an official labor paper in violation of a "cease and desist" order.

NLRB Lays Down Rule On Worker Testimony

An employer's request that employes furnish copies of statements they give to National Labor Relations Board agents, and quizzing them about details, is an unfair labor practice, the NLRB has ruled in upholding a charge filed by the Retail Clerks against the W. T. Grant Co. retail chain.

The company opened a new store in Superior, Wis., in 1962 and fired a union sympathizer shortly after she supported the Retail Clerks in organizing efforts. When the union filed an unfair labor practice charge, management asked seven employes, by letter, to let it "study any statement that was made" to the NLRB.

This request and subsequent questioning of the store clerks, the board said, violated NLRB rules and "constituted serious interference" with NLRB processes. The board also ordered the reinstatement of the fired employe.

An employer's request for a copy of a statement which an employe has given to a board agent, the board said in a decision by a three-member panel, is an attempt to engage in the kind of interrogation which is prohibited under the board's rules.

It was immaterial, it observed, that management "requested" rather than "demanded" the statements, or told employes they were under no obligation to comply.

It added that statements "frequently contain information bearing on union attitudes, sympathies and activities" which may not be relevant to an employer's defense to unfair practice charges. It concluded that such statements "must be treated as confidential unless the employe is called to testify" at later proceedings, when the employer may, on proper demand, see the statement.

Approved by House Committee:

Bipartisan Support Given Rights Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

remedy. This is the procedure which Republicans on the House Labor Committee had unsuccessfully sought to write into the FEPC bill.

High Administration sources say they have a firm commitment from House GOP Leader Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.) for Republican support of the Judiciary Committee bill both in the Rules Committee and on the floor of the House. The Republican pledge of support does not extend to the Senate, where GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has indicated opposition to a public accommodations provision.

Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy publicly praised Halleck and Rep. William M. McCulloch (O.), ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, for their help in bringing out a bipartisan bill. He said the final version is "better" than the Administration's original proposal and "the most effective legislation to deal with the problems as they exist today."

Southerners on the Judiciary Committee played a switching role. Most of them voted for the subcommittee bill, apparently accepting the Administration contention that this would make it more difficult to enact civil rights legislation. Then they voted against the bipartisan bill. One exception was Rep. Jack Brooks (D-Tex.), who supported the committee bill.

Report in a Week

It will be at least a week before the Judiciary Committee makes its report, complete with minority and individual views, and the bill formally goes to the Rules Committee. Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) is a foe of civil rights legislation. If Halleck's commitment holds, however, the normal alliance of Republicans and conservative Democrats would be broken, moving the bill to the House floor.

If passed intact, its next hurdle would be the Senate where it faces a southern filibuster.

West Virginia Labor Raises Per Capita Tax

Charleston—Ways of providing more jobs and strengthening the economy held the center of the stage at the fourth convention of the West Virginia AFL-CIO where delegates, present in record numbers, raised the per capita to finance a broadened program.

In a state where unemployment is a continuing major problem, the delegates heard vigorous calls for action sounded by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Democratic Senators Jennings Randolph and Robert C. Byrd, and other speakers.

Pres. Miles C. Stanley was reelected by acclamation and Glen Armstrong, state COPE director, was named secretary-treasurer succeeding Benjamin W. Skeen, new West Virginia representative of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

The convention voted to raise the per capita from $1.69 per member per year to $1.92.

Stanley reported to the convention that in the six years since merger of the formerly separate state labor bodies progress has been "consistent and objective" but that further strengthening will determine "the impact of labor's influence in helping to solve" the state's social, economic and political problems."

Recent figures indicate, Stanley said, that unemployment in West Virginia stands at about 50,600 or 8.6 percent of the covered work force, below the 72,000 reported to the 1961 convention, but that the covered work force has dropped from 628,400 to 589,700 in two years, thus adding 41,000 workers to those who "presumably were forced to leave the state" to find employment.

Meany, speaking at a banquet marking the state's centennial year, described unemployment as the nation's greatest unsolved problem. It is "everybody's problem because 93 percent of the market for American-produced goods is right here in America," he declared.

The proposed tax cut bill "can help put more people to work," he said, and an accelerated public works program would be "one of the best investments America can make."

Randolph endorsed an appropriation of $1 billion for public works, and Byrd urged a "good hard look" at the possibility of lowering the Social Security retirement age to 60 or even 55.

The convention adopted resolutions calling for greater economic growth in the state; specified improvements in the state tax system; a state minimum wage of $1 an hour; support for an organizing drive by the Teachers; a state law legalizing the group practice of medicine, and other measures.

Zander Urges Governmental Grievance Plan

Philadelphia—A three-point program intended to establish channels through which public employes can appeal injustices on the job was proposed by Pres. Arnold S. Zander of the State, County & Municipal Employes in a speech at a meeting of the Intl. Conference on Personnel Administration.

Zander charged that so far as settling employe grievances is concerned, government "has generally fallen far behind private industry." He suggested that:

- Where state mediation laws cover private industry, they also be made available to public employes and employers.
- Where no-strike laws curb the freedom to act of public employes they be amended to provide also for mediation of grievances.
- Legislation be enacted to establish for public employes principles already in effect in private industry—their right to bargain collectively through their unions; the requirement that public employers must bargain with majority unions, and grievance machinery.

"It is time," Zander said, "that public employers benefit from the experience in industry where effective grievance procedure has proved its great value in promoting good relations between employers and employes by means of peaceful settlement of disputes.

"State and local legislative bodies can no longer handle the complex area of employe relations in any detail."

House Committee Bill Spells Out Steps to Outlaw Discrimination

The following are the principal provisions of the bipartisan civil rights bill approved by the House Judiciary Committee:

VOTING RIGHTS

The bill outlaws disqualification because of minor irrelevant errors or omissions in registration applications. It bars registrars from applying higher or more strictly enforced standards for Negro voting applicants than for others in the community. A sixth-grade education is declared to be presumptive evidence of literacy subject to rebuttal evidence. If literacy tests are used, they must be in writing and uniformly graded. Federal courts are directed to expedite hearings and decisions on voting cases.

The voting rights apply only to elections for federal office, but include primary as well as general elections.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Discrimination, including segregation, is prohibited in the following categories of public accommodations:

- Hotels, motels or other establishments providing lodgings to transient guests, except for owner-occupied rooming houses containing not more than five rooms for rent.
- Public eating places, including restaurants, cafeterias, lunch counters and soda fountains.
- Establishments used for exhibitions or entertainment including movie and legitimate theaters, concert halls and sports arenas.

In addition, writing into federal law a constitutional principle proclaimed by the Supreme Court, all forms of discrimination required by state or local law are outlawed, even if the type of discrimination would not be illegal if practiced by an individual proprietor in the absence of any law.

To enforce the public accommodations section of the bill, the Attorney General or any aggrieved person is authorized to seek a federal district court injunction barring continued discrimination. If the violations persist, contempt of court proceedings could be brought.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

The Attorney General is given authority to bring suit to compel desegregation of public schools and public colleges.

In addition, the U.S. Commissioner of Education is authorized to provide technical assistance, if requested by school boards or other local or state authorities, to prepare and implement desegregation plans. Authority is also given for grants to help train teachers and other school personnel to deal with special educational problems caused by desegregation.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

The Civil Rights Commission, established in 1957 on a temporary basis, is made permanent and given additional authority it requested to serve as a national clearing house on civil rights information, "including but not limited to the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, use of public facilities, transportation, and the administration of justice."

It is also given an added function, not necessarily related to racial discrimination, of investigating allegations of patterns of fraud in any federal elections.

FEDERALLY AIDED PROGRAMS

Racial discrimination is barred in any program or activity receiving federal assistance "notwithstanding any inconsistent provision of any other law." This would in effect repeal the "separate but equal" provision now in the Hill-Burton Act establishing federal grants for hospital construction.

Federal agencies administering federal assistance programs are authorized, but not directed, to cut off federal aid if discriminatory practices continue. An agency ruling is subject to court review.

PUBLIC FACILITIES DESEGREGATION

The Attorney General is authorized to bring suit in the name of the U.S. on behalf of individuals or groups denied full access, because of race, color, religion or national origin, to any public facility owned or operated by or on behalf of a state or municipality.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

Employers, employment agencies and unions covered by the law are barred from discriminating on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin, effective one year after enactment.

For the first year after the effective date, employers with 100 or more workers are covered. This drops to 50 or more the second year and thereafter all employers in industries "affecting commerce," with 25 or more workers, are covered.

"Unlawful employment practices," under the bill, include the following:

- Refusal by an employer to hire a person because of race, color, religion or national origin.
- Discrimination, on those grounds, in pay or other conditions or benefits.
- Segregation or classification of employes in a way which deprives any group of employment opportunities.
- Refusal or failure of an employment agency to refer persons to jobs because of their race, religion or origin.
- Exclusion from membership or any other form of discrimination by a union on the basis of race, creed or origin. Specifically prohibited are segregation tending to deprive an individual of employment opportunities and any attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an individual on these grounds.
- Discrimination in apprenticeship and other training programs, whether operated by employers, by unions or jointly.
- Retaliatory discrimination against any individual by an employer, employment agency or union because of charges, testimony or participation in any investigation or proceeding dealing with alleged violations of civil rights.

The bill establishes a bipartisan, five-member Equal Opportunity Commission with staggered terms, to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The commission is given broad powers of investigation of complaints, including the power to inspect records.

If discrimination is found, the commission is directed to use an informal approach to seek voluntary agreement to discontinue discriminatory practices. If this approach fails, the commission is authorized to bring a civil suit in a federal district court against the offending party. The court, if it finds the charge sustained, may enjoin the offender from further violations and may require hiring or reinstatement of workers, with back pay if appropriate.

The commission is authorized but not obligated to make an agreement ceding jurisdiction to state or local fair employment agencies which have effective powers.

VOTING STATISTICS

The Census Bureau is directed to compile registration and voting statistics by race, color and national origin in such geographic areas as may be recommended by the Civil Rights Commission. Such information could presumably be used as a basis for reducing representation in the House under the 14th Amendment for states which deny the equal right to vote.

AFL-CIO Opposes Cuts:

Foreign Aid Bill Debated in Senate

(Continued from Page 1)

the start of the Marshall Plan, has proved "the most important tangible instrument" to "thwart the goals of totalitarian governments."

Answering "those who feel that foreign aid is a giveaway," Biemiller said 80 percent of the aid funds are spent in the United States, providing jobs for several hundred thousand American workers.

"Their interest, and ours," he said, "is that they not be added to the rolls of the unemployed."

Long Session

Senate Majority Mike Mansfield (Mont.) interrupted the slow-paced debate to anounce that this session of Congress will continue until the opening of the second session on Jan. 3—with 23 days of holiday recesses over Veterans Day, the Thanksgiving period and a Christmas vacation from Dec. 20 to Jan. 2.

On the other side of the Capitol, the drive of AFL-CIO federal employe unions for a "comparability" pay raise took a big step forward as the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee cleared an omnibus pay bill.

It provides raises of 3 to 22 percent, effective Jan. 1, for nearly 1.8 million annually-paid federal employes. Most postal workers would receive a 6.2 percent boost.

The bill also would increase salaries of congressmen, agency heads and Supreme Court members by $10,000 a year.

With an election year approaching, the reluctance of many members of Congress to vote themselves a pay raise is regarded as the chief obstacle the bill faces. The Administration has strongly urged a hike in present congressional salaries of $22,500, pointing out that it has had the effect of setting a ceiling on top civil service salaries

In other congressional developments:

- The House voted a one-year extension of the labor-opposed bracero program, under which Mexican farm laborers are brought in to work for large growers. The 173-158 vote, with six congressmen voting "present," reversed a House ballot earlier this year.
- The House quickly approved conferences with the Senate on two major aid to education bills—a large-scale college aid bill and a vocational education bill which in the Senate version also extends grants to federally "impacted" areas and continues the National Defense Education Act loan program.
- On a straight party vote, the House Ways & Means Committee approved another temporary increase in the national debt limit to take care of seasonal fluctuations in Treasury receipts. The bill would lift the $309 billion ceiling to $315 billion through next June 30. Unless Congress acts, the ceiling automatically drops to $285 billion on Nov. 30.
- As the Senate Finance Committee continued its hearings on the tax cut bill, GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) indicated Republican support for a move to scrap one of the few "reforms" made by the House in the tax structure—repeal of the present 4 percent tax credit on dividend income. The tax credit presently has the effect of taxing income from stocks and bonds at a lower rate than income from wages.
- The AFL-CIO urged a Senate Appropriations subcommittee to add $64 million to the House-passed civil defense appropriations. The money, requested by the Administration, is needed to stock shelters with food, medical, radiation and sanitation kits and to maintain civil defense operations and research, the federation said.

ORGANIZED LABOR'S SUPPORT for the Kennedy Administration's program of tax reduction as part of the overall attack on economic slackness was spelled out for the Senate Finance Committee by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, who is shown testifying.

Health Education of Public Seen As Antidote to Medical Quacks

Education of the American public in basic health knowledge emerged by general agreement at the 2nd National Conference on Medical Quackery as the best weapon against medical frauds, worthless food fads and false drug claims that bilk consumers of an estimated billion dollars a year.

"The root of the problem," observed Food & Drug Commissioner George P. Larrick, "is that so many people so often want to believe in the impossible and the incredible. They may need desperately to believe in something and quackery takes advantage of this."

The two-day conference was co-sponsored by the Food & Drug Administration and the American Medical Association as part of a joint drive against quackery in its many forms.

Meanwhile the National Health Federation was holding a rival conference—the First National Congress on Health and Monopoly—with the theme of "preserving a freedom of choice in matters of health."

"Personally, if I like to take two yeast tablets I want no damned bureaucrat breathing his fluoridated breath down my neck," was the way Lowell P. Mason, a former federal trade commissioner, put it in a speech at the Congress. "Freedom of choice is the American heritage."

In practice, the federation's idea of "freedom of choice" means "freedom to promote eccentric, unproved medicines and treatments," Larrick charged at the FDA-AMA meeting.

He described the National Health Federation as "one of a number of so-called health and nutrition organizations which are not all that they seem to be" and noted that it had defended and promoted the outlawed Hoxsey "cure" for internal cancer.

President Fined

In fact, Larrick went on, a number of its leaders are among those whose practices the FDA and the AMA are campaigning against. He reported that Fred J. Hart, founder and president of the federation, was fined $500 last year for violating an injunction against the shipment of 13 electrical devices claimed to be effective in diagnosis and treatment of hundreds of diseases and conditions.

Larrick also noted that the chairman of the board of governors and one of its directors were convicted of misbranding vitamin preparations and a former director is now serving a three-year prison term following his second conviction for promoting a worthless cancer remedy, "Millrue."

Dr. Edward R. Annis, AMA president, in welcoming the 700 participants to the conference, warned that even reputable physicians have unwittingly given support to what he termed "one of the greatest frauds of the 20th Century," the cancer treatment Krebiozen.

This has occurred, he said, when physicians "did not have the heart to refuse a desperate person's request." However, Annis declared, "the physician must remember the consequence of this act" in terms of giving support to useless treatment.

Deputy Postmaster Gen. Sidney W. Bishop told the quackery conference that the nation's growing population of elderly persons represents "a new class of victims" particularly susceptible to mail order medical and nutritional frauds.

Because many older persons have no transportation to stores or medical centers, they have less human contact as "the days grow longer" for them, he observed. "They love to receive mail and become easier prey for the mail order fraud pitch," he said.

Over at the rival meeting, the counter-attack was on. Dr. George W. Crane, psychologist who writes a syndicated newspaper column, proposed the establishment of the "Pan American Medical Association" to promote "friendly rivalry" with the AMA, drawing its membership from the ranks of doctors who are not AMA members, from the AMA itself, and from "related medical specialties" such as dental surgeons, osteopaths, podiatrists, chiropracters, nurses and others.

The FDA reported at the quackery conference that it had recently proceeded against half a dozen kinds of bottled ocean water that hit the market following a newspaper column extolling the benefits of sea water minerals. A spokesman later said Crane had written such a column.

11-2-63

Senate Study Terms Kerr-Mills 'Ineffective, Piecemeal Approach'

(Continued from Page 1)

private insurance, fully meets the needs of the aged.

The subcommittee report that on the contrary Kerr-Mills has been an ineffective substitute was signed by all eight Democratic members. Republican members dissented, charging the report represented "a premature judgment based on inadequate evidence."

Report Praised

The report drew the praise of the National Council of Senior Citizens for its "honesty and thoroughness."

John W. Edelman, acting president of the organization, said it offers "abundant evidence that the strained financial resources of many states make the well-intentioned aims of the Kerr-Mills MAA law impossible of realization as a national program."

"While Kerr-Mills has been proving its inadequacy for three years," Edelman continued, "Congress has failed to enact the vitally necessary program to provide hospital insurance for older Americans through the time-tested social security system."

The chief findings of the Senate subcommittee, a unit of the Senate's Special Committee on the Aging, were that:

- After three years, Kerr-Mills "is still not a national program" and is not likely to become one "in the foreseeable future." Only 28 states and four other jurisdictions have so far put the program into operation, althought all state legislatures have had opportunity to do
- Stringent eligibility tests and "lien type" recovery provisions have severely limited participation. Last July only 148,000 persons—1 percent of all Americans over 65—received MAA benefits.

The committee cited examples showing that in some states the Kerr-Mills "means" tests are so severe some needly individuals could not qualify although they were eligible for state welfare assistance.

- Benefits vary widely from state to state and except for four states having comprehensive programs, they are "nominal, nonexistent or inadequate."

In Kentucky, for example, only six days of hospitalization is provided under the state's Kerr-Mills program. The subcommittee cited a statement by a state official that if hospitalization is required beyond six days, "the care may be paid for by a relative or a charity, or the hospital may discharge [the patient]. We do not know what happens after our responsibility is met."

- Administrative costs remain too high, exceeding 25 percent of benefits in four states and ranging up to 59 percent in Tennessee.
- Distribution of federal funds has been "grossly disproportionate," with a few wealthy states getting "the lion's share." Five states having 32 percent of the aged received 88 percent of the federal MAA grants through last December.
- Congressional intent has been "frustrated" by some states which have transferred nearly 100,000 elderly persons already on other welfare programs to the Kerr-Mills program to reap the advantage of higher federal grants without increasing caseloads.
- The "welfare" aspects of Kerr-Mills, including cumbersome eligibility investigations, have discouraged many aged persons in need of aid from seeking it.

The minority report signed by GOP Senators Everett M. Dirksen (Ill.), Barry Goldwater (Ariz.) and Frank Carlson (Kans.) attacked the majority findings as inconclusive and protested that not enough attention had been given to the growth of voluntary insurance plans

Sen. Hiram L. Fong (R-Hawaii), filed separate views opposing social security financing of a health care program and outlining his alternative proposal for a federal-state multiple-choice" program for persons whose incomes are below specified levels.

Sen. George A. Smathers (D-Fla.), who is chairman of the parent Committee on the Aging but not a member of the subcommittee, also filed individual views regretting "the negative tone" of the report and calling for correction of the "weaknesses" revealed by the study. Smathers voted against the original King-Anderson bill when it was defeated, 52-48, last year on the Senate floor.

King-Anderson Bill Hearings Scheduled

The House Ways & Means committee will hold public hearings starting Nov. 18 on the King-Anderson bill embodying the Kennedy Administration's proposals for government-sponsored hospital insurance for the aged financed through the social security system.

Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills said hearings on the labor-backed bill would wind up no later than Nov. 27. He gave no indication that the committee would take action on the measure this year.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Nov. 9, 1963 | No. 45

Democrats Retain Posts In Key Off-Year Elections

L. A. Labor Opens '64 Vote Drive

Los Angeles—Organized labor here squared off against California's radical right as it opened its campaign to elect congressmen and state legislators in 1964 who are committed to social progress for the state.

At a $25-a-plate fund-raising dinner for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, more than 1,000 union officials heard Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) call for the re-election of Pres. Kennedy and warn that the same right-wing forces behind the drive for a so-called "right-to-work" law in 1958 have returned to battle with renewed vigor and a huge war chest.

They are active today "to a degree unknown in 1958," Brown declared.

"Their goals are to prevent the creation of stable unions and to deny workers their right to a union contract, adequate wages, reasonable job security and a voice in the rules of employment," he asserted.

While the right wing can be expected to be out "with banners flying in full cry" in the 1964 campaigns, "together we can defeat them," Brown declared.

"I urge you," he said, "to throw the full weight of your energy and influence against those who would turn back the clock of progress."

His plea for a strong political effort by California unions in 1964 was underscored by other speakers, including AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Sec. William J. Bassett of the host Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, and Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the State AFL-CIO.

Vote Drive Opens

The dinner at the Hollywood Palladium, staged earlier than usual this year, kicked off what the 450,000-member Los Angeles central body intends as the greatest political effort in its history. Funds from the dinner will help underwrite a mass registration drive and get-out-the vote campaign.

Bassett and Pitts, in their speeches, vowed that California labor would be united as never before in 1964 when labor in the state will have much at stake at the polls.

Biemiller cited major legislative gains achieved since the Kennedy Administration took office. These gains, he said, were made in spite of one of the most conservative Congresses in many years.

He joined Brown in warning that the radical right would raise formidable opposition to progressive candidates and programs.

"They're loaded with money and they're going to use it," he warned.

FUNDS FOR LABOR'S register-and-vote campaign were raised by the Los Angeles County Committee on Political Education at annual dinner addressed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown. Seated, from left, are Sec.-Treas. W. J. Bassett of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO, Brown, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. Standing is Los Angeles COPE Chairman Webb Green.

Margins Trimmed In Major Contests

By Willard Shelton

Democrats won the major contests in scattered off-year elections Nov. 5, some with reduced majorities, as local issues produced shifts of power but mixed results in scores of municipalities across the nation.

There was no detectable national trend in the voting patterns although Republican spokesmen professed satisfaction at gains in some states and communities and Democrats claimed that a GOP effort to capitalize on supposed voter resentment on the civil rights issues had failed to pay off.

The labor-endorsed Democratic nominee for governor of Kentucky, Edward T. Breathitt, won election by a plurality sharply reduced from the normal margins. The Republican nominee, Louis B. Nunn, campaigned vigorously against an executive order against discrimination in state-licensed businesses issued by incumbent Democratic Gov. Bert T. Combs.

Mayor James H. J. Tate, a Democrat, won re-election in Philadelphia by about a 61,000-vote majority, a drop from the 100,000-to-200,000 pluralities of recent years. But powerful assistance to the Republican nominee, James T. McDermott, by GOP Gov. William W. Scranton, failed to produce a change in political control. Pres. Kennedy had staked his prestige by a visit to Philadelphia just before the election and a direct endorsement of Tate.

Shelley Elected

John F. Shelley, a labor-backed eight-term Democratic veteran of the House, won election as mayor of San Francisco. The election is theoretically nonpartisan but incumbent Mayor George Christopher is a Republican frequently mentioned for statewide office.

In New Jersey, Republicans gained control of the lower house of the legislature, which had gone narrowly Democratic when Gov. Richard J. Hughes was elected.

(Continued on Page 8)

'Registrars' Spur Locals In Politics

Organized labor's political efforts have been given increased impetus in some 700 locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers with the filling of the new local union post of "registrar" authorized by the IBEW's last convention.

The registrar plan was recommended by IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan at the union's 27th convention in Montreal last fall with the goal of improving membership effectiveness on the political front.

Pointing out that political education cannot be effective if confined to "a few hectic weeks between Labor Day and Election Day," the IBEW officers called on local presidents to fill the new offices with members possessing the "enthusiasm, knowledge and energy necessary to produce the needed results" on a year-round basis.

Locals which have followed through so far, as party jockeying for the 1964 election campaigns gets into full swing, represent more than half the IBEW's 800,000 members.

The registrars' duties, as set forth by the convention, are to promote the local's program of political education and activity, maintain registration and voting records, and sup-

(Continued on Page 8)

Unemployment Persists, But:

Profits Rocketing To All-Time High

Corporate profits are rocketing to an all-time record high in 1963 with fourth-quarter earnings expected to maintain the sharp jump over 1962 profits racked up earlier this year.

The Wall Street Journal, in its quarterly compilation of profits, declared flatly that they "seem certain to reach a record high for all of 1963," reporting that for the July-September period profits were up 15.2 percent over the same quarter a year ago.

This followed a 15.9 percent increase in the second quarter of the year and led the Journal to predict:

"Out of 15 industries, no less than 11 promise also to exceed their earnings in the fourth quarter."

The Journal's profits report came a few days after the government reported the unemployment rate in October registered 5.5 percent of the labor force and that the nation had completed the sixth successive full year with unemployment of 5 percent or more.

The newspaper found that earnings in the third quarter "held at the record peacetime rate" reached in the second three months of the year and "seems likely to hold at a similar rate in the current quarter."

Second quarter profits at an annual rate had been estimated by the government at $26.8 billion after taxes compared to $24.6 billion for the same quarter in 1962. Similar increases are anticipated for the third and fourth quarters this year.

The Journal predicted that a new profits record will be reached for the year "even if the fourth quarter falls back somewhat from the rates of the preceding quarters" and that profits at an annual rate of $20 billion in the last three months of the year would put the year well over the $24.6 billion record set in 1962.

All of the 32 categories set up by the Journal showed increases in the third quarter of 1963 over 1962 except three where the decline was slight. The steel industry showed a 126.5 percent jump over the same quarter a year ago, airlines registered a 34 percent rise and automotive industry profits were up 21.8 percent.

Rockefeller to Run; Invites Contests

New York—Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller formally announced his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination and challenged other contenders to compete with him in pre-convention party primaries.

The New Hampshire primary in March, first in the nation, provides "an excellent opportunity" for candidates to make known their views without "fence-straddling or double talk," Rockefeller declared.

His statement that he will enter the New Hampshire and other primaries was regarded as a direct challenge to Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz)., considered by some observers the current front-runner in the GOP presidential contest.

'Separate but Equal' Clause Voided In Test of Hill-Burton Hospital Act

Richmond, Va.—The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals has declared unconstitutional the "separate but equal" clause in the Hill-Burton Act, which provides some $220 million a year in federal matching grants for construction of hospitals, nursing homes and other medical facilities.

In a 3-2 decision the court upheld an appeal by a group of Negro doctors, dentists and patients who sought an injunction to bar discrimination by two private, non-profit hospitals in Greensboro, N. C., built in part with Hill-Burton funds.

The appeals court reversed the U.S. District Court in Greensboro, which had denied the injunctive relief. The new ruling is subject to appeal by the hospitals to the Supreme Court.

Should the decision stand, it could have broad significance in paving the way for further desegregation suits under other federal grant-in-aid systems, and as a precedent reinforcing the view that where private facilities accept the benefits of federal aid programs they become subject to the Constitution's limitations.

The Negro plaintiffs, with the Justice Dept. intervening on their behalf, complained that discrimination by the hospitals on the basis of race violated the 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution. They sought injunctions to restrain the hospitals from:

- Denying Negro physicians and dentists the use of staff facilities on the ground of race.
- Refusing to accept Negro patients because of their race.
- Refusing on the basis of race to permit patients to be treated by their own physicians and dentists in the hospitals.

"The threshhold question" Chief

(Continued on Page 8)

The Story of the AFL-CIO:

The Hands That Build America

A special 44-page magazine supplement telling the story of the AFL-CIO as it returns to the city of its birth for the federation's fifth convention will be distributed at the convention as a section of the New York Times of Nov. 17.

The rotogravure supplement contains major articles dealing with the AFL-CIO's objectives, the state of its 131 affiliates and their 60,000 locals, the federation's efforts to build democratic trade unions in the developing nations, its fight for equal rights for all Americans, automation's impact on jobs, labor's role in community services and voter registration drives, and the AFL-CIO's function as "the people's lobby" in pressing for state and federal legislation of benefit to the entire nation.

Single copies of "The Hands That Build America," detailing organized labor's achievements since the early days of the nation, its current programs and problems and its aspirations for the future, are available free. Quantity prices are 10 cents each in lots of less than 1,000 and $75 for lots of 1,000. To obtain additional copies write:

Pamphlet Division
AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications
815 Sixteenth St., N.W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Unions Ask Civil Aeronautics Board To Void Strike Insurance Program

The Civil Aeronautics Board listened to three sides of the debate over whether the airlines' mutual strike assistance pact violates the public interest and reserved decision.

Six AFL-CIO unions representing airline employes urged the CAB to disapprove the airlines' agreement, a form of strike insurance. They charged that its effect has been to worsen labor relations and to increase the number and severity of strikes.

The seven participating airlines asked the board to uphold a hearing examiner's finding that the agreement is consistent with the public interest.

The CAB's own Bureau of Economic Regulation took a middle position that the original 1958 agreement was proper, but that changes made since then should be disallowed.

In its original form, the agreement required airlines which drew extra business because of a strike against a competitor to rebate its "windfall" profits to the struck company—providing the strike resulted from union rejection of a Presidential Emergency Board recommendation for settlement.

This basic agreement was approved by a 4-1 vote of the CAB in the spring of 1959. However, three of the five present members of the board have been appointed since then and one of the holdovers, G. Joseph Minetti, was the dissenter in the 1959 decision.

Since then the airlines have broadened the agreement to cover all strikes, regardless of cause, and added a provision for an assessment on the participating airlines if the "windfall" rebates did not equal 25 percent of the struck company's normal operating expenses.

This, the CAB's Bureau of Economic Regulation contends, is against the public interest and "constitutes a radical shift in bargaining power of the sort that may lead to union counter-measures immobilizing our air transportation system."

Joining in fighting the entire agreement are the Air Line Pilots, Machinists, Flight Engineers, Railway Clerks, Transport Workers, and Air Line Dispatchers.

The unions' attorney, James L. Highsaw, Jr., told the CAB that the test of the agreement is whether it has had a good or a bad effect on labor relations in the airline industry. He asked that the strike insurance pact be voided because it has "aggravated" union-management relations and has contributed to a "substantial increase" in the number and the duration of strikes.

During the hearings, United Airlines indicated that it will remain a party to the agreement for at least another year, even though the company's president, W. A. Patterson, has criticized it in harsh terms.

United Unhappy

Patterson last spring told a stockholder's meeting that he would recommend to his board of directors that United withdraw from the strike pact because "when you see the labor relations policies of some carriers so opposed to your own, then it's time to take action to protect your own interests."

The agreement, he said, has cost United $8 million in payments to other airlines including strikes over issues that United had already specifically settled with the unions involved.

As the CAB hearings got under way, United was in a dispute with the Machinists over a contract renewal. After a strike vote by the IAM, Pres. Kennedy named an emergency board to make recommendations and hearings were in progress as the CAB proceedings were going on.

A United Airlines executive confirmed to the AFL-CIO News that the company had not served the required 60 day notice for withdrawal from the strike assistance pact by the Nov. 1 deadline, and thus was committed to remain a member through 1964.

The other airlines in the pact are American, Braniff, Continental, Eastern, Northwest, and Trans World.

Talks Continuing At Westinghouse

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Westinghouse Electric Corp. have reached agreement on contract terms for workers in 21 apparatus repair shops but negotiations marked by several strikes were continuing for IBEW units at 40 manufacturing plants.

At one point more than 5,000 workers were out at four locations, the union said, against management insistence on a chain-wide seniority clause. Agreement on a "pattern" wage increase was reached several weeks ago.

The "pattern" settlement called for increases averaging 13.5 cents an hour and improvement in vacation, pension and insurance clauses.

Opportunities Stifled:

Job Lag Stressed By Building Crafts

By Gervase N. Love

New York—A sharp stepup in the nation's economic growth rate as a source of new jobs in which minority group members might share was urged by one speaker after another at the 52d convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. here.

Department Pres. C. J. Haggerty, Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) and Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) joined in stressing the key role of a burgeoning economy in creating work opportunities open to all qualified applicants.

"We have had an annual unemployment rate of 12 percent since 1957 (about twice the national rate)," Haggerty declared in his keynote speech.

"We have experienced a steadily declining work force in that period. We have today approximately 185,000 building tradesmen unemployed.

"The problem as I see it is one that must be solved by getting our economy moving ahead at a faster pace. Congress must realize the need for a vast public works program not as a stop-gap, but a long-range planned program.

"Such a program would make it practical to expand our apprentice training programs because then we could reasonably expect the trainee to find employment. Unless such action is taken the construction work force will continue to decline each year as productivity increases and automation takes its toll."

In addition, Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the Greater New York City Building & Construction Trades Council, as temporary chairman opening the convention, vigorously defended the city's building trades locals against charges of race bias.

'Year of Upheaval'

"We are not protecting any local union that wants to discriminate," Brennan said. "We want every local to be fair. We want to help them. We want to see that if they want qualified men and can't find them, then we will be able to get them."

He said a screening committee has narrowed down "several thousand" job applicants to "a few hundred" who proved themselves qualified under "a test that was not rigged."

"By this means," he added, "we find that there are many young Negro men who are graduated from high schools, and other schools, who are qualified to come into our ranks, and we hope we can bring them in."

Similarly among Puerto Ricans, he said, although the language barrier is a serious problem the unions are not now able to cope with.

"However, we also want to make it clear that we are not going to have people outside the building trades, outside the labor movement, dictate to us or tell us how to run our union," Brennan said.

Haggerty took sharp issue with a forecast of growth in the construction industry between 1960 and 1970 sent to Congress by the U.S. Labor Dept. under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

The report predicted that 2,387,000 skilled artisans would be needed in 1970, in addition to those remaining from the present work force, to meet the demands of the industry's share of the gross national product.

Haggerty said the department's executive council was "baffled and concerned" by the forecast and had its reliability studied by a committee of international union economists.

This group's "extreme variance" in its conclusions led the department to engage an independent management consultant to undertake a similar study. Copies have been sent to Pres. Kennedy and Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, he said.

"Rather than needing 2,387,000 additional journeymen by 1970, our study shows a need of only 456,000," Haggerty told the convention.

"We also do not agree with the government's prediction of an $87.3 billion construction share of the gross national product in 1970. Our figures show only $77 billion plus. We agree that the $87 billion figure would be good, but we feel it is as unrealistic as the manpower needs forecast."

Rockefeller called for a "common effort to accelerate economic growth" to create enough jobs so it won't have to be a matter of 'either-or' a white worker or a Negro worker when a job opens up.

"A full employment economy offers opportunity for all," he asserted, emphasizing that job equality is "an overriding must in making the American dream a reality for everyone." He called for a $10 billion-a-year increase in investment of private capital in new plant or equipment "to create all the jobs we need."

Wagner, welcoming delegates to "your convention in this year of upheaval," called for an "increased tempo" in the economy to help increase employment. He recalled that labor had helped break ground for the civil rights movement and thanked the building trades unions for their aid in assuring opportunities for Negro and Puerto Ricans as both apprentices and journeymen.

"This is a union town," he added, "and so long as I have a voice in its affairs it will be an even better union town."

Both Rockefeller and Wagner touched on the possibility of increased building trades unemployment when construction for the New York World's Fair is completed. Rockefeller said the legislature has authorized $1 billion in guarantees for low-cost and middle-cost housing. Wagner briefly outlined plans for projects of several types, some of which, he said, would require state or federal legislation.

Other opening session speakers included Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept., Pres. Paul Hall of the Maritime Trades Dept., Louis Sherman, Building Trades general counsel, and Jack Zucker, president of the New York City Building Trades Employers Association.

Philadelphia Firemen Reopen Wage Talks

Philadelphia—Negotiations for improved wages in the Philadelphia Fire Dept. were reopened following the successful bid for re-election by Mayor James H. J. Tate. Informational picket lines established earlier by the Intl. Association of Fire Fighters had led to the suspension of 59 members including Pres. James Forbes.

IAFF Sec.-Treas. John C. Kabachus said the picket lines were disbanded several days before the election after city officials agreed to take another look at the fire fighters' wage structures.

'Good Beginning' Seen:

IUD Sessions Keyed To Organizing Need

By Robert B. Cooney

Labor must make organizing the unorganized "a matter of the highest priority" if workers and consumers are to share in economic abundance, Pres. Walter P. Reuther declared before the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s fifth convention.

In a report to some 300 delegates, Reuther noted that the IUD's coordinated organizing drives have brought some 42,000 additional workers into the union fold.

While this represents "a good beginning" for the drive which has been in full swing for only six months, "we must do more," he declared in his keynote address to the convention.

"Workers and consumers are being shortchanged and are not getting their fair share of the fruits of automation," Reuther asserted. Because of this, he added, labor must raise its sights at the bargaining table and must organize to provide access to the benefits of bargaining for others.

He reported that 25 IUD affiliates have assigned 143 organizers to the coordinated campaigns and the department has added 53 more.

The program was adopted last January by the IUD executive committee, which emphasized that it would be in addition to coordinated organizing campaigns authorized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and would not conflict with the overall federation program.

Reuther noted that the IUD drives have reached the point where they are averaging either an election a day or the filing of an election petition. He described as a "major gain" the ability of the coordinated approach to resolve jurisdictional problems satisfactorily at the area level.

On the "civil rights revolution," the IUD president's report declared that "all sectors of American life—unions included—must be opened to equal opportunity." But, he said, labor's fight "must be for full employment as well as fair employment."

Labor must continue to fight for a fair employment practices commission with enforcement powers as a key element in a broad civil rights bill, he said.

Reuther's report also called for creation of a national peace planning board since "arms reduction with inspection now has become a possibility." Such a board should include labor, industry, universities and government, he said, and should have authority to develop alternatives to defense spending.

He urged a federal minimum wage of $2 an hour "for every American" to help end a situation in which "the rich have been getting richer and, relatively, the poor have been getting less than their fair share."

Such an increase, plus extension of minimum wage coverage to millions more workers, are "realistic goals" in today's economy, Reuther declared.

He said the effects of soaring productivity too often have been more unemployment instead of added wealth.

"Wage increases at least in line with today's productivity are essential, particularly for workers at the low end of the wage scale," he said.

Reuther called for strong federal policies, including a "consumer-oriented tax cut," to promote greater economic growth and reduce high-level unemployment.

In reciting "America's long list of neglect"—health care for the aged, the classroom shortage, youth unemployment—Reuther said the nation also must face up to the looming problem of leisure. He said labor will study the feasibility of amending the federal wage-hour law to require vacations by law.

Reuther's review of "the economy and the unemployed" called unemployment "the most pressing economic problem confronting the American people and said the greatest obstacle to full employment remained a weakness in general demand.

To overcome this, he urged "a sweeping tax reduction" for low and middle-income groups. He said the lag in negotiated wage increases also cripples a key source of purchasing power. In addition, improved jobless pay and social security programs would modernize these systems and bolster the economy, he said.

In his keynote address, Reuther said the labor and liberal movements must become more united and militant in their legislative and political efforts. He said they should demand of the congressional leadership "a reorganization of the chaotic committee structure."

He said it is "politically insane and morally indefensible" to have hostile southern senators in charge of a committee handling civil rights legislation and a group of fiscal conservatives writing a tax bill.

NINETY CLERGYMEN were guests of the St. Louis AFL-CIO at second annual labor-clergy dinner. Speakers included, left to right: seated, the Rev. George W. Wittmer of the Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod; Pres. John I. Rollings, Missouri AFL-CIO; Msgr. James R. Hartnett of the Catholic archdiocese; standing, St. Louis AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Oscar A. Ehrhardt; the Rev. William C. Gabler, pastor, St. Paul's United Church of Christ; Pres. Joseph P. Clark of the city central body and AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Delmond Garst.

Montgomery Ward Hit With NLRB Complaint

The National Labor Relations Board has charged Montgomery Ward with violations of the Taft-Hartley Act against the Retail Clerks in a complaint involving a number of company locations throughout the country.

The board alleges that Ward "did interfere with, restrain, and coerce, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employes in the exercise of the rights" guaranteed workers and "thereby did engage in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices."

The complaint charged that Ward "engaged in a nationwide campaign to induce, solicit, or invite the employes at each of the retail stores or mail order houses" listed in an appendix to reject their certified or recognized collective bargaining representative and "induce said employes to file decertification petitions with the board. . . ."

The company's labor relations representatives, district managers, regional personnel directors, district service managers, store managers, and other agents are charged with engaging in a massive campaign of coercion through speeches and other statements to create employe dissatisfaction with their union with the object of undermining the recognized or certified collective bargaining representative.

Following the speeches, the board charged, store managers, assistant store managers, and other supervisors and agents instigated, aided, and encouraged employes to prepare decertification petitions and to gather signatures for these petitions.

Ward also unlawfully conducted polls of its employes regarding their preference for or against representation by the union in various store locations throughout the United States, the complaint charged.

"Immediately prior to the polling," it said, Ward "promised its employes economic and other benefits, the immediate granting of which was conditioned upon the results of said polling."

Hearings now underway before an NLRB trial examiner, may grow into one of the largest records in recent board history. Pending its final decision, the board has dismissed the decertification petitions encouraged by Ward.

Court Bars Runaway From Unfair Practices

New Bern, N. C.—An order restraining the Evans Mfg. Co., a "runaway" garment firm, from unfair labor practices against Ladies' Garment Worker members has been issued here by U.S. District Judge John D. Larkins, Jr.

The union said the injunction marked the first instance in which the ILGWU has received such preliminary court protection from employer coercion.

The court order forbids the Grifton, N. C. firm recognizing an alleged company union, from entering into a contract with it, from spying on ILGWU meeting and from various other coercive and intimidatory practices.

The National Labor Relations Board petitioned for the injunction after issuing a complaint against the company. The ILGWU charged that the firm, which had a plant in Philadelphia, moved to Grifton in 1959 in violation of an agreement to open a new plant only if its Philadelhia plant was working full force and only if contract terms were reached with the union at the new location.

Morton Shapiro, ILGWU regional director, said the union sent organizers to Grifton last June at the request of Evans Co. employes. The management reacted in a "flagrantly illegal manner," according to Shapiro, by setting up the company union, giving employes time off to solicit members and signing a purported contract with the company union, as well as by espionage and the firing of an ILGWU employe leader.

The union urged a court restraining order so that Evans workers would be free from company interference while the NLRB hears testimony and goes through its decision-making process on unfair labor practice charges.

Judge Larkins refused to issue an order restoring the local union leader to his job but agreed to hear further arguments on the issue Nov. 12.

LOOK for the UNION LABEL
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Mediators Ask New Parleys In CWA Strike

Los Angeles—Nearly 9,000 members of the Communications Workers went into the fourth week of their strike against General Telephone of California as federal mediators sought to re-establish bargaining talks between the company and the union.

R. Parker Sullivan, president of General Telephone of California, reiterated the company's position that its last offer had been made at the bargaining table before the strike began. CWA District Dir. Louis B. Knecht retorted that collective bargaining cannot be conducted on a "take it or leave it" basis.

At issue is the company's refusal to pay wages and working conditions that CWA members have won in other telephone companies. General Telephone subscribers pay the same or higher rates than subscribers of the intermingled Bell System, the CWA said. Wage differentials in top grades range up to $11 a week, the union charged, and lower standards also are maintained in pensions, health insurance and vacations.

Over 1.3 million subscribers in the Greater Los Angeles area are affected.

Construction Scales Rise In 3d Quarter

Wage scales of union building trades workers in the third quarter of 1963 rose by an average of three-tenths of 1 percent over the July 1 averages and were 3.3 percent or 12.9 cents an hour, above the October 1962 wage levels, the Labor Dept's Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increases raised the average scale for building tradesmen to $4.10 an hour on Oct. 1.

The BLS, in its quarterly survey of seven major crafts in 100 U.S. cities, said electricians' average rates advanced 3.8 cents, plasterers 2 cents, plumbers 1.5 cents, and the other trades one-half cent.

The BLS said the increases affected one of every eight workers surveyed. Scales were increased in 28 cities for electricians, 21 cities for laborers, 20 cities for plumbers, 18 for carpenters, and in at least 8 for the other trades. In computing the changes, rate increases were averaged among all workers in the trade, the bureau pointed out.

USS Thresher Fund Asks Contributions

Contributions are being sought for the USS Thresher Fund, set up in Massachusetts, to provide higher educational assistance to the nearly 200 children left fatherless when the submarine Thresher was lost at sea last Apr. 10.

Beneficiaries will include the children both of Navy personnel and of civilians who went down with the vessel. The fund, which has initial approval of the Internal Revenue Service as a tax-exempt charity, will also be used for relief if enough money is raised.

Contributions may be sent to the USS Thresher Fund, care of the Old Colony Trust Co., PO Box 850, Boston 3, Mass.

Board Submits Report In Pullman Dispute

A presidential emergency board has recommended a gradual reduction in the workmonth for members of the Sleeping Car Porters coupled with a retroactive pay raise of 5.14 cents an hour. The board, however, rejected the union's demands for job stabilization guarantees.

Under the Railway Labor Act, both sides are required to negotiate for 30 days following an emergency board's report. Thereafter, if no agreement is reached, the union is free to strike.

Porters presently work a basic 205-hour month and are paid at straight-time rates for up to 35 hours of overtime before receiving time-and-one-half premium pay.

Under the board's recommendations, the workmonth would drop to 180 hours but only across a 30-month period. It would fall to 195 hours at once, to 190 hours a year later, 185 hours the following year and 180 hours six months after that.

Premium overtime rates would be paid after 10 hours of straight-time overtime.

A 2-cent increase would be retroactive to Feb. 1, 1962 and an additional 3.14 cents retroactive to May 1, 1962. There would be no reduction in the present monthly base pay with the cut in hours.

The union had sought an immediate 173-hour workmonth, the equivalent of a 40-hour week, plus a 25-cent pay raise and guarantee against layoffs. Members had backed this through a strike vote.

Bipartisan Support

EFFECTIVE CIVIL RIGHTS legislation is not a matter for political partisanship. The deeply moral and social questions posed by racial discrimination cut across all party lines. Bias and prejudice based on color, race, religion, national origin or any other presumed difference is a national concern and its elimination must be approached on a national and bipartisan basis.

It is because of the nature of this disease in the body politic that the bipartisan approach in securing adoption of civil rights legislation in the House Judiciary Committee is especially gratifying.

There are honest differences about some of the bill's provisions and language. But the need is for broadly based, effective federal civil rights legislation and the key factor is both Republican and Democratic support in the fight to secure equal rights for all.

The future of civil rights legislation lies in the continuation of bipartisan support as legislation makes its way through the House Rules Committee, to the House floor and ultimately to the Senate.

The national interest is overriding on this issue and must be served rather than the interests of any political party or group.

Running to Stand Still

THE LATEST READING of the nation's economic health is cause for concern. The vigorous glow imparted by record-shattering profits is discounted by the chronic high rate of unemployment, a rate that has not dropped below 5 percent of the labor force for six years.

The skyrocketing profit rate stems from the sharp rise in productivity which in turn is based on the rising impact of automation and new technology. The profit figures are augmented also by an estimated $2 billion in tax relief granted business and industry in the past few years.

That the tax relief granted business and the increase in productivity have not produced sufficient jobs to overcome the recession-style jobless rates is clear. Economic policies to stimulate demand via pumping purchasing power into the economy and programs to solve the problems stemming directly from the structural nature of some of the present unemployment can correct the present imbalance and distortion.

A chronic gnawing at the vitals of the economy in the form of high levels of unemployment must eventually produce the economic illness that we know as recession, an illness that will take the rosy sheen off profits, plunge the nation into unnecessary suffering and despair and vitally affect its role as the leader of the free world.

An accurate diagnosis of the present condition reveals that the economic growth rate of about 4 percent over the past 12 months is deceptive. It is a rate that reflects the economy running to stand still; it is not enough.

The remedies are at hand and the longer they are delayed, the more difficult will be the cure and the restoration of sound health to the economy.

Wage increases to give workers a fair share of the rising productivity, a tax cut concentrated in the low and middle income brackets, a shorter workweek and increased government expenditures for the wide range of needed public services and facilities—these can turn the trick and send the nation down the road to sound and continuing economic health and prosperity.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Nov. 9, 1963 No. 45

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Dilemma of the '60s

Memorial to a Gracious Lady:

We Remember Mrs. Roosevelt Because 'She Was One of Us...'

The AFL-CIO has given a major priority to raising funds for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation and has set up a special memorial fund committee to secure an hour's pay or $1 from every union member. Created for this drive is the leaflet "She Was One of Us . . ." from which the following is excerpted.

THROUGHOUT the crowded years of her lifetime, Eleanor Roosevelt was the tireless champion of working men and women, of the poor and underprivileged, of the common man the world over.

Wherever there were people in need—in sweatshop or slum, in settlement house or refugee camp—there you could find Eleanor Roosevelt.

Wherever there were battles to be fought—for minimum wage or social security, on behalf of sharecroppers or migratory workers, against the unspeakable evils of discrimination, segregation or child labor, for the union shop or against spurious "right-to-work" laws—there you could find Eleanor Roosevelt.

And because misery and oppression are global, Eleanor Roosevelt's work was global, too. She was an ardent advocate of the ideals of the United Nations, the architect of its Human Rights program.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council said of her: ". . . she regarded every cry of human distress as a personal summons."

Eleanor Roosevelt shared the dreams and hopes of those of us in organized labor. In the tumultuous Thirties while her husband was leading America out of the depths of the Great Depression she was ranging herself on our side, fighting for our right to organize, standing shoulder-to-shoulder with the rest of us in labor's ranks.

But more than that: She was one of us—for a quarter-century a dues-paying member of one of the AFL-CIO unions.

She called the labor movement "my movement," and in an address to the AFL-CIO's 1961 convention spoke warmly of our efforts "to keep alive the ideals . . . of really helping people to better conditions, to a better way of life."

A "gracious and compassionate lady," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called her, one who "instinctively understood the problems and aspirations of workers."

Eleanor Roosevelt labored hard and unselfishly in the humanitarian field and her deeds are our legacy. Death has stilled her voice, but we can still hear the echo of her words: ". . . there is so much to do, so many engrossing challenges, so many heartbreaking and pressing needs . . ."

To meet these needs in her memory, we in organized labor have joined our hearts and hands with those of her other friends to establish the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

Initiated by Pres. Kennedy, chaired by Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, chartered by Act of Congress, this educational and charitable organization will carry on the work to which Eleanor Roosevelt devoted her life.

In recognition of the vital link between labor and Eleanor Roosevelt, Pres. Kennedy has appointed a number of the AFL-CIO's most prominent leaders to serve on the Foundation's board of trustees, to further its program devoted to:

- human rights.
- underprivileged children.
- cancer research.
- international good will and peace.

THE TRADE UNION movement is enriched by its bittersweet ballads, songs that capture the essence of labor's struggles over the years, songs that speak eloquently of labor's dreams and hopes and lofty ideals.

Soaring above the rest are these hauntingly beautiful words:

"If we could consider each other
A neighbor, a friend and a brother,
It could be a wonderful, wonderful world,
It could be a wonderful world." *

This is labor's way. And it was Eleanor Roosevelt's way, too. So we have a dual responsibility—to ourselves and to her memory—to work toward the goals of a world of peace, freedom, social justice and human brotherhood.

The labor movement has established the AFL-CIO Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund and the Executive Council has urged each of us to contribute one hour's pay or one dollar to this fund.

It is so little to ask, this one-time gift. It will mean so much—an assurance to the poor, the homeless, the downtrodden, the people who work for a living all over the world that the candle which Eleanor Roosevelt lighted will always burn brightly, a beacon of hope in a dark world.

* "It Could Be A Wonderful World." Lyric by Hy Zaret, Music by Lou Singer © Argosy Music Corp., Mamaroneck, N. Y. Used by permission.

Morgan Says:

Romney, Mormon Church Face Issues of Race, Far Rightists

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THOUGH HIS RATING IS LOW on the totem pole of the pollsters, George Romney, businessman-turned-governor of Michigan, must still be considered as a dark horse for the Republican nomination for president. The odds against this genial, square-jawed gentleman with what might be called the Rotarian-handshake approach to politics, could well be reduced but for the fact that, like John F. Kennedy before him, he has a religious issue hung 'round his neck.

Morgan

Now, halfway through his first two-year term as Michigan's governor, Romney is a devout member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, or the Mormon church as it is more commonly known. His parents were Mormons and he was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, where they had fled to escape religious persecution. Paradoxically, Romney's problem now in religion is that his church is accused of formal prejudice against if not persecution of Negro minorities.

As matters now stand, no Negro can achieve priesthood in the Mormon church because, according to its teachings and interpretations of the Bible, the black man is marked "with the curse of Cain," making him, in effect, an inferior person.

In a speech in the legislature at Lansing, Michigan's only Negro state senator, a Democrat from Detroit named Basil Brown, challenged Romney to confirm or deny the "curse of Cain" as Mormon belief. The governor refused. "I didn't run for governor of Michigan," he told reporters, "as a Mormon, I ran as an American citizen."

"The only question is whether I accept the fact that we are all equal as citizens and as children of God, and I accept that without reservation."

Fascinatingly enough, the Mormon church hierarchy shows an increasing tendency to grapple with this thorny issue, perhaps in recognition of the apparent contradiction between the non-discrimination that, say, a George Romney practices in his secular life and the narrower line drawn by some of the church's spiritual teachings. As a significant example, after the NAACP threatened to picket the recent General Conference of the church unless it took some position on the Negro's struggle for equal rights, a top Mormon leader, Hugh B. Brown, spoke out. "We believe," he said, "that all men are the children of the same God and that it is a moral evil for any person or group . . . to deny any human being the right to gainful employment, to full educational opportunity and to every privilege of citizenship."

This did not deal directly with the ban on Negroes in the Mormon priesthood but it was seen as an important liberalizing step. Brown himself is regarded as a Mormon "liberal." At the General Conference he was elevated to the position of first councillor to 90-year-old David O. McKay, president of the church. This promotion may have even broader significance because Brown has been prominently involved in another internal struggle with important political ramifications: an issue that any presidential candidate, Mormon or otherwise, would confront: what to do, if anything, about the radical right.

COINCIDENTALLY, THE ISSUE came to a head in the wake of President Kennedy's September trip to the West. Three nights before the President spoke at the Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, Ex-Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson publicly and emotionally embraced the John Birch Society at a testimonial dinner in Los Angeles for its founder, Robert Welch. Since Benson himself is high in the church—he is one of the 12 Apostles—some took this as a Mormon endorsement of the Birchers, whose ultra-conservatism, if not actual membership, is strongly evident in Utah. Furthermore, Benson's son, Reed, is a "coordinator" for the Birch Society. Moderate Mormons were disturbed and Congressman Ralph Harding, Idaho Democrat and himself a Mormon, boldly denounced Ex-Secretary Benson in a House speech, protested that his views were not official Mormon views.

The church suddenly assigned Ezra Benson to head its European mission, headquartered in Frankfurt, Germany. A spokesman said the appointment had "no significance" in terms of the controversy over Benson's political views.

Whatever Romney's political future, this kind of moderation from his church would be far more helpful to him with the great swath of middle-ground voters, so important to any candidate, than the extremism in which Benson himself persists. Only last Sunday in New Orleans, Benson again embraced Birchism, equated Negro demands for civil rights with the "Communist Conspiracy," and denounced a possible wheat deal with the Soviet Union. With alert if cruel journalistic enterprise, however, ABC's Salt Lake affiliate, KALL, recalled that as Secretary of Agriculture, Benson had favored commerce with the Iron Curtain countries. "I'd trade with the Devil," he said in 1957, "if I got a good deal."

Washington Reports:

FEP Pressed as Vital Need Of Skilled, Unskilled Negroes

NOT ONLY UNSKILLED Negroes but many who are trained and qualified have been unable to find work and are in need of a federal fair employment practices law, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) pointed out on the same program that the Council of Economic Advisers, "in a study made at my request, found that taking the Negro even at the skills he has today and the level of education, if you gave him full opportunity you would add $13 billion to $17 billion a year to the gross national product."

Clark acknowledged that the present high rate of unemployment must be reduced to make a federal fair employment act fully effective.

"What's the use," he asked, "of being able to go into the same restaurant as a white man if you can't get a job to let you pick up the tab when you've had your meal?"

"Unless we can bring the unemployment rate below the present 5 percent, it is going to be a long, hard road to get fair employment practices adequately implemented."

Pennsylvania, Clark's state, and New York, that of Javits, have Fair Employment Practices Commissions. Both said the problem of fair employment cannot be met by state laws alone, since few states in the South have any such legislation and many states have serious loopholes in their laws.

"However," said Clark, "when a state can take care of a case, under the proposed federal law, it would have jurisdiction" allowing effective action.

THE FEDERAL LAW would work like that in New York, Javits said, with efforts made to settle cases without court action.

Opponents of FEPC argue that the courts would be handling nothing but fair employment cases.

"This is just untrue," he added. "This has not been the experience in New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and California. The courts have not been flooded in any of these states.

"On the contrary, the overwhelmingly large majority of cases have been settled [without court action], and not so many cases have been brought up, relatively speaking, as people might imagine."

Javits said a federal fair employment law will not bring "the golden rule," but "the difference between a situation with FEPC and without it is day and night."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE POLL TAX, long a troublesome issue on the ground that such a tax is an infringement on a citizen's right to vote, remains a troublesome issue. Thirty-six states have ratified a proposed constitutional amendment to abolish poll taxes in federal elections, but two more are needed for the requisite two-thirds, and there is no certainty that an additional two states will act in time to make the amendment effective for the presidential election in 1964.

In addition, the question of a poll tax for local and state elections is an issue in Virginia and could remain an issue in Texas, subject to the verdict of the voters in a Nov. 9 referendum on repeal.

Only a few of the state legislatures are scheduled to meet in regular sessions next year. Four of them are southern states—Virginia, Louisiana, Georgia and South Carolina—where the legislatures have previously shown no strong push to ratify the amendment. The other states with regular sessions are Arizona and South Dakota, which declined to complete action this year. The Arizona house voted to ratify but the Senate did not, while the South Dakota legislature failed to act in either house.

Sponsor of the proposed amendment was Sen. Spessard L. Holland, a Florida Democrat, who has long opposed poll taxes in principle but believed that they could not be abolished except by constitutional amendment. This was the general doctrine also advanced by other members of Congress from the southern states. As of now, only Florida and Tennessee among the southern states have ratified the proposal; Mississippi has rejected the amendment and the other legislatures have not acted.

* * *

ONLY FIVE STATES now retain the poll tax system as a qualification for voting; the tax has gradually been eroded as an obstacle to voting rights and no doubt other obstacles also will be eroded. The issue of principle, however, should be declared as a matter of the country's self-education.

In Virginia a major battle is developing on whether the legislature will re-enact a poll tax for non-federal elections even though the amendment outlaws the system for federal elections. Gov. Albertis S. Harrison has called a special session of the legislature for Nov. 19 to submit such a proposal. Rep. W. Pat Jennings, a Democrat who does not vote with the state organization controlled by Sen. Harry F. Byrd, is heading a bipartisan drive for repeal.

The confusions invited by a poll tax for state elections, while such a tax in federal elections is outlawed, could be compounded by revisions of the registration laws. Among the devices mentioned by organization Democrats, for example, is a requirement that every citizen be obligated to submit evidence of residence six months before election day—the precise deadline for payment of state poll taxes.

The Virginia League of Women Voters, the Virginia Teachers Association and other groups have joined the Virginia AFL-CIO in denouncing the poll tax. The Jennings group circulated petitions for outright repeal.

* * *

THE SUSPICION is gradually growing among some members of the House and Senate that something must be wrong with the rules if they cannot reach effective decisions on legislative proposals at a faster pace than thus far in 1963.

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel of California, the Republican Senate whip, said on the floor that "the archaic rules under which we operate" are to blame for many difficulties. He may have had in mind the fact that the Senate has no rule of germaneness; any member who gets the floor can talk on any issue in the world no matter what the presumption is about the pending business.

The basic problem is more difficult: It is the rule of seniority in both houses that gives powerful committee chairmanships to members merely because they have managed to be elected enough times to become veterans. They may have no sympathy whatsoever with national programs but they become chairmen, and then they use their power to block legislation rather than pass it.

The longer a member serves, the more he develops a tendency to feel a vested interest in his own seniority and the prospects it holds for the future.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES legislation is one of the most important and necessary sections of the civil rights bill pending before Congress, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), left, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Rollcall in House on Bracero Program

Here is the rollcall by which the House voted to extend for one year—until Dec. 31, 1964—the bracero program under which farm laborers are brought in from Mexico to work on U.S. farms. The vote was 173-160. Democrats voted 118-72 against extending the program; Republicans supported the extension, 101-42.

On labor's scorecard a vote against extension was a right vote (R), while a vote in favor was a wrong vote (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

ALABAMA

AL Andrews (D)	W
AL Elliott (D)	PR
AL Grant (D)	A
AL Huddleston (D)	R
AL Jones (D)	W
AL Rains (D)	PR
AL Roberts (D)	A
AL Selden	W

ALASKA

AL Rivers (D)	R

ARIZONA

1. Rhodes (R)	W
2. Udall (D)	W
3. Senner (D)	R

ARKANSAS

1. Gathings (D)	W
2. Mills (D)	A
3. Trimble (D)	W
4. Harris (D)	PW

CALIFORNIA

1. Clausen (R)	W
2. Johnson (D)	W
3. Moss (D)	W
4. Leggett (D)	W
5. Shelley (D)	PR
6. Mailliard (R)	W
7. Cohelan (D)	R
8. Miller (D)	A
9. Edwards (D)	R
10. Gubser (R)	W
11. Younger (R)	W
12. Talcott (R)	W
13. Teague (R)	W
14. Baldwin (R)	W
15. McFall (D)	W
16. Sisk (D)	W
18. Hagen (D)	W
33. Sheppard (D)	W
34. Hanna (D)	W
35. Utt (R)	W
36. Wilson, Bob (R)	W
37. Van Derlin (D)	W
38. Martin (R)	W

Los Angeles County

17. King (D)	R
19. Holifield (D)	R
20. Smith (R)	W
21. Hawkins (D)	R
22. Corman (D)	R
23. Clawson (R)	W
24. Lipscomb (R)	W
25. Cameron (D)	A
26. Roosevelt (D)	R
27. Burkhalter (D)	R
28. Bell (R)	W
29. Brown (D)	PR
30. Roybal (D)	R
31. Wilson, Charles (D)	R
32. Hosmer (R)	W

COLORADO

1. Rogers (D)	R
2. Brotzman (R)	W
3. Chenoweth (R)	W
4. Aspinall (D)	W

CONNECTICUT

AL Grabowski (D)	PR
1. Dadario (D)	R
2. St. Onge (D)	PR
3. Giaimo (D)	R
4. Sibal (R)	R
5. Monagan (D)	R

DELAWARE

AL McDowell (D)	R

FLORIDA

1. Sikes (D)	PW
2. Bennett (D)	R
3. Pepper (D)	A
4. Fascell (D)	W
5. Herlong (D)	PW
6. Rogers (D)	W
7. Haley (D)	W
8. Matthews (D)	W
9. Fuqua (D)	PW
10. Gibbons (D)	R
11. Gurney (R)	W
12. Cramer (R)	W

GEORGIA

1. Hagan (D)	A
2. Pilcher (D)	PW
3. Forrester (D)	PW
4. Flynt (D)	W
5. Weltner (D)	R
6. Vinson (D)	W
7. Davis (D)	W
8. Tuten (D)	R
9. Landrum (D)	W
10. Stephens (D)	W

HAWAII

AL Gill (D)	R
AL Matsunaga (D)	R

IDAHO

1. White (D)	A
2. Harding (D)	PW

ILLINOIS

12. McClory (R)	R
14. Hoffman (R)	PW
15. Reid (R)	PW
16. Anderson (R)	W
17. Arends (R)	W
18. Michel (R)	R
19. McLoskey (R)	W
20. Findley (R)	W
21. Gray (D)	R
22. Springer (R)	W
23. Shipley (D)	PR
24. Price (D)	R

Chicago-Cook County

1. Dawson (D)	A
2. O'Hara (D)	R
3. Murphy (D)	R
4. Derwinski (R)	W
5. Kluczynski (D)	PR
6. O'Brien (D)	A
7. Libonati (D)	R
8. Rostenkowski (D)	R
9. Finnegan (D)	R
10. Collier (R)	W
11. Pucinski (D)	R
13. Rumsfeld (R)	W

INDIANA

1. Madden (D)	R
2. Halleck (R)	W
3. Brademas (D)	R
4. Adair (R)	PW
5. Roush (D)	R
6. Roudebush (R)	R
7. Bray (R)	R
8. Denton (D)	R
9. Wilson (R)	R
10. Harvey (R)	W
11. Bruce (R)	A

IOWA

1. Schwengel (R)	W
2. Bromwell (R)	W
3. Gross (R)	W
4. Kyl (R)	R
5. Smith (D)	R
6. Hoeven (R)	W
7. Jensen (R)	W

KANSAS

1. Dole (R)	W
2. Avery (R)	W
3. Ellsworth (R)	W
4. Shriver (R)	PW
5. Skubitz (R)	PW

KENTUCKY

1. Stubblefield (D)	W
2. Natcher (D)	R
3. Synder (R)	PR
4. Chelf (D)	W
5. Siler (R)	PR
6. Watts (D)	PW
7. Perkins (D)	R

LOUISIANA

1. Hebert (D)	PR
2. Boggs (D)	R
3. Willis (D)	W
4. Waggonner (D)	W
5. Passman (D)	W
6. Morrison (D)	R
7. Thompson (D)	PR
8. Long (D)	PW

MAINE

1. Tupper (R)	R
2. McIntire (R)	W

MARYLAND

AL Sickles (D)	R
1. Morton (R)	W
2. Long (D)	W
3. Garmatz (D)	PR
4. Fallon (D)	PR
5. Lankford (D)	R
6. Mathias (R)	R
7. Friedel (D)	W

MASSACHUSETTS

1. Conte (R)	R
2. Boland (D)	R
3. Philbin (D)	R
4. Donohue (D)	PR
5. Morse (R)	R
6. Bates (R)	R
7. Macdonald (D)	PR
8. O'Neill (D)	R
9. McCormack (D) (Speaker)	NV
10. Martin (R)	W
11. Burke (D)	R
12. Keith (R)	W

MICHIGAN

AL Staebler (D)	W
2. Meader (R)	W
3. Johansen (R)	W
4. Hutchinson (R)	W
5. Ford (R)	W
6. Chamberlain (R)	W
7. O'Hara (D)	PW
8. Harvey (R)	W
9. Griffin (R)	W
10. Cederberg (R)	W
11. Knox (R)	W
12. Bennett (R)	R
18. Broomfield (R)	W

Metropolitan Detroit

1. Nedzi (D)	R
13. Diggs (D)	R
14. Ryan (D)	PR
15. Dingell (D)	R
16. Lesinski (D)	A
17. Griffiths (D)	PR

MINNESOTA

1. Quie (R)	W
2. Nelsen (R)	W
3. MacGregor (R)	PW
4. Karth (D)	PR
5. Fraser (D)	R
6. Olson (D)	R
7. Langen (R)	W
8. Blatnik (D)	R

MISSISSIPPI

1. Abernethy (D)	PW
2. Whitten (D)	W
3. Williams (D)	W
4. Winstead (D)	PW
5. Colmer (D)	W

MISSOURI

1. Karsten (D)	R
2. Curtis (R)	W
3. Sullivan (D)	R
4. Randall (D)	PR
5. Bolling (D)	PR
6. Hull (D)	R
7. Hall (R)	W
8. Ichord (D)	R
9. Cannon (D)	R
10. Jones (D)	W

MONTANA

1. Olsen (D)	R
2. Battin (R)	W

NEBRASKA

1. Beermann (R)	W
2. Cunningham (R)	R
3. Martin (R)	PW

NEVADA

AL Baring (D)	A

NEW HAMPSHIRE

1. Wyman (R)	PW
2. Cleveland (R)	R

NEW JERSEY

1. Cahill (R)	R
2. Glenn (R)	R
3. Auchincloss (R)	PW
4. Thompson (D)	PR
5. Frelinghuysen (R)	W
6. Dwyer (R)	R
7. Widnall (R)	W
8. Joelson (D)	R
9. Osmers (R)	R
10. Rodino (D)	R
11. Minish (D)	R
12. Wallhauser (R)	R
13. Gallagher (D)	PR
14. Daniels (D)	PR
15. Patten (D)	R

NEW MEXICO

AL Montoya (D)	R
AL Morris (D)	W

NEW YORK

1. Pike (D)	R
2. Grover (R)	R
3. Derounian (R)	PR
4. Wydler (R)	PR
5. Becker (R)	PR
25. Barry (R)	W
26. Reid (R)	R
27. St. George (R)	R
28. Wharton (R)	W
29. O'Brien (D)	R
30. King (R)	W
31. Kilburn (R)	PW
32. Pirnie (R)	PR
33. Robison (R)	R
34. Riehlman (R)	PR
35. Stratton (D)	R
36. Horton (R)	R
37. Ostertag (R)	R
38. Goodell (R)	W
39. Pillion (R)	W
40. Miller (R)	PR
41. Dulski (D)	R

New York City

6. Halpern (R)	R
7. Addabbo (D)	R
8. Rosenthal (D)	R
9. Delaney (D)	R
10. Celler (D)	PR
11. Keogh (D)	PR
12. Kelly (D)	PR
13. Multer (D)	PR
14. Rooney (D)	R
15. Carey (D)	R
16. Murphy (D)	R
17. Lindsay (R)	R
18. Powell (D)	R
19. Farbstein (D)	R
20. Ryan (D)	R
21. Healey (D)	R
22. Gilbert (D)	R
23. Buckley (D)	PR
24. Fino (R)	R

NORTH CAROLINA

1. Bonner (D)	PW
2. Fountain (D)	W
3. Henderson (D)	W
4. Cooley (D)	W
5. Scott (D)	PW
6. Kornegay (D)	A
7. Lennon (D)	A
8. Jonas (R)	W
9. Broyhill (R)	W
10. Whitener (D)	W
11. Taylor (D)	PW

NORTH DAKOTA

1. Andrews	W
2. Short (R)	W

OHIO

AL Taft (R)	W
1. Rich (R)	R
2. Clancy (R)	R
3. Schenck (R)	PW
4. McCulloch (R)	W
5. Latta (R)	W
6. Harsha (R)	W
7. Brown (R)	W
8. Betts (R)	W
9. Ashley (D)	R
10. Abele (R)	A
11. Bolton, Oliver (R)	R
12. Devine (R)	R
13. Mosher (R)	R
14. Ayres (R)	PW
15. Secrest (D)	R
16. Bow (R)	PR
17. Ashbrook (R)	A
18. Hays (D)	R
19. Kirwan (D)	R
20. Feighan (D)	R
21. Vanik (D)	R
22. Bolton, Frances (R)	W
23. Minshall (R)	W

OKLAHOMA

1. Belcher (R)	W
2. Edmondson (D)	PW
3. Albert (D)	W
4. Steed (D)	W
5. Jarman (D)	W
6. Wickersham (D)	W

OREGON

1. Norblad (R)	W
2. Ullman (D)	PW
3. Green (D)	R
4. Duncan (D)	W

PENNSYLVANA

6. Rhodes (D)	A
7. Milliken (R)	R
8. Curtin (R)	R
9. Dague (R)	W
10. McDade (R)	W
11. Flood (D)	R
12. Whalley (R)	W
13. Schweiker (R)	R
14. Moorhead (D)	R
15. Rooney (D)	R
16. Kunkel (R)	R
17. Schneebeli (R)	W
18. Corbett (R)	W
19. Goodling (R)	W
20. Holland (D)	R
21. Dent (D)	R
22. Saylor (R)	R
23. Vacancy
24. Weaver (R)	W
25. Clark (D)	R
26. Morgan (D)	R
27. Fulton (R)	W

Philadelphia

1. Barrett (D)	R
2. Nix (D)	R
3. Byrne (D)	R
4. Toll (D)	R
5. Green (D)	R

RHODE ISLAND

1. St. Germain (D)	R
2. Fogarty (D)	R

SOUTH CAROLINA

1. Rivers (D)	W
2. Watson (D)	PR
3. Dorn (D)	W
4. Ashmore (D)	PW
5. Hemphill (D)	W
6. McMillan (D)	W

SOUTH DAKOTA

1. Reifel (R)	W
2. Berry (R)	W

TENNESSEE

1. Quillen (R)	R
2. Baker (R)	PR
3. Brock (R)	W
4. Evins (D)	R
5. Fulton (D)	R
6. Bass (D)	R
7. Murray (D)	PW
8. Everett (D)	W
9. Davis (D)	W

TEXAS

AL Pool (D)	W
1. Patman (D)	W
2. Brooks (D)	R
3. Beckworth (D)	R
4. Roberts (D)	PW
5. Alger (R)	W
6. Teague (D)	W
7. Dowdy (D)	PW
8. Thomas (D)	R
9. Thompson (D)	W
10. Thornberry (D)	PW
11. Poage (D)	W
12. Wright (D)	PW
13. Purcell (D)	W
14. Young (D)	R
15. Kilgore (D)	W
16. Foreman (R)	W
17. Burleson (D)	W
18. Rogers (D)	W
19. Mahon (D)	W
20. Gonzalez (D)	R
21. Fisher (D)	W
22. Casey (D)	W

UTAH

1. Burton (R)	PW
2. Lloyd (R)	W

VERMONT

AL Stafford (R)	PR

VIRGINIA

1. Downing (D)	W
2. Hardy (D)	W
3. Gary (D)	W
4. Abbitt (D)	W
5. Tuck (D)	W
6. Poff (R)	W
7. Marsh (D)	W
8. Smith (D)	W
9. Jennings (D)	R
10. Broyhill (R)	W

WASHINGTON

1. Pelly (R)	PR
2. Westland (R)	PW
3. Hansen (D)	R
4. May (R)	PW
5. Horan (R)	PW
6. Tollefson (R)	A
7. Stinson (R)	A

WEST VIRGINIA

1. Moore (R)	R
2. Staggers (D)	R
3. Slack (D)	R
4. Hechler (D)	R
5. Kee (D)	R

WISCONSIN

1. Schadeberg (R)	W
2. Kastenmeier (D)	R
3. Thomson (R)	W
4. Zablocki (D)	R
5. Reuss (D)	R
6. Van Pelt (R)	W
7. Laird (R)	W
8. Byrnes (R)	PW
9. Johnson (D)	R
10. O'Konski (R)	R

WYOMING

AL Harrison (R)	W

New Gains or Depression?:

Rising Productivity Points Up Wage Lag

The rapid rise in man-hour output of American workers offers the nation a choice of new highs in living standards or a tailspin toward depression, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine, the American Federationist, has declared.

An article in the November issue of the magazine examines the recent sharp increases in productivity, especially among factory production workers, and warns that failure to follow through with proper economic and political decisions may mean "rising unemployment, heightened social tensions and a general weakening of the fabric of American society."

On the other hand, productivity gains could bring bountiful plenty, the economic analysis suggests, if they are accompanied by elimination of the "wage lag" —the margin by which wages have fallen behind the increase in manhour output.

"Wages must increase more rapidly than they have in the past few years without any increase in the overall price levels," the article asserts.

It reminds negotiators in the nation's 150,000 collective bargaining situations that the rapidly rising productivity rate "justifies and even requires higher wage increases than have been occurring in the past several years."

The article, "Soaring Productivity: A Fair Share for Labor," appears as an Economic Review feature of the Federationist and is prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

It notes that over the entire 1947 to 1962 period, factory output per man-hour rose at an average annual rate of 2.7 percent, but for the last two years of the period, productivity in manufacturing jumped 4.2 percent a year and has "continued to climb at a similar rate in 1963."

Moreover, this trend to greater productive efficiency, the analysis observes, has been evident in farming, construction, railroading, retail and wholesale trade and other industries as well as in manufacturing.

Fewer Produce More

What all this means, the analysis states, is that "we can produce as much or even more than before with fewer workers."

"Yet a growing labor force means more people seeking work than ever before," it adds. "Obviously, unless hours of work are shortened, production and sales must grow rapidly enough to make up for the jobs which the growth in productivity would otherwise destroy and to create additional jobs for new workers as well."

But production and sales have not been rising that fast. They have grown only 2.8 percent a year since 1953, the magazine points out, while over the same period the growth in the labor force and in man-hour output have pushed up production capacity at the rate of 4 to 4.5 percent a year.

"The slow growth in demand," the article continues, "is not likely to be reversed, however, unless business shares the benefits of increasing productivity with other groups in society. Consumers are the main source of demand. They purchase about 70 percent of all goods and services we produce. But they are able to do so, for the most part, because of the income they receive from wages and salaries.

Demand Will Lag

"Obviously, if wages fail to rise sufficiently while profits and dividends and other forms of income increase disproportionately, consumer demand for goods and services will lag. Wealth will become concentrated in the hands of those who tend to save much of their income or invest it. And the result, inevitably, will be a further widening of the gap between our ability to produce and our ability to consume."

The AFL-CIO researchers liken the current situation to that of the 1920-29 period, when manhour output rose nearly 32 percent, while the real buying power of factory workers' hourly wages increased less than 15 percent, leaving the "lion's share" of total income in the hands of the wealthy and leading to the great depression of the Thirties.

The nation has failed to apply the lessons of the Twenties, and once again an "economic lopsidedness" is evident, the magazine observes, pointing out that productivity rose 20.2 percent between 1956 and 1962, but that the buying power of workers' hourly wages rose only 15.2 percent over the same period.

Meanwhile, it notes, higher prices and lower unit labor costs as a result of productivity gains have led to an "unprecedented" rise in profit margins which represents "a danger signal which the nation cannot afford to ignore."

Wrong Profits

"Record profits based on lagging wages, rising prices and higher profit margins are not the kind of profits which produce and sustain full employment," the article asserts. "They are not the way to generate growth in sales and production. . . .

"To boost sales and avoid still another recession, the wage lag must be eliminated."

This can be achieved, the Federationist suggests, with little or no effect on prices by increasing real wages "at least in line with the recent trend of productivity . . . in the national economy" and by tieing profits to high volume.

Unless the nation corrects the growing imbalance between high productivity gains and low consumption levels, the analysis warns, the rate of unemployment will double by 1970.

To avoid this "grim prospect," it urges "vigorous use of government spending, taxing and other powers" and declares that "there can be little question that the time has come for legislation to reduce the length of the workweek."

* Based on information submitted by a large sample of employers regarding man hours of all persons.

† AFL-CIO estimate.

Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics, U. S. Department of Labor

Southern Textile Wages Still Trail, TWUA Says

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America said it "welcomes" an announcement by leading southern textile manufacturers of a forthcoming wage increase for production workers but warned that even if all workers get the projected raise, southern textile wages still will lag some $30 a week below average wages in all manufacturing industries.

The warmth of the union's reaction to the reported raises, said TWUA Pres. William Pollock, will depend on the "degree of good faith" with which employers carry out their announced intentions.

Pollock recalled that at the time of the industry's last raise announcement, in March 1962, what was to have been a 5 percent increase averaging 7.5 cents an hour turned out to be a 3.5 percent raise equivalent to 4.5 cents. Many employers either undercut the published figure or failed to give any raises at all, he charged.

"If the (new) wage announcement gets as much action as lip service," Pollock said, "it should give the low-wage economy of the South a badly-needed shot in the arm."

He estimated that a 5 percent raise would increase southern workers' purchasing power by $90 million a year.

Pollock noted that the wage increase announcement contradicted the industry's reply to a TWUA advertisement, published in August, which called on employers to share their profits with workers.

"They said we were talking through our hats," he recalled. "Now, just two months later, it's interesting to find the president of Burlington Industries, for example, declaring that conditions justify wage increases."

Burlington has reported that the last fiscal year was the best in its history. For the fiscal year ended Sept. 28, 1963, profits before taxes were $90.5 million on sales of $1.849 billion. For the preceding fiscal year, the figures were $83.3 million profits on sales of $1.099 billion. Both years were record-breakers for sales as well as profits.

The Burlington chain has been found guilty of numerous unfair labor practices against union employes in National Labor Relations Board cases.

Belanger Wins Sixth Term In Bay State

Springfield, Mass.—J. William Belanger was re-elected over two opponents to a sixth term as president of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO at the 6th annual convention here.

Also returned to office were Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin and Executive Vice Pres. John A. Callahan, who is the state's commissioner of labor and industries. Pres. Richard B. O'Keefe of the Leather Workers was named to the second executive vice presidency. All 31 vice presidents seeking new terms were re-elected.

In a major address Belanger called on Massachusetts labor to continue pressing for a shorter workweek, a more comprehensive system of unemployment insurance, hospital care for the aged through social security, improved educational facilities, a tax system based on ability to pay, and equal rights for all Americans.

"In short," he declared, "we must continue the fight to make our state and nation socially and economically better places in which to live and raise our families."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the delegates of a resurgence of activity among local unions, particularly evident in the rise in voluntary contributions to the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education in 1962 over the presidential year, 1960. Schnitzler urged continuation of this trend to counter the impact of stiffening opposition to labor's programs.

Among other speakers were Assistant Interior Sec. Kenneth Holum, who discussed the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies; AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Unions in Wisconsin Push 'Rights for All'

Milwaukee—Action to achieve the full exercise of freedom and human rights for every American was urged at the second biennial Conference on Civil Rights sponsored by the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO.

Delegates from Wisconsin labor bodies approved a resolution urging legislation by Congress and action by local and state governments, the labor movement and individuals "to end the humiliation and injustice suffered by millions of Americans" in voting, employment, housing, and public accomodations.

The struggle for human dignity, the resolution stated, is a "moral struggle which calls upon the total effort of every American citizen who believes in democracy and freedom" for himself; who "realizes that freedom, like peace, is indivisible" and that, unless everyone enjoys full freedom, "no one's freedom is secure."

The labor movement, delegates declared, must accelerate its efforts to "end all forms of segregation and discrimination." Every union affiliate, they resolved, should review its collective bargaining agreements "to assure that no discrimination exists."

Rap Anti-Semitism

The delegates voted "wholehearted support" of federal legislation to empower the Justice Dept. to bring suit against those who deny others their constitutional rights; of a public accomodations law forbidding discrimination at any public facility; of "first-step" desegregation in every public school district, and similar measures.

The conference voted also to condemn anti-semitic practices in Soviet Russia and urged the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to move speedily to ratify the genocide convention adopted by the United Nations in 1948.

Convention speakers included Gov. John W. Reynolds; Pres. Fred H. Harrington of the University of Wisconsin; Milwaukee Mayor Henry W. Maier; Pres. George A. Haberman and Sec.-Treas. George W. Hall of the state AFL-CIO; James Farmer, national director of CORE; and state Supreme Court Justice Myron L. Gordon.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Boris Shishkin was chairman of the final report meeting on conference workshop discussions.

William Sefton Dies, USWA Organizer

Langenburg, Sask.—William Sefton of Toronto, a Steelworkers organizer since 1942, died of a heart attack while visiting a prospective member here. He was buried in Toronto.

A strong proponent of labor political action, Sefton, who was born in Sudbury, Ont., recently was a vice president of the New Democratic Party in Ontario, and was an unsuccessful NDP candidate for the House of Commons in 1962. Earlier he had been active in the former Co-Operative Commonwealth Federation in 1957 and 1958. He was chairman of the Political Education Committee of the Toronto & District Labor Council.

Source: Based on figures appearing in "Automation," August, 1963; information on Cleveland engine block plant reported in U.S. News & World Report

Senate Action Pending:

$1.2 Billion College Aid Plan Wins House Passage, 258-92

A large-scale college aid bill was only one step short of Pres. Kennedy's desk as the House approved a conference agreement on a three-year $1.2 billion program of federal grants and loans. The vote was a decisive 258-92.

A somewhat closer vote was expected in the Senate, where the issue of federal aid to colleges operated by religious groups stirred controversy. Senate conferees dropped a provision that would have invited a court test on the constitutionality of such aid, holding up the use of federal funds until the courts decided the issue.

The Senate, tied up in a foreign aid battle, also faced a vote on whether to accept a House bill extending the present Mexican farm labor program another year or hold out for major reforms in the bracero program.

Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) served notice he will seek approval of the House bill. AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to senators, urged that this move be rejected. He termed the House bill "an unfortunate blow to America's most poverty-stricken group of workers," the domestic farm laborers. (See House rollcall on Page 6.)

In its final form, the college aid bill contains these major provisions:

- Federal matching grants totaling $690 million over three years for public and private colleges. Twenty-two percent of the funds would be earmarked for public junior colleges and technical institutions.
- Grants to senior colleges not to exceed one-third of the cost of any single project and used to construct libraries, laboratories, and classrooms for instruction in sciences, engineering, mathematics and modern foreign languages.
- Grants to public junior colleges covering up to 40 percent of construction costs for any type of academic facilities.
- A separate grant program for graduate school construction, totaling $145 million over three years.
- Long-term low-cost loans to public and private colleges to finance up to 75 percent of the cost of construction of academic facilities. The three-year loan authorization would total $360 million.

Meanwhile the Senate continued to chip away at the foreign aid authorization bill despite concessions already made by the Administration.

Seeking to check more drastic reductions, Democratic and Republican leaders agreed to accept a cut of $385 million from the $4.2 billion figure recommended by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The committee bill was itself a reduction of $300 million in the President's request, although $700 million above the authorization voted by the House.

Other Cuts Proposed

The Senate then voted an additional $25 million slash in an amendment offered by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and, by an 86-3 vote, adopted a package proposal by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) which reduced the authorization by a net of $50 million. The Humphrey amendment cut the President's contingency fund, used for emergency situations, by $125 million but added $75 million more to the Alliance for Progress.

Still pending were a number of other amendments to make further cuts in the foreign aid program.

In sharp contrast to previous years, the Senate bill is expected to be considerably closer to the heavily-slashed House bill than to the amount the President has said is needed.

In the civil rights field, the House Judiciary Committee was completing the drafting of its report on the bipartisan civil rights bill it has approved. The next step is the Rules Committee, where it faces an expected delaying attempt by southerners.

House and Senate conferees, including many of the same members who reached quick agreement on the college aid bill, began taking up another education measure, the vocational education bill.

The Senate added to its bill an extension of two popular existing programs—the National Defense Education Act, which provides loans for college students in certain fields, and grants to "impacted" school districts, where there are large numbers of federal civilian and military personnel.

'Separate but Equal' Hospital Aid Banned

(Continued from Page 1)

Judge Simon E. Sobeloff observed in his opinion for the majority, was whether the activities of the defendants—the Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital and Wesley Long Community Hospital—"are sufficiently imbued with 'state action' to bring them within the 5th and 14th Amendment prohibitions against racial discrimination."

State Action 'Evident'

The district court had found that discrimination by the hospitals was "clearly established," but granted the hospitals' motion to dismiss the case on the ground that "no state action" was proved.

The appeals court majority, however, ruled that state action was evident in the "large amounts of public funds" given the hospitals for expanding their facilities in accordance with a "state plan" for hospital construction developed under Hill-Burton's terms. The decision noted further that participation in Hill-Burton Act projects brings hospitals "to an elaborate and intricate pattern of governmental regulations, both state and federal . . ."

The decision went on to declare unconstitutional the Hill-Burton Act's exception to a non-discrimination clause where "separate but equal" facilities are provided. The remainder of the act, including its general prohibition against discrimination, stands.

The court said it was mindful of the hospitals' protest that they "are being required to do what the government assured them they would not have to do," but said this left them no worse off than a southern restaurant owner required to desegregate facilities leased from the community, or southern voters who had approved bond issues for segregated schools prior to the Supreme Court decision outlawing such segregation.

Circuit Judges Albert V. Bryan and J. Spencer Bell joined Sobeloff in the decision.

A strong dissent was registered by Judge Clement S. Haynesworth, joined by Judge Herbert S. Boreman.

The minority opinion argued that mere receipt of grants in aid by the hospitals did not establish "state action" and noted that the Hill-Burton Act expressly denies federal officials "any right of supervision or control" over recipient hospitals.

The appeals court's ruling came as the Kennedy Administration was under increasing pressure to eliminate the "separate but equal" clause from Hill-Burton Act agreements for federal grants.

Backed by Labor

At its 1961 convention the AFL-CIO condemned the clause and urged its removal by executive action or legislative amendment to assure that hospital facilities built with Hill-Burton funds "are available without distinction based on race, color or creed."

At its November 1962 meeting, the federation's Executive Council declared that discrimination in hospital admissions and staff appointments is not only a civil rights matter, but imposes "the most serious limitation on the freedom of choice of both patient and physician." The council said it is "essentially a matter of making high quality health services available to all citizens, with assurance of free choice of physician and hospital."

The council voted an initial contribution of $5,000, which was later supplemented, to help a group of Negro doctors in Chicago in a federal court fight to end discrimination by certain hospitals in the city.

Registrar Post Boosts IBEW Political Effort

(Continued from Page 1)

ply the members with information on candidates and pending legislation.

In practice, this requires among other things that he:

- Represent the local at conferences of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education or any similar body to which the local is affiliated.
- Assume responsibility for the local's COPE fund-raising drive in cooperation with the financial secretary and his committee members.
- Head the local's campaign to make sure that every member is registered and qualified to vote, drawing on the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries and COPE's Women's Activities Division for assistance and supplying up-to-date statistics to IBEW headquarters.

Members Informed

Each local union continues to determine its own political program under the convention plan, but once it sets its course, it is the responsibility of the registrar under the supervision of the local president to see that all members are informed.

Each registrar has been supplied with a complete sample kit of COPE informational materials which he may order in quantity to service his local members. He also regularly receives the AFL-CIO News and the COPE Memo to keep informed on national legislative and political issues.

From time-to-time, the IBEW also distributes special newsletters to the registrars dealing with legislative matters.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING would be good for Detroit schools, pupils and teachers, Pres. Charles Cogen of New York Teachers' local said at rally launching Detroit campaign for bargaining election there. Pres. Mary Ellen Riordan of Detroit Teachers said nearly 70 percent of teaching employes have signed petition calling for election. Left to right: Miss Riordan; Cogen; AFT Pres. Carl Megel and Theodore Sachs, attorney for union.

Democrats Hold Posts In Off-Year Elections

(Continued from Page 1)

The voters also turned down two Hughes-backed bond issue proposals, totaling $750 million, offered as an alternative to a state sales or income tax. In Ohio, a $250 million bond issue supported by Republican Gov. James A. Rhodes was approved.

The Democratic organization in Mississippi turned back the first serious Republican bid for power in nearly a century, electing Paul Johnson as governor over GOP nominee Rubel Phillips, who nevertheless rolled up more than 100,000 votes. Both Johnson and Phillips ran as avowed segregationists and critics of the Kennedy Administration's civil rights program.

Republicans strengthened their position somewhat in Virginia, electing 10 members of the legislature and two members of the city council in Richmond.

Cities Shift

Connecticut municipalities showed Democratic gains while Indiana's smaller cities, including industrial centers, shifted toward the Republicans. The state's largest city, Indianapolis, stayed Democratic.

The possible effects of the civil rights issue in the elections came under sharp study by both political parties.

Pres. Kennedy said in his last pre-election press conference that racial demonstrations in Philadelphia might influence the vote.

Some predominantly white wards which recently have had large Democratic majorities showed a trend toward McDermott while Negro wards gave their usual solid majorities to the Democratic nominee.

In the Kentucky election, the Republican nominee, Nunn, carried rural counties which have been historically Democratic. He suffered a substantial loss in what has become a normally Republican margin in Louisville, where a Republican mayor last year successfully backed an anti-discrimination ordinance. Nunn's plurality in the city was about 4,000 as contrasted to a 23,000 margin for Sen. Thruston B. Morton in 1962.

Kentucky is traditionally Democratic but has been shifting toward a swing state in recent years. It has two Republican U. S. senators, including the liberal Sen. John Sherman Cooper, while the Louisville district elected a conservative Republican to the House in 1962.

The Nunn campaign leaned heavily on attacks on Pres. Kennedy and Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who he said were "involved" in Gov. Combs' anti-discrimination order. Nunn also assailed the Supreme Court's decision outlawing use of state-ordered prayers in public schools. An anonymous leaflet, widely circulated, featured alleged racial mingling at Democratic campaign meetings.

Folder Available on 'Brotherhood' Film

A two-color promotional folder on the recently-released AFL-CIO film, "In Common Brotherhood," is now available. The folder depicts international activities of the American Institute for Free Labor Development covered in the 16mm sound film.

Free of charge, folders can be ordered through the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C., for distribution to AFL-CIO affiliates and in the community.

Groups which rent or purchase the film will receive a newly-prepared discussion guide, which includes an introduction for use with the film and questions to promote discussion. Single copies of the guide may be had by writing to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Meany Warns of 'Curse' of Automation

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Nov. 16, 1963 | No. 46

Kennedy Asks Labor's Aid On Job-Building Programs

Meany Sounds Keynote:

Convention Urged To Awaken Nation

By Saul Miller

New York—Labor's job is to "wake up the nation" to the possibility of economic collapse triggered by the growing "curse" of automation, to mobilize its unified strength behind a positive program for all Americans, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the federation's 5th convention in a definitive keynote address.

That program, he stressed, "must take every possible step to improve the vital purchasing power," including a 35-hour workweek, or less, a "substantially higher" minimum wage, jobs, tax relief and increased government spending for public facilities.

The American system "can go down the drain" on the problem of automation, Meany warned, a problem which is "becoming a real curse in this society" and "could bring us to a national catastrophe." He added:

Labor cannot wait on the basis of a "pious hope" that the problem of automation is "just going to go away" and that we should "just go out on the back porch and look for bluebirds."

Critics Rebuked

Meany's wide-ranging address opening the convention, in the city where the AFL-CIO was born nearly eight years ago, included a stinging review of the "free advice and opinion" coming from "disenchanted liberals," or "disillusioned friends of labor" that the labor movement is "all washed up."

Noting the attacks from these groups that the labor movement has lost its militancy, that collective bargaining is dead, that labor is not doing anything about automation, that it is neglecting its responsibilities in civil rights and that the AFL-CIO should be split to provide inter-union competition, Meany traced the basic inconsistencies of their arguments and said:

"The American trade union movement is a long, long way from outliving its usefulness or achieving its final goals, if any of its goals are ever final . . . we know that we have many serious problems and unfinished business ahead of us . . . and are determined and ready to deal with them."

"I am not troubled too much by the fact that our members today enjoy the highest wages, the best working conditions and the greatest measure of security ever obtained by working people anywhere at any time and I am proud of the fact that this organization, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, have played a tremendous role in bringing this about.

"I have absolutely no feeling of nostalgia for the days of the great depression, of starvation wages and chronic insecurity . . ."

Meany asserted that there is complete unity at the state and local level, that "we have never had a better condition of unity." He told the delegates that the internal disputes plan adopted at the 1961 convention is "operating fairly and successfully" and has documented the fact that such disputes are "in fact

(Continued on Page 16)

A DELEGATE'S BADGE pinned on by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany welcomed Pres. Kennedy to the federation's New York convention to the cheers of 4,000 delegates and guests who heard the President ask for labor's help to solve the number one issue of jobs and economic needs.

Says Need For Action Is Urgent

By Willard Shelton

New York—"I came here to ask your help . . . not next year but now," Pres. John F. Kennedy told a cheering throng of 4,000 AFL-CIO convention delegates and guests, to help solve the "number one domestic issue" of jobs and economic needs.

The nation "dare not wait until it is too late" for a tax-cut bill that offers the promise of new jobs to "2 or 3 million" now jobless, the President declared in a wide-ranging speech.

"We urgently need that tax cut as insurance against a recession next year," he solemnly warned.

If we end up with a recession, with 8 or 9 million people out of work, "what then is going to be said about the Leader of the West?" he demanded.

This country "is the keystone in the arch of freedom," he continued. "The forces of freedom are still in the majority around the world because the United States has been willing to bear the burden."

But we can maintain these forces, the President warned, "only if we provide for a growing and buoyant and progressive economy here."

(Continued on Page 16)

Executive Council Reports:

'Strength of Labor' Advancing America

New York—The "strength and unity of the labor movement" have been brought to bear on the challenges and problems of the past two "hectic" years in the interest of workers and the "nation as a whole," the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's 5th constitutional convention.

These challenges and problems include high and persistent unemployment, the battle for a shorter workweek, the struggle for civil rights, the radical right attack on the American form of government, the world struggle for peace and freedom and a host of other problems, the council declared in its 385-page report.

Despite these perplexing and critical matters and aware of the pitfalls ahead, the council expressed its confidence in the ultimate success of labor's cause, "a better life for all Americans and for all mankind."

The 29-member council reviewed the two years since the last convention in a report covering 15 major sections. It includes a highlighting of the major areas of concern by Pres. George Meany, a detailed financial report by Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, developments in the labor movement and sections on the national economy, international relations, social security, the worker and the community—dealing with education, community services and safety—civil rights, the campaign against the so-called "right-to-work" laws, court and Na-

(Continued on Page 15)

Council Warns of 1964 Pressures From Extreme Right-Wing Forces

New York—The 1964 elections must be fought in the face of new pressures including the rise of extreme right-wing forces as a coherent political force, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention here.

Pointing out that 15 liberal first-term senators must run again, the council said that the results of these elections alone could "have a tremendous impact on the character of the Senate for the next 15 or 20 years."

Twenty-six governors must be elected, 19 of them now Democrats, and there will be state legislative races in all but four states in addition to election of the full membership of the U.S. House, the council noted.

New developments and pressures must be expected in areas other than the rise of the right wing, it declared.

Emphasizing the political organization of right-wing forces, the council noted that more than 1,000 rightist groups are now active with a claimed membership of 4 million and financing that "can be traced back to big business and big industry" to the "cautiously estimated" extent of $10 million in 1961.

Other pressures are observable in related areas that may affect the 1964 elections, the report warned:

- The civil rights crisis and the degree to which a successful solu-

(Continued on Page 14)

Index to Stories On Convention

New York — Stories on AFL-CIO's 5th constitutional convention may be located as follows:

Pres. Kennedy's address—Page 1.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's keynote address — Page 1.

Executive Council report—Pages 1, 4, 5, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15.

Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention — Page 2.

Union Label & Service Trades Dept. convention — Page 2.

Maritime Trades Dept. convention—Page 3.

Metal Trades Dept. convention—Page 3.

Industrial Union Dept. convention—Page 4.

Int'l. Labor Press Association convention—Page 5.

FORMER PRES. RICHARD J. GRAY of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. administers oath of office to department's newly elected officers and council members. From left, Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers; Gordon M. Freeman, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Peter Fosco, Laborers; John J. Murphy, Bricklayers; Russell K. Berg, Boiler Makers; Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Edward J. Leonard, Plasterers; Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty; M. A. Hutcheson, Carpenters; L. M. Raftery, Painters; John H. Lyons, Jr., Iron Workers; Dept. Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio. Besides Haggerty and Bonadio, all board members are union presidents except Fosco, who is secretary-treasurer of his union.

Jobs Nation's Foremost Problem, Building Trades Convention Told

New York—The major problems of the labor movement are basically those of the nation as a whole, and the greatest is unemployment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 52d convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Five years with joblessness at more than 5 percent of the labor force, he said, has given the country's "number one domestic problem" a role in "the struggle of our country to maintain a free way of life, to make democracy work, to improve the conditions of life and work of the people."

Meany said jobs must be found not only for those now unemployed, but for the 1.3 million new workers who enter the labor market each year and for the uncertain number —"something that cannot be pinpointed"—displaced by automation.

'Getting Worse'

"Industry is moving more and more toward complete mechanization," Meany said. "They are not satisfied with machines to turn out production. They have to have machines that will eliminate the human element entirely. I do not subscribe to this bluebird theory that everything is going to be all right and that this problem will disappear. It will not disappear. There is every indication that it is going to get worse."

The convention adopted a series of resolutions supporting a tax cut for low and middle income persons, urging a reduction in social security retirement age to 60 for men and 57 for women and proposing tightening of specified steps in bargaining relationships with employers.

Resolutions also were approved urging amendments in the AFL-CIO internal disputes plan that would "protect the interests" of the 18 unions affiliated with the department and urged consideration by the federation of any application for readmission by the Teamsters if they apply and reaffiliation is "consistent with the constitution of the AFL-CIO." The Teamsters were expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of corruption of its leadership.

Officers Re-elected

Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty, Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio and all vice presidents were re-elected without opposition at the sessions that heard a number of governmental officials and industry leaders.

Meany paid tribute to Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the Greater New York City Building & Construction Trades Council and those associated with him in meeting civil rights problems. The New York group, he said, has "taken the position that they are for racial equality" and for opening up opportunities to those denied them.

"But they have also taken the position," he added, "that they are not for any preferential treatment and that they do not believe in doing an injustice to a white boy to make up for an injustice that has been visited upon a black boy in the past."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz expressed the belief there would be full acceptance of the "fair employment" principle "if there were in fact full employment."

Problem May Be Misstated

"It may very well be that the present problem is misstated when we put it in terms of racial discrimination," he added. "I have the strong impression that there are very few Americans—some, but very few—who object to working with someone of a different race. It is not that an American worker says, 'I don't want a Negro to get a job working with me.' What he says is, 'I don't want anybody to get my job'."

He warmly commended the department's public stand against discrimination in membership, hiring, referral systems and apprenticeship programs, and called much of the criticism of them "unfair." But, he added:

"I respectfully urge your recognition of what I think are fair protests against the slow rate of progress in implementing the policies which have been adopted, and fair objections to some of the positions which have been taken in defense of the present system."

Wirtz, like Meany and the department, expressed opposition to a quota system. The opening of trades and apprenticeship programs to all alike "in no way implies or warrants reducing the skill levels of the crafts," he said. But where there are apprenticeship lists with no Negro names "because they knew they didn't have a chance, those lists should be opened up," he said.

Haggerty told Wirtz "we appreciate your frankness," and noted that on the question of apprenticeship training regulations "our people have been very much disturbed and angered and hurt by the untrue, by the false and unfounded and unwarranted allegations with respect to this position on non-discrimination."

We do not pretend, said Haggerty, that there is not an occasional violation in this area, but he said, they will be adjusted "rapidly and as good sense dictates in the method which we operate under . . . [an] autonomous system that requires a little intelligent persuasion, some discussions and a little bit of time consumed."

Wirtz defended Labor Dept. estimates of the number of new journeymen the industry will need by 1970 which had been under attack by Haggerty and the executive board of the Building Trades Dept. as being too high. The figures were first prepared in 1959 at the request of the administrative committee of the Construction Industry Joint Committee, he said.

Davis-Bacon Changes Seen

Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) predicted enactment of his bill to bring fringe benefits under the Davis-Bacon Act.

Deputy Dir. Joseph M. Rourke of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education told the delegates that "politics may ignore you, but the decisions of Congress and the legislatures . . . affect you every day in the week, 365 days a year."

He asked that each local union consider creating the office of "registration commissioner" to promote voter registration campaigns, and to designate one person to be responsible for COPE work.

Other Speakers

Other speakers were Deputy Assistant Sec. of Defense Stephen N. Shulman, Solicitor Charles Donahue of the Labor Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and John Cosgrove, former AFL-CIO assistant education director and now assistant director of the Office of Emergency Planning in the office of the President.

Speakers from the building industry included Pres. Paul Wechter of the National Contractors Association; Robert L. Higgins, assistant executive vice president of the National Electrical Contractors Association and Chairman William J. Cour of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the Construction industry.

At 51st Convention:

Label Dept. Adopts Expansion Program

New York—Constitutional changes to permit the direct chartering of Union Label & Service Trades Councils by AFL-CIO central labor bodies, and to authorize Women's Auxiliaries to become fraternal affiliates of the Union Label Dept., were approved here by delegates to the best-attended convention in department history—the 51st.

The two changes, along with other actions taken to put more power in the union label drive, may double affiliated membership in the next two years, Dept. Pres. Richard F. Walsh and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis predicted.

The department, with membership at the highest point in history, heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany assert that the union label idea is "still basic to the fundamental philosophy" of the labor movement—the "use of labor's purchasing power as an ingredient without which the economy cannot live."

In supporting wide use of the label, Meany said, "we are supporting the basic philosophy of the trade union movement, and we are also supporting employers who see the wisdom of employing labor at decent wages" and producing goods under union conditions.

"We are an important segment of the American system," he observed, "and we want a fair share of the wealth produced by this system."

The union label, he concluded, "will become more efficient and important as the years go by."

The federation president presented awards to winners of the department's first contest stressing increased use of the union label, shop card, and service button.

Gold Trophy Presented

A golden label trophy for first prize and a $100 savings bond went to Women's Auxiliary 99 of the Rubber Workers in Hartville, O. Meany gave a silver trophy and a bond to a representative of the second prize winner, Blue Water Auxiliary 300 of the Machinists, Port Huron, Mich.

Bronze trophies and $25 bonds were won by the Miscellaneous Auxiliary of the Polk County AFL-CIO, Des Moines, Ia., third prize; Kansas State Council of Auxiliaries, fourth; and Wichita, Kan., Council of Auxiliaries, fifth.

The delegates re-elected Walsh, Lewis, and seven vice presidents for new four-year terms—Joseph P. McCurdy, James A. Suffridge, John O'Hare, Joseph D. Keenan, Arthur P. Gildea, Daniel E. Conway and Anthony J. DeAndrade. They also:

- Approved preliminary plans for the 1964 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show at Louisville, Ky., next May 22-29.
- Designated the next two union label weeks as Sept. 7-13, 1964, and Sept. 6-13, 1965.
- Voted support for members of five unions on strike since Mar. 11, at the Kingsport Press, Kingsport, Tenn.

The officers reported the addition of four international unions to department membership, and the formation of 20 new label trades councils and the reinstatement of eight to bring the total of active chapters to 100.

The convention also was addressed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Pres. Paul Hall, Seafarers; COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan; New York State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond Corbett; and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Label Activity on Rise

Schnitzler reported that he has found greater union label activity than at any time in his memory. He also cited numerous contributions to community welfare by labor groups, including these: Philadelphia building tradesmen gave up 10 to 12 weekends to build an orphanage 60 miles away; Des Moines, Ia., trades built a new camp for an Easter Stamp sale group with donated labor, and the Iowa State AFL-CIO raised money to buy the materials; in Spokane, Wash., Barbers give free haircuts every month at a retarded children's home.

Schnitzler in addition noted the work of the Musicians in sponsoring an estimated 1,000 free public concerts out of recording industry trust funds and said all these activities, along with the usual trade union bread-and-butter actions, "represent a challenge to get the union message" to the public.

The delegates voted resolutions of support for the COPE voluntary dollar drive; appreciation to the labor press, particularly the AFL-CIO News and the American Federationist, for reporting label activities; support for the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries; and an invitation to all local unions to join union label councils.

WOMEN'S AUXILIARY of the Hartville, O., Rubber Workers won first prize in a nationwide contest for superior achievement sponsored by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and the federation's National Auxiliaries. Four other auxiliaries won contest prizes presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the departmental convention in New York. Shown with first prize trophy and $100 savings bond are, from left: Mrs. Marcella Beatty, National Auxiliaries president; Mrs. Eunice Wilson, URW Auxiliary 99, Hartville; Dept. Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis; Beatrice Warwood, National Auxiliaries' first vice president; Ida Pickens of Hartville.

Canadian Law 'Unwarranted':

Maritime Trades Blast Trusteeship

New York—A special committee for the preservation of trade union rights was set up by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. convention here to meet problems raised by the Canadian government's legislatively-created trusteeship over five unions in the maritime field.

The convention branded the trusteeship as the "gravest threat to free trade unionism'" in the history of the North American continent. The trusteeship is a "drastic" and "clearly unwarranted" means to deal with a labor-management dispute, the delegates declared, and stated that "we as trade unionists cannot accept this method."

The nine-member committee was instructed to coordinate efforts for the restoration of "the trade union rights of Canadian maritime workers" in these ways:

- Representations to the United Nations and the Intl. Labor Organization on the basis of guarantees of freedom of association.
- An educational program to inform trade unionists and the public of the effect of the trusteeship on Canadian maritime workers.
- "Such economic actions as may be deemed advisable" and "consideration" of selective boycotting.
- Exploration of possible remedies through U.S. action.

The convention also strongly protested government policies that have allowed the shrinking of the U.S. Merchant Marine, including shipyards and American-flag vessels moving on the seas.

The delegates urged Congress to "provide vastly increased appropriations" for ship construction, conversion and repair and to "relax restrictions" that now prevent U.S. shipyards from receiving contracts.

The Soviet Union, at present rates, will have a merchant marine "twice as large as the United States by 1971," although the strength of a nation is inseparably linked to its merchant marine, the convention said.

It also charged that basic policies designed to promote the merchant marine were violated by the device of registry of U.S. owned ships under foreign "flags of convenience," with low-paid crews, which have captured large proportions of ocean-borne commerce. The foreign "flag of convenience," the delegates said, must be opposed in every lawful way.

The convention re-elected Paul Hall as president of the Maritimes Trades Dept. and Peter M. McGavin as executive secretary-treasurer. Some 200 delegates, representing 29 national and international affiliates, attended.

The dispute that ended in the Canadian government trusteeship began as an industrial conflict between the Seafarers and one Canadian company, Hall told the delegates. In 1962 the company broke off a 10-year history of contractual relationships with the SIU on the Great Lakes and hired new employes from the newly-chartered Canadian Maritime Union. The SIU treated this as a lockout and picketed the company's ships. Retaliatory action followed on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Efforts to work out a private trusteeship of Canadian Maritime unions under AFL-CIO and Canadian Labor Congress auspices broke down over the issue of a third impartial trustee and of standards to be applied toward officials of the SIU of Canada, an SIU fact book said.

Hall, who is president of the SIU as well as the Maritime Trades Dept., pointed out that the government trusteeship grants sweeping authority over officers and finances of the union and of its bargaining committees. The trusteeship law provides criminal penalties for interference.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Maritime Trades Dept. delegates that there are natural differences within unions but that our "cardinal principle" is that the trade union movement is free, "not controlled by any outside group."

"When we fight against government control, we don't draw any lines," he said. "We are opposed to it in America, in the Soviet Union, in other countries and in Canada."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who was involved in negotiations between U.S. and Canadian spokesmen seeking to develop the private AFL-CIO-CLC trusteeship, said there was nothing about the issue that could be "improved at this time" by his public discussion of it.

"I think it is a matter of very great concern, but I don't think I can add anything to it," he said.

Wirtz said there have been "problems" involving management and unions in the maritime industry, and that "relationships between various parts of union organizations" have contributed to the "worsening" of the problems.

It has been "completely impossible" for other countries to realize "the kind of interdependence and independence" between government and unions in this country, he said. He and spokesmen of maritime unions had "always felt free" to voice disagreement, Wirtz told the delegates.

Southern Railway Wins Court Test on Firemen

A U.S. district court judge has refused to hold the Southern Railway in contempt of a court order directing it to employ locomotive firemen on all its trains—even though the railroad conceded that the men it had hired were not assigned any duties and were all elderly and inexperienced.

Judge Leonard P. Walsh said he was satisfied with the railroad's explanation that it had hired men over 60 because it would be easier to eliminate them through attrition if a settlement of the rail work rules dispute permitted abolition of jobs.

CANADIAN TRUSTEESHIP legislation received major attention from Pres. Paul Hall of the Maritime Trades Dept. in the opening session of the department's three-day convention in New York. The MTD set up a special committee to handle problems arising from the Canadian legislation.

Metal Trades Vote Per Capita Hike To Spur Major Organizing Drive

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—The 51st convention of the Metal Trades Dept., working on an organizing campaign expected to add 100,000 new members to union rolls in the next few months, voted to double the per capita available for organizing and servicing and set its sights on an action program geared to continued expansion.

Having won exclusive recognition for 61,000 federal blue collar workers and with elections scheduled among 40,000 others, the delegates turned their attention to atomic energy and other private business fields. Also they called on Congress to revitalize the merchant marine by a vigorous program of shipbuilding and ship repair, merchant and naval, to keep the U.S. flag on the high seas.

The convention cleared the decks for its stepped-up organizing campaign by raising per capita dues from 1.5 cents to 3 cents per member per month effective Jan. 1.

The delegates cheered a report by Pres. B. A. Gritta that metal trades unions have moved vigorously to take advantage of Pres. Kennedy's executive order of January 1962 permitting federal workers to authorize exclusive recognition for a union, and to benefit through collective bargaining and a signed agreement.

Navy-wide Pact Sought

Gritta reported that most of the 650,000 unorganized "wage board" workers in government service work within the jurisdiction of metal trades unions. He announced that so many Navy workers have joined Metal Trades Dept. unions that the Navy will be asked soon to grant Navy-wide jurisdiction to metal trades councils for blue collar employes at yards and installations.

The convention returned Gritta, Sec.-Treas. Clayton W. Bilderback and nine vice presidents to office.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated department officers for the "zeal and intelligent approach" they showed toward organizing government employes. He recalled that so good a friend as former Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt once expressed the view that collective bargaining had no place in the field of civil service. He said Kennedy's order represents a step forward and a further indication of the "tremendous progress" made by labor over the years.

The convention, calling for increased cooperation between AFL-CIO unions and departments in organizing, also took these actions:

- It called for a 35-hour workweek in government service with no loss in pay to combat unemployment and loss of jobs due to automation.
- It supported hospital care for the aged under social security; a federal minimum wage of $1.50 an hour for all workers; and amendment of the health benefit act to permit federal employes freely to choose qualified doctors.
- It urged greatly increased appropriations for Navy ship construction, and for the building, conversion and repair of merchant ships. It opposed the continuation of "flags of convenience" or runaway fleets.

The convention approved a resolution urging amendments in the AFL-CIO internal disputes plan. It also urged consideration by the federation of any application for readmission by the Teamsters if they apply, and reaffiliation if "consistent with the constitution of the AFL-CIO." The Teamsters were expelled in 1957 on findings of control by corrupt interests.

During the preceding two years, the department added two international unions, to bring its total of affiliates to 22, and chartered 12 new metal trade councils.

Gritta detailed the progress made under the federal employe organizing program but called for changes in the application of the President's order to permit runoff votes in case of ties,

In the atomic energy industry, Gritta said, metal trades local councils and affiliated unions represent a "dominant majority" of the organized workers. But the Atomic Energy Commission continues to allow its contractors to operate government-owned plants without fair and equitable regard for workers.

Besides its stepped-up organizing program, undertaken with the aid of the AFL-CIO and the loan of organizers by affiliated unions and the federation's Dept. of Organization, the department continued to service members in shipyards and the nonferrous metals and other industries, according to Gritta.

He noted the success of a leadership training program calling for three-day institutes for shop stewards and officers at each Navy yard. The second such program will be held Dec. 3-5 at the New York Naval Shipyard in Brooklyn.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers also were convention speakers.

METAL TRADES DEPT. convention delegates, hailing a report by Pres. B. A. Gritta and other officers that 100,000 new members will have been organized by this year's end, doubled the department's per capita dues rate and returned the two top officers and nine vice presidents to office. Pictured are Gritta, left, and Sec.-Treas. Clayton W. Bilderback.

Chairmen Listed For 5th Convention

New York—Following is a list of committee chairmen for the AFL-CIO 5th convention here:

Resolutions—Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, chief executive of the Railway Clerks.

Constitution — Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers.

Education—Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

State and Local Bodies—Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers.

Credentials—Vice Pres. Paul L. Phillips, president of the Papermakers & Paper Workers.

Rules—Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, president of the Stage Employes.

Executive Council Report —Vice Pres. O. A. Knight, president of the Oil Workers.

Appeals—Alex Rose, president of the Hat Workers.

Label—Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Clothing Workers.

"IF WE ARE GOING TO RAISE our sights at the bargaining table," Pres. Walter P. Reuther tells fifth convention of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., "then we must raise our sights to organize millions of workers so they may have access to the benefits of collective bargaining." The delegates approved a wide range of resolutions, including such areas as organizing, the economy, civil rights, political action, health care, taxes and minimum wages.

IUD Convention Votes Program For Jobs, Organizing, Bargaining

By Robert B. Cooney

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s fifth convention hammered out a program to promote full employment, spur organizing drives, bolster bargaining and wipe out racial discrimination.

The guest speakers—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sleeping Car Porters' Pres. A. Philip Randolph, and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz—emphasized both civil rights and the need to dent unemployment rates.

A large part of the problem of discrimination in employment, he emphasized, "could be wiped away as a vital issue if we had full employment in this country, full employment for all."

On the broader economic and political front, Meany said a breakthrough for labor depends on changing the complexion of Congress and the state legislatures.

"We may have [in 1964] for the first time in this country an open and shut contest between the forces of liberalism and the forces of reaction," he declared.

The best expenditure of labor's energy and money that can be made, Meany said, is to get people registered and then to help turn out the vote. I look forward to a great period of activity on the part of COPE," he said.

Randolph told the 300 delegates that America is "in the midst of a full dress civil rights revolution."

"These great masses of black people are rising because they want to be free," he declared. "They want to be free men in a free country. They will never rest until they are fully free."

Meany told the convention that labor will "continue to fight" for civil rights legislation which goes further than the original Kennedy Administration proposal. But, he stressed, labor would not contribute to an impasse which might produce no bill at all.

Randolph said that just as labor's path was "strewn with blood and tears," the current revolution must not be expected to be "meticulously beautiful." He told the delegates:

"Negroes have suffered too long, too much and too sharply. An issue is either right or wrong. . . . They are working towards one end—the abolition of racial bias . . . and they are working for the abolition of this thing in every area of American life."

Wirtz told the delegates the Administration is not content with the present job picture and that "there is no justification whatsoever in this society and this economy for an unemployment rate of 5.5 percent" nor even for 4 percent.

"The problem of growth and the necessity of growth come first so far as the priorities are concerned," he added.

The next step in promoting equal job opportunity will be to deal with the "fall-out from discrimination"—the need to build motivation in young people, he said.

Unemployment and poverty and ignorance are linked as an inheritance of slums and inadequate schooling, Wirtz declared, with some 11 million children growing up in families with less than $3,000 a year in income.

The Administration's plan for persuading school drop-outs to return has fallen far short of expectations, the secretary said. Of 600,000 youngsters dropping out of school earlier in 1963, some 75,000 were persuaded to go back in September. Of the returnees, only one of 10 will still be in school next January, he added.

It was worth it, Wirtz said, to salvage even up to 10,000 out of 600,000 futures but the problem requires a more basic approach—"a declaration of war" on ignorance, poverty and unemployment.

In a series of actions, the IUD delegates urged:

- A full employment program which would include democratic economic planning, liberal fiscal and monetary policies, formulation of an expanding wage policy by the President's Council of Economic Advisers, improved manpower planning, public works expansion and new social legislation.
- A civil rights offensive—by unions to wipe out bias, end segregated locals and open up apprenticeships; by Congress to enact legislation with an enforceable fair employment provision and Justice Dept. power to protect constitutional rights; by the executive branch to extend the housing order and to create a Community Relations Service.
- Senate improvements in the tax bill passed by the House to bolster its benefits for middle and lower-income families and to eliminate the corporate tax cut.
- Extension and expansion in the IUD of the multi-union organizing approach with fuller participation by affiliates.
- Establishment by the IUD of a collective bargaining services section, unifying several existing functions, as an aid to affiliates in coordinating their negotiations.

In other resolutions, the delegates called for a step-up in voter registration and political action drives; a national health program; a total world pact to ban nuclear tests of all kinds; federal legislation to permit situs picketing; a federal minimum wage of $2 an hour and double time for overtime.

UAW Safety Expert Named to Labor Dept.

An industrial safety expert with the United Automobile Workers for the past six years, F. A. Van Atta, has been appointed deputy director in the Dept. of Labor's Office of Occupational Safety.

Van Atta will also head the offices safety programming and research activities and represent the department on committees and boards dealing with worker health and safety.

Segregated Locals Down To a 'Hard Core'—Meany

New York—Only about 170 of the more than 60,000 local unions in the AFL-CIO and its affiliates are still segregated, Pres. George Meany told a press conference here.

"These are the hard core," he said, "and are going to be difficult to merge. In most of the 170, it is the Negro local that refuses to merge."

In reply to a query, Meany said he was "sure we have pockets at the local level of people who do not believe the Negro is entitled to equal treatment," despite the policies of the international unions. Apprenticeship programs should be opened to all who have the qualifications and who apply, he said.

Meany also welcomed the entrance of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (N. Y.) into the race for the Republican nomination for president.

"The more candidates the better," he observed "especially when you get candidates of different points of view."

Care for Aged:

Health Experts Back Social Security Plan

A group of prominent public and private medical care experts has concluded a year-long study by recommending health care for the aged through social security and issuing a new proposal embodying the social security approach.

The National Committee on Health Care of the Aged called for hospitalization and nursing home care to be financed through social security, with other medical expenses to be borne by private insurance carried by the senior citizen.

Headed by Arthur Flemming, former health, education and welfare secretary, the committee is made up of medical educators, hospital directors and representatives of private prepaid medical care programs. It includes another former HEW secretary, Marion B. Folsom.

The recommendations of the special committee—which was formed at the suggestion of Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N. Y.)—will be available for consideration when the House Ways & Means Committee opens hearings on the King-Anderson bill next week.

Pres. Kennedy told his Thursday press conference that the committee's report, being constructive and bipartisan in nature, offered a good deal of hope. Later, after a meeting with Javits, Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) and the committee, he indicated a belief that the report would move Congress to enact "this badly needed legislation."

Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, termed the report a "real contribution to the public understanding of health care for the aged which is still very much with us." He indicated that the AFL-CIO was "pleased" by the report's recommendation of the social security method for basic institutional health care.

The report was also viewed as indicating a growing shift away from limiting government participation to public assistance programs, such as Kerr-Mills.

Sherman Act Waiver Asked

The committee held that the Kerr-Mills program should be continued to provide assistance to those whose needs go beyond the social security financed program, but there should be a shift in emphasis in government action from relief measures to social insurance.

The committee proposal for social security payment of institutional care is kept separate from doctor care and non-institutional medical services to be provided by private programs.

The committee recommended that the Sherman Anti-Trust Act be waived to enable private health insurance companies to band together to offer identical provisions and rates, under federal charter.

In any joint insurance venture, Flemming stated, "no company or group should be allowed to participate except on a non-profit basis." Such action, he indicated, would enable the private health insurance companies to be free of the heavy burden of the aged and enable them to do a better and more profitable job among the younger age groups.

Specifically, the committee's social-security-paid proposals differ from the King-Anderson bill in several degrees.

King-Anderson would provide a choice of up to 45 days of hospital care with no deductible, up to 90 days with the patient paying $10 a day for the first nine days, or up to 180 days with the patient paying all costs for the first 2.5 days; up to 180 days in a nursing home; outpatient diagnostic services, including x-ray and laboratory costs in excess of the first $20 of costs; and home health services, including nursing care up to 240 days in one year.

The committee proposal would eliminate payments by the citizen, but would provide for hospital stays of 70-90 days or a combination of hospital-nursing home time equal to the cost of 70-90 days in a hospital. The unusually lengthy hospital stay of elder citizens has generally been pointed to as a key problem, but the committee held that only one in 10 aged citizens remains in a hospital longer than 30 days.

The committee proposal would also eliminate the out-patient diagnostic service.

While it did not make a specific estimate of cost in its report, Flemming felt the cost of the proposal would be a shade higher than King-Anderson, which would require higher Social Security taxes equal to one-fourth of 1 percent of an individual's first $5,200 of income to be paid by both workers and employers.

Labor Builds Program Of Community Services

New York—Labor continued to expand its community services program during the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention, the federation's Executive Council reported here.

The report stressed the "two-way street of cooperation" between the trade union movement and community social service agencies.

Union members, the council noted, "give and give generously to support voluntary social work services" and contribute approximately one-third of the $520 million raised annually through United Fund and Community Chest campaigns across the nation.

Of "key importance," it said, is the role of the 128 full-time AFL-CIO community services representatives. They help union members with problems, they recruit trade unionists for service on the boards and committees of local agencies, and they coordinate labor's fund-raising efforts.

Equally significant, the report noted, is the volunteer work of thousands of union officers and members who participate actively in community activities, as scout leaders, hospital aides, youth club workers, Red Cross volunteers, disaster workers and solicitors in local United Fund campaigns.

The 1962 national community services conference explored in depth the inadequacies of existing public welfare programs and labor's goals to improve them.

This year's conference dealt with the use of leisure and brought together spokesmen from recreation, the arts, government, education and public service, the report noted.

Listing other programs and activities of the past two years, the council concluded:

"Much has been accomplished; more will be done as the community services program enters to ever larger degrees into the mainstream of the American labor movement."

Meany Hails Improvement:

Labor Press Role Examined by ILPA

New York—The function of trade union publications in the civil rights, foreign policy and political fields was the central theme of the Intl. Labor Press Association convention here.

In workshop sessions, in a speech by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in discussions on the floor, editors of the nation's labor press dealt with the rise of radical right-wing political pressures, the work of the AFL-CIO in civil rights, and the historic interest of American labor in assisting free trade union movements in other countries.

White House Conference

A White House conference for labor editors was announced for next February by Pierre Salinger, press secretary to Pres. Kennedy.

The conference will cover domestic and economic issues but will also include background information across the field of the national interest including foreign policy, Salinger said, and the editors will be briefed by top officials.

The convention elected Leon Stein, editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers publication, Justice, as its president for next year, succeeding Bernard Mullady of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Kenneth Fiester of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations was re-elected secretary-treasurer and one new vice president and executive council member, Richard Strunsky, was chosen. Fourteen council members were re-elected. Strunsky is editor of 32B, publication of the big New York City local of the Building Service Employes.

In other sessions, the convention:

- Approved a recommendation for employment of a full-time field secretary for two years, to stimulate creation of new labor newspapers and advise existing ones.
- Decided to ask the AFL-CIO Executive Council to select a special topic each year for the ILPA journalistic awards.
- Praised the work of the New Jersey Labor Press Council in its regional seminars at Rutgers University and suggested that ILPA promote similar conferences elsewhere.
- Approved a subcommittee to study complaints about advertising soliciting methods of the Union News, publication of Jewelry Workers Local 225 of New York.

Meany Notes Improvement

Meany noted a "tremendous improvement" in the labor press and urged the editors to make themselves effective in two major areas, foreign policy and civil rights.

Recounting the long-term interest of American unions in assisting free labor movements in other lands, Meany pointed out that we never expect to "collect any dues" from union members elsewhere but that our interest "has a certain amount of selfishness in it."

Things have happened that make the world "a much smaller place," he pointed out. The advocacy of withdrawal from the United Nations, he said, is "a theory of isolationism," and "it could not result in anything other than disaster for us."

In the civil rights field, the AFL-CIO president stressed that labor press editors could often be particularly effective in local areas, where the federation is placing its major emphasis. A special task force is encouraging local labor movements to "take the lead" in stimulating communitywide rights programs, he said.

Workshop sessions presented Walter G. Davis and Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, who are members of the civil rights task force for local communities, and Wesley McCune on the mounting activity of political right-wingers.

McCune, director of Group Research, Inc., in Washington, warned that extremist right-wingers, who are both anti-labor and anti-liberal in the legislative field, plan a major drive in the 1964 elections.

Right Growing Stronger

They are growing stronger and more aggressive, he said, and are backed by ample financial support. He estimated they would have at their disposal next year some $20 million—"more than will be spent" by the Republican and Democratic National Committees put together.

In a third workshop panel Prof. Philip A. Taft of Brown University reviewed the history and significance of the labor movement in the context of present-day attacks.

Salinger in his speech told the labor editors that the so-called "managed news" issue raised against the Administration is a "smoke screen for politicians."

The issue is "access to news," he said, and there is greater access to news from policy-makers, greater freedom to reporters to get background information in major policy fields, than in the past 20 years.

The charge that news can be "managed" is an insult to the 1,500 competent reporters who cover Washington affairs, he said, and to the government officials who are as anxious as they to inform the public.

Union Bank Fetes Council At Luncheon

New York—A luncheon sponsored by the Amalgamated Bank of New York in honor of the AFL-CIO Executive Council was one of the features of a series of pre-convention activities here.

The luncheon was "unique," Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers explained, "because ordinarily banks are not in the habit of toasting organized labor." But, he added, the Amalgamated Bank "is not typical—it is a labor bank, the first and only labor bank in New York City."

Potofsky added that the bank, created by the union 40 years ago, "is dedicated to serve the labor movement and the community." In four decades its reserves have grown to more than $100 million.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated the bank's successful record of achievement, and described it as "further evidence of the foresight of Sidney Hillman," the union's first president.

He praised the union for its effectiveness in holding down the interest rate on personal loans to wage earners in the New York area, and for its role in counseling unions on investment policies.

Meany noted the AFL-CIO had set up a Dept. of Investment to help unions manage their investment funds. He emphasized his belief that union investments in government-guaranteed mortgages provide both safety and a means of helping slum-clearing, home-building programs.

The AFL-CIO president said the Amalgamated Bank "was set up with a purpose—for service to workers they can get nowhere else. And it has been succesful."

TOP WINNERS in the Intl. Labor Press Association contest in the overall editorial excellence category were Clifford Scottin, editor of Canadian Labor, which won in the magazine category, and Gordon Cole, editor of the Machinist, outstanding publication in the newspaper class.

Annual ILPA Awards Cite Union Publications

New York—The Machinist, weekly newspaper of the Machinists, and Canadian Labor, monthly magazine of the Canadian Labor Congress, won first place in their respective categories in the annual contest for trade union publications sponsored by the Intl. Labor Press Association.

The publications ranked first in editorial excellence among international union journals. These awards, and some 50 first prizes in other categories, were announced here at the ILPA convention. The judging was done by the Nieman Fellows of Harvard University.

The top award among publications of state and local central bodies and similar organizations went to the Service Union Reporter, monthly newspaper of the California State Council of Building Service Employes. The best local newspaper was judged to be the Hotel-Bar-Restaurant Review produced monthly by Local 705 of the Hotel & Restaurant Workers, Detroit. Best local magazine was Hotel & Club Voice, monthly publication of New York Local 6 of the hotel union.

A special award for a series of articles on the daily press was presented to Ray W. Taylor, editor of the Milwaukee Labor Press, by the ILPA executive council.

The winners:

International publications: editorial excellence, newspaper format, the Machinist; magazine format, Canadian Labor; best front page, newspaper format, ICAW Union News; magazine format, Firemen & Oilers Journal; best single editorial, Catering Industry Employe; best original cartoon, Seafarers Log; best feature article, RWDSU Record; best regular special column, Allied Industrial Worker; best original photograph, ILGWU Justice.

State and central bodies publications: editorial excellence, newspaper format, Service Union Reporter; best front page, Oregon Labor Press; best single editorial, Oregon Labor Press; best feature article, Lansing Labor News; best regular column, Service Union Reporter; best community project, Toledo Union Journal; best original photograph, Detroit Labor News.

Local union publications: editorial excellence, newspaper format, Hotel-Bar-Restaurant Review; magazine format, Hotel & Club Voice; best front page, newspaper format, the 65er and Local 880 News & Views (tie); magazine format, 1199 Drug News; best single editorial, Dining Room Employe; best original cartoon, Equity; best feature article, the 65er; best regular column, Dining Room Employe; best community project, Hotel & Club Voice; best original photograph, 32B.

Jump Shown In Net Worth Of AFL-CIO

New York—The net worth of the AFL-CIO increased by $258,116 in the two-year period ended June 30, 1963, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said in a report transmitted by the Executive Council to the convention here.

Financial statements certified to by Main & Co., certified public accountants, said the general fund net worth increased from $5.27 million to $5.528 million during the period, the result of an excess of income over expenses.

In the report, Schnitzler listed total assets of $7.525 million, a decrease of $450,000 over the period ended June 30, 1961; and total liabilities of $1.997 million, down $708,000 in the two-year period.

Also certified by Main & Co. were reports of the trustees of the AFL-CIO organizers' pension plan. the AFL-CIO staff retirement plan and the Executive Council's financial report of the AFL-CIO Intl. Free Labor Fund.

IAM Welfare Fund Pays Out $2 Million

St. Louis—A total of $2,076,741 in benefits was distributed by the Welfare Association of Machinists Dist. 9 during the fiscal year ending June 30, at an operating cost of 2.11 percent, according to the annual report.

The plan covers more than 13,000 Dist. 9 members plus their dependents and has paid out more than $18.4 million in the 14 years of its existence. The full cost is borne by employers with whom the union has contracts. Payments have been at the rate of $14.50 per member per month since July 1, 1959.

Disputes Plan Shows Value Of Mediation

New York—The internal disputes machinery established by the 1961 AFL-CIO convention has demonstrated the value of mediation in settling disputes between unions, the Executive Council reported to the federation's 5th convention here.

Noting that nearly 69 percent of the 222 cases filed under the disputes article since Jan. 1, 1962, have been settled in mediation, the council said a similar proportion of settlements is expected for the cases still in mediation.

Disputes mediation has been handled by a panel of 60 leaders of affiliated unions, with David L. Cole as impartial umpire in cases referred to him. The council noted that of the 222 cases filed, 126 have been settled in mediation; 29 are still in mediation; 58 were decided by the umpire, who also issued five fact-finding reports, and four cases are pending.

During the operation of the plan, three unions were found in noncompliance and sanctions required by the plan were put into effect. One union, the Bookbinders, placed itself in compliance and sanctions were removed, the council reported. Sanctions are in effect against the National Maritime Union and the Journeyman Stonecutters.

The effectiveness of the internal disputes plan is attributable, the report noted, "to a high degree of cooperation among federation affiliates in settling cases at the mediation level, and the high degree of competency" of the mediators. Many cases were settled on an informal basis after discussions by the parties with Pres. George Meany's office, the council said.

The Executive Council subcommittee received 21 appeals from the umpire's determinations, of which 19 were denied, one withdrawn and one referred to the council. The subcommittee also received 14 complaints of noncompliance with the umpire's decisions. It achieved compliance in six cases, found noncompliance in four, with four cases still pending.

Report Urges Affiliation with Central Bodies

New York—The failure of many local unions to affiliate with appropriate state and local central bodies is a continuing problem, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported here.

Observing that central bodies have primary responsibility in the fields of legislation, political action and community relations, the council said non-affiliation of local unions is a problem "on which officers of the central bodies, who are carrying heavy responsibilities, feel very strongly.

"They feel," the report said, "that the unaffiliated local unions are shirking their responsibility and are 'free riders' on the backs of the other locals."

Noting that the 1961 AFL-CIO convention called on all affiliated unions to "take such action as may be needed to mandate their local unions to affiliate with the central bodies" and to pay per capita tax on their full membership, the report said too little progress has been made. "The basic strength is still not fully mobilized," the council said.

The AFL-CIO's Coordinator of State & Central Bodies, Stanton Smith, is planning a new survey to determine which locals are not afliated so that a concerted effort "can be made again to solve this vexing problem," the report said.

DRASTIC ACTION TO DISCOURAGE COUPS was proposed by representatives to recent inter-American conference of unions in Venezuela, here addressed by Gen. Sec. Arturo Jauregui of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT). Listening to Jauregui are Venezuelan unionists, left to right, Juan G. Herrera, president of the National Federation of Construction Workers; Bernardo Perez Salinas, secretary of international affairs for the Venezuelan Confederation of Workers (CTV); Jose Gonzalez Navarro, president of CTV; Jauregui; Augusto Malave Villalba, CTV general secretary, and Armando Gonzalez, of the National Federation of Campesinos.

Chicago Parley Asks Letters on Rights Bill

Chicago—Strong support for pending federal civil rights legislation and equally vigorous efforts at state and local levels were urged at the 9th Labor Conference on Civil Rights, sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee of Chicago and endorsed by the Chicago AFL-CIO.

More than 600 delegates were urged to write representatives and senators in behalf of the civil rights bill voted by the House Judiciary Committee. Workshops stressed the need for similar civil rights demands in legislatures, as well as need for establishment of community education programs to improve the human relations climate.

The conference noted that the fight for equal rights also had to be waged against the hate campaigns of the right wing extremists.

With primary attention focused on the bipartisan bill voted by the House Judiciary Committee, Joseph F. Dolan, assistant U.S. deputy attorney general, termed the measure "effective, tough and realistic."

It can reach the floor of the House this month and be passed, he predicted.

"Then it will test the ability of the Senate to come to grips and cope with our most serious domestic problem," he added.

If the Senate delays action, he stated, "we will suffer a national tragedy of incalculable dimensions."

The conference's individual civil rights trophy was awarded Vice Pres. Angelo DeSoto of Steelworkers Local 65, co-chairman of the local's civil rights committee, for initiating a special program to aid minority group members of the union.

Chicago Dining Room Employes Local 25, formed by the recent merger of Waiters Alliance Local 25 and Federated Hotel Local 356. won the local union trophy.

A joint civil rights scroll honored Willis A. Thomas, secretary of Dining Room Employes Local 25, and the late Thomas Rogan, secretary-treasurer of the Waiters Alliance before merger of the unions.

Boris Shishkin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, represented the federation. Morris Bialis, member of the Chicago AFL-CIO executive board and vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, presided at the one-day conference.

NLRB Award Tied to Pact OnAutomation

The National Labor Relations Board has made two jurisdictional awards of work on the basis of a collective bargaining agreement between the unaffiliated West Coast Longshore union and the Pacific Maritime Association, an employers' group.

The effect of the decision was to rule out the use of dockside cranes furnished by a company employing members of the Operating Engineers and manned by IUOE members.

A strike by the longshoremen—the ILWU—in 1960 over the use of the contracted cranes to unload a ship of the American Mail Line sent the dispute to the NLRB. Before the case came to a decision, the company, which first asserted its right to use a contracted crane crew, switched and agreed that the work should go to ILWU members. The second case, although involving a different company, centered on the same issues.

The NLRB, in a 4-0 decision, said it viewed the controversy against the background of the agreement between the ILWU and the employers dealing with automation on the West Coast waterfront.

"The parties are now living under that agreement," it commented, "and urge us to honor their agreement as interpreted by them and their arbitrator. In the circumstances here presented, we have decided to do so."

Michael Komaroff Dies, Conducted Ford Vote

Los Angeles—Michael Komaroff, a veteran arbitrator and a member of the industrial relations faculty of the University of California at Los Angeles, died suddenly at San Francisco on Nov. 10. He was 54.

He was a former employe of the National Labor Relations Board and conducted the historic Ford Motor Co. representation election in 1941. Later he served for a number of years as impartial umpire for the Auto Workers and the North American Aviation Co. He was a brother of Mrs. Myra Wolfgang, a vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes and secretary-treasurer of Detroit Local 705.

ORIT Parley Fights Coups Of Extremists

Caracas, Venezuela—A program for discouraging the "recurrence of coups" in Latin America and for advancing social and economic progress has been adopted by a conference of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT).

Representatives of democratic labor unions in the Western Hemisphere concluded deliberations by calling upon all sectors of society to consolidate their forces against the seizures of power by extremist groups.

In a "Declaration of Caracas," ORIT noted that democratic forces have been weakened by both Communists and the extreme rightists and urged that specific steps be taken to discourage further coups by denying recognition to such governments.

The conference was led by ORIT Gen. Sec. Arturo Jauregui and hosted by the Venezuelan Confederation of Labor. Ernest Lee, executive assistant to the director of international affairs, represented the AFL-CIO.

Wirtz Hails Labor Record On Missiles

Labor peace prevails in the nation's missile and space programs, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has reported to the White House, with every program "either on time or ahead of schedule."

Wirtz, who serves as chairman of the President's Missile Sites Labor Commission, reported a total of only 62 work stoppages in the program in the year ending last June 1. Of this total, 24 were so brief they were not counted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Lost time due to work stoppages amounted to eight-tenths of one percent of all worktime.

The 62 work stoppages, Wirtz said, compares to the 160 stoppages the year before and to 207 in the year before Kennedy created the two-year-old body.

"Delays in the completion of American's missile and space programs because of labor disputes have been virtually eliminated," the report said. "Every program is either on time or ahead of schedule."

Credit was given mainly to a voluntary approach through 24 regional committees and to "the conviction that the national interest was paramount."

Intl. Affairs Director:

Michael Ross Dies After Long Illness

Michael Ross, director of international affairs for the AFL-CIO, died Nov. 9 at George Washington University Hospital in Washington, D. C. He had been hospitalized for about a week, before which he had kept to his home for several months because of poor health. He was 65.

In a telegram to his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Ross, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said it was "with deep sadness that we learned of Mike's death."

"He was a warm and fine man and he served the trade union movement with distinction and dedication," they said. "Throughout the years he worked in the international labor field, Mike demonstrated a true belief in democracy, human dignity and freedom. He will be sorely missed by the democratic unions of all the free countries, by his colleagues in the AFL-CIO and by all who enjoyed his friendship. You and your daughter have our deepest sympathy."

Ross was born in England in 1898 and served in the British Army in World War I. After the war he studied economics in England, joined the Labor Party, traveled throughout Europe and wrote for a number of British publications.

Coming to the United States in 1932, he lived and studied in Philadelphia for several years. In 1936-37 he served on the staff of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee under the late Sen. Robert LaFollette of Wisconsin. In 1938 he became research director of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers and in 1943 became the IUSWA's Washington representative. During World War II he represented the union on a number of committees established by government agencies dealing with the war effort, notably the War Production Board, War Manpower Commission and National War Labor Board.

In 1945, he was appointed by the late Philip Murray to serve as first director of international affairs for the former CIO. From 1953 to 1955 he was the CIO representative in Europe and served as liaison man to the Intl. Labor Organization in Geneva and to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels.

After the AFL-CIO merger he became associate director of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs and was appointed its director by Meany on Jan. 1, 1958.

Ross was a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, the Advisory Committee of the Export-Import Bank, and the board of the Foundation on Youth & Student Affairs.

He is survived by his widow, who resides in Washington; his daughter, Miss Mary Ross of Baltimore; and by two sisters and a brother in England. The body was to be cremated and there will be no funeral.

MICHAEL ROSS

Florida Railroad Balks At Rehiring Workers

Pres. Kennedy has appointed an Emergency Board to recommend settlement terms for the Florida East Railway Coast strike, but the railroad has refused to lay off its newly-hired strikebreakers in order to restore to their jobs 1,400 striking "non-operating" employes and 600 train crew members who respected the picket lines.

Under the Railway Labor Act, appointment of a Presidential Emergency Board requires restoration of the conditions existing prior to the dispute.

As interpreted by Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, this means that the 2,000 union members must be given the jobs they held before Jan. 23, when the strike began.

The non-op unions walked out when the railroad refused to grant the same 10.28 cent hourly wage increase awarded workers on all other major railroads in 1962. The company later notified its operating employes that it was imposing unilateral work rules changes sought by the railroad industry in the still-unresolved work rules dispute now before a special arbitration board. It was forced by a court order earlier this year to cancel that action, but recently issued a new notice of rules changes.

If the railroad persists in its refusal to rehire most of the pre-strike workers, the government would presumably seek a court order forcing compliance, O'Neill indicated.

G. E. Leighty, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association and spokesman for the non-operating unions in the dispute, said the unions will call off the strike "as soon as we receive assurances that all employes who held seniority on Jan. 22, 1963, will be restored to service with all rights unimpaired."

The issue of strikebreaker replacements hired before an emergency board was established has never arisen before since in the past such boards have been set up either before a scheduled strike or within a few days after a shutdown.

Company Refuses

A company official, R. W. Wyckoff, was quoted in the Wall Street Journal as declaring that the company will not displace any of the 700 non-union workers it hired after the strike began.

To fill the remaining jobs, he said, "we intend to advertise and give the employes who went on strike the same opportunity to get the jobs as other applicants."

Earlier in the strike, the unions had accepted proposals by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and a special three-man panel to submit the dispute to arbitration. The company refused to arbitrate.

$3.7 Billion Ceiling Set:

Senate Votes Out Battered Aid Bill

The Senate voted to set a $3.7 billion ceiling on new foreign aid spending after three weeks of hacking and whittling at Pres. Kennedy's budget request and the recommendations of its own Foreign Relations Committee. The battered bill was passed, 63-17.

Kennedy, who had sought to take the steam out of congressional budget-cutters by voluntarily reducing his original $4.9 billion budget estimate to $4.5 billion, had voiced dismay at the harm done to the nation's foreign policy goals by the budget cuts and a series of restrictive amendments.

"This is the worst attack on foreign aid that we have seen since the beginning of the Marshall Plan," he told a news conference.

Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee which approved a $4.2 billion bill, commented bitterly as the Senate neared the final passage vote: "The bill has been emasculated now to the point of non-recognition."

The House earlier had made even heavier slashes, cutting the total authorization to $3.5 billion. But it had been expected that the Senate, as in past years, would restore the bulk of the cuts and a conference committee would then split the difference.

The AFL-CIO urged approval of the Senate committee bill "without change," declaring that it provided the "absolute minimum" needed to assure "the growth of freedom" in the world.

Instead the Senate made one cut after another, forcing concessions from the leadership and then overpowering the core of foreign aid supporters to achieve further reductions.

The final figure which will come out of a House-Senate conference will merely set a ceiling on expenditures. A new round of budget-cutting is expected on the appropriation bill providing the funds.

There was one spot of encouragement for the Administration in the foreign policy area. The House voted to authorize expansion of the Peace Corps from the present 6,700 volunteers to 11,300 next year. Beating back three budget-cutting amendments, it authorized $102 million in new appropriations, an increase of $43 million over last year's spending.

In his news conference, Kennedy expressed impatience with the slow pace of Senate Finance Committee hearings on tax cut legislation and warned that the nation's economy "will suffer" if final action is long delayed.

Prodding Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.), who has said that his committee will continue to hear witnesses until mid-December before going into closed session to consider the tax bill, Kennedy declared:

"It would seem to me that it might be possible to end those hearings and bring the matter to the floor of the Senate before the end of the year."

Otherwise, the President noted, the Senate will be tied up in a "very long debate" over the civil rights bill early next year, which might hold up action on taxes.

The President again emphasized that "both these bills"—tax and civil rights legislation—"should be passed."

Auto Workers Teams Visit African Nations

New York—A 10-man delegation from the Auto Workers is en route to Africa to establish direct relationships with democratic trade union groups and that continent.

Headed by Victor Reuther, director of the UAW Dept. of Intl. Affairs, the group will divide into three teams and cover 11 African countries, as well as visit Cyprus and Israel.

The group hopes to determine means, in conjunction with the international labor movement, to encourage and strengthen the growth of free trade unions in Africa.

FRONT COVER of a 44-page New York Times magazine supplement telling the story of the AFL-CIO carries out the title theme, "The Hands That Build America." The supplement will be distributed during the AFL-CIO convention in New York as part of the Times' Sunday edition, Nov. 17. It will also be distributed with the paper's West Coast edition, Nov. 18, and with the international edition, Nov. 25. Single copies are available free from the Pamphlet Div. of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications. Quantity prices are 10 cents each in lots of less than 1,000 and $75 for lots of 1,000.

Horseshoers Update 78-Year Constitution

Houston, Tex.—The Journeymen Horseshoers revised and updated their constitution at the union's biennial convention to meet requirements of modern working conditions and labor legislation.

This was the first major overhaul of the constitution in the 78-year history of the 300-member union, one of the smallest internationals in the AFL-CIO. Twenty-four delegates and officers attended the five-day convention.

The union resolved to redouble its organizing efforts among horseshoers who attend to the foot comfort of show, farm and riding stable horses and pets. Most of the present members work at racetracks in the United States and Canada. Only local 23 in Texas, a non-racing state, is made up of so-called "saddle-horse" platers.

To facilitate organizing, the union will lower its $200 initiation fee and $7.50 monthly dues for saddle-horse tradesmen. This will be worked out at a forthcoming executive board meeting.

The Horseshoers also resolved to continue a legal fight against Canadian and Maryland trainers who are seeking court action to halt the union's boycott against Canadian trainers.

The trainers are appealing a recent decision by a federal judge at Baltimore who held that the Horseshoers are employes, not independent contractors, within the meaning of federal labor laws.

The convention elected a whole slate of new officers. Fred Webb, who had been secretary-treasurer, defeated incumbent George Miller for the presidency. Both are of Hot Springs, Ark.

Other new officers are Jimmy Lane, Arcadia, Calif., first vice president; Elmer Campbell, Miami, Fla., second vice president; D. B. Brady, Houston, third vice president; and Bob Coons, Pittsburgh, Ill., secretary-treasurer.

High Court Denies Hutcheson Hearing

The U.S. Supreme Court has denied a hearing to Carpenters' Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson on a 1960 conviction for contempt of Congress.

The high court let stand rulings by lower courts that Hutcheson improperly refused to answer a series of questions on land dealings in Indiana posed by the Senate's Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. Hutcheson had protested that the matter was then before the Indiana courts, which subsequently found no evidence of wrongdoing.

Wide Impact Seen in L-G Challenge Of Musicians' Per Capita Balloting

By David L. Perlman

New York—The Musicians have appealed a far-reaching federal district court decision invalidating a method of convention voting used by many unions—a rollcall ballot in which delegates cast votes equal to the membership of the local unions they represent.

Immediate effect of the ruling by Judge Richard H. Levet was to void a per capita dues increase adopted at the AFM convention last June by a rollcall vote of 158,069 to 113,742. The increase—from $2.10 to $6 a year—was to have gone into effect Jan. 1, 1964.

The wider impact on the labor movement was pointed up by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in an affidavit submitted to the district court. Meany strongly supported the Musicians' claim that the method of voting—prescribed by the AFM constitution—was both legal and democratic.

To invalidate the per capita voting system, he warned, "would be disastrous to a substantial number of international labor unions whose constitutional procedures would thereby be invalidated and would violate democratic principles."

Declaring that "the AFL-CIO has been vitally interested in promoting democracy in its constituent unions," Meany told the court that the rollcall procedure followed by the AFM "clearly furthers intraunion democracy."

Judge Levet held that the provision of the Landrum-Griffin Act requiring approval of a dues increase by "majority vote of the delegates voting at a regular convention" is "clearly mandatory." It is beside the point, he said, whether the voting method used at the AFM convention was equally or even "more democratic' than the method prescribed by Congress.

In a brief filed with the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals, the Musicians challenged this interpretation.

Union attorneys said the term "majority vote" used in the Landrum-Griffin Act "is broad enough to encompass a system under which delegates' votes are weighted in accordance with the members they represent" and does not require a "one-vote-per-delegate" procedure.

The lower court's interpretation, the union brief asserted, would have enabled delegates representing only 27 percent of the AFM's membership to control the union's convention, since the maximum number of delegates a local could send was three.

Citing congressional hearings on Landrum-Griffin, the union contended that "surely it was never intended that the rights of members" under their union's constitution could be "destroyed" by allowing "delegates representing a minority of the members to frustrate the will of the majority of the members."

It would require "a fantastic distortion" of the law to reach such a conclusion, the AFM contended.

If per capita rollcall voting were banned and the Musicians desired to provide representation at conventions based on the size of locals, starting with one delegate for each local having 200 members or less, "its conventions would have to be attended by over 13,000 delegates," the union brief declared, "as contrasted with the present number of approximately 1,200 delegates."

The cost of such a convention would be over $3 million, the AFM said, "and would make the holding of a convention impractical as well as prohibitive in cost."

The suit was brought by a group of members of New York Local 802, represented by Attorney Godfrey P. Schmidt. Some members of the group had also been plaintiffs in an earlier suit which resulted in the invalidation of a tax on the earnings of traveling musicians, which formerly had been a major source of revenue for the AFM and its locals. The per capita increase was recommended by the union's executive board as a substitute form of revenue.

Although the district court decision did not pass on a challenge raised by the plaintiffs to the fact that some 26,000 AFM members pay dues to two or more local unions—and thus had more than one vote—the union rebutted that point in its brief to the appellate court.

Each local of which they were a member would be required to pay per capita to the international union based on their membership, the union pointed out, and per capita payments are the traditional method for determining membership in good standing.

In any event, the AFM noted, the total of duplicate memberships was considerably less than the 44,000 vote plurality for the dues hike.

The Immutable Goals

THE AFL-CIO OPENED its fifth convention in the city of its birth facing the crisis of jobs and unemployment as a united movement. In the words of Pres. Meany in the Executive Council's report to the convention, "Today in the U.S., labor unity is an immutable fact."

In the eight years since Dec. 5, 1955, the AFL-CIO has survived a host of premature obituary notices, attacks from the reactionary right and the equally reactionary left, and the efforts of the handful of corrupt elements to insinuate themselves into the labor movement.

The inherent strength of the trade union movement has repelled and repulsed these assaults, and labor has gone about the basic job of gaining for American workers a fair share of the wealth they help produce and building a better society in the democratic tradition of social justice.

It is this strength, this ability not only to survive the assaults of enemies and critics but to move forward, that is the hallmark of the AFL-CIO as it opened its convention sessions.

★ ★ ★

THE LABOR MOVEMENT has moved forward in significant areas since the last convention. It has broadened and strengthened its civil rights machinery, and progress toward the goal of equal rights for all and the approach to the end of discrimination in the labor movement has been sharply accelerated.

Internal disputes have been reduced to insignificant proportions and the machinery adopted in 1961 is working successfully. In Pres. Meany's words "for all practical purposes, the so-called 'insoluble problem' has been solved."

There are differences within the labor movement but they are essentially differences of emphasis and approach and tactics, not the basic strategy or the objectives and the goals. There is wide agreement and solid support in the never-ending struggle for bread, peace and freedom.

★ ★ ★

THE STRUGGLE is to preserve and build the nation's economic strength, to solve the problem of chronic unemployment in a period of automation and an explosively growing labor force.

The struggle is to defeat the forces of reaction organized under the banner of the radical right, which would weaken the foundations of American democracy.

The struggle is to help build strong, free unions in the new nations of the world, to help preserve these nations in freedom and throw back the never-ending threat of Communist totalitarianism.

In these struggles the labor movement is strong and united. It is in these areas—the bread of economic security and a decent standard of living, the freedom of a strong democratic society with equal rights for all, the peace of a world striving to control nuclear power and its threat of destruction—that the unity of the labor movement counts.

"We in the AFL-CIO are determined that America will not fail," Pres. Meany told the convention, that there will be jobs for all, equality for all in a free world.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the
American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President
WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Nov. 16, 1963 No. 46

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Convention Agenda

Gus Tyler Warns:

'New Leftism' Snipes at Labor, Challenges Liberal Coalition

The following is excerpted from an an article by Gus Tyler, "The New Challenge to Liberalism," appearing in the November 1963 issue of the American Federationist.

AMERICAN LIBERALISM faces a dual challenge: the first, and most serious, from a newly invigorated conservative coalition; the second, from a "new" leftist critique that damns labor's existence in order to save its soul. To counter both requires a liberal coalition that will effectively unite the unions, the civil rights movement and progressive-minded intellectuals.

The liberal strategy also falls into two phases: win the next presidential election and move ahead to win majorities in state and federal legislatures. To do the latter—win legislative majorities—will require more than votes. Court action—probably Supreme Court action—will be required to democratize the legislative bodies so the voice of the voting majorities may be properly heard. But to win elections—whether for the presidency or the legislatures—requires a third and basic element: an effective liberal coalition.

The dominant leadership in the various groups that compose this coalition recognize the need for a political alliance. Yet there is a real danger that this coalition will be disrupted, even impaired, by a small though highly publicized coterie of liberal intellectuals who are making a career out of fostering friction and schism among the great liberal movements. They propose a split in labor as a means of invigorating the unions; they see a Negro assault on organized labor as a prime means to invigorate the civil rights movement; they see in a return to the radical formulas of the 1930s a pattern for behavior in the 1960s.

This new "leftism," with its accent on the negative, is the "enemy within" the liberal coalition.

Some of this "new" critique reflects a general malaise among certain intellectuals who become angry with mass movements if the latter do not, in school-child fashion, follow the teacher. Some of it reflects a sense of guilt on the part of brief sojourners in the labor movement who justify their AWOL by denouncing either the old general or the old cause. Some of it is a kind of reactionary radicalism that tries to rediscover the kicks of youth by reciting old cliches in new jargonese.

But most of it derives from plain ignorance—a state to which most intellectuals, especially those least informed, will rarely own up.

The spokesmen of the "new" critique devote their talent to penning obituary notices for collective bargaining. They feel that automation has given labor its coup de grace. They argue that "the system of collective bargaining, which has operated successfully since the passage of the Wagner Act 28 years ago in 1935, has proved less and less adequate for the solution of some basic problems now faced by unions and management." Projecting this trend, they argue that with more and more automation, collective bargaining will mean less and less.

THIS IS A MOTH-EATEN LINE of reasoning dated circa 1930s and was just as inaccurate then as it is now. In the depth of the great depression, a few radical sectarians insisted the union no longer had a function as a collective bargaining agency since unemployed workers cannot bargain against a non-existent employer.

Hence the unions had better forget about the piddling business of dollars and cents contracts and turn to the more meaningful business of seizing power for a social revolution. This is basically the line of reasoning of the "new" critique, with the word "automation" replacing "unemployement" and with a vague "call for action" replacing the now unfashionable "revolution."

In forming a liberal coalition, the intellectuals can play a pivotal role. As economists, they can shape broad programs. As students of inter-group relations, they can counsel towards the end of prejudice. As educators, they can raise up new generations of inspired and instructed young people to play their energetic part in progressive social movements. As researchers and propagandists, they can enlighten the nation politically. As viewers of the total society they can interpret labor to the civil rights movement and interpret the civil rights movement to labor.

The bulk of the liberal intellectual community plays precisely this role. To the "new" leftists, however, such responsible thinkers are servants of the Establishments, Uncle Toms, the kept brains of the unions, to be read out of the intellectual community while the negativists take over and proclaim themselves the voice of intelligence.

For all these forces—labor, civil rights and liberal intellectual—the time for decision is close, as close as the next national election. Conservatism is moving in for the kill. Its one best hope is a divided liberalism.

For the liberal, the one best hope now—as always—lies in unity, unity in the immediate future around "jobs and freedom."

Morgan Says:

University Campus Ideal Spot For Taking a Look at Reality

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ONE OF THE BEST WAYS to clear the cobwebs from the attic of a Washington ivory tower and clean its begrimed and foggy windows is to get out of town and onto the premises of some college or university. Here reality and unreality collide or, to be more precise, here is where the "practical" life of the workaday world is caught with all its crudities and its inevitable decisions of compromise in the spotlight of idealism, and vice versa.

Morgan

Over a weekend I was fortunate enough to visit two such institutions, Shaw University in Raleigh, a Baptist school for Negroes founded in the year Lincoln was shot, and the University of North Carolina in neighboring Chapel Hill, which over the years has earned an enviable reputation for academic liberalism. The atmosphere on both campuses crackled with eagerness and the restless tension of impatience.

As one might expect, there was an atmosphere of serious, even intense, dedication at Shaw. Struggling along on its all-too-modest endowments, the peeling paint of its old and shabby classrooms reflecting society's neglect and the speciousness of that now exploded myth of "separate but equal" facilities, the university, nevertheless, was almost quiveringly alert to the issue of civil rights.

Shaw students were in the vanguard of sit-in demonstrations and they seem to be beginning to take pride in the fact that they have been fighting not only their own but democracy's battle. Their minds were full of other questions.

It was on the larger campus at Chapel Hill, however, that the interplay of the practical and the ideal was most vivid. University life, of course, revolves in a kind of ivory tower of its own which is more valuable to society than most of us are apt to realize because from the tower, if there is any intellectual strength to the structure at all, a searchlight is beamed outward, constantly scanning the nation's sense of values.

The university is more than mildy convulsed at present over a so-called gag law sneaked through the closing days of the legislature prohibiting known or suspected Communists from speaking on the campus of any state-supported school in North Carolina. The controversy, however, goes far beyond the issue of freedom of speech and, in microcosm, shows the power structures of our society at work, the tensions they build up between principle and practicality and the compromises that emerge.

HERE IS A HARD CORE of semi-rural conservatism in the legislature, suspicious of "academic freedom," determined with a partially vindictive "papa-knows best" attitude to tell those smart-alec university people where to head in and motivated too by an obviously sincere desire to protect what they are likely to refer to as "Americanism."

Here is a young, vigorous governor, a New Frontier lawyer type named Terry Sanford, the only governor in the union with no veto power, trying to undo the legislature's hasty damage without, as it were, making a federal case of it.

Here is an enlightened, hard-working administrative hierarchy of the university, or multiversity as California's Clark Kerr calls the multiple structure of a state's higher education, caught between the caution of the politicians and the impatience of students and faculty.

Eventually the problem will be solved, hopefully with positive results but with some high ideals undoubtedly dented in the process. Here the function of a university along the lines, as Pres. Kerr describes them, of "disseminating and examining the eternal truths" emerges with powerful importance.

How authentic, a conscientious teacher will ask, is an "Americanism" whose politicians, while demanding a kind of peerless citizenship from others, permit themselves to defy their own state constitutions rather than fairly reapportion legislative districts? Or to defy the federal constitution's protection of civil rights for Negroes? Their private answers are likely to be "well, we've got to get re-elected of course, and you can't legislate a man's convictions."

You can send him to war, though, and tell him he's fighting for democracy. A young professor startled a Chapel Hill bull session by saying he had killed a man over free speech, the issue embodied in the state's gag law. "I was in World War II," he said. "They handed me a gun and told me to kill the enemy and I did, thinking it was over the issue of freedom and other ideals this country stands for, which I believe in."

The bull session was shocked into murmurs of "yes but" protest.

"Yes but," the professor said, "looking at the issue that way sort of makes you stop and think, doesn't it?"

Washington Reports:

Senate Party Leaders Disagree On Tax, Civil Rights Schedule

SENATE MAJORITY Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), declared that a $10.5 billion tax cut would mean $30 billion in purchasing power to "create jobs, modernize industry, and forestall the possibility of a depression, which has seemed to occur about every 44 months . . . since the end of World War II."

Mansfield was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on some 700 radio stations, with Senate Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.).

With 160 witnesses scheduled and the need for time to digest the testimony, mark up the bill and consider amendments, Dirksen said "we'll be not only into the Christmas season but even beyond."

Mansfield was more optimistic and said the leadership still hopes both the tax bill and a civil rights bill will pass at an early date.

"If we fail to pass one or the other," he added, "we will immediately take that one up at the beginning of the second session. I expect to be here right straight through until noon Jan. 3, 1964, when we have to adjourn, but if we are here that long, it is my intention to adjourn at that time, but immediately to convene the second session."

Dirksen said he expected the "main trouble' over the civil rights package will be on Title 2 dealing with public accommodations, and predicted "it will be difficult to pass, to say the least."

"The Democrats alone cannot pass a civil rights bill," Mansfield said. "If there is to be a civil rights bill, it will be because of strong Republican support . . . My belief is that outside of (public accommodations) we could expect strong Republican support."

HE SAID PRESENT PLANS are for "extended debate, but not too extended since I do not plan to hold night sessions."

"I do not believe the Senate is a circus," he said. "I intend to uphold the decorum and the prestige of the body. My guess at the moment, subject to change, is that two to three weeks' debate ought to be enough. Then I will move to invoke cloture; if we fail . . . by a fairly close vote, then we'll continue for another week or so and again try to invoke cloture."

The chances for cloture are "fair," he said.

Dirksen said that there are a number of reforms in the tax bill which "certainly are not offensive or objectionable," although some of them can be expected to receive "a good deal of attention."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SUPREME COURT is at the point of spelling out the ground rules under which state legislatures must operate in distributing political power among rural, urban and suburban voters.

The court uncorked an explosion of activity—legislative and judicial—when it ruled in the spring of 1962, in a Tennessee case, that federal courts had authority to rule on complaints by city voters that rural minorities were unfairly depriving them of representation in the legislatures. Briefs have been filed and oral arguments held.

All the Supreme Court said then was that the federal courts had jurisdiction over such cases, and, as Justice Brennan wrote in the majority opinion, that lower court judges could frame decrees to try to meet the equities.

The state legislative system in Tennessee, the court ruled, gave such disproportionate power to rural voters and members that city voters were deprived of equal protection of the laws—the warranty of the 14th Amendment. Justice Brennan's opinion said, in effect, that lower court judges should seek to devise remedies and let them be sent up to the Supreme Court to be tested.

This 1922 decision was treated, generally, as an extraordinary reversal of a "long-standing rule" that courts would not enter the "political thicket." In fact, it was not a reversal at all, as Justice Brennan emphasized; in 1946 the court had reached an identical conclusion in an Illinois case involving congressional districts by a 4-to-3 margin, but the late Justice Rutledge, the decisive man in the case, chose for his own reasons not to implement the judgment at that time.

* * *

THE IMPACT of the decision, nevertheless, has been overwhelming.

In state after state, suits were filed in state and federal courts attacking either the state legislative districts or the congressional districts. Legislatures tried hastily to revamp their procedures, in one area or the other or both, to meet the threat that the high court might throw out the old procedures as unconstitutional.

The evil of the old procedure can be stated simply: The states have failed or refused to redraw legislative districts to take account of population shifts from farm to city and from city to surburb. City voters were cheated of equal representation.

The evil overlapped into the area of the U.S. House of Representatives because state legislatures, under rural and small-town control, failed or refused to redraft congressional districts.

The New York Times expert in court issues, Anthony Lewis, quoted a Times correspondent in Tennessee as reporting: "The rural bloc has demonstrated that it will seek every means of avoiding compliance—of cheating, even by a few seats—in an effort to preserve as much of its authority as possible."

* * *

THE MULTIPLICITY of decisions and legislative gestures since the 1962 high court ruling can cause confusion. In essence the practical questions are these:

- Can state legislatures district themselves so as to preserve rural domination—"to cheat, even by a few seats"—or must they distribute power to voters on the basis of "one man, one vote"?
- Can one house of a legislature be based on population, the other on area, as in the "federal system" giving two senators to each state? Some state and lower federal courts have ruled yes, some no.
- Even if a state legislature must be based on both houses on the principle of equality in voting—"one man, one vote"—do the courts have power to regulate state apportionment of U.S. House members according to same principle?

These are the issues now before the Supreme Court, to be decided in specific cases.

Court decisions may backfire against the supposed victors (for example, population weight now is in the swollen suburban areas, thought to be conservative, not in central cities). But the issue of equality in voting is at the heart of many other things, and the Supreme Court's decisions in the specific cases will be markers along the way.

THE SENATE WILL PASS both the tax cut and civil rights bills at an early date, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), left, predicted on the AFL-CIO radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.) expressed doubt, however, that the Senate would reach a vote on the tax bill until next year.

How to Buy:

The High Cost of Gambling: Only the Syndicate Gets Rich

By Sidney Margolius

(Second of two articles on how professional gamblers exploit moderate-income workers.)

YOU WOULD NOT DREAM of inviting a gang of hoods into your home, and especially not the Mafia or Cosa Nostra. You would be only too aware of the threat to your family and your possessions.

Yet every $2 bet on a horse, every quarter on the "numbers," has become an invitation to the most ruthless criminals to seize control of your community, and sometimes the place where you work, reporter Fred J. Cook has warned.

Professionally-controlled gambling is so profitable that the crime syndicates now dominate most of the "action," as they call it, in local communities. When the syndicates move in, they seek to corrupt not only the cop on the beat but in a number of proven cases have been able to control elected officials.

In the long run you never can beat the gambling syndicates' odds. Previously we showed that the professional gamblers have a margin of 15 to 80 percent against you. Even in legal parimutuel gambling at racetracks permitted in many states, the track and the state between them may take 20 percent.

Many habitual horse players spend much time trying to make a science of betting, and studying form sheets and newspapers' selections. But even the professional handicappers admit it is impossible to advise a winning system.

One of the most popular handicappers, Fred Keats, said, "Any horseplayer who thinks he can beat the horses by following a handicapper's daily selection is in for a surprise. If I could beat them consistently why would I have been giving them away for a weekly paycheck the last 53 years?"

Ernest Blanche, a government statistician, showed that even such relatively-conservative systems as betting only on favored horses is doomed to failure. He analyzed the results of 256 races and found that if you had bet on the favorite to win in each race, you would have lost money. If you had bet on each favorite to at least "place" (come in second), you would have lost even more. If you had bet on each to "show" (at least come in third), as 73 percent of the favorites did, you still would have ended with less than your original stake.

One of the most loaded forms of gambling is the "numbers" game, sometimes called the "poor man's stock market." Of 1,000 bettors who pay a dime each, or a total of $100, on the average one wins, but only $54. In some cities, the ruling syndicates pay out only 400 to 500 to 1, or, $40 to $50 of every $100 they collect.

BETTING ON SPORTS EVENTS has become widespread in recent years, with an estimated 10 million people betting on football and baseball pools and basketball games. Increasingly, sports betting has come under control of professional syndicates.

The odds often are quoted as the number of points by which the favored team is expected to win. But whichever side you take, the bookmaker puts up only $5 against your $6. If the betting is especially heavy on one side, the "point spread" may be further juggled to favor the bookmaker.

In areas where bingo is played illegally, the promoters are believed to return only 50 percent of the proceeds. In legalized bingo, where adequately supervised, the odds have been reduced somewhat but still are stacked more heavily than many people assume. The reports of the New York State Bingo Control Commission indicate that operators still keep 34 percent of the proceeds. The odds still are 3 to 2; 66 cents back for the average dollar bet.

Slot machines are supposed to be illegal in all but five states, but government men still discover them on raids. The "slots" have the most-ruthless odds of any kind of gambling. They usually are adjusted to return only 20 to 60 percent of the coins played, Blanche reports. Even when the machine is adjusted for a relatively-generous payout, the jackpot combination appears only once in about 4,000 spins.

Sweepstakes and lottery tickets, or payments for them, may not be sent legally through the mails. But tickets often are smuggled into the country. We have had tickets sold here for everything from the Irish sweepstakes to a new one in the Republic of Haiti.

The odds against winning are staggering. In the Irish Sweepstakes, only 40 percent of the proceeds are earmarked for prizes (some authorities say less). The ticket-buyer's chance of winning the top award is 1 in 305,000; of drawing a horse that places first, second or third, 1 in 101,666, and of even drawing a horse listed as a possible starter, 1 in 3470, John Scarne, a noted gambling expert, has warned.

Dice and card games also often are operated by professional syndicates. If run honestly, gambling-house odds may take 6 percent of the bets, according to one authority. But Blanche warns that the honesty of professional dice and card games cannot be taken for granted. Dice can be controlled by the use of metal-loaded dice and magnetized tables.

Many amateurs want the excitement of tossing the dice. But the odds are always slightly against the tosser, Blanche points out. The odds against tossing the hoped-for 7 or 11 on the first throw are 9 to 2.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

From Soup to Nonsense:

A Few Thoughts That Seemed Like Good Ideas at the Time

By Jane Goodsell

"NOW, LET'S ALL promise to follow the dentist's advice to brush our teeth for a full three minutes in an up-and-down motion after every meal. Okay?"

* * *

"I've just bought a new dictionary, and every time I come across a word I don't know, I'm going to look it up right away before I forget it."

* * *

"That dog is entirely the children's responsibility. It's up to them to take care of him, and I'm not going to lift a finger to help."

* * *

"I'm giving up best sellers and whodunits and, from now on, I'm going to read only worthwhile literature. I'm starting with Plato, and working my way straight through the Great Books course."

* * *

"Memory is a matter of training, and I'm going to make a real effort to concentrate on people's names when I'm introduced to them."

* * *

"I'm going to get up at 6:30 every morning and tune in on that marvelous course in advanced mathematics on the educational TV channel."

* * *

"No more store-bought salad fixings for us! We're planting a vegetable garden in the backyard, and it's going to be great, picking our own lettuce and radishes and tomatoes. Boy, oh boy, I can hardly wait to sink my teeth into that sweet corn! We'll set a pot of water boiling on the stove, and then dash out to the yard to pick a dozen or so ears fresh off the vine and mmmmm!"

* * *

"Why don't we form a group to get together for lunch once a week, and swear a solemn pact to converse entirely in French?"

FOR THE 16th YEAR the Brewery Workers made a grant of $1,200 to the National Society for Crippled Children & Adults, with Sec.-Treas. Arthur R. Gildea (center) shown presenting the check to Sumner G. Whittier (left), executive director of the society, as Joseph E. Brady, the union's legislative director, looks on.

Stevenson A Symbol:

UN's Success Draws Wrath of Right Wing

THE VIRULENT ATTACK on UN Ambassador Adlai Stevenson by Texan right wing extremists has served to highlight a growing violent mood among American right wingers. Stevenson was spat upon, a placard—whether deliberately aimed or not—hit him on the head, his speech was interrupted by catcalls and derision.

The incident also served to highlight a pathological hatred among right wingers of the United Nations. The Birchites have made a career out of opposition to the UN. All sorts of weird political cults have voiced their hatred of such UN bodies as UNICEF, the United Nation's International Children's Emergency Fund, which has become part of the American "trick or treat" Halloween tradition.

Why this hatred for the UN? Is it because the UN has been a failure?

The United Nations is now observing its 18th anniversary. By the time the old League of Nations had reached its 18th anniversary, it was virtually dead. It had failed to stop Fascist aggression in Ethiopia. It had failed to halt the Nazi re-armament in Germany. It had failed to prevent Japanese onslaughts against the Chinese. It had failed to support the Spanish Republic against the Falange and it had failed to stop the beginning of the Soviet Union's expansion into Eastern Europe.

The UN, on the other hand, has had 18 years of extraordinary success in helping to prevent what—on more than one occasion—might easily have been a third world war.

During these 18 years powerful revolutionary currents have hit virtually every corner of the world. Without the UN, it is safe to say that chaos would have swept many nations at the end of World War II, making them easy targets for Communist subversion. Vast colonial empires collapsed in Asia and Africa; scores of new nations, ill-prepared for independent, democratic life, have emerged with the UN their only common meeting ground.

THROUGH ALL THIS, how have the interests of the United States fared? It is difficult, if not impossible, to find the UN as a body voting against the United States in any major controversy that has risen during the past 18 years. The U.S. position was supported in Iran in the early days of the founding of the UN. It was supported in Korea. It was supported in the Congo. It has been supported repeatedly in rejection of Communist China as a UN member.

It is true that Khrushchev used a UN table on which to beat his shoe and that Castro used the UN as a sounding board for one of his vitriolic speeches. But what did it avail either of them? Neither Khrushchev nor Castro could swing the UN to his side.

Basically, such opposition to the UN as has developed in the United States has come from men and women who want to see the United States return to the isolation of bygone days; who want to see the power of the federal government fractionalized in the name of states' rights; who hate the kind of social progress and reform that is taking place in our own country and is the mark of the UN in the work of its specialized agencies.

It is here that the line between supporters of the UN and its haters can be drawn. Not merely is the quarrel over isolationism. It is also over the whole gamut of social change and progress. Organized workers recognized this. The AFL-CIO is an ardent supporter of the UN and its works. So is labor, in the democratic world, through the Intl. Confederation of Free Trades Unions.

The UN, in many ways, has become a symbol of the deep crevass that is separating the extreme right wing movement and the rest of the American people and for that matter, most of the rest of the world.

It is an American tragedy that this difference in viewpoint more and more is being expressed in such un-American ways as abuse, physical violence and charges of "communism" against such men as Supreme Court Justice Earl Warren. (PAI)

World Conquest Still Goal:

Soviet's Co-Existence Policy Viewed as Device to Gain Time

New York—Premier Khrushchev's policy of peaceful co-existence "aims at eliminating, and not co-existing with, the free world," the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned in its report on international affairs.

"He needs more time for reorganizing the Soviet Communist Party and remedying the gross defects of the Soviet economy," the council advised delegates to the 5th AFL-CIO convention.

"He needs more time for settling his serious fight with Mao-Tse-tung. He wants more time to develop the most effective strategy for maximum Soviet exploitation of the divisive political trends . . . and the disarray in the western camp resulting from the difficulties over the Common Market."

The Soviet leader is not likely to make significant concessions nor will he move away "from the basic aim of Communist world conquest," the council asserted, lest the Chinese Communists and their supporters "might exploit them for weakening the international supremacy" of the Russian party.

As it is, the council noted, the "myth of monolithic Communist unity" has been "deeply scarred" by the Sino-Soviet rift, and while the Kremlin's position in the Communist world is still dominant, "Khrushchev has already been weakened in his relations with the satellites."

"The Moscow-Peiping conflict once again reveals the great contradiction inherent in world communism," the council observed. "As a totalitarian ideology, it cannot long tolerate differences within its own fold. As a worldwide subversive movement bent on domination, it cannot long permit the existence of democracies anywhere. Yet the very modernization which the Communists seek tends to provide better soil for the growth of the love of freedom which persists everywhere. This process gives rise to difficulties and dangers which menace the totalitarian system."

The report covered a wide range of topics that reflected the Executive Council's continuing attention to world affairs.

It supported the stand of Pres. Kennedy and his Administration in Cuba and West Berlin and reemphasized its earlier statement that U.S. capacity "to deter and defeat" Communist aggression is the "decisive force" that preserves peace and safeguards independent countries from Red subversion.

It reiterated its call for strengthened Atlantic unity and termed it "unfortunate" that "the strength of the western democracies should be sapped by disarray" at a time when the Reds are "beset by difficulties and divisions."

Support was given to adequate foreign aid funds and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's dissent from the majority report of the Committee to Strengthen the Security of the Free World (Clay committee), which called for a cut in funds.

The Executive Council again pledged moral and material backing to the "emerging trade unions" in the developing nations and called for the liberation of countries still under the yoke of colonialism.

It hailed the labor-backed Alliance for Progress for its efforts to develop economic and political stability in Latin America and estimated that some 37 million people have benefited from it to date. Some countries, it pointed out, have submitted programs calling for AFL-CIO "economic involvement."

Renewed support was given the United Nations as an instrument for preserving peace but the council expressed regret that it did not use its "moral authority and prestige" to bring the Soviet Union to task for its "flagrant violation" of UN decisions on Hungary.

The report welcomed the reorganization of the central leadership and administration of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its "resulting improvement," and reported that the outlook for operations of the Solidarity Fund is favorable.

It briefly reviewed activities of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers, pointing out that stepped-up Communist activities—particularly in the labor movement—have increased the need for counter-moves by ORIT and for special organization and education projects for which AFL-CIO personnel have been supplied.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development has had "remarkable success," the report noted, with 151 union leaders from Latin America and the Caribbean area having completed courses since the school was opened in June.

The Executive Council called the past year "perhaps the most difficult" in the history of the Intl. Labor Organization because of major political issues growing from "the understandable determination of the newly independent countries, especially in Africa, for vigorous action" on matters affecting them.

The Soviet bloc, seeking to exploit the "legitimate aspirations" of the African nations, has sought to convert the ILO into a tool for promotion of Communist political aims, the report said. However, it recalled, the Reds failed to force adjournment of the 1963 conference when the African and Asian nations walked out in a dispute over the ouster of the South African apartheid regime. Despite "heated political issues," the ILO has continued to make progress in advancing the welfare of workers, the council said.

EXPERIMENTAL PROGRAM under the Manpower Development & Training Act to develop demonstration projects for training handicapped persons was announced by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz (left) at a meeting with Dr. Stafford L. Warren (center), special assistant to the President for mental retardation, and Dr. Gunnar Dybwad. The development work will be done by the National Association for Retarded Children, at whose Washington convention the project approval was announced.

School Crisis Seen In Federal Aid Delay

New York—The nation's educational crisis has worsened during the past two years despite stepped-up efforts by states and communities to improve schools and attract qualified teachers, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention here.

The council put the blame on the continued failure of Congress to enact a full-scale federal aid to education program.

Classroom construction is proceeding at the "high" rate of 70,000 a year, yet more than half the states report a larger shortage of classrooms in 1962 than in 1961, the council said.

There have been "substantial increases" in average teacher salaries — "yet the improvements have not been enough to meet the shortage of qualified teachers."

A greater portion of the national income is going to education, "yet many of the states which are making the greatest effort are far below national averages in their per pupil educational expenditures."

The report stressed that with inadequate state and local tax sources and sharp differences in state resources, "the federal government is the only agency which can effectively equalize educational opportunity throughout the nation."

Vocational Training Worst

Perhaps the most serious shortage in schooling, the report noted, is in the field of vocational education, which is "barely scratching the surface" of the problem of training millions of young people for trades and industry.

"Meaningful vocational education," the council pointed out, requires expensive equipment and teaching facilities. "Yet only 1.5 percent of the nation's school budget goes for vocational education with about one-fifth of that small amount coming from the federal government."

Commenting on vocational education proposals made by the Kennedy Administration and embodied in somewhat different bills passed by the House and Senate, the council said:

"The greater flexibility proposed in the legislation represents a welcome realization that the whole structure of vocational education must be reshaped in terms of the needs of present-day industry."

Looking to the future, the report noted that by 1970 there will be 8 million more school-age children than in 1962, "placing further strains upon already overcrowded and understaffed schools."

The report warned also that "unless something is done soon, the next education disaster area will be the college campus. The increasing birth rate of the 1940's is just about to hit the institutions of higher learning."

There is "compelling" evidence, too, of the need for federal aid to eradicate illiteracy and semi-literacy among adults. This, the report noted, "has been a drag on manpower training and re-training programs."

In a related area, the report urged a step-up in apprenticeship programs, noting that there is "a growing demand for skilled workers and a shrinking demand for unskilled workers."

It called on government, employers and unions to strive for expansion and improvement of apprentice programs.

Reporting on the AFL-CIO college scholarship program, the council noted that in addition to the direct benefits, it has "also encouraged many affiliated organizations to establish scholarship programs of their own."

Trade Adjustment Administration Criticized as 'Overly Stringent'

New York—AFL-CIO protests against "overly stringent administration" of the adjustment assistance feature of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 were renewed by the Executive Council in a report to the convention and coupled with a warning that the program "must be meaningfully implemented."

Since the act is effective through 1967, its full effects will not be known until then, the council pointed out, but "meanwhile, administrative problems cause concern.

The report recalled that labor support for the act last year was conditioned upon inclusion of adjustment assistance sections to help workers and industries injured by imports. In testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee, the Executive Council continued, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized that organized labor would be compelled to oppose the bill if it were reported out without adjustment assistance. This feature was included in the measure that became law.

2-Way Protection

The protection applies in two ways:

- If the U.S. Tariff Commission finds injury under a so-called escape clause to an industry, the President may raise tariffs, impose quotas, and provide that firms and groups of workers may ask the secretaries of commerce and labor "for a finding of eligibility to apply for adjustment assistance."
- A single firm or group of workers may petition the Tariff Commission for a finding of injury; if injury is found, benefits become available to help workers and their firm to adjust to new problems.

Applications for adjustment benefits for workers in three AFL-CIO affiliates have been rejected by the Tariff Commission, the council observed.

"For workers," the Executive Council explained, "these benefits include weekly payments equal to 65 percent of the worker's average weekly wage or 65 percent of the average manufacturing wage, whichever is less; relocation allowances, retraining and extended benefit periods for workers in retraining and for workers over 60 years of age. All of these benefits are higher than those available under other programs and are financed through federal payments."

The council reminded the delegates that last August it warned that unless the "rigid interpretation," of the law is ended, the AFL-CIO "will be compelled to insist on amendment of the statute to prevent future misinterpretations of congressional intent and administrative avoidance of adjustment assistance to workers."

While international fair labor standards that AFL-CIO had urged were not included in the final version of the act, the council said, the Senate Finance Committee's report on the bill "would imply the necessity for considering them."

The report noted a 22-nation long-term agreement under which cotton textiles and articles made from them are subjected to "voluntary restraints" in an effort to avoid market disruption which the U.S. has suffered in such soft goods industries as cottons and textiles. Efforts to reach a similar pact for woolen products are continuing under the auspices of GATT.

The Executive Council also reported AFL-CIO support for extension of the Export-Import Bank Act as a help to promoting foreign trade. A compromise of disagreements over financing methods, the report said, "permits the bank to function effectively and foster more trade, with additional lending and guaranty funds, but delayed congressional decisions on new financing."

Investment Advice Stresses Safety

New York—Maximum safety of principal and avoidance of speculative activities guide the investment policies of the AFL-CIO Investment Dept., the Executive Council reported here at the convention.

A primary goal of the department, set up to offer advice and assistance to affiliates on the prudent investment of funds, is to encourage affiliated unions to invest a portion of their reserves through financing federally insured or guaranteed mortgage loans on homes and apartments, the council said.

The growth of reserve funds requires alert supervision by union officials performing their responsibilities as custodians of union funds or as trustees of welfare and retirement programs, the report pointed out. It added that the facilities of the department can be helpful to all affiliates with current investment problems.

GROWING GAP BETWEEN ACTUAL AND POTENTIAL NATIONAL PRODUCTION

In Billions—1962 Dollars

*AFL-CIO estimate

SOURCE: Council of Economic Advisors and AFL-CIO Research Department

Right-Wing Push Seen For State 'Work' Laws

New York—Efforts to outlaw union shop agreements through so-called "right-to-work" laws have intensified since the last AFL-CIO convention, the Executive Council reported.

The council attributed this resurgence to an alliance between anti-union business groups and the radical right movement.

Wyoming was cited as a case in point. A rightist-dominated Republican Party won firm control of the legislature and promptly enacted a "right-to-work" law, marking the first time since 1958 that a state had used Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act to ban the union shop.

A similar alliance is evident in Oklahoma, where a petition for a constitutional amendment prohibiting union shop agreements is pending before the State Supreme Court, the council said.

In most states where "work" forces have mounted active campaigns, they have been rebuffed by legislatures, under both Democratic and Republican control, the report noted.

In Maine, after the 1961 legislature defeated a "right-to-work" bill, the sponsors launched a petition campaign to force the issue to a referendum, but were unable to collect the required number of signatures. A bill introduced in the 1963 legislative session was killed by overwhelming majorities in both houses.

New Mexico was again a major target of a "right-to-work" drive and a bill passed the Senate, but was twice defeated in the House. Legislation was also introduced in Idaho, Vermont and Connecticut but made no headway. In Kansas, an enabling act providing for enforcement of the state's constitutional "work" provision was killed in the final days of the legislative session. The defeated bill also would have imposed additional restrictive labor legislation.

New drives against the union shop are under way in Pennsylvania and Kentucky, where state "right-to-work" committees have been formed, the council noted.

"The efforts and activities of the ultra-right wing are increasingly evident, particularly in the sparsely settled non-industrial states of the Rocky Mountain," the report said. "The success of their effort in Wyoming is an indication of what could happen in other states."

The report related the effort of labor and its friends in fighting the "right-to-work" groups.

An Executive Council subcommittee and an AFL-CIO staff committee have been assigned to the campaign against "right-to-work" laws in cooperation with state labor federations and local central bodies.

A citizens' group, the National Council for Industrial Peace, has played a major role in alerting public opinion to the threat to good labor-management relations posed by the "work" forces.

The Machinists, through their film, "Anatomy of a Lie," the council reported, have effectively refuted "vicious propaganda" in the anti-labor film, "And Women Must Weep," produced by the National Right to Work Committee and widely used by anti-union employers during organizing campaigns.

Active participation by all international unions and state and local central bodies in the fight against "right-to-work" laws is "increasingly important," the council report concluded.

Executive Council Reports:

'Massive National Effort' Urged to Restore Economy

New York—"A massive national effort" is needed immediately to restore the American economy's health and penetrate the problem of persistent high unemployment, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in its report to the convention.

The council noted that in the seven years between 1963 and 1970, nearly 30 million new jobs must be created to accommodate the rapidly growing labor force, compensate for labor displacement by automation, and wipe out current joblessness, which has exceeded 5 percent for each month of the last six years.

In the face of this need, "nothing less than a series of bold and positive government actions" is required, the council declared in its report on the economic situation.

"Job-creating measures are the nation's top priority requirement," the report asserted.

Specifically it called for:

- An immediate $10 billion tax cut, concentrated among low-income and moderate-income taxpayers who would quickly spread it through the economy in consumer purchases, lifting total national production by $20-$30 billion within about two years and adding as many as 2 million more jobs.
- "Increasing federal outlays" for needed public works, which would result directly and indirectly in 150,000 to 200,000 jobs for every $1 billion in added government investment.
- Reversal of the "tight money" policy instituted by the Federal Reserve Board in mid-1963, which may push up the entire structure of interest rates and endanger the domestic economy by discouraging expansion of demand for goods, services and manpower while promising "little, if any," improvement in the nation's balance of payments problem.
- An expansionary wage policy that will lift the buying power of real earnings in line with soaring productivity "to strengthen consumer markets and boost consumer sales."

"If the buying power of wages fails to advance along with the economy's increasing productive efficiency," the report declared, "it will be most difficult to achieve full employment and impossible to maintain it."

- A "more rapid pace" of reduction in work time, shorter workweeks, more holidays, longer vacations, to spread job opportunities in the face of surging automation and accelerating growth of the labor force. The council noted that it has urged Congress to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to cut the standard workweek and require penalty pay of double time for all work beyond 35 hours.

"Reduced working hours may not be the best way to create jobs," the report observed. "But cuts in standard working time, with no reduction in take-home pay, can and will spread employment opportunities."

- A national manpower policy "as an essential supplement" to expansionary fiscal, wage and monetary measures, to assist people and communities in adjusting "to the disruptions of rapidly changing technology."

Proposed Policy Detailed

This policy, the report said, should include among other things a new approach to worker retraining oriented to national rather than strictly local needs, development of the public employment service into a truly nationwide instrument, improvement of the area redevelopment program to attack specific labor market problems, government relocation allowances to help jobless workers match their skills to available job opportunities, federal legislation to end job discrimination against Negroes and other minorities, an educational system geared to the needs of a growing population in the midst of a technological revolution, and a system of federal standards assuring adequate unemployment insurance to tide workers over between jobs.

In addition to these prime needs, the council observed, further steps are necessary to reduce poverty and increase demands for goods and housing.

"The Fair Labor Standards Act should be amended to extend the minimum wage law's coverage to millions of low-wage workers who are not now protected," the report said.

"Hospital insurance, under the social security system, should be provided to retired older people. . . .

"Retirement benefits under social security should be improved to provide retired people with adequate incomes in their old age.

"A greatly increased program of low-rent public housing is needed for low-income families, many of whom now live in slums.

"Educational opportunities, including opportunities for higher education, should be improved to provide children of low-income families with a fair chance of advancement."

At the root of the nation's economic difficulties, which have produced "10 years of recurring recessions," the council observed, has been a "continuing lack of balance" between capacity to produce and lagging demand on the consumer and government levels.

Contributing to this gap, the report said, is a "basic contradiction" in national economic policies "all through the past decade." This has been evident, it continued, in government policies that, on the one hand, promote greater productive capacity through such measures as stepped-up depreciation allowances and investment tax credits, and on the other hand suppress the expansion of demand through restrictive fiscal and monetary policies.

"The resulting idle productive capacity, in turn, has discouraged business from a continuing rise of investment in new plant and equipment despite substantial and increasing flows of cash to corporations," the council observed.

It suggested that a major factor in this contradiction has been fear of the deficit in the U.S. balance of international payments, just as in the mid-1950s fear of "mythical pressures from non-existent inflationary shortages" were used to justify restrictive policies.

Problem 'Exaggerated'

While suggesting a number of steps the government should take to curb the outflow of U.S. investment dollars, the council nevertheless declared that the balance of payments problem has been "grossly exaggerated" and emphasized:

"It is not accidental that the balance of payments difficulty, which began in 1958, has been associated with persistent slack and rising unemployment in the American economy. Only a rapidly growing economy can provide the basis for a long-run solution of the difficulty. The strength of the dollar depends, in the final analysis, on the strength and growth of the American economy."

If the economy fails to show strength and growth, and continues its failure to utilize growing productive potential, the council warned, the result will be "mounting unemployment and increasing social disruptions from those whom society places in the role of jobless outcasts."

"It will also mean," the report continued, "the persistent loss of vast opportunities to improve America's education and health facilities, renew urban areas and reduce the poverty that prevails among one-fifth of the nation's families.

"This gap of under-employed productive potential—resulting from rising unemployment and short-time work, as well as idle plants and machines—is the deficit that should concern America most. This is the deficit that must be met quickly, to prevent a polarization of American society between those who are fortunate enough to have full-time employment and rising incomes and a growing group of unemployed and low-wage part-time workers."

Job Security Advances Stressed in Bargaining

New York—Significant union gains in collective bargaining over the past two years were marked by emphasis on job security as well as wage increases, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention.

The council noted that "the vitality and flexibility" of collective bargaining revealed itself in changing approaches to negotiations and in terms of settlement, especially in industries hard hit by unemployment.

A number of major settlements, it observed, gave special stress to workweek cuts, longer vacations, additional supplemental unemployment benefits, severance pay, production sharing payments, and improved health, welfare and pension plans.

Despite these adjustments and the fact that in 1962 total strike idleness reached its third lowest postwar level, the council recalled that "organized labor was faced with public and congressional onslaughts against this traditional union weapon for ultimate enforcement of its legitimate demands."

The report said, however, that while proposals were made in a number of industries to limit or even abolish the right to strike, "a more positive note" was sounded by the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy, which reported to the President that:

"Collective bargaining is an essential element of economic democracy. . . . By free collective bargaining, we mean the opportunity for labor and management to work out their own problems and to arrive at voluntary agreement concerning them. All members of this committee are convinced that free collective bargaining should constitute the primary procedure by which the essential terms and conditions of employment shall be determined. Indeed, this is today as it has been for at least a quarter-century, our declared national policy."

The council pointed to these general features of varying collective bargaining situations across the country during the last two years:

- Wage increases averaged about 3 percent a year, but these were partially offset by cost-of-living rises of 1 percent a year and their effect on the economy was mitigated by high unemployment and part-time work schedules in many industries.
- Hours reduction and longer vacations received major attention and resulted in 13-week vacations for senior employes every five years in some agreements.
- Production sharing and progress sharing plans were negotiated in steel and auto industries with a view toward more equitably distributing the gains from increased productivity.
- Negotiated adjustments to the impact of technological change included such provisions as improved supplemental unemployment benefits, retraining programs, severance pay, unemployment pools and early retirement.

September Stoppages Set New Postwar Low

September set another low post war record for time lost and number of workers affected by work stoppages, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said 550 strikes or lockouts involved 155,000 workers for 11 hundredths of one percent of working time—the lowest level for the month since September 1944.

For the first nine months of the year, the ratio of time lost to time worked was 16 hundredths of 1 percent, the second lowest level since the end of World War II, according to the report.

Council Notes Gains, But:

Labor-Backed Bills Still Awaiting Action

New York—Congress has made a start on programs to provide jobs for the unemployed and advance the nation's welfare, but major portions of labor's legislative program are still awaiting action, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in its report to the federation's fifth convention here.

Reviewing the congressional record of the past two years, the council took note of these accomplishments:

- Enactment of the Manpower Development & Training Act last year, "vigorously supported" by the AFL-CIO. The report warned, however, that the program faces "annihilation" unless the law is amended to eliminate the need for state matching funds next year.
- The accelerated public works program, financed with an $850 million appropriation, which has put thousands of people to work on useful projects in areas of heavy unemployment. This program, the council said, should be extended and expanded for another year.
- Congressional passage, climaxing a long campaign, of a labor-backed equal pay for women law which includes a guarantee that wages of male workers will not be reduced in order to achieve "equality" of wages for equal work.
- Approval by Congress of a proposal to build the world's biggest electric generating plant powered by atomic energy, using waste steam from the Atomic Energy Commission's plutonium reactor in Hanford, Wash.
- Strengthening of the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act by providing criminal penalties, urged by the AFL-CIO, for kickbacks, conflict-of-interest payments and embezzlement.
- Legislation assuring better and safer prescription drugs, based on investigations of a Senate subcommittee headed by the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.).
- Passage of a federal pay raise law which established the principal of annual salary review to bring and keep government pay scales up to the level of private industry for "comparable" work.

On the unfinished business list, of course, are the two big bills now before Congress—the tax cut bill, which has passed the House, and civil rights legislation.

The council report traced the progress of both measures in detail, and recounted the unsuccessful attempt to break a southern filibuster last year which blocked Senate action on a literacy test voting bill, and the failure of the Senate this year to change its rules to make it easier to limit debate.

Truth-in-lending and truth-in-packaging bills have not yet been able to get out of Senate committees, the council report noted.

The House Labor Committee endorsed an AFL-CIO-supported bill to include fringe benefits in determining prevailing wages under the Davis-Bacon Act and it is currently before the Rules Committee.

A group of bills to help migratory farm workers and their families passed the Senate; the House has yet to act.

The council report noted that the constitutional amendment to eliminate poll tax requirements in federal elections which Congress passed in 1962, has been ratified by 36 states—only two short of the number needed for enactment.

In another area of constitutional proposals, the council expressed concern at the progress through legislatures of what have been labeled the "disunity amendments."

These propose to change the method of amending the federal constitution, eliminating the role of Congress; take away from federal courts power to consider suits challenging the apportionment of legislatures, and establish a Court of the Union which would have authority to overrule the Supreme Court in cases dealing with federal-state relations.

All AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies should be aware of the "dangers" in these amendments and should "oppose them with their full strength," the Executive Council said.

MORE THAN 1,000 union craftsmen worked to complete New York State Maritime College's new $3 million dormitory and recreational center at Fort Schuyler, in the Bronx, in time for dedication ceremony. Shown at ceremony are cadets in training, alumni and guests before 650-student hall. The college is affiliated with the State University of New York, has its own training ship, the Empire State IV, at its own East River dock.

Local Centrals Number 773; 50 in States

New York—Fifty state central bodies and 773 local central bodies were under AFL-CIO charter as of June 30, the Executive Council reported to the federation convention.

During the previous two years, the report said, 10 local central bodies were chartered, 22 were disbanded and 51 were involved in mergers which resulted in 28 local central organizations.

The council also reported that as of June 30 the AFL-CIO had 299 directly-affiliated local unions with total membership of 62,000. This reflected a decline of 61 locals and 9,000 members since the 1961 report.

Over the two-year period, the council said, 20 directly affiliated locals with a membership of 11,293 became affiliates of international unions; 19 merged into a single direct affiliate; 22 with a total of 985 members were disbanded, and six with a total of 2,364 members had their charters revoked.

Fourteen new locals received direct AFL-CIO charters over the two years, the report said.

'Regressive' Trend Seen in State Taxes

New York—State legislatures have continued to put the burden of higher taxes on "families least able to pay," the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

In contrast to the federal government's tax policy, most states get the bulk of their revenue from "regressive" sales taxes, selective levies on cigaret and gasoline sales, and property taxes.

"Progressive taxes levied on the incomes of individuals and businesses in relation to their ability to pay" represent only a minor source of revenue, the council asserted.

The Executive Council noted that state and local governments finance two-thirds of the civilian public services in the United States, with the bulk of the federal government's expenditures related to defense. It is "increasingly urgent," the council said, that unions press for "a greater use of progressive taxes by the states."

In other areas of state legislative activity, the Executive Council took note of gains made in the fields of minimum wages, anti-discrimination policies, collective bargaining rights and anti-strikebreaker laws.

During 1962 Hawaii, Massachusetts, New York and Rhode Island all raised statutory minimum wages from the previous $1 level to $1.25, in two steps. Alaska adopted an escalator provision establishing its minimum wage, previously $1.50 an hour, at "50 cents an hour greater than the prevailing federal minimum," the council reported.

In 1963 sessions, New Mexico raised its statutory minimum from 75 cents to 80 cents an hour for general employment and from 65 to 70 cents for service occupations, and North Carolina raised its rate from 75 to 85 cents an hour, effective Jan. 1, 1964. Idaho boosted its minimum from 75 cents to $1, and Nevada raised its rate from $1 to $1.15 in two steps.

The Executive Council also reported:

- Enforceable fair employment legislation was enacted in Vermont and Hawaii and Indiana's fair employment act was strengthened by providing enforcement procedure. Iowa prohibited discrimination by employers or unions, with criminal penalties but without administrative procedure for enforcement. Maine and New York specifically banned discrimination in apprenticeship programs.
- Collective bargaining rights for various groups of public employes were extended through laws passed in Massachusetts, New York, Wisconsin, Oregon and Connecticut. However, a Georgia law passed in 1962 prohibited strikes by state employes and made it unlawful for any person to influence a state employe to strike.
- Laws curbing the use of professional strikebreakers were enacted or strengthened in Michigan, Massachusetts, Louisiana, Hawaii and Rhode Island.

Commercial, Blue Cross Plans Fail To Meet Health Needs, Council Says

New York—Commercial health insurance and Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans have proven inadequate to meet or finance the health needs of the nation, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

In its report to the federation's biennial convention, the council said the opposition of the American Medical Association and AMA-supported state laws hold back the needed expansion of prepaid group health plans.

The council recommended that affiliated unions seek to write into their contracts provisions for a "free choice" of health plans for employes which would permit them to choose comprehensive pre-payment plans over standard group insurance programs.

For the nation's senior citizens, the council declared, the King-Anderson bill providing hospital care financed through the social security system remains "the soundest, most equitable method of meeting this problem."

The council lashed the AMA for attempting "to confuse the public" and distort the facts on social security health care.

Terming racial bias in health services a "scandal," the council noted a Negro death rate from tuberculosis triple that of whites, and an infant mortality rate twice as great for Negro babies as for white babies.

The worst problem is in hospital care, the report said. This involves segregated hospitals, segregated facilities within a hospital and the denial of staff privileges to Negro doctors.

The council urged a multi-pronged attack on the "separate but equal" provision of the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act, under which many of the discriminatory policies developed. This clause was recently held unconstitutional by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals.

The report noted that medical trends have led to an increase in group practice plans—from 459 groups in 1951 to 1,400 groups in 1962—even against the opposition of state and county medical societies.

The AMA has come to accept prepayment and group practice but fights their merger, the report noted. Therefore, such operations as the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, Group Health Association in Washington, D. C., Community Health Association in Detroit, Kaiser Foundation plans on the West Coast and others which pay doctors by salary or by capitation represent a challenge to the AMA's economic control of health care, the council observed.

Its report also discussed the social security program, public assistance, the public employment service, jobless pay, workmen's compensation and the growth of pension funds.

Merger Talks Launched By OCAW and ICWU

Denver—Six-man committees representing the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Intl. Chemical Workers Union charged with attempting to work out an agreement to merge the two unions held their first meeting here.

The committees are headed by Pres. O. A. Knight for the OCAW and ICWU Pres. Walter L. Mitchell. Further meetings will be held under a resolution passed by delegates to the OCAW convention in August proposing a specific method of negotiating toward unification.

Decision Upholds Hoffa Indictment

The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to consider the claim of Teamsters' Pres. James R. Hoffa that he was improperly indicted on charges of jury tampering in Tennessee.

The high court's brief order let stand the rulings of lower courts that this issue should not be raised at this point. Hoffa's claim that the grand jury's selection excluded Negroes, Catholics, Jews, manual laborers and union members could be properly raised on appeal if Hoffa is convicted, according to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The way thus is cleared for the Nashville trial.

In Chicago, meanwhile, U.S. District Court Judge Richard B. Austin refused a Hoffa appeal for immediate trial or dismissal of charges that he fraudently conspired to obtain $20 million in loans from the union's pension fund. The judge set Feb. 3 for trial to begin.

Membership Put At 12.407 Million

New York—Affiliated unions paid per capita dues to the AFL-CIO on an average membership of 12.407 million for the two years ending Aug. 31 according to a report by Sec.-Treas William F. Schnitzler.

The report lists the paid membership of all federation-affiliated unions for the year 1955 and for two-year periods ending in 1957, 1959, 1961 and 1963, not counting the unions expelled in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt interests.

The totals listed were 12.305 million in 1955, 12.751 million in 1957, 12.671 million in 1959 and 12.482 million two years ago.

JAPANESE LABOR REPORTERS interview AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, seated left, following a luncheon in their honor by the AFL-CIO in Washington. The reporters, who cover labor news for more than 10 million readers in Japan, are studying the complexities of American labor and industrial relations. Samuel Amico, standing in rear, is escort officer for the U.S. Labor Dept., sponsors of the tour.

AFL-CIO's 'Organizing Mission' Stressed as 'Never Ending Task'

New York—The full resources of the "mainstream of American labor" must be devoted to meeting the challenge presented by the organizing mission of the trade union movement, the federation's Executive Council reported here.

"With every year," the council said, "the organizing mission assumes greater importance. To fulfill that mission is a never ending task and an ever present challenge."

Calling for an all-out effort to change the laws and procedures which permit employers to intervene harmfully in representation elections, the report said that, while unions explore more effective ways to assist each other in organizing and collective bargaining, "organizations specializing in anti-union techniques have mushroomed and prospered as employers turned to them for professional assistance."

Pointing out that the American work force has an unorganized potential of 29 million, the council said union success in Los Angeles and other areas have provoked sharp reaction and "today it is not the exception but the rule for the employer to wage an all-out campaign against his workers when they show interest in forming a union" for collective bargaining purposes.

For this reason, the council reported, "unions today must devote more time, more resources, more thought to campaigns than ever before," with special emphasis on the white collar and technical work force.

Greater Effort Needed

It is clear, it added, that "organizing among any group of employes . . . requires greater concentration and effective application of organizing resources."

Statistics of the National Labor Relations Board verify the statement that unions are stepping up their organizing activities, with 7,355 representation elections conducted in fiscal 1962, the greatest number of such elections in any year since passage of the Wagner Act, the report said. It added that unions won 59 percent of these elections, a 3 percent increase over the preceding year.

The effort of the NLRB, its chairman and its new general counsel to "restore NLRB to its proper role as a neutral agency, and to its proper goal of promoting collective bargaining as a necessary and desirable means of fostering good labor-management relations" has, the report said," played a definite part in the slight improvement in the total organizing picture."

This effort has provoked sharp attacks on the board, the council noted, by "professional reactionaries, the sharpness of whose response merely confirms the pro-management bias that marked the board during the previous national Administration."

The present board has been trying to apply to the "free speech" area of the labor law the standard of whether an employer's acts detract from free choice the council observed. In that regard, it has set aside elections in which violently anti-union films were shown to employes during union organizing campaigns.

'Union Busters Busy'

"This nationwide anti-union campaign continues," the council said, with "the union busters busy shaping means to improve their own tactics."

The report notes that, as a move toward coordinated organizing spreads, AFL-CIO central bodies are taking part as a natural outcome of the program initiated by federation Organizing Dir. John W. Livingston, and of area organizing conferences held under joint AFL-CIO regional director and central body sponsorship.

A recent development was a four-state conference on organizing in Dallas, Tex., sponsored jointly by the Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas state central bodies, the report observed.

Unions must improve their organizing position among the growing ranks of white collar workers, the council urged, and "continually re-examine their organizing programs and policies if they are to develop the appeal" that will bring this group into the union movement in greater numbers.

The white collar work world is clearly a necessary area for union effort, the council reported. It noted also that southern workers, in growing numbers, are "beginning to perceive that union membership is a necessary part of industrial society."

Council Previews Election:

Rise of Radical Right Seen Factor in '64

(Continued from Page 1)

tion can be reached by election day.

● The rise of the Republican Party in the South.

"There are no gimmicks or magic formulas for winning elections," the council said, and labor must play its role by expanding and refining techniques that have proved effective when applied with hard work in the past.

The 1964 campaign began for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education "the Wednesday following the 1962 elections," the council said.

Register-Vote Drives Set

There will be coordinated registration-and-vote campaigns in the large metropolitan areas "in which most of our members live," including the growing suburban areas that reapportionment is giving new significance.

Observing that the 1962 register-and-vote drive gained measurably because of an early start—February of that year as compared to August 1960—the council nevertheless warned that "the big city problem is not yet solved."

Registration drives in all major cities except Detroit and Philadelphia "were disappointing—notably in Chicago, Pittsburgh, New York, Los Angeles, Cleveland and St. Louis," it reported.

There were notable registration gains in many areas, and these vitally affected the 1962 election results, the council observed. One effect was to check 1962 losses in the House, it said, holding Democratic losses to four seats intead of a freely-predicted 20 to 40 seats.

The best-organized COPE registration drive "cannot stem an avalanche" such as occurred with right-wing successes in the Mountain States, but it can make the difference in the usual close election, the council said.

Successful major city campaigns depend on good ward and precinct organization, reasonable registration procedures, and the "involvement of the entire community in one concerted effort."

The AFL-CIO for years has hoped "that the emergence of a two-party system in the South would give the voters a true choice based on issues," the council said.

But while the Republican southern vote jumped in 1962 by 1.5 million (244 percent), GOP candidates "were generally on the far right wing" while "all but a few courageous Democrats jostled for a position to the right" of the Republicans.

On the civil rights issue, the council said, "the time has passed when any thoughtful American should expect to manipulate (it) for political gain." The stresses of change may still "produce pockets of irrational and unpredictable political reaction in all sections of the nation," it observed.

Of the 15 liberal senators facing election contests at the end of their first terms ("the class of '58"), the council said that re-election would "start them up committee ladders to positions of importance" and give them the benefits of "a natural law of politics which tends to lengthen the tenure of senators who survive the obstancle of election to a second term."

There will be senatorial elections in 12 states in which the right wing is particularly active, involving nine seats now held by Democrats, three held by Republicans, the council observed.

Some of the states were "fertile territory" for the radical right in 1962, "particuarly in less populous states where they captured control or increased reactionary membership in state legislatures, often almost by default," the report warned.

NLRB Termed 'Moderate, Impartial' In Contrast to 'Eisenhower Board'

New York—Employer attacks on the National Labor Relations Board's "new" majority, appointed by Pres. Kennedy, must be judged in relation to the "anti-labor record" of the former Eisenhower board, the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention here.

The Eisenhower board "was defeated in the Supreme Court" in "more than 80 percent of major cases" taken there by unions in the board's last year, the report observed.

The present board is "moderate and impartial," the council said, although having to make "sensible and constitutional interpretations" in cases arising from "the complex and often poorly drafted" Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959.

Labor "often disagrees" with the board's decisions in important cases, particularly in the secondary boycott and "hot cargo" fields, but "respects the board's effort to promote a fair and workable system" of collective bargaining, it said.

The council's report on court decisions and the application of the Landrum-Griffin Act cited these key observations:

● Supreme Court decisions during the past two years have involved basic questions on the enforcement of collective bargaining contracts, including such issues as union and employer suits against each other in state and federal courts. Many questions in this area remain undecided.

● In another decision the high court knocked out the Missouri public utility seizure law, the King-Thompson Act, as in conflict with the federal law's guarantee of the right to strike.

● In a Railway Labor Act case the court ruled that an "objecting" member can challenge expenditure of dues under a union-shop clause "for political purposes," as distinguished from services "germane to collective bargaining," but did not "try to draw a precise line" between these types of expenditures.

● The high court in a decision unfavorable to maritime unions ruled that the NLRB could not assert jurisdiction over union picketing of "runaway" ships—merchant ships flying foreign "flags of convenience" and manned by foreign crews—even though U.S. interests own and manage the ships and use them in U.S. foreign trade. State courts can, therefore, enjoin such picketing.

● The court ruled in two cases that unions need not prove an employer intended "bad faith" conduct against workers engaged in strikes or bargaining. If the employer's conduct is discriminatory, that is sufficient to sustain an NLRB decision holding him guilty of unfair practices.

The report noted that the NLRB has modified its approach to so-called employer "free speech" during union representation campaigns and looks at the "total context" of an employer's counter-campaign instead of isolated instances.

It also noted that the NLRB "has moved in several ways to make its remedies more meaningful" to victims of employer unfair practices, including an award of interest on backpay obligations and the use of federal court injunctions to protect workers pending decisions on NLRB proceedings.

The Landrum-Griffin Act's so-called "bill of rights" section has produced "slow pace" lawsuits, the council observed, confirming labor's view that the section was "unnecessary."

CWA Contract Wins Pay Hike In Long Lines

New York—A new contract providing wage increases and improved fringe benefits has been negotiated for 22,000 workers of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company's Long Lines Dept. by the Communications Workers.

The agreement covers workers in 43 states and the District of Columbia.

Wage increases of $2 to $4 per week for operators and $2 to $8 per week for plant personnel are provided, with two wage reopeners during the 38 months of the contract's life.

The contract increases benefits under a medical expense plan, reduces the employes' contribution for group life coverage, improves the vacation plan and provides pension increases.

The company is also required to pay one-fourth of the premium cost for a basic medical plan, increasing this to one-half of the cost during the life of the contract.

CWA officials said they expected membership ratification "because it is a very good contract."

Acceptance of the contract requires a majority of those voting in the entire department and would be binding upon all long lines locals.

The nationwide mail referendum is being carried out by the American Arbitration Association, which must submit a vote tally to the union in time for it to report acceptance or rejection to the company by Dec. 10.

Council Sees Labor Strengthening U.S.

Struggle for Jobs, Rights, Peace Advances Goals of Entire Nation

(Continued from Page 1)

tional Labor Relations Board decisions, and national and state legislation, and reports of headquarters departments and trade and industrial union departments.

Meany, summarizing the key economic, political and international developments, declared that the issue of "jobs for all" is the primary task facing the labor movement and that the convention will be asked to give its "full weight of endorsement" to the campaign for a 35-hour workweek with no reduction in pay.

"Chronic unemployment is a formula for national suicide and for the loss of freedom everywhere," Meany stated, adding that the solution of this problem would help meet the challenge to America not only abroad but also at home, where the current "peaceful revolution" for civil rights is entwined in the struggle for job opportunities.

Full employment can be achieved, Meany said, through satisfying the nation's need for schools, housing, hospitals and other public facilities and services and by reducing the workweek to absorb the jobless and those entering the labor market. The convention must devise "a broader and more effective drive," he stressed, although some gains had been made in the past few years.

The AFL-CIO president also reported a need to offset the intensive efforts of the "militant, well-financed force of extreme rightists" by expanding the register and vote campaign. America's social gains and democratic institutions under attack by organizations such as the John Birch Society, can be protected only by increasing the participation of all citizens in the electoral process, he said.

As to the 88th Congress, Meany declared it was too early to make an assessment while the current session is under way but that the

Within the federation, Meany reported the success of the internal disputes machinery, noting that "the so-called insoluble problem had been solved." Since the 1961 convention, 222 dispute cases have been handled and 126 were settled by mediation, 58 by determinations of the impartial umpire and in only five cases have sanctions been imposed.

Schnitzler reported that the AFL-CIO is sustaining its financial position despite a slight dip in per capita membership. He noted that the net worth of the AFL-CIO increased by $258,116 over the past two years. Membership of AFL-CIO affiliates based on per capita payments declined by about 75,000 to 12,407,000.

Priority to Drives

In the section on the labor movement, the report noted that the "highest priority" is being given to organizing drives, particularly in the white collar field and in areas selected for concentrated efforts by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates. In Los Angeles, the first area chosen, about 12,000 members had been organized by last July. The campaign started in January and the results have been encouraging enough to warrant a similar approach in the Baltimore-Washington area and in several other locations.

In the 22 months since the last report, AFL-CIO unions have won 4,797 elections out of 8,906 contests for a 54 percent record and have won bargaining rights for 336,800 workers. More than 2 million new members were added to AFL-CIO rolls in the past seven years, but total membership has remained virtually unchanged because of losses to automation, general unemployment and related factors, the report said.

The section on the national economy stressed that the government must put more money into the spending stream of the American economy to achieve full employment. A tax cut of $10 billion would be an immediate step in this direction, the council said.

The growth of unemployment during "10 years of recurring recessions" has not been halted, the report said, in part because government efforts to expand the demand for goods and services have been insufficient.

The council report urged "expansionary measures" to achieve and maintain full employment and urged the President to call an annual economic conference of the major groups in the economy to help achieve "maximum utilization of the economy's potential to produce."

For Stronger NATO

In its report on international relations, the council noted that the Russians and Chinese have utilized the "era of coexistence" to expand their Communist empires and called for continued support of the democratic nations of Western Europe and the maintenance of a stronger NATO force.

The council said the recently established American Institute for Free Labor Development has met with "remarkable success" and noted that it is creating educational centers throughout Latin America to train democratic trade unionists and to help resist the rising tide of military juntas.

In the area of social security, the report criticized the three-year-old Kerr-Mills Act as a failure in providing medical care for the aged and called again for hospital care for the aged through social security.

Unemployment compensation programs must be overhauled to provide for the longterm jobless and state workmen's compensation laws are totally unable to cope with modern occupational problems such as radiation illness, the report said.

The council drew attention to the nation's task of educating 26 million youngsters entering the labor market in the next 10 years and the great need for vocational training.

In a section on civil rights the council expressed satisfaction with AFL-CIO compliance procedures developed in the 1961 convention. At the national level the council declared that "hard-core resistance is crumbling" in the fight for voting rights, housing, jobs and public accommodations. It pledged the labor movement to continue "a major concerted effort to press the drive" for civil rights "to full realization."

On the "right-to-work" front, the report noted that anti-union forces are teaming up with extreme right-wing elements to seek new "work" laws. The first such law in five years was passed in Wyoming this year, but unions and aroused citizens groups defeated right-wing efforts in a number of other states.

The AFL-CIO will seek to alert the nation to the threat from the radical right, the report noted in a section on political activities. There are about 1,000 right-wing groups active in the country, the council said, and a trio of constitutional amendments has been introduced into legislatures, with as many as 15 states adopting one of the amendments designed to undermine the authority of the federal government and place control in the hands of rurally-dominated state legislatures.

The Committee on Political Education, the council said, poses "a liberal counterforce to the new wave of ultra conservatism battering at the foundations of our most cherished institutions."

In a survey of national and state legislation, the report ranged over 50 national issues on which the AFL-CIO has taken positions and testified before Congress.

Dealing with labor and the law, the report said that two-thirds of the important legal decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court over the past two years have been favorable to labor but that many important issues involving the agency shop and the Landrum-Griffin Act remain to be resolved.

The remaining two sections of the report cover the operations of the AFL-CIO's 13 headquarters departments and various constitutional departments. The reports of the trade and industrial union departments were prepared separately and incorporated into the Executive Council report and transmitted to the convention without approval or disapproval.

THE ETERNAL STRUGGLE for freedom is symbolized in the illustrated Hagadah, which contains the Jewish Passover service, presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by former Sen. Herbert H. Lehman (D-N.Y.), right, and Rabbi Louis Finkelstein, president of the Jewish Theological Seminary. The presentation was made at the annual meeting of the board of trustees of the George Meany Foundation of the seminary's Herbert Lehman Institute of Ethics.

Unions 'Leading Force' In Civil Rights Thrust

New York—The year 1963 will go down in American history as "the year of the big forward thrust in the advancement of civil rights," and the labor movement has been "a leading force" in that drive, the Executive Council declared in its report to the AFL-CIO convention here.

The council noted that labor's role in the nation's drive for equal justice, equal opportunity and equal rights for all had been reinforced by "a forthright and vigorous" mandate from the 1961 AFL-CIO convention.

Instrumental in carrying out that mandate, it said, have been the reconstituted and expanded Standing Committee on Civil Rights, headed by Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, and the special five-man committee under the chairmanship of Pres. George Meany appointed last July to carry labor's civil rights struggle into the nation's major cities.

On the legislative front, the council observed, the federation mobilized strong labor support for enactment of an equal employment opportunities act, binding on unions as well as employers, and for the entire civil rights program of Pres. Kennedy now before Congress.

But the AFL-CIO's "central civil rights effort" in the past two years, the report said, "was to eliminate the remaining pockets of discrimination in trade unions' own ranks and to win communitywide support for social and economic justice for everyone regardless of religion, nationality or the color of one's skin."

Developments Listed

It cited these major developments and trends among others:

- Prompt action by affiliates to resolve the "relatively low number of complaints" of discrimination brought to the attention of the Standing Committee on Civil Rights.
- Amendment of a number of collective bargaining contracts as directed by the last convention to end separate lines of seniority based on race, and in some cases the filing of complaints against employers with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.
- Mergers of segregated locals in 21 international unions, three of which reached 100 percent elimination of segregation among their members. This brought to 106 the number of AFL-CIO affiliates with no segregated locals, and negotiations toward this goal are continuing in the remaining 24.
- Success of a number of state central bodies in the South in breaking down racial barriers in hotels through their insistence on completely desegregated facilities for their meetings, in accordance with a directive by Meany.
- Close liaison between the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and the President's Committee in an effort to promote full compliance with the President's executive order dealing with equal job opportunity under federal contracts.
- A four-point program adopted by the presidents of the 18 unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. designed to end discrimination in admission to membership, job referrals and apprenticeship training.

AFL-CIO Return to New York Hailed by Rockefeller, Wagner

New York—This nation has no need for so-called "right-to-work" laws, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R-N. Y.) told the AFL-CIO convention here in a welcoming speech.

Like New York City's Mayor Robert F. Wagner who spoke earlier, Rockefeller described himself as a friend of labor and said he will "fight any effort to alter the historic position" of the state Republican Party on a "work" law. He will also "fight to assure that the national Republican platform next year again declares my party in opposition" to a federal right-to-work law "and that its candidate, whoever he may be, shall live by this commitment," he said.

Wagner welcomed the convention to the city where the 1955 AFL-CIO merger convention was held—a "labor town which values and respects not just labor, but organized labor."

New York City is a place where labor "participates in government, gets a fair hearing and a fair shake from the city government," the mayor said, and labor "can be proud as it looks back on its achievements." In some states, he remarked, as a "reward" for its accomplishments, labor's return is a right-to-work law sponsored by "hatchetmen who are your friends on Labor Day but are not around" when other help is needed.

Instead of a reactionary movement against labor, we need to return to the spirit of "the law of which I am proud—the Wagner Act," he said. The Mayor's father, the late Sen. Robert F. Wagner, Sr., was the sponsor of the act.

Rockefeller told the convention "I believe in the American labor movement" and the "American dream," and "I do not believe the labor movement has had its day."

"I most emphatically oppose" those of the far right or far left who would destroy the free labor movement," he said.

Making his appearance shortly atfer declaring himself publicly as a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, Rockefeller declared the country's first order of business "must be to create jobs—20 million new jobs in the next five years." An essential first step, he observed, is "the enactment of properly designed tax reductions, combined with strict expenditure control."

On so-called "right-to-work" laws, Rockefeller said the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively is the law of the land and of New York State.

"When a union is legally certified as a bargaining agent under the law, it means it has won a majority of the workers. It then bargains—as is required by law—on behalf of all employes in the bargaining unit.

"I do not call this compulsory unionism. I call this the American tradition of majority rule after freedom of choice."

THE AFL-CIO PRESENTS
Edward P. Morgan
AND THE NEWS
MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY — 7 P.M. E.S.T.
ABC

Meany Warns of 'Curse' of Automation

Calls on Convention To 'Wake up Nation'

(Continued from Page 1)

a very minor or fringe aberration in the trade union movement."

He pointed to the progress—"not enough" but substantial progress—in the field of civil rights, the special labor task force working at the community level and the drive to wipe out the areas of discrimination in the trade union movement. "We have to lead this fight," he stressed, and labor's past record shows "we are able and willing to lead the fight."

In the international field, the federation president praised Pres. Kennedy for his "patience and persistence" in negotiating with the Communist bloc while stressing vigilance and strength. Meany assailed those who indulge in "wishful thinking" on negotiations with the Communists as well as those "prisoners of panic and pessimism" who would paralyze American foreign policy for fear of negotiation.

'Unreal' Viewpoint

"We must reject this viewpoint as utterly unreal in fact and completely false in its estimate and evaluation," said Meany, tracing the course of world events and declaring that the international balance sheet today "is not food for pessimism and panic."

On the question of organizing, Meany touched on both the difficulties and the coordinated programs worked out in Los Angeles and being inaugurated in the Baltimore-Washington area. The Los Angeles project, he said, "is not a howling success if we are going to count numbers, but it is moving forward and I am delighted with the cooperation we are getting there."

He reviewed the role of the AFL-CIO in the world labor field, noting its strong support for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its schools in Asia, East and West Africa, and soon in Mexico. He described the work of the American Institute for Free Labor Development which has grown to nine branch schools training over 1,500 Latin American trade union leaders and supporting Alliance for Progress projects.

Jobs Still Key Issue

Domestically, he emphasized strongly, the number one problem is jobs and the continued failure of the economy to provide employment for those willing and able to work. Even the official jobless rate, above 5 percent for more than six years, doesn't tell the entire story. If all elements are included, the rate is closer to 8 percent of the work force, he said.

Unless the job problem is solved, Meany warned, "it will seriously jeopardize our leadership" of the free world.

The question of unemployment, he commented, always goes back to the question of purchasing power—"if it lags, our economy lags." Part of the answer, he said, is the minimum wage. The present $1.25 an hour is "a disgrace . . . it is impossible to live on in any part of the country." He added:

"This convention without question should declare for a higher, a substantially higher, wage and start a campaign to work for it."

Turning to automation, the federation president asserted that "there is no possible way out of this dilemma but the shorter workweek. The question is how short that workweek will eventually be."

Every big corporation in America, he noted, is "in a mad race to produce more and more with less and less labor without any feeling as to what it may mean to the whole national economy. The fact that they're reducing purchasing power in their own plants doesn't seem to bother them because they feel if they produce cheaper they will get customers some other place."

Meany warned jobs are being eliminated at the rate of "tens of thousands a month" and that competent experts are predicting that in a few years "all the production we need will be furnished by less than 25 percent of the manpower we have."

It was in the context of these critical problems that Meany put the "disillusioned friends of labor" to a close and biting examination. He noted it was a small group in terms of "membership" but that its "productivity is amazing"; that for authority and support they "simply rely on one another" in producing "the myths and fallacies" for public consumption.

Reviewing "some of the symptoms of our fatal illness," Meany noted:

- They tell us there are not enough strikes, that labor has lost its militancy and on the other hand that there are too many strikes that endanger the public and therefore strikes are out and should be replaced with compulsory arbitration.
- They say collective bargaining has been too successful and that union members are now middle class and no longer interested in burning social problems and on the other hand that collective bargaining is dead and cannot cope with present-day problems.
- They say labor is permitting too much joblessness from automation which is undermining labor's strength but then declare that there is not enough unemployment be- of union featherbedding.
- They claim unions neglect responsibilities in the field of civil rights but never have "an unkind word" about the powerful employers who are largely responsible for widespread discrimination in employment. On the other hand they say labor is "stupid" to be active in civil rights because it is handicapping organizing activities in the South.
- They say labor is too divided and its energies dissipated by internal bickering and then also claim there is too much unity, that an authentic split is needed to provide competition.

Meany commented: "I have some sympathy for the economic needs of the writers of these cracks. As the saying goes they must publish or perish. It's just unfortunate that they chose the wrong alternative."

THE JAM-PACKED BALLROOM at the Americana Hotel in New York was the scene of the opening of the AFL-CIO's 5th convention and Pres. George Meany's keynote address declaring that labor's job is to "wake up the nation" to the possibility of economic collapse with a positive program to boost purchasing power, including a shorter week and a "substantially higher" minimum wage.

Kennedy Asks Labor for Help 'Now' To Win Job-Creating Tax Program

(Continued from Page 1)

"The whole economic climate" is already affected, he declared, by the 4 million people out of work, by a rate of joblessness in the 1963 "year of prosperity", as "high as it was in 1954, a year of recession."

"That is why I think this issue of economic security, of jobs, is the basic issue, and I wish we would get everybody talking about it," the President declared.

In an immediate response, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Kennedy that the convention was "deeply grateful" for his message and the "sense of urgency" conveyed about his legislative program.

"Nothing I could say would embellish it," Meany declared, adding that the President said what needed to be said "about the problem as we see it."

Labor will do everything in its power, he pledged, "to help solve the problems in the days to come."

Kennedy came to the convention just one day after he had acknowledged in a White House press conference that his proposed tax cut bill and the pending civil rights bill might not pass during this session of Congress.

In what has been described as almost a "sit-down strike" by powerful and hostile committee chairmen, great sections of the Administration's—and labor's—legislative program are delayed if not stalled on dead center.

The President hit hard at the "powerful and articulate" enemies of his program. "They talk loudly of deficits and socialism," he said. "They are campaigning on a platform of so-called individual initiative. But they do not have a single constructive job-creating program of their own—and they oppose the efforts that we are making."

He was almost brutally candid in his description of the burden and sweep of the problem of joblessness.

We are still riding the wave of a long period of stepped-up economic activity that has jumped national production at a fast pace, put to work 2.5 million people, led to higher profits and wages—yet we have 5.5 percent jobless, he told the delegates.

"Productivity goes up so fast, so many millions come into the labor market, that unless we have the most extraordinary economic progress in the history of the country, we cannot possibly make a dent in the 5.5 percent jobless figure."

His audience at the AFL-CIO convention, "more than anyone," knows how much the country still must do, he said. The four million jobless "hanging over the labor market" make it difficult "for labor at the bargaining table to speak with force."

Some consider civil rights the number one issue, Kennedy acknowledged, and he agreed the nation "needs the passage of our bill if we are to fulfill our constitutional obligations." But, he continued:

Jobs First Need

"No one gains from a fair employment program if there is no employment to be had. No one gains by being admitted to a lunch counter if he has no money to spend. No one thinks much of the right to own a good home and to sleep in a good hotel or go to the theater if he has no work and no money."

Others may place education as the number one issue, the President said, and it is true that the nation "must improve its education." But "what concerns me almost more than anything else is the statistic that there will be eight million young boys and girls coming into the labor market in the '60s who have not graduated from high school."

"Where are they going to find jobs? Which of your unions is going to be able to put them to work, eight million of them?" he asked. "The best schools, the best teachers, the best books—all these are of no avail if there are no jobs."

The President acknowledged that "there are those who oppose" the tax cut bill, the youth employment bill, "who oppose more money for depressed areas and job retraining and other public needs."

But there were those who opposed all the efforts which were made during the '30s, under Pres. Roosevelt and in the administration of Pres. Truman, he pointed out. He pointed also to the sharp differences between the 1945-1963 period and the 20 years following the First World War, when the country had "staggered" through "an 11-year depression, a 2-year depression, 8 years of stagnation on the farms."

"It is no accident" that since 1945 "this country has steadily increased in wealth and strength . . . It didn't just merely happen," he said.

"It is because of the steps that were taken in the '30s to lay the foundations for progress in the '40s and '50s and '60s," he declared.

"It is our obligation in the 1960s to do those things in Congress and in the various states which will make it possible for others in the 1970s and 1980s to continue to live in prosperity."

We can "take real pride" in our job capacity and our economic activity "only when they are underwriting to the fullest extent" the programs "to improve our schools, to rebuild our cities, to counsel our youth, to assure our health, to care for our aged and infirm," he declared.

We need "hospital care for our older citizens" and "the facts are known" although the House Ways & Means Committee is opening hearings on the King-Anderson bill to establish such hospital care under the social security system, he continued.

"I cannot tell whether we are going to get this legislation before Chirstmas, but I believe that this Congress will not go home next summer to the people without passing this bill. I think we should stay there until we do," he said.

11-16-63

President Hails AFL-CIO As Spur to Nation's Gains

New York—"I express my appreciation to the AFL-CIO which, in the 1960s, is attempting to do what its fathers did in the 1930s in supporting a program of progress for this country of ours," Pres. Kennedy told the convention.

The AFL-CIO, he said, "can take pride in the actions it has taken, pride in the stand it has made, pride in the things it has done, not only for the American labor movement, but for the United States as a whole."

Citing Abraham Lincoln's 100-year-old comment "all that serves labor serves the nation," the President hailed the actions taken by the AFL-CIO "under the leadership of Mr. Meany, both at home and abroad, to strengthen the U.S., to support assistance to those who are trying to be free, to make it possible in this hemisphere for labor organizations to be organized so that wealth can be more fairly distributed."

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Nov. 23, 1963 | No. 47

AFL-CIO Mourns Kennedy, Pledges Support to Johnson

JOHN FITZGERALD KENNEDY

LYNDON BAINES JOHNSON

Texan Becomes 36th President

The AFL-CIO pledged its "full support" to the nation's new president, Lyndon Baines Johnson, as it mourned the death by assassination of Pres. Kennedy, declaring that "history is certain to regard him as one of our greatest presidents."

Federation Pres. George Meany wired a pledge of support to Johnson, the nation's 36th chief executive, immediately after the death of Pres. Kennedy in Dallas and Johnson's taking of the oath of office.

"In this hour of almost inexpressible grief," Meany said in his telegram, "on behalf of the AFL-CIO I want to express to you our full support as you undertake the grave duties of the presidency."

"We are confident that you will carry on the work of John F. Kennedy, which is of such tremendous importance not only to the people of America but to all the free world," his message said.

"In that mission and in your efforts to meet the many problems that will arise from our domestic and international responsibilities, you will have our complete backing and our prayers."

In a telegram to Mrs. Kennedy, Meany said, "No words can express our shock and grief."

"The President was a great man, and history is certain to regard him as one of our greatest Presidents," Meany said.

"He was a warm friend of all the working people of America and only a week ago it was our great honor and privilege to show him in person the warmth and affection in which we held him," the AFL-CIO president continued.

"To you and your children go the heartfelt sympathy of millions of workers who admired and loved your husband and who were the beneficiaries of his wisdom and courage and devotion to freedom. We shall always miss him."

Johnson, elected Vice President with Kennedy in the 1960 campaign, was sworn in as President by U.S. District Judge Sarah T. Hughes at the Dallas Airport just before flying to Washington to assume the burdens of his office.

"This is a sad time for all people," the new President said. We have suffered a loss that cannot be weighed."

"For me it is a deep personal tragedy. I know the world shares the sorrow that Mrs. Kennedy and her family bear. I will do my best. That is all I can do. I ask your help—and God's."

The new President, Kennedy and Texas Gov. John Connally were traveling together in a frankly political tour of the state, which gave its electoral college votes to the Kennedy-Johnson ticket

(Continued on Page 16)

Delegates Focus on 1964:

Convention Charts Program To Press Nation Forward

By Saul Miller

New York—The AFL-CIO emerged from its 5th convention here united in its determination to press forward with a program designed to provide economic security, freedom and equal rights for all Americans.

The convention focused its sights on the critical year 1964, the growing complex of economic and social problems, and the challenge to democracy by the radical right, and came up with a wide-ranging program keyed to the needs of all citizens, union members and non-members alike. (See Index Page 2).

The 970 delegates, who in five days passed on 253 resolutions and heard a dozen speakers, underscored their conviction that the solution to many of the nation's problems required decisions in the White House, in Congress and in the state legislatures by giving a top priority to a massive register-and-vote campaign next year.

Refuting charges by "friends" and critics that labor is in stagnation and disruption, the convention voiced faith and confidence in its leadership and broke new ground in mapping a program to meet the issue of chronic unemployment and job displacement.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, re-elected to a fifth term with Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and supported by a re-elected Executive Council, articulated the theme of the resolutions and the speeches when he said:

"We are the conscience of America. If the little people of America are to have a better life, we have to do the job."

Meany had told the convention earlier that labor's job is to "wake up the nation" to the possibilities of economic collapse, and the delegates tackled the task of putting to-

(Continued on Page 3)

Full 'Freedom, Equality' Stressed as Rights Goal

By John M. Barry

New York—A wide-ranging civil rights resolution rededicating the trade union movement "to the cause of freedom and equality for all Americans" was adopted unanimously by the AFL-CIO convention in a special order of business.

The convention set twin courses for organized labor in the struggle to achieve full justice in every sphere of national life for the American Negro and other racial minorities:

First, the resolution declared, "we must set our own house in order, removing the last vestiges of racial discrimination from within the ranks of the AFL-CIO."

Secondly, it continued, "we must cooperate with our neighbors in the general community to assure every American the full rights of citizenship."

Action on the resolution followed a stirring appeal by AFL-CIO

(Continued on Page 15)

15-Point Plan Adopted To End Jobs 'Lethargy'

New York—A 15-point program designed to arouse the nation from economic lethargy and bring it to "sustained full employment," was adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

"No simple cure-all, easy panacea or one-shot gimmick" can heal the ills that have kept more than 5 percent of the American work force unemployed for six years, the convention declared.

"A comprehensive and massive job-creating effort is required without delay," rationally fitting together separate actions needed on many fronts "into a coherent program . . . commensurate with the dimensions of the problems we confront," the resolution on the national economy emphasized.

To direct this program—which would include among other things the $11 billion tax cut proposed by the Kennedy Administration, a shorter workweek, a $2 minimum hourly wage and expanded coverage—the convention called for creation of a national planning agency, involving the democratic participation of all elements of the population.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany observed that the resolution

(Continued on Page 5)

THE MESSAGE IS CLEAR in this fashion show produced by the Ladies' Garment Workers for the National Auxiliaries of AFL-CIO unions. The large audience reviewed the latest in dresses, evening wear, swimsuits and sleepwear and was urged to "look for the union label."

$400,000 Libel Suit Hits AMA; Steel Unionist Charges 'Fraud'

New York—A Steelworkers' official, with the full backing of his union, has sued the American Medical Association for $400,000 in damages, charging that its American Medical Political Action Committee libeled him by distributing a fraudulent recording purporting to present his voice and depicting him "as a tough-talking bully and extortionist."

Paul Normile, a member of the USWA executive board and director of the union's Dist. 16 in Allegheny County, Pa., also asked that the AMA and AMPAC be enjoined from further distribution of the record and be required to destroy all copies of it.

Normile declared in an affidavit filed with the suit that not only was the voice on the recording not his, but that he had never made the speech attributed to him or any speech of a similar nature.

He seeks $100,000 in compensatory damages on the libel count, a like amount for invasion of privacy and $200,000 in punitive damages.

Filing of the suit in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D. C., was announced to AFL-CIO convention delegates by Pres. George Meany.

Meany Charges Fraud

Meany labeled the AMPAC recording "an absolute fraud." He noted that AMPAC, the AMA's counterpart of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, had been formed as part of the medical organization's bitter fight to prevent the enactment of a hospital insurance program for the aged financed under social security.

"The AMA has a perfect right to oppose the King-Anderson bill, which we are supporting," Meany said, "or they have a perfect right to oppose any plan that we may support, but they do not have a right, in my book, to forgery or fraud."

At a news conference, a tape of the AMPAC recording and another presenting Normile's actual voice were played for reporters and Normile was present in person to answer their questions.

"It takes no expert to recognize that this purported speech of an executive board member of our union is an electronic fabrication," USWA Pres. David J. McDonald declared. "It smacks strongly of the photographic fakery practiced years ago."

USWA Counsel David E. Feller, who is representing Normile in the case, said the AMPAC recording had been played to groups of doctors and other persons to portray Normile and other representatives of organized labor unfavorably and to encourage physicians to contribute funds to AMA's campaign against old-age social security hospital insurance.

The complaint notes that the AMPAC recording, titled "AMPAC brings you the voice of COPE," is attached to a booklet describing the plastic record as "a transcription of a meeting held early in 1963 by the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) in Allegheny County, Pa," and listing the speaker as "Paul Normile, COPE chairman of the Allegheny Labor Council and director of Dist. 16, United Steel Workers."

The booklet states that the transcription was obtained from "a COPE member" who opposes COPE's "high-pressure" methods.

Threats on Disc

The record reproduces a speech by a person introduced as Normile who addresses "brother COPE leaders of Dist. 16" and announces that "our kick-in tab for '63 is 146,000 bucks . . . a buck for each USW rank-and-filer in the Allegheny County Labor Council. No ifs, ands or buts."

The complaint charges that the record portrays Normile as a "tough-talking bully who uses strong-arm tactics to obtain money to 'knock out' the 'docs' and to promote the medicare bill." The person introduced as Normile, the complaint states, is heard directing USWA representatives "to threaten workers with 'the graveyard shift' if they refuse to 'kick in.'"

In his affidavit declaring that he had never made the speech nor any such speech, Normile stated that he had "certainly never authorized or given permission for such use of my name by AMA, AMPAC or anyone else."

"The imputation to me of the statements contained in this record has had, and will continue to have, the most adverse consequences for me, my reputation, my official career, and my state of mind," Normile said.

"Particularly disturbing is the attribution to me of remarks authorizing, approving, indeed urging that employes be coerced into making political contributions, even to the extent of threatening interference with their employment rights; and the depiction of me as a tough-talking bully who uses 'strong-arm' tactics to get his way. Such tactics are offensive to me, as they are to all the officials I respect in the labor movement."

At the news conference, McDonald observed that not only did the voice, inflections and choice of words reveal the person on the record not to be Normile, but a number of other false notes were apparent in the content.

He said that while Normile actually was COPE chairman for the County Labor Council—lending credibility to the record—there are no "COPE leaders" in USWA Dist. 16 because the Steelworkers have retained the title "Political Action Committee"—PAC—for the organization that solicits voluntary political contributions within the union.

Another example, he said, is the use of the term "shop steward," a phrase foreign to the nomenclature of the steel union, which has "grievance committeemen" instead.

AMPAC Figures Off

As for the reference to 146,000 USWA members in Allegheny County, Normile said the actual figure is closer to 90,000, some 52,000 of whom are in locals affiliated with the County Labor Council and only 24,000 of whom are in USWA Dist. 16.

"I wish we were fortunate enough to collect a (COPE) dollar from every member, but we are not," McDonald observed. He said the best union has been able to do in COPE collections is 20 to 25 percent.

Feller said that when the existence of the AMPAC record became known, a USWA staff representative in Dist. 16, George Radulovich, personally obtained three copies of it and a tape by requesting them at AMPAC's national headquarters in Chicago.

He also reported that at least one union official, Burt Beck, publicity director of the Clothing Workers, had received a copy in the mail from the AMA. Both Radulovich and Beck have signed affidavits that accompany the complaint.

Convention Affirms Union Label Ruling

New York—A policy decision by the AFL-CIO Executive Council that all affiliated unions have a right to use their own label was affirmed by the convention. The action was opposed in a speech by Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union.

Delegates adopted a recommendation by the Resolutions Committee for non-concurrence in a resolution introduced by ITU delegates.

No Reason for Delay:

'First Priority' Asked For King-Anderson

New York—"There is no conceivable reason for further delay" in enactment of a health care program for the elderly as part of the Social Security system, the AFL-CIO convention here declared.

The convention called for a number of improvements in the social security structure, but stressed that "first priority" should be given to passage of the King-Anderson Hospital Insurance bill.

For six years, the resolution noted, labor has been urging Congress to remove "the most serious threat" to the economic security of American families—"the unpredictable high-cost illness of the elderly." The resolution added:

"For six years, Congress has failed to come to grips with the problem. Every substitute—reliance on private insurance schemes and the shabby substitute of public charity offered by the Kerr-Mills Act—has been tried. The problem is still with us."

A 14-month study by the National Committee on Health Care of the Aged was praised by the convention as indicating "how social security and private insurance can complement each other" in meeting the problem of financing health care. The committee's recommendations, the convention said, should be given careful consideration by the House Ways & Means Committee, now conducting health care hearings.

The convention also endorsed these other improvements in social security benefits:

Other Proposals

- Expansion of disability insurance to cover temporary as well as permanent disability.
- Raising the taxable wage base for computing social security benefits from the present $4,800 limit to at least double that amount. This, the resolution said, "would permit an increase of 67 percent in the maximum benefit and provide additional revenue to the system to finance other needed improvements."
- Inclusion of earnings from tips for social security tax and benefit purposes. Present exclusion of income from tips deprives more than a million workers of full benefits, the resolution pointed out.

The convention considered a number of resolutions dealing with proposals to reduce the retirement age and directed a study by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security of "the many economic and social factors which relate to the issue of the retirement age." The staff study and recommendations will be referred to the Executive Council.

While age 65 "has been considered the normal age of eligibility for retirement on pensions for many decades," the report noted, the figure is "arbitrary" and "its appropriateness is subject always to reevaluation in the light of changing circumstances."

The report cautioned, however, that a lowered retirement age can't be regarded as a "panacea" for economic problems and that "alternative methods of reducing the total working time must also be taken into account."

In a separate resolution, the convention called for a major expansion of programs and facilities to cope with mental illness, described as "America's No. 1 health problem."

It praised the government's program for comprehensive community mental health centers, built and financed with federal funds, and expressed regret that Congress limited the program by denying federal funds for the initial staffing.

In a resolution dealing with vocation rehabilitation, the AFL-CIO urged that both the federal government and the states provide more funds for public programs to improve and expand training of handicapped workers.

Index to Convention News

	Page
Civil Rights	1, 15
Economic Policy	1, 5
Health Care for Aged	2
Internal Disputes Plan	3
Civil Liberties	3
Unemployment Compensation	4
Manpower & Training Program	4
Workmen's Compensation	4
35-Hour Workweek	5
Election of Officers	5
$2-an-Hour Minimum Wage	6
Union Label	6
General Board Session	6
'Right-to-Work' Laws	7
Address by Sec. of Labor Wirtz	7
Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund	9
Higher Wage Policy	10
State-Central Body Affiliation	10
Expelled Unions	10
Rail Arbitration	10
Missile Sites Peace	10
Organizing Program	11
Taft-Hartley & Landrum-Griffin Acts	11
U.S. Foreign Policy	12
Trade Adjustment Needs	12
Fraternal Delegates	13
Aid to Education	14
Community Service	14
Politics & Congressional Reform	16

Convention Charts Program for Nation

Jobs, Rights, Politics Receive Major Emphasis at Sessions

(Continued from Page 1)

gether a program to prevent a "national catastrophe."

Wage-Hour Drive Set

They voted unanimously to open a major drive for a $2 minimum hourly wage and extension of coverage of the Wage-Hour law to 16 million low-paid workers presently exempt.

They shouted approval of a resolution to cut the workweek to 35 hours and set up a standard of double-time for overtime.

They voiced strong support for a 15-point economic program, including the minimum wage and workweek elements, that would lift the nation out of economic lethargy and bring it to "sustained full employment." Included was a call for passage of Kennedy's $11 billion tax cut and stepped-up public spending to increase critically-needed consumer purchasing power.

In the second of three major problem areas, the delegates dedicated the full resources and strength of the trade union movement to "the cause of freedom and equality for all Americans" by "removing the last vestiges of racial discrimination from within the ranks of the AFL-CIO" and working in the "general community to assure every American the full rights of citizenship."

The resolution on civil rights, strongest ever adopted by any labor organization, followed a stirring appeal by Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph to strengthen labor's historic alliance with Negroes in their fight for full equality.

In the third area, the convention stressed as never before the need for intensified political education and action to stem anti-labor, anti-liberal forces in the 1964 elections. The federation's General Board, meeting to deal with how best to meet the political issues of 1964, concluded that greater effort and fuller utilization of trade union manpower was the key to the success of the campaign next year.

Western Unity Urged

In the international arena, the delegates made it clear that the "disarray" in the Western Alliance cannot be tolerated if the free world is to defeat the thrust of Communist totalitarianism and they called on the U.S. to "spare no effort to resolve the present disputes among the allies and to build an ever more effective and powerful western unity."

On internal problems, the convention took a close look at organizing the unorganized and called on all unions to provide more funds and manpower in coordinated programs to help complete "the major unfinished task of American labor."

The delegates vowed to press for wage and salary increases for those already organized to give workers a "fair share" of the economy's productive power and to help bolster the nation's economic growth.

And in face of the success of the two-year-old internal disputes plan, they voted to ask the Executive Council to consider proposed changes contained in resolutions and gave it the job also of securing relief for all affiliates from court decisions on situs picketing.

Guests from All Parts of World

Guests at the convention included some 300 trade unionists from all over the globe and 86 theological students and teachers representing all major faiths.

Working in long sessions in the ballroom of the Americana Hotel, before the television cameras, microphones and reporters from the world's news media, the convention demonstrated once again why the term "people's lobby" applies to the AFL-CIO.

A sampling of the resolutions adopted call for:

- A massive federal investment in education because America's schools are in a state of crisis.
- Enactment without delay of a hospital care program for the elderly as part of the Social Security System.
- A Youth Employment Act to ease the harsh impact of unemployment on teenagers.
- Action to protect the consumer through passage of "truth-in-lending" and "truth-in-packaging" bills.
- Major improvements in the unemployment insurance programs.
- A federal workmen's compensation law because the states have not met their responsibilities.
- Apportionment of state legislatures and congressional districts on the basis of "one man, one vote."

And there were many, many more, touching on every facet on American life. Many required further study and were referred to the Executive Council. The council set up four two-man teams to examine the proposals and make recommendations to the next council meeting scheduled for Feb. 18 in Miami Beach, Fla.

RETURNED TO OFFICE by acclamation, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany accepts return of gavel from Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, who had presided temporarily during the election.

Disputes Plan Changes Go to Council for Study

New York—A variety of amendments to the Internal Disputes Plan were referred to the Executive Council for further consideration by the 5th AFL-CIO convention.

The convention approved without debate a report of the Constitution Committee, headed by Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, calling for creation of a special subcommittee of the council specifically to develop language clarifying the intent of Sec. 3 of Art. XXI of the federation's constitution, which sets out the disputes plan. The section deals with established work relationships.

The committee recommended that the new group, to be appointed by Pres. George Meany, "should devote its attention to the problem of new work sites for the purpose of protecting established work relationships at such sites and to a clarification of the meaning and application of the requirement that work must have been 'customarily performed' by members of a particular union in order to establish a 'work relationship.'"

It urged a report to the Executive Council at the earliest possible date of "agreed-upon language for adoption as a policy resolution of the council which would be in the nature of a rulemaking interpretation so as to meet these problems in a manner consistent with the objectives of Art. XXI."

Resolutions to amend the plan were introduced by the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Metal Trades Dept., Maritime Trades Dept., Utility Workers and Sheet Metal Workers.

The convention approved also the Constitution Committee's recommendation that a resolution presented by the Pulp, Sulphite Workers on the handling of disputes between local unions of AFL-CIO affiliates in Canada be referred to the Executive Council with the understanding that the council "is empowered to waive the application of the disputes machinery of Art. XXI in the case of disputes between Canadian locals, branches or lodges of AFL-CIO affiliates when and if the Canadian Labor Congress adopts a plan for settlement of internal disputes similar to that contained in Art. XXI of the AFL-CIO constitution."

A resolution to increase the convention voting strength of state and city central bodies with affiliated membership in excess of 50,000 was rejected, as was a proposal to eliminate completely the Internal Disputes Plan from the constitution.

The Internal Disputes Plan was adopted at the 1961 AFL-CIO convention in Miami and from Jan. 1, 1962, through Sept. 30, 1963, handled 222 cases of which nearly 69 percent were settled by mediation.

Service Corps Gets Delegates' Support

New York—The AFL-CIO convention declared its support of the proposed National Service Corps, a service agency patterned after the Peace Corps, creation of which has been recommended by Pres. Kennedy.

An NSC would enable Americans to take part "in the fight against poverty" by working with American Indians, among migrant workers and their families and in big city slums, the resolution declared.

It said the NSC would allow selected men and women to work under local direction with professional personnel and partime volunteers. It also said the proposed NSC would not duplicate existing programs and would not displace local workers.

McCarran Act Revision Backed

New York—Legislation calling for "ultimate abolition" of the national quota system on immigration was strongly supported by the AFL-CIO convention, which endorsed legislation introduced by Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.).

Present immigration policy, said the resolution, is "discriminatory, unscientific and un-American" insofar as it provides arbitrary quotas favoring one portion of Europe over the rest of the world.

The Hart-Celler bills would be "a valuable first step" in carrying out AFL-CIO policy adopted at its founding convention calling for reform of the McCarran-Walter Act, delegates declared.

Radical Right Branded As Enemy of Freedom

New York—The radical right is concerned with "promoting reaction and not with defeating communism," the AFL-CIO convention declared, and "the John Birch Society, the White Citizens Councils and their ilk are communism's strongest allies."

The convention in a resolution on civil liberties and internal security warned that freedom is under attack from both the radical right and the radical left. The "tiny but fanatical Communist Party" in the U.S., the convention said, is chiefly important as a recruiting ground for "spies and traitors" and can be handled by effective security measures.

But the AFL-CIO "flatly rejects" the notion that the way to fight communism "is to jettison individual liberties . . . and to adopt the very tactics which make communism abhorrent to those who believe in human freedom," the convention said.

The resolutions sharply rejected the doctrine that turning back the clock on social progress and reducing the powers and tax revenues of the federal government is the way to defeat the radical left. It specified as examples recent proposals to abolish the income tax and emasculate the American constitutional system by giving state legislatures the power to rewrite the constitution and perpetuate rural, minority control over those legislatures.

'Nefarious' Amendments

The intent of the three proposed constitutional amendments pushed through some legislatures is "nefarious," the resolution declared, and "their consequences would be disastrous."

The Supreme Court has become a principal target of right-wing extremists because it "often stood forth as a courageous and vigilant protector of traditional American liberties and freedoms" at a time when "hysterical reaction was riding high in the congress."

"The AFL-CIO commends the Supreme Court for its continued stalwart defense of individual civil liberties," the convention declared.

The Administration "has shown more respect for civil liberties," the convention said, "than its predecessor," but added "it has had little in the way of an affirmative program to expand and protect civil liberties as it has civil rights."

Noting that the Administration has revised personnel security programs to give accused persons limited rights, the resolution added that "those rights are still unnecessary restricted" and that the industrial security program "is applied far beyond the needs of security," although there is a greater concern for "according fair treatment."

Wiretapping Curbs Sought

The convention had reservations also on the Administration's wiretapping proposals, terming them "overbalanced in the direction of facilitating police investigations at the cost of personal privacy."

The AFL-CIO believes that wiretapping by state and local police, as well as by private persons, "should be absolutely banned" and that federal agents should be allowed to wiretap only in cases of "espionage, treason and kidnapping" and only pursuant to a court order in each case, it declared.

The Administration's proposal for compelling testimony regarding violations of certain sections of the Taft-Hartley Act was similarly termed overbalanced toward prosecution at the expense of undercutting the privilege against self-incrimination.

340 in Press Cover Convention

New York — A total of 340 press, radio and television reporters, announcers and cameramen covered the 5th AFL-CIO convention, bringing the proceedings to the nation and the world.

Western Union reported more than 295,000 words were filed over its wires from the convention press room. Thousands more were carried on every major radio and television network. The deliberations were broadcast and distributed around the globe by Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and the U.S. Information Agency.

RESOLUTIONS AT AFL-CIO convention went through a committee headed by Vice Pres. George M. Harrison, left, chairman, and Vice Pres. David J. McDonald, right, secretary. Harrison is chief executive of the Railway Clerks. McDonald is Steelworkers' president.

Higher Jobless Benefits Pressed as 'Imperative'

New York—It is "imperative" that both Congress and state legislatures make major improvements in the unemployment insurance program, the AFL-CIO declared here.

Largely because of inadequate state laws, the federation said, "unemployment insurance is replacing only one out of every $5" of lost wages, and 30 percent of the jobless either cannot qualify for benefits or have exhausted their entitlement.

The convention also expressed concern at the fact that 14 states have cut back benefits during the past two years.

Every effort should be made, the convention said, to seek passage of the McCarthy-King bill providing federal minimum standards for unemployment compensation.

State laws, the resolution declared, should include:

- Coverage of all employes "except those in the most casual jobs," including single-employe firms and public employes. Low-wage earners should not be required to show longer employment than higher-wage earners to prove their attachment to the labor force.
- Computation of maximum benefits at 67 percent of average weekly wages, "stated as a percentage rather than a dollar amount to prevent erosion of the benefit" as wage levels change.
- Extension of benefits to at least 52 weeks through a combined state-federal program.
- Lessened disqualification penalties, except for fraud, so as not to exceed four weeks.
- Increased taxable wage bases to improve the financing of the program, coupled with either elimination or modification of the experience rating system which allows some employers to escape payment of taxes. The goal of financing, the convention said, "should be to underwrite an adequate benefit program, not to keep taxes low in state competition for industrial development."

The convention report noted that most states which raised maximum benefits in recent years merely restored the relationship to wages that existed a few years before, "leaving almost untouched the big decline in weekly wage protection that has occurred since 1939."

Federal Benefits Urged To Aid Injured Workers

New York—A federal workmen's compensation law was urged by the AFL-CIO convention because "the states have not met their responsibilities."

Reciting a long list of "shortcomings" of existing state legislation, the AFL-CIO called on the Administration to sponsor and support a federal workmen's compensation law or, short of this, federal minimum standards for state programs.

In a related resolution, the convention urged uniform nationwide standards dealing with occupational health and safety "so that workers will have the kind of protection they deserve."

Among the workmen's compensation standards all state laws should meet, the delegates said, are these:

- Compulsory coverage, with no exemptions for establishments with a minimum number of employes.
- Coverage of agricultural workers in the same manner as other employes.
- Benefit levels high enough "to maintain a decent standard of living for injured workers" with a ceiling "not less than two-thirds of the state's average weekly wage."
- Reciprocity of benefit rights between jurisdictions.
- Longer time limits for filing claims for occupational disease.
- Full statutory coverage of all occupational disease, including diseases caused by radiation.
- Full medical coverage, free choice of qualified physician, and authority to the workmen's compensation agency to supervise medical care.
- An exclusive state compensation fund, with administration by a state agency rather than the courts.
- Benefits for the totally disabled for the full period of disability.
- An appeals board with no administrative responsibility, with judicial review only on points of law.

The convention took note of pressure for legislation to reduce social security disability benefits if the recipient also receives workmen's compensation benefits.

"There is nothing inherently wrong in allowing a worker to receive more than one benefit if he had incurred a risk covered by more than one program," the AFL-CIO said.

The convention called on all affiliates to "actively oppose" legislation to reduce federal social security benefits by the amount of workmen's compensation received.

Business Leader Voices Concern:

Automation Job Loss Held Immediate, Human Problem

New York—A maker of automation equipment told AFL-CIO convention delegates that the new technology is destroying jobs every week by the thousands and that this and other human problems it poses "are at least as serious for business as they are for labor."

John I. Snyder, Jr., chairman and president of U.S. Industries, Inc., expressed the belief that automation "is necessary for this nation today if we are to produce and sell goods in the face of world competition" and that ultimately it can do "greater good" for man by relieving him of much of the drudgery he had had to perform.

"However," he declared, "I also believe it is in the best interests of all businessmen to work hard to solve the very real and immediate human problems that automation is creating.

"I want to sell the automation machines my company makes, and if our economy turns sour, if the unemployment problem is not solved, I will have difficulty selling them."

He urged "a greater degree of wholehearted cooperation" among labor, industry and government in the search for answers to the ills of automation, and cited as an example the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, of which he and Machinists' Pres. Al J. Hayes are co-chairmen.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a response to Snyder's speech, declared that the federation stands willing to work with all groups "in the closest possible harmony" to produce a solution to the nation's job needs.

Meany had introduced the industrialist as "the rare exception in business" for his belief that workers who lose their jobs to automation should not be "the sacrificial lambs of the balance of society which benefits. . . . He believes that unless we deal effectively with all of the adverse by-products of technological advance—including unemployment and all of its ramifications—that automation may well defeat itself."

JOHN I. SNYDER, JR.

'Total Solutions' Conditional

Part of the answer to automation, Snyder suggested, may lie in a tax cut, in imaginative collective bargaining and in a shorter workweek, but "total solutions' to unemployment, he went on, "are going to depend on total planning directed toward two major ends: first, the creation of new industries in this country; and second, the creation of new markets for our products."

As an example, he said, if the shorter workweek becomes a reality it will lead to new leisure-time industries that in turn will produce more jobs. Other new industries, new consumer products and services, he continued, may well lie in the thousands of industrial secrets locked in Defense Dept. files that could be released without endangering national security.

New Market Study

As for new markets, Snyder called for a study in depth of the needs of developing nations and an effort to become true "partners in progress" with them.

While some of the suggestions may not prove out, he observed, "they are examples of the far-out thinking that I am convinced is required if we are ever to solve the unemployment problem as we have it today, as well as some of the other mammoth problems which exist all around us on the globe."

The nation, he said, must overcome a "deep sedation" flowing from what he called "the fallacies of automation."

The first of these, he said, is the belief that automation is really not going to eliminate many jobs, whereas the facts show that it has been a major factor in wiping out upwards of 40,000 jobs a week.

"Automation is putting a hell of a lot of people out of work this year, and will continue to do so, increasingly, for a long time to come," Snyder predicted.

The belief that it will create a compensating number of jobs is another fallacy, he observed, declaring that if automation did require an operating and maintenance force as large as the force it displaces, "it would not make economic sense to automate."

'Rational' Training Plan, More Jobs Seen Urgent

New York—The nation needs a rational manpower policy, the AFL-CIO convention declared, but this goal is thwarted as long as high-level unemployment wastes the resources which current limited training programs are trying to develop.

A resolution on manpower policy and retraining called such legislation as area redevelopment, manpower development and training, and the trade expansion law all steps in the right direction.

But, it made clear, these individual programs do not constitute a rational approach in a national economy in which, "like the ebb and flow of the tides, industries come and go as technological progress reaps its reward and at the same time takes its toll of people and communities."

Progress has been made, the resolution said, but "above all else there must be a massive increase in the number of job opportunities in order to develop effective programs to aid in the ability of workers to adapt to changing conditions."

The resolution urged:

- That the Secretary of Labor strengthen the operation of the newly-created Manpower Administration within his agency.
- That Congress adopt pending amendments to improve the Manpower Development and Training Act, provide also for basic education for workers needing it and act favorably on a pending bill to provide relocation allowances and boost training allowances for jobless workers.
- That the manpower administrator run the retraining program as a national operation rather than as a series of local programs and recognize that today's job market overruns community boundaries.
- That the Secretary of Labor and the manpower administrator place priority on upgrading of workers already on a payroll and that Congress amend the law to provide incentives for on-the-job training programs.
- That top manpower officials recognize the need for a truly national public employment service and shape the employment service toward that end, and that the President require government contractors to list all job openings, outside of union-management arrangements, with the U.S. Employment Service.
- That the President and Congress recognize the impact of government spending on the economy and develop a program of adjustment aid to workers adversely affected by changed patterns of contracting.

970 Delegates Attend Convention

New York—The work of the AFL-CIO's 5th convention was handled by 970 delegates who met in committee and convention sessions for five days and disposed of 253 resolutions and a series of committee reports.

The delegates represented 127 national and international unions, six constitutional departments, 45 state bodies, 212 city and county bodies, 29 directly affiliated local unions and two fraternal organizations.

Delegates Hail Equal Pay Law For Women

New York—Enactment of the Equal Pay for Women law earlier this year was hailed by the AFL-CIO convention in a resolution calling for "realistic enforcement" of its provisions and passage of additional state laws to protect women not covered by the federal statute.

The convention also voted a strong endorsement of the report of the President's Commission on the Status of Women and called on the AFL-CIO affiliates to help implement it.

Other sections of the resolution:

- Urged additional federal funds for child care facilities.
- Asked liberalized income tax deductions for child care expenses incurred by working mothers.
- Emphasized the need for "maximum extension of coverage" of the federal wage-hour law.
- Opposed the so-called Equal Rights Amendment to the constitution "because of the destructive impact it would have on labor standards laws for women."
- Urged "renewed efforts by AFL-CIO affiliates to enroll women workers" and "greater recognition of women in union affairs."

'Time for Sharp Cut':

35-Hour Workweek Urged as Standard

New York—The AFL-CIO's goal of a 35-hour workweek without reduction of take-home pay was reaffirmed by its 5th convention here, which called on Congress to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to cut the maximum workweek and provide double-time pay for overtime.

"The time has now come," the convention said, "to sharply reduce hours of work in order to spread job opportunities. Chronically high levels of unemployment can no longer be tolerated."

The convention resolution described the economic problems that have made this "the decade of unemployment" in these terms:

"America's ability to produce is increasing at an unprecedented rate. But much of her manpower, machines and factories stand idle because potential consumers lack purchasing power."

While pressing for the "positive, bold and expansionary" measures needed to solve this problem, organized labor has an obligation to its members to explore other paths to full employment, the resolution said.

One such path, it declared, is the reduction of working hours without reduction in take-home pay.

The convention pointed out that the problem of unemployment is compounded by the tendency of employers to resort to overtime for existing labor forces rather than hiring additional workers. This practice should be curbed by requiring extra compensation for overtime work, the resolution said.

It urged pursuit of these objectives as a "high priority" on bargaining and legislative fronts and congratulated unions which already have succeeded in cutting work hours.

The convention suggested that negotiations toward reduced working time can proceed in many directions, including the shorter workweek, more holidays, longer vacations, earlier retirement, sabbatical leaves, and strict overtime controls in periods of joblessness.

Dir. Al Whitehouse of Steelworkers Dist. 25 said the three-month vacation plans negotiated by the union over the past two years in basic steel, aluminum and the container industries mean "at least 50,000 new jobs now, and that's just a starter."

He predicted that further reduction in working hours would come in the major industries, "not for moonlighting or to get another fringe benefit, but because we believe it is basic to the economy and the good of the U.S."

The resolution instructed AFL-CIO officers to provide "all possible staff assistance" to affiliates seeking help in negotiating hours reductions.

It urged Congress to:

- Extend the scope and depth of the hours-of-work study by the select House Subcommittee on Labor to provide a sound basis for legislation cutting standard working time.
- Explore proposals for automatic and flexible adjustment of the basic workweek under FLSA to maintain full employment "in the face of continuing technological change and fluctuations in demand."

ATTENTIVE DELEGATES, reinforced by standees, follow a high point in the proceedings of the AFL-CIO's 5th convention in the Americana Hotel, New York

AFL-CIO Leaders Win Unanimous Re-Election

New York—The executive officers and members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council were unanimously re-elected for a two-year term in the closing actions of the federation's 5th convention here.

George Meany was given an ovation as AFL-CIO Pres. A. Philip Randolph, presiding at the elections, announced his selection for a fifth term. Meany has been president of the AFL-CIO since its founding Dec. 5, 1955, and before that was president of the former AFL. (See Editorial Page 8.)

Elected with Meany was Sec-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who has served as the AFL-CIO's only secretary-treasurer since its creation.

The 27 vice presidents and members of the Executive Council were elected in a group on the nomination of Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes.

Meany was nominated by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, of which the AFL-CIO president is a member. The nomination was seconded by Pres. Raymond Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO, which Meany led for many years as president of the New York State Federation of Labor.

Schnitzler was nominated by Pres. Daniel A. Conway of the Bakery Workers, of which Schnitzler is a former president. The seconding action came from Pres. Vincent Murphy of the New Jersey AFL-CIO.

Elected to the council were:

Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, Harry C. Bates, William C. Birthright, James B. Carey, David Dubinsky, David J. McDonald, Emil Rieve, William L. McFetridge, Joseph Curran, Maurice A. Hutcheson, A. J. Hayes, Joseph D. Keenan, Jacob S. Potofsky, A. Philip Randolph, Richard F. Walsh, Lee W. Minton, Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge, O. A. Knight, Karl F. Feller, Paul L. Phillips, Peter T. Schoemann, L. M. Raftery, Paul Hall, Herman D. Kenin and John J. Grogan.

Hall, Kenin and Grogan were elected for the first time. They had been named to vacancies since the last convention.

At a meeting of the new council immediately following the convention, the following were re-elected to the Executive Committee:

Pres. Meany, Sec.-Treas. Schnitzler, and Vice Presidents Reuther, Harrison, Carey, Bates, McDonald and Dubinsky.

The executive committee will meet on the first Tuesday of every odd-numbered month starting in January.

The executive council holds quarterly meetings, usually in February, May, August and November.

Federal Inspection Asked for All Meat

NEW YORK—Federal meat inspection should be extended to cover all meat and meat products of processors engaged in interstate commerce, the AFL-CIO convention said. At present, 20 percent of the nation's meat supply is not subject to federal inspection.

Job Needs, Economic Planning Stressed in 15-Point Program

(Continued from Page 1)

stressed unemployment as the nation's Number One problem and "indicated the need for complete cooperation between all segments of American society to solve this problem."

He pledged the willingness of the federation's officers and Executive Council "to meet with the business organizations of this country, who must certainly be concerned, in an attempt to find a solution."

A number of the convention's major economic policy recommendations embodied in the resolution also were treated in separate measures. The "over-all wrap-up," in the words of Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther, represented an effort "to tie together all of the separate elements that go into the basic question of how does America get itself back to work."

"We have to reach ahead," he declared, "and we have to raise our sights . . . to develop new concepts in new approaches to deal with new problems, and to realize new opportunities."

New Mechanisms Needed

Reuther, who headed the subcommittee which produced the resolution and is chairman of the federation's Committee on Economic Policy, cited the example of the European democracies which "have freed themselves of a lot of ancient, obsolete myths" and have established "a mechanism by which they can achieve a measure of rational democratic planning."

"They have understood that you can have public planning for people compatible with private planning for profits," he declared.

Vice Pres. Paul Hall, head of the Seafarers, praised the resolution for pointing up contradictions and inconsistences in the nation's economic policies, among which he cited the "hullabaloo" over tax cuts to inject dollars into the spending stream while at the same time "we are tightening up money and making it even more difficult to obtain."

J. C. Turner, president of the Greater Washington (D. C.) AFL-CIO, also voiced support for the resolution and criticism of the Federal Reserve Board's action in mid-1963 to raise interest rates. He went on to urge the President to rally the people "to pressure the Congress to get this stagnated economy moving."

Reversal of the FRB's increase in the rediscount rate to 3.5 percent was a major point of the convention's economic program.

"America needs an expansionary monetary policy—an ample and growing money supply and relatively low interest rates—to stimulate economic activities," the resolution declared, adding that membership on the governing and advisory bodies of the federal reserve system, "now dominated by bankers and big businessmen," should be opened to all major sectors of American society, including trade unionists.

Specifics of Resolution

In addition to the national planning agency and expansionary monetary policies, the resolution specifically called for:

- Increased federal spending for public works, including a $2 billion extension of the public works acceleration act through 1964, stepped-up low-rent housing programs, and expanded programs of aid for housing, urban redevelopment, community facilities, mass transit, health facilities, and development and conservation of natural resources.
- Prompt enactment of the Administration's $11 billion tax cut proposal with amendments to concentrate its benefits among low and moderate-income taxpayers.
- Enactment of a youth employment opportunities program to provide "meaningful work for young people, 16 to 21 years of age" in conservation and public service.
- "A faster pace of increases in wages and fringe benefits . . . to broaden and strengthen the mass markets that are essential for an economy whose ability to produce more goods and services, more efficiently, is growing rapidly."
- An increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour and expansion of coverage to the 16 million non-supervisory workers now exempt "to lift the buying power of low-income families."
- A cut in standard working hours, with a 35-hour week as the goal, and payment of double-time for overtime "to spread job opportunities in this period of rapidly advancing productivity, accelerating growth of the labor force and intolerably high unemployment."
- Additional federal standards to extend the duration and raise the level of benefits to unemployed workers, with the federal government supplying supplemental benefits at this duration and level over the interim period.
- A national manpower policy "to assist working people and communities to adjust to the disruptions of rapidly changing technology," including an effective nationwide U.S. Employment Service, a genuine retraining program to upgrade the skills of the work force, an effective program to rehabilitate the economic health of chronically distressed industrial communities, adequate systems of vocational and general education, and federal relocation allowances to assist unemployed workers who wish to move to areas of job opportunities.
- Appointment by the President of a commission on automation and creation of a technological clearing house to gather information on technical changes, actual and planned, and their impact on the economy.
- An "all-out war on the shameful persistence of poverty" among 20 percent of America's families, including such specific measures as a higher minimum wage and expanded coverage, higher social security benefits with a reduced retirement age and old-age hospital insurance, improved unemployment compensation, adequate assistance payments to economically distressed families, expansion of low-rent public housing, and adequate opportunities for the education, including higher education, of low-income families.
- Measures to solve the international balance of payments problem, within the context of expansionary domestic policies to eliminate the economy's slack and sustain full employment.

Convention Hails FEC Rail Strikers

New York—Striking employes of the Florida East Coast Railway were hailed for their "gallant struggle against the greatest odds" in a convention resolution which urged AFL-CIO affiliates to extend them all assistance possible. The railroad's non-operating employes struck Jan. 23 and operating workers have respected their picket lines.

In a related resolution, the convention noted that the Alfred I. duPont estate, which has financial control of the railroad and other important Florida enterprises, is exempt from the Bank Holding Company Act through a loophole in the law.

The convention urged Congress to close this loophole, which enables the estate to exercise "immense and unjustified industrial, financial and political power" in Florida.

GENERAL BOARD OF AFL-CIO hears a report from COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan at a meeting keyed to an all-out register-and-vote drive for the 1964 elections.

General Board Session Stresses Voting Drive

New York—An all-out 1964 register-and-vote drive keyed to full utilization of trade union manpower emerged as the major theme of the AFL-CIO General Board meeting here.

The 167-member body reviewed the record of the 1960 and 1962 register-and-vote campaigns and reached a general consensus that a greater effort is needed in 1964. Special emphasis was placed on the need for a fulltime officer assigned to political activity in every union and a person in every local union to implement the program.

The convention had approved earlier a resolution calling on each local union to appoint a person responsible for registering the unregistered and getting out the vote on election day.

At the meeting of the board—composed of a general officer of each AFL-CIO affiliate, the Executive Council and an officer of each constitutional department—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the appointment of Roy L. Reuther as national director of the federation's 1964 register-and-vote campaign.

Reuther, who will serve within the AFL-CIO Committee for Political Education (COPE), directed the 1962 campaign. Administrative assistant to the president of the Auto Workers and director of the UAW Legislative Dept., Reuther will be on leave of absence during his AFL-CIO service.

The board heard a review of the current status of COPE activities from National Dir. Alexander Barkian, and a rundown on the registration and voting patterns of the 1960 and 1962 campaigns from Reuther.

It heard an appeal from Meany for each union to put the necessary manpower to work to assure the greatest possible number of eligible voters and the largest turnout of voters.

The register-and-vote campaign is to be financed by a voluntary 5-cents-per-member assessment voted by the Executive Council in October.

The campaign will direct its major attention to the registration of trade union members and their families, including activity in states and congressional districts considered marginal or likely to change political complexion in the election.

In addition to mobilizing manpower, it will seek reform of state and local laws now making it difficult to register. These include poll taxes, discriminatory literacy tests, limited hours for registration and unreasonable residence requirements as well as changes in permanent registration laws to prevent unnecessary dropping of voters from the poll lists.

The sense of the discussion at the board meeting was that the labor movement is being challenged on the political front by those who would weaken or destroy it and that labor must fight back by insuring the greatest possible participation in political decision-making.

The best single weapon that labor has in this struggle, the discussion indicated, is manpower enlisted on the side of citizenship.

'Redoubled' Support Pledged Union Label

New York—The AFL-CIO pledged to "redouble its support" of the union label program in a resolution adopted by the federation's 5th convention here as the "sometimes silent picket lines or almost hidden organizers which can bring thousands of non-union workers into the fold of organized labor."

The resolution also reaffirmed the fullest support of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and backed the union label programs conducted by individual affiliates.

The union label, the shop card, the store card and the service button "are the symbols which rally the vast purchasing power of union people and their families and friends and tell the unfair employer that we will not buy his products or patronize his services," the resolution said.

Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, chairman of the convention's Label Committee, told the delegates that the union label "represents one of labor's mightest weapons, its own power as consumers." AFL-CIO members and their families, said Potofsky, spend more than a quarter of all the money spent for consumer goods in the U.S.

The convention also adopted resolutions:

- Inviting all affiliates to take part in the 1964 AFL-CIO union-industries show to be held in Louisville, Ky., May 22-27, 1964.
- Designated Sept. 7-13, 1964, and Sept. 6-12, 1965, as Union Label Week for those years and called on all union members to observe the week in honor of the union label, shop and store card.

Labor Backs Equal Rights In Balloting

New York—Calling for equality of citizenship at the polls, the AFL-CIO convention demanded an end to "malapportioned state legislatures and congressional districts" which deny fair representation to people who live in urban areas.

In the absence of corrective legislative action, "Americans have the right to expect relief from the federal courts," the convention declared. A series of significant apportionment cases was being argued before the Supreme Court while the convention was in session.

The rural minority—some 30 percent of the population—still controls most state legislatures and has disapportionate influence in the U.S. House of Representatives, the resolution noted.

This, it declared, is because "one form of malapportionment feeds another . . . it is the rurally-dominated state legislatures which have control over the apportionment of congressional districts."

The convention endorsed a bill by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) which would require congressional districts to be "of reasonably equal population and of compact boundaries."

It criticized inadequate "token" legislative redistricting following the Supreme Court's 1962 reapportionment decision and declared:

"Only through congressional action, presidential leadership, enlightened court decisions and public demand can truly representative apportionment become a reality, with every citizen possessing equal strength at the ballot box and in the voting booth. Only when the concept of one man, one vote is fully observed will democracy be fully achieved."

Federal Act Urged On Strikebreakers

New York—A federal law barring the use of imported strikebreakers during a labor dispute was urged by the AFL-CIO convention "to protect the citizens of the U.S. from goons, racketeers and other unsavory characters."

The resolution urged also a continuation of the campaign seeking similar laws in states and municipalities. A drive by the printing and related trades has resulted in the passage of citizens' job protection laws by 10 states and 28 municipalities.

The proposed federal statute would make it illegal to recruit, import, train or hire professional strikebreakers.

16 Million Need Coverage:

$2-an-Hour Urged As Wage Floor

New York—A $2-an-hour federal minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act and extension of coverage to 16 million low-paid workers presently exempt were urged by the AFL-CIO convention as a major plank in the federation's economic platform.

"Of immediate priority," the convention resolution declared, "is the extension of coverage to hotel, motel, restaurant, laundry, cleaning and hospital employes and to workers employed in so-called 'small' logging operations."

"The present unfair exemptions from the act should be removed so that all workers are accorded the safeguards of the law," the resolution said.

It labeled the present $1.25 minimum wage for workers in interstate commerce "inadequate," and pointed out that even this amount has been postponed until 1965 for workers newly covered by the act's 1961 amendments.

The convention observed that the $2 minimum the AFL-CIO proposes would still leave affected workers far short of the $6,000 a year needed "to maintain a family at a minimum standard of health and decency." It would, however, represent a step in this direction, the resolution said.

"Many of the millions of workers who are denied the safeguards of the act are forced to live in poverty," the convention asserted. "They and their families receive an utterly inadequate share of the great wealth and opportunities of American society. Most of these are unorganized and therefore are not aided by collective bargaining.

States' Record Poor

"What is more, with few exceptions the states have demonstrated conclusively that they are unwilling or unable to provide adequate minimum wage and maximum hour protection for the millions of workers who are not protected by the federal law."

The convention called for substantial increases in existing wage minimums under state laws and their immediate adoption in states which have not as yet done so.

It also urged "particular attention" to the need for wage floors and hours ceilings to protect farm workers and those in agricultural processing.

The minimum wage rates applying to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, the resolution said, should be raised rapidly to achieve parity with mainland minimums and "assure a healthy development of the economies of the (islands) and a decent standard of living for their workers."

Auxiliaries Offer Aid To Trade Union Causes

New York—The AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, responding to an invitation by the federation convention, moved here to mobilize the "wives, daughters, sisters and mothers" of workers into an effective feminine task force working alongside their men in labor causes.

Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director of the Auxiliaries, reported to the convention that the women of labor represent a "vast potential" that has barely been tapped. Delegates agreed they could serve as volunteers for community services, union label and consumer education, political and legislative service and traditional "works of mercy" in aiding strikers on picket lines and in soup kitchens.

A resolution called the auxiliaries the "most significant single group" in promoting union goods and services and the "key to the success of our political efforts" by their "dedicated volunteer services" to labor's register-and-vote campaigns.

The new executive council, inducted by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, includes Mrs. Beatrice Warwood, new president; Mrs. Gertrude Gray, first vice president; Mrs. Elda Luebbert, secretary-treasurer; Mrs. Beatrice Weiland, past president and new vice president; and six other vice presidents. All will serve two years.

The Auxiliaries called attention to a recent letter by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to all affiliates in which Meany asked for creation of auxiliaries in every union and their affiliation with the national group.

Convention speakers included Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant secretary of labor; Sec.-Treas. John Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Dame Anne Godwin of the British Trades Union Congress; John E. Cosgrove of the U.S. Office of Emergency Planning; and Don Ellinger, of the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency & Youth Crime. Herbert Heasley of the U.S. Treasury Dept. presented a citation to the Auxiliaries and Mrs. Beatty for aiding the savings bond drive.

Senior Citizen Centers Given Labor Support

New York—Local central labor bodies should take the lead in promoting pre-retirement information programs, senior citizen centers and other services for the aging and aged, the AFL-CIO convention said here.

A resolution observed that labor, through collective bargaining and legislative action, seeks for the older worker an assured retirement income, prepaid health care and low-cost housing.

But many workers enter retirement unprepared to live on reduced income, unable to cope with leisure time, and feeling useless to the community, the resolution noted.

To enable the retired worker to gain a sense of personal worth, to make creative use of his earned leisure and to play a community role, the resolution said, central bodies should work with local unions and community health and welfare agencies to provide a variety of services.

These would include pre-retirement information courses, counseling and referral services, meeting places, opportunities for voluntary work visits to homebound retirees.

The resolution said unions should rely on existing agencies and work with other community groups in creating new services. It said central bodies should stress the creation of information programs and senior citizen centers, either on a union or community basis.

Full Employment Key Goal:

Wirtz Says 'Lethargy' Is Ending On 'Intolerable' Jobless Rate

New York—Americans are awakening from six years of "lethargy" towards the nation's "intolerable" level of joblessness, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the AFL-CIO convention here.

The nation now realizes, Wirtz said, that full employment is essential to meet other pressing problems, including racial discrimination, juvenile delinquency and the need to upgrade education and job training. Declaring that "half measures are not going to work," he attacked the "timid" and the "negativists" who oppose full employment programs with "fright phrases" such as "inflation," "government interference" and "unbalanced budgets."

The American people must demand "an all-out commitment" to full employment as "a first order of business," he declared, "with the clear understanding that anybody who gets in the way is going to get run over."

Wirtz praised the AFL-CIO for having been instrumental in bringing about a new "sense of urgency" towards the "monotonous" monthly unemployment statistics which "have long since lost whatever shock potential they may once have had."

He noted that "the uninvited guests at this convention" are the "robots—mechanical men that work at wages which wouldn't feed a family." The major labor disputes of recent years, he stressed, have developed "in large part because of men's fears that if machines take the jobs they now have, there won't be other jobs to go to."

Lack of jobs has been "an important precipitating cause of the Negro revolt, especially in the North," Wirtz pointed out. And "fear of unemployment," he emphasized, "makes too many people oppose in practice what they accept in principle about equality of opportunity . . . they are afraid that equal employment rights will mean more competition for their own jobs."

Juvenile delinquency is "in large part the fallout from unemployment," he said.

"Boys are not worse than they used to be," he added. "It is just that more of them haven't anything to do . . . There is no short cut to full employment of youth without full employment of the entire work force."

'Cruel Delusions'

The Manpower Development & Training Act "is a landmark in social legislation," Wirtz declared, but "training programs will be cruel delusions if there are no jobs at the end of them."

He reiterated the Administration's opposition to a statutory reduction of the workweek as a "half-measure" which, he contended, does not meet the "central facts" in the unemployment problem:

Labor's Contribution

The secretary spoke feelingly of the trade union movement's contribution "to freedom and to human dignity in this country and in the world."

"I have been reading those books and those articles about the decline and fall of labor unions in America," he told the delegates.

"It is my very clear impression that the 'corpse' is more alive than the pallbearers."

In the resolutions before the convention, Wirtz said, are found "a proud and magnificent statement of the authentic American purpose—not just for American labor; for America."

"Here is American labor serving notice that it will do battle with the irresponsible extremists on the right just as it did battle so successfully before with irresponsible extremists on the left," he continued.

'People Are Important'

"Here is American labor insisting that people are important enough to see that there is provision for meeting their medical needs when their work is done.

"Here is proper insistence that unemployment insurance protection be brought up to date, that standards be established by a rule of reason instead of by pressures bordering on human exploitation.

"Here is strong expression of the good sense that the minimum wage protection be extended to those who need it most and must be at meaningful levels.

"Here, perhaps most significantly, is labor's reassuring proclamation that it considers freedom's residence as not this country alone but . . . all the world."

FEDERATION Pres. George Meany and Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz as latter is presented to convention for major speech.

Mediation Chief Urges 'Mature' Bargaining

New York—The need for "sophisticated and mature collective bargaining" and for unions with enlightened leadership has never been greater, Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service told the AFL-CIO's 5th convention.

Speaking for 240 mediators involved actively in more than 7,000 disputes a year, Simkin decried the "prophets of doom" who say the organizing surge in the 30's and early 40's was the high-water mark for American unions, that the subsequent "very substantial improvement in wages and working conditions has almost milked the cow dry" and that little can be done in the future.

The implication, he observed, is that unions might just as well go out of business and leave any remaining problems in the hands of management.

It has also been suggested, Simkin noted, "that labor leadership is addicted to middle-age spread and is hanging on to the institution of collective bargaining for personal job security reasons."

Union leaders are not flawless, he said, but the institution of collective bargaining has "potentials that can result in achievements more realistically significant," though perhaps less glamorous, than any of the past.

"Nor can we trust management to produce these achievements by unilateral action," he said. "Instead, the need for industrial democracy, in the form of really sophisticated and mature collective bargaining, has never been greater."

The mediation chief cited the fact that for four consecutive years the nation has had a consistently low record for time lost by strikes and lockouts.

This "exceptionally good record is a tribute to your leadership," he said, adding that "the occasional failure of collective bargaining promotes public hysteria that is not justified by the record."

Over all, the institution of collective bargaining is "doing a better job today than would be performed by most of its critics" if they had the power to decide rather than to criticize, Simkin said.

The future of the bargaining process, he added, probably lies in the field of continuing consultation and communication throughout the term of a labor agreement.

As evidence of this "new bargaining maturity" he listed new agreements recently achieved by union and management in steel, autos, electrical manufacturing, aerospace, maritime and numerous scattered small plants.

Expanded Drive Voted To Defend Union Shop

New York—Warning that so-called "right-to-work" laws "threaten the prosperity of the nation and the very fabric of a democratic society," the AFL-CIO pledged to fight "more vigorously than ever" all attempts to outlaw the union shop.

The convention called on Congress to repeal Sec. 14B of the Taft-Hartley Act, which gives states "the unprecedented right to preempt the jurisdiction of federal law with respect to union security."

The "right-to-work" campaign is the successor to the open shop drive launched by the National Association of Manufacturers in the early years of the century and the so-called "American plan" of the 1920s, the resolution noted.

Like its predecessors, the objective of the "work" campaign is "destructive of unions," the convention said.

Anti-union employer groups which waged the earlier union-busting drives have a new ally in the "right-to-work" campaign, the convention pointed out—the "radical right" organizations.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the subcommittee set up by the federation's Executive Council to combat "work" laws, stressed the need for unions to do a more effective job of informing their members "what is behind the activities of those who sponsor 'right-to-work' laws."

There are still some, Beirne said, who are under the impression that "right-to-work" is a law "to give a job to some of the 5.6 percent of our working population who are unemployed."

Message of Hate

Beirne warned that the National Right to Work Committee, "financed and sponsored by those who want to render labor unions impotent, has been getting great funds" to spread a "message of hate and distrust."

The resolution pointed out that per capita income, average hourly wages and labor standards "in virtually every case" is lowest in states which ban the union shop.

The drive for such laws is backed by "the nation's most notoriously anti-union employers," the convention noted, and in some cases its sponsors have openly admitted that one of its purposes is to "weaken unions at the collective bargaining table."

In the counter-attack on "right-to-work," the convention said, labor should "continue and expand the effort to enlist in this campaign all fair-minded citizens.

Labor Pledges Major Battle In Oklahoma 'R-T-W' Election

New York—The AFL-CIO will give "full support" to its Oklahoma affiliate in a major drive to defeat a so-called "right-to-work" constitutional amendment at the polls, Federation Pres. George Meany announced here.

He expressed disappointment that an Oklahoma State Supreme court referee has ruled there were insufficient "improprieties" to invalidate the petition filed by "right-to-work" promoters. If the court upholds its referee, a proposition to outlaw union shop agreements will be placed on a statewide referendum ballot. The decision on when to submit the issue to the voters will be up to Gov. Henry Bellmon (R).

Meany condemned the "right-to-work" drive as "a fraud from start to finish." He declared:

"Here is a movement that pretends to call for the 'liberations' of workers from the 'dictatorships' of unions. Yet in Oklahoma, and everywhere else, those who put up the money for 'right-to-work,' and promote it most vigorously, are employers with long records of bitter opposition to trade unionism, including strikebreaking, lockouts and other union-busting tactics.

"Moreover, this so-called 'right-to-work' proposal has made the most headway where union membership is smallest. It has become law in only one state where union members make up a substantial part of the wage-earning population.

"If 'right-to-work' is a way of 'liberating' union members," Meany asked, "why is there no sign of it in states like New York and Michigan?"

The "answer," Meany said, is that "it is a total fraud, and we are determined to expose and eliminate it wherever it appears."

Oklahoma has been a primary target of the National Right to Work Committee and the Special Committee for Voluntary Unionism set up two years ago by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

After the Oklahoma legislature refused to enact a law banning union shop agreements, the "right-to-work" forces launched a massive petition campaign early in 1962 and, using paid solicitors, submitted 212,000 signatures—nearly 77,000 more than the number required to compel a referendum issue.

During a year-and-a-half of bitterly contested hearings, labor and a citizens' group fighting "right-to-work" produced a mass of evidence of faked signatures, misrepresentation of the nature of the petition, signatures solicited by employers, and signatures which did not match names on voter registration lists. In all, some 104,000 names were challenged.

Under Oklahoma law, a referendum proposal must be approved by a majority of the persons voting in the general election on which it appears on the ballot. Thus if the question appeared on the ballot in the November 1964 election, the "silent vote" of those ignoring the referendum question would in effect count against it.

Council Aid Asked In Situs Picketing

New York — The AFL-CIO Executive Council was directed by the convention here "to seek relief for all affected affiliates from the decisions of the Supreme Court" in situs picketing cases.

Attempts to secure legislation in Congress to allow common situs picketing have been stalled for the past two sessions.

The Conscience of America

GEORGE MEANY, moments after his election to a fifth term as president of the AFL-CIO, told the delegates the AFL-CIO is "the conscience of America—if the little people of America are to have a better life, we have to do the job."

His eloquent address perhaps best sums up the eight-year history of the AFL-CIO and the federation's 5th convention. Here are some excerpts:

"In a free society, one of the things we enjoy is the right to differ with one another, and when you look at this organization, 130 national unions, 13 million members scattered all over this great country, different ethnic backgrounds, every color, every creed, with all types of industrial and mechanical backgrounds, it would be very, very unusual if there were not some differences.

"But the things that hold us together, the things we believe in, the dedication that we have to this movement and to the country, they are far more important than any differences, and will always continue to be more important, no matter how these differences may be blown up by those who really do not understand what keeps this movement going and what is back of it.

"I would like to say to you that in that building in Washington we have the finest type of American citizens who are devoted to this trade union movement, and when I move around to various committees and meet with various agencies of government, bump up against the captains of industry and their representatives, I am completely convinced that in every single field of endeavor we not only have men that can match the best that the government has, the best that industry has, but we have men that out-shine them.

★ ★ ★

"LET ME SAY TO YOU quite frankly, if the American trade union movement does not carry the ball to move this country toward a better economy, to keep it in the forefront of the free world, to see to it that it discharges its obligations as the leader of the free world—if we don't do it, the NAM won't do it. The Chamber of Commerce won't do it.

"We are the conscience of America. If the little people of America are to have a better life, we have to do the job.

"I look back over the years when labor was a tiny minority. It was perhaps considered an oppressed minority. But still through organization and through the genius of the early pioneers we were able to lead this country to a better life.

"In every factory in this country there is a protection for workers, protection from injury, protection from disease, protection from the economic effects of injury on the job, protection for health. All of these things are on the statute books and they all bear the label of the American trade union movement. They were not put there by any group of politicians sitting in a smoke-filled room, nor were they put there by the board chairmen who meet in Wall Street now and then. They were put there by the trade union movement.

"When we look for further improvements, they have to come from this organization. I happen to believe that this organization as it is presently constituted, with the men on the Executive Council, with the men who lead the important unions and the small unions and the large unions in this federation, that we are set up in a way that we can make a continuing contribution to the welfare and advancement of life here in the United States of America and also at the same time make some contribution to workers in other parts of the world toward a better life."

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the
American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President
WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Nov. 23, 1963 No. 47

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Here We Come!

Pres. Kennedy's Last Message to Labor:

4 Million People Without Jobs Nation's 'Number One Issue'

Just one week before his death, Pres. Kennedy addressed the AFL-CIO convention. Following are excerpts from his last message to the American labor movement—an eloquent appeal for programs to build a strong, prosperous America:

FOUR MILLION PEOPLE are out of work. All of the people who opposed the efforts we are making to try to improve the economic climate of the United States, who talked to us so long about socialism and deficits and all the rest, should look at that figure.

Four million people out of work. And judging from last summer's statistics, three times that many have experienced some unemployment. And that hanging over the labor market makes it more difficult for those of you who speak for labor at the bargaining table to speak with force.

When there are so many people out of work it affects the whole economic climate. That is why I think that this issue of economic security, of jobs, is the basic issue facing the United States in 1963, and I wish we could get everybody talking about it. A quarter of the people we are talking about are out of work 15 weeks or longer and their families feel it.

This is a year of prosperity, of record prosperity. Nineteen fifty-four was a year of recession. Yet our unemployment rate is as high today as it was in 1954.

Last year's loss of manhours in terms of those willing but unable to find full time work was a staggering 1 billion workdays lost, equivalent to shutting down the entire country for three weeks with no pay. That is an intolerable waste.

It is not so recognized by everyone. There are those who oppose the tax cut, the Youth Employment bill, who oppose more money for depressed areas and job retraining, and other public needs. And they are powerful and articulate. They are campaigning on a platform of so-called individual initiative. They talk loudly of deficits and socialism, but they do not have a single constructive job-creating program of their own.

There are those who support our effort for jobs but say it isn't the Number One Issue. Some may say that civil rights is the Number One issue. This nation needs the passage of our bill, if we are to fulfill our constitutional obligations, but no one gains from a fair employment program bill if there is no employment to be had; no one gains by being admitted to a lunch counter if he has no money to spend; no one gains from attending a better school if he doesn't have a job after graduation. No one thinks much of the right to own a good home and to sleep in a good hotel or go to the theater if he has no work and no money.

The civil rights legislation is important. But to make that legislation effective we need jobs in the United States. Some may say that the Number One domestic issue is education, and this nation must improve its education. What concerns me almost more than anything is the statistic that there will be 8 million young boys and girls coming into the labor market in the '60s who have not graduated from high school.

Where are they going to find jobs? Which of your unions is going to be able to put them to work, 8 million of them? But the best schools, the best teachers, the best books—all these are of no avail if there are no jobs.

THE OUT-OF-WORK college graduate is just as much out of work as a school drop-out. The family beset by unemployment cannot send a child to college. It may even encourage him to drop out of high school to find a job which he will not keep. Education is a key to the growth of this country. We must educate our children as our most valuable resource. We must make it possible for those who have talent to go to college, but only if those who are educated can find a job.

If jobs are the most important domestic issue that this country faces, then clearly no single step can now be more important in sustaining the economy of the United States than the passage of our tax bill. This will help consumer markets and build investment demand and build business incentives and, therefore, provide jobs for a total addition to the economy in the next months of nearly $30 billion.

We dare not wait for this tax cut until it is too late, as perhaps some would have. This nation's period of peacetime expansion before the downturn comes leading to a recession, on the average, has lasted 28 months, since 1920, and 32 months since the end of the second world war. Today we are already in our 33rd month of economic expansion, and we urgently need that tax cut as insurance against a recession next year, and we need that cut where it will do the most good, and the benefits mostly will go to those 2 or 3 million people who will, out of that bill, find new jobs. But tax cuts are not enough and jobs are not enough, and higher earnings and greater growth and record prosperity are not enough unless used to sustain a better society.

Meany Tells Convention:

Critics' Obituaries Premature, Unions Still Alive and Kicking

The following is excerpted from the keynote speech to the fifth AFL-CIO convention by federation Pres. George Meany.

AS THIS CONVENTION opens, you have before you, as in the past, a detailed report of our experience since the last convention—and a quantity of resolutions proposed for the future guidance of the AFL-CIO.

In essence, they respond to the questions faced by every delegate to every AFL-CIO convention. How are we doing and where do we go from here?

In our search for the answers, we have been favored in recent years with a stream of free advice and opinion graciously extended to us by a new school of critics—sometimes termed the "disenchanted liberals" or "disillusioned friends of labor."

The distinguishing feature of the members of this group is their friendship and association, past or present, with trade union aims and ideals.

Some profess significant trade union backgrounds, during some past golden age of idealism and innocence. Others have sought to establish —retroactively—some other basis for a reputation for devotion and service to the cause of the underprivileged.

While the membership of this group appears to be small, its productivity is amazing. The unlimited variations that can easily be played on their basic theme eliminate the need for careful thought or tiresome research.

FOR AUTHORITY and support, they simply rely upon one another—one writes an article, another develops it into a pamphlet, the former expands the pamphlet into a book, and the latter then writes a favorable book review—praising the experience, background and insight of the author —rather oddly describing him, of course, as a "disenchanted liberal" or "disillusioned champion of labor." In this way myths and fallacies are born, planted in the public mind and echoed in the editorial pages of the daily press.

What do these expert "friends of labor" report as to how the trade union movement is doing?

I regret to have to tell you that we are all washed up. We are dead, but we are just not smart enough to lie down and wait for the undertaker. Let me give you a few excerpts, as I understand them, from the obituary notices —some of the symptoms of our fatal illness as seen by these disillusioned friends of ours. If you happen to notice any small inconsistencies in these reports as to the causes of our impending demise, don't let it bother you.

Now, they tell us that there are not enough strikes. They say we lost our trade union militancy because our members are too contented with their present conditions and are no longer willing to sustain strike improvements. Then, a short time later the same individual in this case tells us that there are too many strikes, and that in addition strikes in certain industries seriously endanger the general public. Just think of that, and they say we have been too militant in our negotiations with newspapers, railroads, airlines, building contractors, stevedoring companies, ship owners, et cetera and et cetera. The strike weapon is therefore out of style and requires replacement with more up-to-date innovation such as compulsory arbitration.

Then they say collective bargaining has just been too successful. They say our unions have achieved so many gains for their members in wages, conditions and security that they have acquired a middle class, bourgeois outlook and are no longer interested in burning social problems. They long for the good old days. Trade union success to them is just no fun at all. Then they come on and say that collective bargaining is an obsolete failure.

ONE WRITER very comfortably ensconced in the parlor car of a foundation gravy train describes collective bargaining as old and worn out at the age of 28. This intelligence that collective bargaining is only 28 years old will no doubt come as a shock to many delegates here.

Then they say that there is too much—we are permitting too much unemployment from automation. They say our strength is being undermined by the loss of jobs, members and bargaining powers as the result of rapid technological changes with robots casting workers on the slag heap without adequate protection through the collective bargaining process. Then in the very next breath they say there is not enough unemployment from automation. They say our efforts to protect the livelihoods of men who have devoted their careers to a company, industry or trade, constitute inexcusable featherbedding, delaying the realization of the great economic and social blessings of automation.

THEN THEY SAY we neglect our responsibilities in the field of civil rights. Those who never have an unkind word to say about the powerful employers of this country, who are largely responsible for widespread discrimination in employment, seem to derive a perverse delight from senseless attacks made upon the most effective and consistent advocate of civil rights over the years, the American trade union movement.

Then they say we are stupid to be so active in the field of civil rights. They say our campaign for strong civil rights legislation and other actions in support of the legitimate aspirations of minority groups have severely handicapped our organizing activities, particularly in the South where organization is most needed.

Then they say we are too divided. They say our energies and resources have been dissipated by internal bickering and inter-union jurisdictional disputes, and right after that they say we are too united. They say, and they feel this is true, some of them, that an authentic split in our ranks might be the impetus for a surge of new dynamic activity.

Let's see just where we would be headed if we heeded their advice as to our future course. Since collective bargaining and strikes are obsolete, presumably we would have to find an outlet for our renewed zeal and militancy, our renewed dynamism before a government-appointed labor court or compulsory arbitration panel.

We would have to surrender our traditional position in behalf of free trade unionism and freedom of association, irrespective of national boundaries, wherever it might disturb the politicians and government officials of another country, even one whose economy is inter-meshed with ours, so we were advised by a friendly labor editorialist who frequently deplores the declining militancy of American labor, and who recently informed the public that the AFL-CIO has no right to express views on the seizure of trade unions by a government other than our own.

IF DIVISION in inter-union competition is the key to a surge of new activity as these outside friends suggest, why stop at a division into two parts? Would not four, five, or six competing federations be that much more invigorating and energizing? I am sure the Birchers and other anti-union groups would like to very much.

Then, of course, to really shake up the complacency of our officers and members, it would be wonderful if we could find some way to get back to that great golden age of the 1930's, back to the sitdown strikes, the soup lines, the apple stands, the eviction notices, the county poorhouses, 40-cents-an-hour wage, and all the other happy features of those wonderful years.

I am frank to admit that I am not troubled too much by the fact that our members today enjoy the highest wages, best working conditions and greatest measure of security ever obtained by working people anywhere, and I am proud of the fact that this organization, the AFL-CIO, and its affiliates have played a tremendous role in bringing this about.

I have absolutely no feeling of nostalgia for the days of the great depression, of starvation wages and chronic insecurity, and I am positive that the American trade union movement is a long, long way from outliving its usefulness or achieving its final goals if any of its goals are ever final. We all know that we are not perfect. Our organization is not perfect. It is a human institution.

We know that we have many serious problems and much unfinished business ahead of us. We recognize these problems and are determined and ready to deal with them.

Hour's Pay or $1 Asked For Mrs. FDR Memorial

New York—The 13 million members who make up the AFL-CIO were strongly urged to contribute one hour's pay or $1 to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation to insure its work "toward a world of peace, freedom and social justice—those goals that were jointly shared by Eleanor Roosevelt and the trade union movement she loved."

The call for all-out support of the foundation through the AFL-CIO Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund Committee came in a convention resolution mourning Mrs. Roosevelt's death and memorializing her involvement in labor activities and the causes to which labor is dedicated.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and Joseph D. Keenan, the latter chairman of the federation's fund-raising committee, strongly urged the delegates to insure the success of the drive by involving every union member.

Meany commented that Mrs. Roosevelt "was a friend of workers from her earliest days," noting her activities in the Women's Trade Union League in the 1920s. Reuther pointed to her role as an active trade unionist as a member of the Newspaper Guild and said she was "a living symbol of the values to which the labor movement is committed."

Keenan said that every effort has been made to help affiliates conduct the campaign and that two persons have been specifically assigned to help make it a complete success.

Legion Head Backs Labor's Job Goals

New York—America should build a healthy economy at home and "seize the initiative" abroad through a "peaceful confrontation" with communism, National Commander Daniel F. Foley of the American Legion told the AFL-CIO convention here.

"We of the Legion are in accord with the thinking of organized labor that a strong and healty economy, providing conditions of maximum employment, is most essential," Foley said to the delegates.

"With conditions of near full employment, there is less likelihood of unrest and discontent among our people . . . conditions under which people are most susceptible to exploitation by Communists and Communist front groups in our midst."

And in a period of cold war, he continued, "a healthy national economy has significant international implications."

Foley interpreted the Soviet Union's willingness to sign the limited test ban treaty, its large wheat purchases and Premier Khrushchev's conflicting announcements on the moon race as evidence "that the Soviet economy is in trouble and presently is in no position either to continue nuclear testing or to compete in a race to the moon."

If this is a period in which the Soviet Union is trying to buy time, he said, then "America cannot afford to nap."

Foley said it should be "a challenge to America and to our free world allies to seize the initiative in the conflict of ideologies."

"We have everything going for us in this matter of peaceful confrontation," he declared, "and we should have no qualms over bringing free world methods of doing business into direct contrast with the methods of communism whenever and wherever the opportunity presents itself."

He pointed out that the postwar period has witnessed the emergence of a greater number of independent nations than any other comparable period of history—independence encouraged or granted by free world nations. In contrast, he added, once free men and nations—Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechslovakia, China and Cuba—"have been ground under the heel of international communism."

"The suppression of man's desire to be free versus the support of freedom is a basic element of peaceful confrontation," Foley said.

Another area of "peaceful confrontation" can be found in the field of education, Foley continued, with freedom of access to all knowledge contrasted with an ideologically-controlled education. Freedom of religion is still another area of contrast, he said.

The nature of support of the United Nations is still another case, Foley said, with free world nations seeking to utilize the UN to promote "peace with honor" while the Soviets and Communist-bloc nations have obstructed UN policies and used the UN as a propaganda forum.

NEW YORK CITY'S Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) left, and New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller greeted delegates to the convention on opening day.

Danger Seen In Forced Arbitration

New York—Labor's "unalterable opposition to compulsory arbitration"—on the railroads or in any other industry—was reaffirmed by the AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates expressed "profound fear" that Congress, in directing arbitration of key issues in the railroad work rules dispute, "has given management an incentive not to bargain."

They adopted a resolution suggesting that Congress consider if it would "serve the public interest to nationalize this industry," which has been "deemed so essential to the safety, health and welfare of the nation that employes, by law, were denied the right to strike."

The arbitration law, the resolution declared, was enacted after rail management spokesmen announced "they would force a nationwide crisis unless the unions submitted to their demands for unilateral control of manning issues and work assignments."

In other resolutions dealing with railroad problems, the convention:

- Called for a moratorium on railroad mergers pending legislation to limit mergers to "conditions which permit adequate safeguards for the public and the nation's long-range transportation needs."
- Urged an "intensive investigation" by Congress of railroad finances. The resolution noted that while many railroads have been pleading "poverty" as justification for curtailing services, corporation financial reports "differ markedly from these claims." The convention urged the Senate to approve a bill sponsored by 21 senators to establish a select committee to carry on such an investigation.
- Called attention to the "seriousness" of unemployment in the industry—elimination of 500,000 jobs in the past 10 years—and pledged support to efforts of rail unions to stabilize employment in the industry.
- Commended the rail unions for their efforts to improve safety conditions "despite the lack of cooperation of management." The convention pledged the AFL-CIO to "do all in its power to help attain the legislative and administrative reforms . . . needed to halt the needless maiming and slaughter which is occurring along railroad tracks throughout the nation."

In speaking for adoption of the resolution on compulsory arbitration, M. W. Hampton of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen sharply criticized press coverage of the work rules dispute. He said the press dealt only with the railroad demands and paid no attention to union proposals for improved conditions.

Pres. Charles Luna of the Trainmen warned the delegates that if compulsory arbitration can be imposed on one union, it can be imposed on any union. Earlier, at a news conference, he announced that his union "will undertake programs of public education to alert the American people to the dangers of compulsory arbitration."

Bracero Bill Stand Unrecorded: Baring

Rep. Walter S. Baring (D-Nev.), who was listed as absent in the House roll call vote on extension of the bracero program, has said that something went awry with his request that he be paired against the bill.

In Geneva as a U.S. delegate to the Intl. Lead-Zinc, Tungsten Workshop at the time the vote was taken, Baring said he would have cast his ballot against the measure had he been present and that it is "too bad my wish to be paired against the bill was not recorded."

Record on Missile Sites Praised as 'Near-Perfect'

New York—Special tribute to labor for its "complete cooperation" with the work of the Missile Sites Labor Commission was paid by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The record is "as close to perfect as can be expected in a society of free human beings," he told the AFL-CIO convention in recalling that at a time when some congressmen were crying for restrictive legislation in 1961, labor gave the government a voluntary no-strike pledge.

The commission was established and since then, local missile site committees headed by federal mediators have resolved most disputes without resorting to commission decisions. This could not have been, Simken said, without the "able and resourceful leadership" of many of the "men who are in this room today."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who addressed the convention earlier, said a report filed recently with the White House showed a record of only one man-day lost because of labor disputes out of every 1,288 days worked from June 1962 to June 1963. That works out to less than one hundredth of 1 percent of potential working time.

86 Theological Students Guests of Convention

New York—Eighty-six theological students and teachers from Protestant, Jewish and Catholic seminaries in northeastern states were guests of the AFL-CIO convention here and held question-and-answer meetings after attending convention sessions.

Most of the seminarians attended a conference sponsored by the Religion & Labor Council of America. Ten students from the Catholic Maryknoll Seminary, arriving later, were given a separate briefing and convention visit.

Union Leaders Speak

Conference speakers included Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers; Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters; Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Dr. Cameron Hall of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. Conference chairmen were John G. Ramsay, the Rev. Roy McCorkle and the Rev. Charles C. Webber of the Religion & Labor Council.

Reuther said American religious leaders have a "special responsibility to help motivate people" to work for a better international order. Unions must act to help develop a world in which people will be adequately fed, clothed and housed and encouraged to demonstrate their genuine brotherhood, he asserted.

Randolph said the church must seek to "give enrichment to the life of labor, to give it hope and faith to move forward in a society where the individual man can be free."

From 16 Schools

The seminarians attend the Andover-Newton Theological School; Boston University School of Theology; Crozer Theological Seminary; Drew Theological School; Episcopal Theology Seminary of Cambridge, Mass.; General Theological Seminary; Gordon Divinity School; Hartford Seminary Foundation; Harvard Divinity School; Jewish Theological Seminary of America; Lutheran Theological Seminary of Philadelphia; Princeton Theological Seminary; St. Lawrence University Theological School; Union Theological Seminary; Yale University Divinity School, and Maryknoll.

Policy Reaffirmed On Expelled Unions

New York—The AFL-CIO convention here reaffirmed the federation's 1961 stand that readmission of the Teamsters and other former affiliates must be conditioned on their "complete observance" of all provisions of the AFL-CIO constitution and its "rules, laws, standards and policies."

Picking up the substantive clause of the 1961 resolution, the convention instructed the Executive Council to "give consideration" to any application for reaffiliation from an expelled union in the light of existing AFL-CIO policies and the "current situation" within the applicant union.

The council is authorized to proceed with reaffiliation if this can be accomplished "under conditions that will fully protect the rights of all affiliates" and assure adherence to basic AFL-CIO principles.

Invitation Repeated

Commenting on the resolution, as adopted in 1961 and again this year, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described it as an "invitation."

"We have invited these people to make application under the constitution," he said. "They haven't made it to date. If, as and when they do make it, I am quite sure the Executive Council will give it absolutely fair and sincere consideration."

Noting that a "question of personality" had been raised but without mentioning Teamster Pres. James R. Hoffa by name, Meany said:

One-Sided Invectives

"I don't know this man, have had no association with him and the personal invectives that you hear are all from one side."

Hoffa's "insults" do not bother him, Meany said, but "I do resent a little bit" the Teamster president's statements that Meany had never conducted a strike.

His own union, the Plumbers & Pipefitters, had no need to picket when it struck, he said, but as president of the former New York State Federation of Labor he had advocated and conducted a strike by some 2,000 WPA workers against the government to preserve union wage standards.

Furthermore, Meany said, "we won the strike.

The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt interests.

To Bolster Economy:

Bigger Wage Hikes Urged in Bargaining

New York—Higher wages are needed to bolster the nation's economic growth and can be granted without price increases, the AFL-CIO convention declared in a statement on labor's collective bargaining goals.

"We will press for wage and salary increases," the delegates affirmed, "because rising worker incomes are the essential underpinning of consumer buying power, on which the well-being of the entire economy ultimately must depend."

The workers' share of the national income "has declined in recent years as wages have lagged behind productivity," the convention said, while "profits have soared to record levels."

Labor's drive for a reduction of working hours will continue to be carried on at the bargaining table as well as in the legislative halls, the resolution emphasized. In addition to seeking cuts in the workweek, negotiators will seek "improved vacations, holidays and other increases in paid leisure time."

The trade union movement will continue to seek "improved health and welfare plans, better pensions, new programs for guaranteeing employment, training programs and more adequate supplemental unemployment benefits," the resolution declared. All of these, it said, will "advance the security and well-being of workers."

High unemployment and rapid technological changes which throw workers out of their jobs have placed a "heavy burden" on collective bargaining, the convention noted, and many of these problems can't be resolved at the bargaining table.

In the face of such "grave problems," the convention declared, "collective bargaining has been demonstrating its strength, vitality and flexibility." Union and management negotiators have often come up with "new solutions" for problems arising in various industries.

The convention hailed the extension of bargaining agreements to large groups of federal, state and local employes and to such groups as hospital employes and school teachers.

'Fair Share' Sought

For all wage and salary earners, the resolution said, labor's collective bargaining goals are to give workers "a fair share" of the economy's productive power, to protect the rights of workers on the job, "and to enhance human dignity in this complex and rapidly changing economy."

The convention cited with "pride" the accomplishment of unions in bringing about better working and living standards. But it declared that "much greater advances are needed and are attainable."

"Our task," the delegates asserted, "is to get the entire economy and all of its sectors to function responsibly."

Central Body Affiliation Urged for All Locals

New York—Full membership of all local unions in state and local central bodies, strongly urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a personal appeal to delegates, received convention endorsement here.

Reaffirming an action taken at the 1961 convention, the delegates adopted a report of the Committee on State & Local Central Bodies.

The committee reported that although progress has been made toward affiliation of locals, the "goal of a fully mobilized labor movement at state and local levels is still far from attained, with far too many local unions remaining outside these official branches of the AFL-CIO."

The resolution urged all national and international unions to encourage their local unions to "affiliate and to pay per capita tax on their full membership so the full strength of the AFL-CIO may be mobilized for the important tasks ahead."

Central bodies were commended for their efforts to implement AFL-CIO policies and programs, and for their assistance to affiliated unions. In virtually every state they have been active in fighting so-called "right-to-work" laws, have campaigned for passage or improvement of minimum wage, unemployment and workmen's compensation laws, and have helped organize the unorganized, the report said.

To implement all of the programs and objectives of the labor movement and to "fully mobilize and strengthen the hand" of state and local central bodies, the committee emphasized the need for full affiliation and cooperation by every AFL-CIO union.

Meany told the convention that "much of the beneficial legislation we have at the national level was initiated at the state level" and recalled that William Green, late president of the former AFL, introduced a workmen's compensation bill in the Ohio Senate which later became law in that state and led to similar laws in Wisconsin and New York.

Passing a law is merely the first step, Meany said, pointing out that such legislation may be repealed or made ineffective by refusal of legislators to vote funds for enforcement.

"We need continual action at the state and local levels if we are to get the benefit of the total overall work" of the labor movement, he said.

In this way and only in this way, he added, "can we make the work of our great organization completely effective and of importance" in every area.

Patton Greets Labor For 'Farm Families'

New York — Greetings from "750,000 farm families in this country who believe in organized labor" were brought to the AFL-CIO convention by Farmers Union Pres. James Patton.

Patton was introduced to the AFL-CIO convention by Pres. George Meany as "an old friend" of the labor movement. The veteran farm leader was recently named co-chairman of the National Council for Industrial Peace, a citizens' group carrying on a nationwide fight against so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Convention Sets Goal:

Expanded, Unified Organizing 'Major Task' Facing Labor

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—Full use of AFL-CIO resources in meeting labor's greatest challenge—the organization of the unorganized—was pledged by convention action here.

The delegates, reviewing past successes in the light of present opportunities, declared that:

- Organizing the unorganized workers of the United States is still the major unfinished task of the American labor movement.
- All affiliates should "critically examine" their organizing efforts to determine if they are fulfilling their responsibilities to members and other workers.
- National and international unions should participate "wholeheartedly" with more men, money and resources in coordinated organizing programs undertaken by the AFL-CIO to "bring the greatest possible concentration of organizing impact" in strategic areas.

Recognizing that only through "total commitment to meeting the organizing challenge can the promise of American labor be realized," the AFL-CIO renewed the decision made at its founding convention to provide a "realistic appraisal of the obstacles, imaginative planning, and full use of our resources."

Pres. George Meany and delegates from various affiliates emphasized the need for unified and continuous action in Los Angeles, where 28,000 new members have been enrolled by an organizing coalition of 54 unions; in the Baltimore-Washington area, where a coordinated drive has just got underway; and in other areas.

Dir. of Organization John Livingston, calling for still "better cooperation and teamwork" of unions, said the most critical shortage is in the field of manpower.

Even in Los Angeles, he said, the result was "only half what it would be if all participating unions came up with their full manpower" of staff organizers.

The committee marked up a Los Angeles record of 126 victories to 117 losses in elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board but, Livingston pointed out, the greatest percentage gains were made in two organizing areas—service trades and government workers.

There is no need for unions to interrupt their organizing campaigns in disputes over jurisdiction, Livingston told the convention. There is "enough for everybody," and unions must put additional men and money into their campaigns or "you'll find yourselves getting weaker" on both organizing and legislative fronts, he said.

Meany said that soon after the AFL-CIO merger, the federation found it could not involve itself in organizing campaigns where unions did not agree on jurisdiction. In the last 12 months, he noted, there has been a "significant breakthrough on organizing," and also in relations between unions.

The change took place, he told the convention, after the Executive Council drew up an organizing plan and decided, because of the extreme cost of a simultaneous organizing program, to put it into effect in one area at a time, as in Los Angeles and Washington-Baltimore.

"This is a voluntary plan," he observed, "decided upon by a subcommittee representing all trades and crafts."

In "target" plants where as many as six unions might claim jurisdiction, he said, the campaign proceeded on the basis of allocating the plant to the union which seemed to have the best chance for success.

George Hardy of the Building Service Employes recalled that unions in the Los Angeles area—the "most anti-labor area on the West Coast"—had been losing members over a five-year period and that the coordinated campaign there has reversed the trend and resulted in closer cooperation with the Committee on Political Education.

Attacks on Organizers

Sec.-Treas. John Chupka of the Textile Workers Union of America reported on attacks on union organizers by mobs in the Southeast, and harassment by police and deputy sheriffs. Specifying such towns as Hartwell, Ellijay and Fitzgerald, Ga., and Sylacauga, La., he charged that the civil rights of union members were violated and that labor's protest should be strong. Administration of federal labor-management law has been improved, he noted, but "more needs to be done."

The plight of low-paid workers was cited by several speakers, including Pres. Russell R. Crowell of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union, who said that many in Baltimore are working for less than 50 cents an hour, that such wages prevail in most other major cities and that these workers "urgently need help."

The resolution reported that since the AFL-CIO merger, some 2 million workers have been brought into contract coverage through organizing activities by AFL-CIO unions. In the 21-month period following the 1961 convention, AFL-CIO unions took part in 8,482 representation elections and won 4,620, establishing bargaining rights for 324,000 workers.

Net membership gain has been small because of automation and the diminishing share of the total work force represented by blue collar workers.

Taft-Hartley, L-G Acts Seen 'Barrier' to Growth

New York—The Landrum-Griffin and Taft-Hartley Acts "present the major barriers to the growth of union membership," the AFL-CIO convention declared, and prevent the "full exercise" by workers of "their right to bargain collectively with their employers."

The delegates adopted a resolution renewing the AFL-CIO call for Congress to review the two acts and "to correct the most unnecessary, burdensome, unworkable or unfair provisions."

The resolution pointed to "16 years of unhappy experience" under Taft-Hartley which have been compounded by the "inequalities and unnecessary burdens placed upon the American trade union movement by the Landrum-Griffin Act."

The National Labor Relations Board, the resolution said, "now seeks to interpret and administer with impartiality and even-handed justice a complex and unfair code of labor-management conduct." The fault does not lie with the board, it added "but with the law it must administer."

The resolution noted that the so-called "bill of rights" section of Landrum-Griffin "has operated largely to invite frivolous, unwarranted, costly and harassing litigation" and that provisions relating to union elections have kept the Dept. of Labor "busy running around the country searching union records" because of complaints made by disappointed office seekers or discontented members.

The convention pointed out that under the original Wagner Act, and for 12 years afterwards, "the labor movement enjoyed an ever-increasing rate of growth."

"This rate of growth was halted, however, with the passage of Taft-Hartley and its offspring, the so-called 'right-to-work' laws permitted under Sec. 14B, and for the past decade the percentage of organized workers in the nation's total labor force has been gradually declining," it went on.

"Since 1959, a further contributing factor to this decline has been Landrum-Griffin. Today these two federal laws present the major barriers to the growth of union membership in this country and to the full exercise and enjoyment by workers of their right to bargain collectively with their employers."

The resolution declared that the bonding provision of L-G "has unnecessarily increased bonding costs and has provided surety companies with a windfall in the form of increased premium payments for a risk that experience over the last four years has proved to be inconsequential."

AFL-CIO is presented an award by American Cancer Society for aid in raising research funds, spreading information of importance of frequent cancer checks. former Gov. George M. Leader of Pennsylvania makes the award to Pres. Meany.

'Runaway' Shipping Hit at Convention

New York — Labor went on record at the AFL-CIO convention as "determined to oppose" the continued diversion of ocean-going trade to ships flying so-called "flags of convenience."

The convention also approved a resolution calling for an expanded U.S. shipbuilding program and urged Congress to set up a construction program to modernize America's naval and merchant marine fleets.

AMERICAN LABOR was honored at the AFL-CIO convention by citations presented by the Dept. of Defense and the Red Cross. In top photo, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany accepts, on behalf of the federation, the Defense Dept.'s meritorious award, presented by Deputy Assistant Sec. Stephen N. Shulman. Below, a certificate of appreciation is presented by American Red Cross Pres. E. Roland Harriman.

64 National Affiliates Hit Full COPE Goals

New York—COPE awards to 64 national unions which met their quotas in raising voluntary dollar donations for the AFL-CIO political education program were presented at the convention by Dir. Alexander Barkan of the Committee on Political Education.

Eighteen of the unions have perfect records, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted, for meeting their quota for the eight years that awards have been made.

They are the Asbestos Workers, Brewery Workers, Communications Workers, Elevator Constructors, Glass & Ceramic Workers, Glass Blowers, Flint Glass Workers, Lathers, National Maritime Union, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Photo Engravers, Pulp Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, American Radio Association, Rubber Workers, Theatrical Stage Employes, Stereotypers, Textile Workers Union of America, and Typographical Union.

Other winners were:

Seven-year awards: Horse Shoers, Papermakers & Paperworkers, Plasterers & Cement Masons, and Steelworkers.

Six-year winners: Distillery Workers, Hatters, and Plate Printers.

Five-year awards: Auto workers, Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union, Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, Roofers, Tobacco Workers, and Transport Workers.

Four-year awards: Operating Engineers, Hosiery Workers, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, Siderographers, and Broadcast Employes & Technicians.

Three-year winners: Chemical Workers, Newspaper Guild, Packinghouse Workers, Sleeping Car Porters, and Upholsterers.

Two-year winners: Coopers, Furniture Workers, Window Glass Cutters, Insurance Workers, Mechanics Educational Society, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Retail Clerks, Seafarers, United Shoe Workers, United Stone & Allied Products Workers, and Street & Electric Railway Employes.

One-year awards: Bricklayers, Brick & Clay Workers, Clothing Workers, Commercial Telegraphers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Jewelry Workers, Leather Workers, Marine Engineers, Sheet Metal Workers, Transport Service Employes, Utility Workers, and Meat Cutters.

Passing of Ross, McDevitt Mourned

New York — The 5th AFL-CIO convention mourned the death of two top staff directors in adopting a resolution noting the passing this year of James L. McDevitt, national director of the Committee for Political Education, and Michael Ross, director of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Pres. George Meany reviewed their careers and their "tremendous contribution" to the labor movement.

Of McDevitt, Meany commented: "I cannot say too much in tribute to this very, very wonderful trade unionist who made such a fine contribution in this particular field."

Of Ross he said: "The work that he did was a great contribution to this organization's prestige and standing in the field of international labor."

PRESIDENTS OF TWO UNIONS whose members are currently voting on a merger referendum confer with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the federation convention. At left is Pres. William J. Hall, of the affiliated Photo Engravers; at right, Pres. Kenneth J. Brown of the unaffiliated Lithographers. Meany said ratification would be "a major contribution to labor unity."

Tariff Agency Assailed On 'Adjustment' Policy

New York—Amendment of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 will be necessary if proper administration of the law's protections for workers and domestic industries is not forthcoming from the tariff commission, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

A resolution on international trade recalled that labor's support of the act was based on its inclusion of adequate assistance for workers and businesses hurt by increased imports and declared that its continued support for liberal trade "depends on the fulfillment of this premise."

The resolution restated labor's view that expanding trade "is an essential ingredient for a strong United States in a strong free world."

It pointed out, however, that the Tariff Commission's administration had made the trade adjustment features "meaningless" and that the commission's narrow interpretations had rejected the petitions of the three AFL-CIO unions which so far have sought relief.

"Trade policy does not exist in a vacuum," the resolution declared. "The United States exports only about 4 percent of its total product. Both exports and imports create jobs. While trade expansion is vital to U.S. economic health, an effective trade policy cannot ignore the importance of full employment at home.

"A fully-employed domestic economy is essential to the national interest and the successful progress of liberal trade. It is unrealistic to expect the United States to turn its major efforts toward 4 percent of the economy while 96 percent is operating at less than full use."

The resolution urged either Administrative action or congressional amendments to make trade adjustment assistance effective and declared that the nation "cannot afford to wait" until the end of negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade, starting next year, "to find out whether this program is working."

It called for U.S. efforts "in every possible way" to promote international fair labor standards "not only to protect American workers against unfair competition, but also to assure workers in other countries a fair share of the increased returns resulting from expanded trade."

The resolution also recommended:

- Hard bargaining on the part of the Administration in the forthcoming GATT negotiations to lower tariffs and remove restrictions on as many items as possible, reserving sensitive items and those covered by special programs.
- Government and private action to expand exports without short-changing domestic needs.
- Multilateral international agreements, similar to the cotton textile agreement, to relieve problems of market disruption involving such items as wool and other textile and apparel products.
- An end to the unfair competition to which some U.S. industries are subject through the export of raw materials, such as cotton, at prices below the domestic price.
- U.S. efforts to remove trade barriers other than tariffs.

Delegates Urge Development Of Resources

New York—A "firm, decisive, modern" natural resources policy to end waste and lay the basis for economic growth and full employment was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

In a resolution on "natural resources, minerals and atomic energy," the delegates said the government has fallen short on its resource policy despite evidence it sensed "the urgency" of problems and proposed partial remedies.

The federal government must end years of waste, duplication and policy conflict by reorganizing and unifying its resource policies, the convention urged, so that the nation could undertake new river basin development programs along the lines of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The resolution said federal leadership should guide the development of the power supply and transmission, step up its attack on the water pollution problem, act to control air pollution and the control of pesticides, establish a wilderness system and formulate a national outdoor recreational policy.

On atomic energy, a speed-up in developing low-cost nuclear power was urged with strong safeguards against radiation dangers.

In Foreign Policy Resolution:

Major U. S. Effort Asked To Strengthen Allied Unity

By Robert B. Cooney

New York—The AFL-CIO convention, expressing concern over "disarray" in the Western Alliance, has called on the United States to "spare no effort to resolve the present disputes among the allies and to built an ever more effective and powerful western community."

"In spite of the limited test ban treaty," the resolution said, "the world has yet to witness any real relaxation of tension (in the cold war) and can ill afford bickering, distrust and dissension among the members of the Atlantic Community."

The resolution said the U.S. should encourage the European nations to open the Common Market to Great Britain and other democratic nations and move towards developing a collective political entity.

In a series of other actions on the international scene, the convention called for freedom of information and travel; urged tension-ridden Middle East nations to arrange a three-year truce on their disputes; denounced Soviet government anti-semitism; criticized repression in South Africa, Algeria and the Congo; urged the completion of national independence in Africa and supported a strengthened Intl. Labor Organization.

On the Western Alliance, the resolution observed that the long trend towards an integrated Europe has been endangered by discord among the Allies.

"The disarray in the Western Alliance," the resolution said, "has been brought about largely by the fact that European integration has been halted through the refusal of the European Economic Community to admit Great Britain as a member, by a trend to transform the Common Market into a closed, inward-looking and protectionist organization and by the determination of the French government to follow, in many respects, a policy of 'going it alone'."

Disunity Deplored

Allied disunity has manifested itself in disagreement over the strategy of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, friction over trade between the U.S. and Europe, withdrawal of the French fleet from NATO control, divergent views on the war in Vietnam, contradictory trade policies with Communist nations, differences over United Nations' policies, the resolution noted.

The AFL-CIO "views with concern" this situation, the convention said, and added:

"We fervently hope that our government will spare no effort to resolve the present disputes among the allies and to build an evermore effective and powerful western community."

In view of the lack of Soviet guarantees on West Berlin, U.S. armed strength in Germany must be maintained, the resolution said, adding that "our Allies should make a more adequate contribution to the cost of the collective [NATO] defense" and in terms of conventional forces. It said also that "Western Europe should assume a fairer and larger share of the [foreign] aid load."

On other international problems, the convention:

- Urged "peaceful relations between nations" through full compliance with Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This provides that "everyone has the right to seek, receive and impart information and ideas" through all media and regardless of frontiers.
- Called for a three-year moratorium among nations of the Middle East "on all border strife and transgressions." This period could be utilized, the resolution said, for developing joint action "to overcome illiteracy, illness and poverty." The U.S. should grant economic and other aid only to those nations honoring such a truce.
- Demanded an end to Soviet "persecution and discrimination against the Jewish people.
- Protested the repression of trade union rights in various areas, singling out "the savage apartheid system" in South Africa, the crackdown on union organizing in Algeria and imprisonment of "the courageous, loyal trade union leadership" in Leopoldville in the Congo.
- Pledged "staunch support" of the ILO and called on the U.S. to make available "adequate funds" to support its work.

Emerging Peoples Seek Change Now, Becu Says

New York—"Peaceful stagnation is no longer possible; it is either peaceful revolution or violent chaos" in the newly-emerging nations, declared Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Becu told the AFL-CIO convention that free world labor "has gladly accepted its role as part of the vast movement for the political and economic emancipation of the developing countries."

The ICFTU, which represents 57 million members in 108 nations, has received "massive support' from American labor to aid in "the task of wiping out the starvation, poverty and illiteracy in which two-thirds of mankind still lives," he acknowledged.

"The masses in Africa, Asia and Latin America have been awakened to their situation and are struggling as never before to improve it," he declared. But he added his warning that they have no more time to wait, and that "peaceful revolution or violent chaos" are the alternatives.

Sec. Gen. Arturo Jauregui, of ORIT, the Inter-American regional arm of the ICFTU, also warned that the choice in the social revolutions of Latin America is whether they will be democratic or totalitarian.

The aim of ORIT and U.S. labor is the building of "strong and vigorous free trade unions, capable of meeting the challenge posed by a democratic society and of stopping the totalitarian forces of the right and left from using the political crisis in some of our countries to impose their rule," he said.

Jauregui praised, as an example, "the heroic struggle" of workers in British Guiana against the attempt of Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan to put the unions under state control. There have been setbacks, he said, in the form of military coups against democratic and constitutional government.

Criticizing the Alliance for Progress as lacking a dynamic policy capable of transforming social and economic systems, he urged that unions must insist on a direct voice in the planning of national programs, a role he said is becoming recognized.

The convention commended the ICFTU for its accomplishments and pledged "vigorous support of its policies and action." The resolution termed the ICFTU "a staunch defender of the cause of freedom, democracy and human rights against military dictatorship and all forms of totalitarianism—be it communism, fascism or falangism."

Another resolution urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to give "prompt and serious consideration" to applying for affiliation with the appropriate international trade secretariats, pointing out that the ICFTU has focused attention on "the internationalization of the world economy."

Runaway shops, the resolution said, "now travel worldwide with destinations on all the world's continents," and it is necessary for free unions dealing with international corporations to coordinate their bargaining efforts and exchange of information through the trade secretariats.

Becu reviewed the activities of the ICFTU in identifying organized labor with the self-determination aims of the colonial masses in inspiring a coming United Nations conference on trade and development, in helping to plant the seeds of free trade unionism in the emerging nations.

Becu said the ICFTU is consolidating its efforts in the newer nations, though some setbacks had been suffered in Africa where, aside from "vicious" Communist campaigns, certain governments have talked of suppressing unions on the pretext they represent a minority too much better off than the mass of peasants.

The solution, he said, is to raise the standards of the peasants, and unions can lead in this by helping to build up the countries.

Council Pledges Aid to Porters

New York—The Sleeping Car Porters can count on "the full and unstinting backing of the AFL-CIO" if they are forced to strike to win demands for a 40-hour workweek and the hourly pay raise given last year to other groups of railroad workers.

The federation's Executive Council, meeting here following the AFL-CIO convention, said it was "a national disgrace" that a presidential emergency board did not recommend a 40-hour week for the porters. The board recommended a slight reduction in working hours, but cut in half the 10.28-cent wage increase given other unions.

Pres. George M. Harrison of the Railway Clerks declared that if the Sleeping Car Porters are compelled to strike, "all railroad workers will rally to their support and observe their picket lines."

The Executive Council statement noted that Pullman porters now work a basic 205-hour month, the equivalent of a 48-hour week, and are paid at straight time for the first 35 hours a month beyond that.

Most other unions are pressing for a 35-hour week and many contracts call for even less, and the plight of the Sleeping Car Porters is an intolerable offense against justice, the council said.

While working "excessive hours," the council noted, the number of porters has been reduced from 14,000 during the 1940s to less than 4,000 today.

"If a strike becomes necessary, it will have the full and unstinting backing of the AFL-CIO and all its affiliated bodies; and it will be carried on until it is won. In this area, as in others, there is no place for a double standard in America."

State Dept. Official Hails Labor Role:

Aid Program Balks Reds in New Nations

New York—America's "unprecedented program" of foreign aid has paid off to the extent that "not one of the new nations created since the end of the second world war has chosen communism as a way of life and government," Harlan Cleveland, assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, declared in an address to the AFL-CIO convention.

Yet for all this success, said Cleveland, speaking the day before Senate passage of this year's battered aid bill, "even though we know better, we are still tackling 20-year problems with 5-year plans based on 2-year personnel working with 1-year appropriations."

HARLAN CLEVELAND

"That wasn't good enough even in the 1950s," he asserted. "It is not nearly good enough for the '60s."

Cleveland congratulated the American labor movement for holding to "the refreshing notion that instead of nibbling the foreign aid program to death, we should turn our talents to improving it . . . the beautifully simple proposition that this would serve the basic interests of the United States of America."

Trade unionists, he noted, have played a significant role in the success of U.S. foreign policy—as participants in the AFL-CIO's own international affairs program, as members of the government staff that made the Marshall Plan effective, and as labor attaches in U.S. embassies, especially in developing nations whose leadership emerged from the labor movement.

"Many a foreign door has been opened in recent years by a union card in the hand of an American trade unionist," he declared.

Over the years, Cleveland recalled, U.S. aid has been used to help weak nations "on the periphery of the Communist world" build up their defenses, shore up their economies and maintain political stability.

It has been increasingly focused, he continued, on economic and social development, "especially to help grow trained people . . . people who can learn to manage the public and agricultural extension services, the banks and factores and transportation networks, and institutions for land reform and tax reform, the schools and post offices, budget bureaus and foreign ministries and all the rest of what it takes to run a modern society."

"We have been doing all this," he said, "as part of what George Meany has called the long-term cost of frustrating those who would bury democracy, and of 'reinforcing our own strength by supporting around us a community of resolute, prospering, free world societies.'

"And who in his right mind would expect this job to be finished in a decade or two? What man in touch with reality would expect this gigantic operation to be carried out with no errors and with no waste anywhere?

"Yet the debate on the foreign aid bill this year [has been] full of the sounds of weariness, impatience, anxiety and depression—of frustration because the job has not been finished or has been tarnished with error, delay or disappointment here and there from time to time."

Congress Hit on Cut In Foreign Aid Bill

New York — "We deeply regret the failure of Congress" on the foreign aid authorization bill, the AFL-CIO convention said, and called for an end to "bickering" on the issue.

Foreign aid is still needed, the resolution pointed out, to strengthen many nations against Communist subversion and aggression and to help them fight poverty, disease and illiteracy. Administration proposals are "vital for our national security" and "sound and reasonable," it said.

"We have followed with growing concern, disappointment and dismay the protracted and often petty debate in Congress," it added. "The bickering has tarnished the image of the U.S. as a generous and understanding friend of less fortunate peoples."

Strengthened 'Latin Alliance' Policy Urged

New York—Strengthening of the Alliance for Progress to help democratic governments in Latin America survive attacks from both the left and the right was called for by the AFL-CIO convention.

"It is [the] condition of political strife and upheaval, fiscal insanity and backward labor-management relations," said the delegates in a resolution, "that seriously hampers the Alliance for Progress from achieving its objectives."

Communists are using every means, including terrorism, to subvert the progress of democratic institutions and governments, the resolution said. And, it added, traditionally reactionary forces are using the Communist threat to attack democratic regimes and thereby perpetuate their "iron-fisted" control over workers and the national economies.

Leaders of the United States and the democratic governments of the hemisphere must therefore "redouble the efforts of the Alliance for Progess," the convention said.

It commended the recent meeting of the Inter-American Economic & Social Council at Sao Paulo, Brazil, for creating a labor advisory committee to assure labor a role in alliance planning. The resolution said the AFL-CIO also would urge "instant, effective and coordinated sanctions" against future governments violating the precepts of the alliance.

The resolution in addition commended the American Institute for Free Labor Development "for its dynamic and effective work to promote labor education and social progress in Latin America."

FRATERNAL DELEGATES from Great Britain and Canada were feted at a special luncheon during a respite from AFL-CIO convention sessions. Shown with Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky (right), they are, from left, Gen. Sec. Harry Douglas, British Iron & Steel Trades Confederation; Dame Anne Godwin, general secretary, Clerical & Administrative Workers' Union, and Joe Morris, executive vice president, Canadian Labor Congress.

Boycott Urged to End Apartheid

New York—"Every action short of war" should be employed to force South Africa to abolish apartheid, the AFL-CIO convention declared here.

A resolution backed boycott efforts of New York Longshoremen and called on the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Intl. Transportworkers' Federation to convene a conference of dockers and seamen to consider a global boycott against South Africa.

In addition, the resolution said, the U.S. government should give active support in the United Nations to a selective boycott of petroleum products shipments to South Africa, as recommended by a UN special committee on apartheid. South Africa imports two-thirds of the petroleum it needs, it was noted.

The boycott actions were urged in a resolution on "the remaining struggles for national freedom in Africa."

The resolutions also called on the U.S. and the UN "to act energetically to hasten the end" of colonialist regimes in the Portuguese territories and the Rhodesias.

"South Africa stands as a 'menace' to peace and stability in Africa because it has the strongest and most developed economy, with its own armaments industry and military machine," the resolution said. The political and racial character of apartheid provides fertile soil, it added, for a takeover of nationalist movements by totalitarian forces, as shown by Communist efforts to infiltrate the African National Congress.

The resolution declared:

"The time has come to employ every action short of war to force the South African government to respond to what is certainly the will of international public opinion."

Labor supports efforts to expel South Africa from the UN, the delegates said, but this would be insufficient and therefore boycotts are required.

The "outrageous practices" of South Africa are matched to a great degree in Portuguese territories, the resolution added, citing forced labor, oppressive taxation, low wages, bad health conditions, brutual police repression and denial of basic human rights.

Role for Labor Advised In Economic Planning

New York—Organized labor must have a direct voice in economic planning or it will find that difficulties invariably will be met through an attempted clamp-down on wages, a fraternal delegate from Great Britain told the AFL-CIO convention.

Harry Douglas, general secretary of the British Iron & Steel Trades Confederation, described labor's participation on the Iron & Steel Board of Great Britain and the labor, management and consumer representation on the National Economic Development Council.

Dame Anne Godwin, general secretary of the Clerical & Administrative Workers' Union and past president of the Trades Union Congress, and Joe Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, also spoke as fraternal delegates.

Douglas said that British union spokesmen have shown they can help carry the responsibility of planning. They decided, he said, they were not going to allow British employers to fix the arrangement in the economy and, "immediately difficulties arise, turn around and say that unless the workers stopped getting so much money we shall have inflation. There are factors in the economy which causes inflation other than the workers."

Dame Godwin urged that organized labor approach the education problem in its broadest sense so as "to evolve the whole human being."

Educating the whole person enables that person to play a role in the community and especially through the labor movement, she said. If the education system narrowly creates scientists and technicians or merely retrains the miner and typist, she warned, the labor movement may find itself without appeal to "this great army of white collar workers (and) white overall workers."

Dame Godwin said the TUC speaks for an increasing number of non-manual workers, with 1.25 million already in the fold. She said the non-manual worker no longer considers union membership odd.

She also stressed the need to unionize working women in the industrialized nations and to aid "those women in the underdeveloped countries who work not as an expression of their emancipation but as an expression of their bondage." These women must be freed of the burden of poverty and ancient customs, she added.

Morris told the convention that the long tradition of cooperation and common action between Canadian and American labor represented a force powerful enough to overcome problems underlying "our current difficulties."

Alluding to the differences over the maritime union trusteeship in Canada, Morris urged "patient and private negotiation and explanation" within the family of labor.

The maritime situation must be considered against the background of an upsurge in recent years of nationalism and self-determination. he said. Canadian unionists feel "we must retain the power to make decisions—right or wrong—which affect us and the welfare and progress of those whom we represent," he added.

Douglas emphasized labor's role in national economic planning. He said labor too often has found it has elected a government of its choice and the government then is faced with "a financial dictatorship which defies it."

The new NEDC, he said, includes six union leaders, six employers, consumers and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Those affected by major decisions can now take part in making the decisions, he said, and they know "that unless the economy is planned, the economy is going to fail."

Rhaidhri Roberts, joint secretary of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, told the delegates that Irish labor also faces problems of unemployment and manpower development. Though Ireland is still divided politically, he said, the labor movement has been unified. This unity, he added, enables labor to take a more active role in economic and social progress.

Delegates Oppose Mass Transit Bill

New York — Opposition to a mass transit bill approved by the House Commerce Committee was voiced by the AFL-CIO convention, unless it is amended to protect the job, bargaining and benefit rights of employes. The Senate-passed bill contains these safeguards, the convention noted.

Step-up Urged In Programs of Labor Schools

New York—An expansion and growth of workers' education programs to instruct the new generation of members and to further labor's goals was urged by the AFL-CIO convention here.

Workers' education has become an increasingly important activity of the labor movement, with an "impressive growth" in the past two years, said the resolution adopted by the delegates. Some international unions have broken ground with new programs, others have expanded theirs and an increasing number of state universities are offering labor extension programs, the resolution noted.

The convention action commended "those affiliated unions and central bodies which have conducted a rich variety of educational activity." It urged "expansion and growth of workers' education, especially in those unions which have not yet undertaken educational activity."

The resolution also called on unions to develop programs to enable members to make constructive use of increased leisure; urged creation of education committees in each local and state central body and, where possible, of education departments in state central bodies.

It urged the closest possible working relationship between unions and university labor extension programs.

The convention instructed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education to continue to aid affiliates in planning, developing and conducting education programs and to work with university labor education programs to achieve the greatest potential value of their efforts.

Bargaining Rights Asked For Teachers

New York—The AFL-CIO has called on state legislatures to guarantee to teachers and other public employes the right to unions of their own choosing.

"Collective bargaining is not simply a way in which teachers can win higher salaries and greater financial security," said the resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention. "It makes it possible for teachers to work with the school system rather than for it."

The resolution reported by the Committee on Education, discussing the issue of teacher organization, asserted that "unmanageable classroom size, inadequate school housing and increasing clerical duties for teachers are a few of the problems which can be better solved through collective bargaining."

The convention praised as a "most dramatic accomplishment" the achievement of recognition by the United Federation of Teachers in New York City but pointed out that this right remains an "urgent need" in most school systems.

"Every state should remove any possible doubt as to the right of teachers to engage in collective bargaining," the resolution declared, "by enacting legislation specifically guaranteeing this right" and setting up "workable procedures" for them to exercise it.

James Sala Joins AFL-CIO Field Staff

Appointment of James Sala of Baltimore as a member of the AFL-CIO field staff has been announced by the Dept. of Organization. Sala, a member of the Government Employes and the Auto Workers, will serve as a division coordinator for the Baltimore-Washington Organizing Committee.

AFL-CIO PRES. GEORGE MEANY presents an "old friend", the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Adlai E. Stevenson, to AFL-CIO convention delegates. Stevenson also spoke at dinner honoring Pres. William Pachler of Utility Workers, with proceeds going to the AFL-CIO Committee for the UN.

U.S. Civil Rights Eyed By World—Stevenson

New York—The issue of civil rights "affects our prestige, our leadership in the councils of the world," U.S. Ambassador Adlai Stevenson said during the AFL-CIO convention here.

The occasion was a dinner honoring Pres. William J. Pachler of the Utility Workers, the proceeds of which went to benefit the AFL-CIO Committee for the United Nations.

Stevenson, who heads the U.S. delegation to the UN, said that delegates from African countries "can and do distinguish between that discrimination in America which conflicts with official government policy and that which, like apartheid in South America, is government policy."

"They know that our government," the diplomat said, "is deeply committed to a course of action that is as courageous as it is far-seeing, and they know that in the open society that is the U.S. every step of the battle will be witnessed by the world."

They also note our shortcomings, Stevenson said, adding:

"Until that day arrives when intent gives way to accomplishment, when every man can receive an education, qualify for a job, be a union member, live where he wants—in short, when the only qualifications for the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness will be his personal qualifications as a man—then and only then will the voice with which we speak in the United Nations be completely clear. Only then will our national conscience be clear."

The ambassador told his labor audience, which also included as guests chiefs of UN missions from African, Asian and Latin American countries, that labor, "perhaps more than any other organized group in America," has the potential to help secure passage of the civil rights bill now before Congress.

Meany, honorary chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee for the United Nations, described the testimonial to Pachler as "a richly deserved tribute." The AFL-CIO leader said that labor's establishment of a UN "friendship" office across the street from the UN building in this city was in keeping with its long-time involvement in international affairs and particularly its struggle against totalitarianism.

"Labor is always the first victim of a dictatorship," he said, "and it is this which causes American labor to be allied with workers throughout the world. Perhaps it is intelligent selfishness but when we use our material resources, we feel we are making a contribution to the welfare of our great country."

The AFL-CIO Committee for the UN and "labor's friendship office" are names used interchangeably. Organized with approval of the AFL-CIO Executive Council by the New York City Central Labor Council, the office serves UN delegates, particularly those with a trade union background, as a bridge in meeting trade unionists in the metropolitan area. The committee is headed by Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., as chairman, and includes New York labor officials. It is financed by the national AFL-CIO and by local New York unions.

The dinner proceeds were estimated by Michael Sampson, business manager of Utility Workers Local 1-2, at $20,000. Sampson was toastmaster. Other speakers included AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and James B. Carey and Joseph Fisher, former UWUA President.

Wide Community Work Urged on All Unions

New York—The AFL-CIO convention called for the creation of community services departments and full-time staffs throughout the labor movement to strengthen America's communities "in the area of health, welfare and recreation."

The delegates adopted a wide range of other resolutions dealing with community services and problems of public welfare, consumer counseling, blood banks, aid to the handicapped, fund raising, and labor representation on agency boards.

The resolution on community services urged all affiliates to set up community services departments with full-time staff. It said state and city central bodies should create such committees with full-time staff wherever possible. Local unions were urged to establish community committees.

Also encouraged were a variety of programs and activities—equitable labor representation on the boards of public and voluntary agencies; a stronger labor role in policy and program planning; a labor role in civil defense and disaster relief; a labor role in planning health, welfare and recreational services to meet social problems.

In other resolutions, the delegates:

- Lashed "punitive" public welfare rules in the District of Columbia which bar aid to needy families.
- Called on all state and local central bodies to learn more about community agencies, seek top-level participation and develop competent labor representatives.
- Urged the consolidation of voluntary fund raising efforts.
- Demanded an end to "means test" fee charging by voluntary agencies, with the exception of minimal fees, pointing out that union members contribute substantial sums to support such agencies in the first place.
- Expressed alarm at the "malnutrition and hunger" suffered by millions and urged nationwide expansion of the Administration's food stamp program.
- Pledged labor's continued support of non-profit, voluntary blood banks and called for a national program of blood-banking. Support of the American and International Red Cross also was reaffirmed.

Crisis in Education:

$20 Billion U.S. Aid Sought for Schools

New York—There must be a massive federal investment in education, the AFL-CIO convention declared here, saying that "America's schools are in a state of crisis."

The labor movement "is committed to the need for quality education for all American young people," a convention resolution said, "wherever their homes may be, however rich or poor their parents, whatever their race or nationality."

Toward this goal of quality education, the AFL-CIO urged a wide range of actions: $20 billion in federal aid for school construction; higher salaries for teachers; free public schooling through junior college; compulsory schooling until age 18; expanded adult education; a speed-up in school desegregation; federal loans and other aid for non-public schools; bargaining rights for teachers.

"There is no question that money spent for education is not a social cost but an essential form of investment in economic growth," the convention said, adding that the "magnitude" of the "state of crisis" in the schools is "little understood."

On classroom construction, the resolution said a bare minimum of $4 billion is needed to build 66,000 classrooms to meet the overflow of present pupils and bring class size down to a maximum of 30. Another 51,400 classrooms are needed to replace those which are combustible and otherwise obsolete. To build all 880,000 classrooms the nation needs at maximum would cost over $30 billion.

A $20 billion program for classroom construction could be amortized over a period of years and "it is a cost which the economy can well afford," the resolution added.

The resolution noted that federal funds under defense education, impacted areas and vocational education programs have been going to segregated school systems. It maintained U.S. funds should be withheld from all communities which defy the Supreme Court's school desegration decisions.

On the church-state obstacle, the resolution said that "non-public elementary and secondary schools should receive as much assistance as is constitutionally possible," urging loans and wider aid through the national defense education act.

On teacher salaries, the resolution said an additional expenditure of about $2 billion a year would be required to raise teachers to an average of $8,000 a year.

It noted that the income of teachers has lagged behind that of most other professional workers, with one of every seven teachers leaving his job at the end of the year.

The resolution stressed the need to modernize and expand vocational education.

It noted legislation passed in both houses of Congress but subject to conference committee agreement would expand skill training opportunities and be in accord with labor's belief "that all young people, regardless of race, must have equal access to job training under vocational education and under the apprenticeship programs.

Goal 14 Years of Free Schooling

On higher education, the resolution said the time has come to make available 14 years of free schooling for all young people, with junior colleges and federal scholarship provided so that children of lower income families may expect further education to the extent of their ability.

The resolution called for a variety of adult education programs to reduce the burden of illiteracy. Public libraries are in a "deplorable" state, the resolution said, urging aid to expand such facilities.

It also outlined the standards and principles which labor believes are basic to "quality education for all American young people." These included teacher qualifications, bargaining rights for teachers and democratically-run schools, a flexible educational program to meet a variety of student needs.

Beirne Cites Unionists' Role As Citizens

New York—Trade unionists are "citizens first" and the proof lies in their community service, Joseph Beirne, chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, told the AFL-CIO convention.

Beirne said organized labor has 155 people working fulltime for community benefit in 98 cities and towns. In addition, some 75,000 union members serve on boards and committees of health and welfare agencies, and another 65,000 union members provide home counseling service, he reported.

He pointed out that during 1962-63, labor raised $175 million among AFL-CIO members for united funds and councils. This represented about 34 cents of every voluntary dollar collected in the health and welfare field, he noted. AFL-CIO members contributed 35 percent of all the voluntary blood donated to the Red Cross, he added.

On civil rights, Beirne said, organized labor is "exclusively responsible" for preventing the expulsion of the Urban League from United Fund campaigns in many southern states.

The community service of union members, he said, includes providing millions of dollars in strike assistance, in raising millions for disaster aid, in building summer camps for children, in sponsoring and running Boy and Girl Scout clubs and many other activities.

Civil Rights Action Program Adopted

Labor Steps Up Drive For Freedom, Equality

(Continued from Page 1)

Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph to strengthen labor's historic alliance with Negroes in their fight for full equality.

"The labor movement traditionally has been the only haven for the dispossed, the despised, the neglected, the downtrodden and the poor," Randolph declared. "We must pledge our lives to the social revolution which will bring all of them into labor's crusading fold—into the pale of dignity and economic well-being."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated the president of the Sleeping Car Porters for "a very moving, intelligent address on a subject that he has been leading for many years."

Meany also reported on the progress of the special taskforce committee established last July under his leadership to carry the civil rights struggle into the nation's major cities through broadly-based community action groups.

In the short span of the task force's existence, he reported, it has worked out plans with central bodies to spur community action in Cincinnati, Boston, Washington, Milwaukee, Oakland, San Francisco, Denver, Houston, and a number of other cities. The response from central bodies, he said, has been such that the committee plans to double the AFL-CIO staff assigned to the community projects.

Community Action Spurred

Discussing the resolution then before the convention, Meany declared his confidence "that we can do a good job in this field."

"I don't know of any time where I have seen the American trade union movement, right down to the grass roots level, more conscious and more awake on this particular problem," he said. "But we have got to do it; we have got to do it from a trade union point of view."

A mood of determination was reflected in the repeated pleas of speakers supporting the resolution, urging delegates to go back to their home cities and put the program to work.

Among the speakers during the debate—all of whom endorsed the resolution—were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, reporting as chairman of the Standing Committee on Civil Rights; Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther, a member of the special taskforce committee; Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan; Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh; Vice Pres. Cleveland Robinson of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Vice Pres. Frank Evans of the Allied Industrial Workers; Leo Smith, Civil Rights Committee chairman of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO; Mary Callahan, IUE executive board member; Matthew Guinan, executive vice president of the Transport Workers, and Herrick S. Roth, president of the Colorado AFL-CIO.

Standing Committee Review

Schnitzler presented a comprehensive review of the activities of the Standing Committee on Civil Rights since the 1961 convention, including the substance of the Executive Council's report to the convention on the progress in eliminating segregated locals, negotiating non-discrimination clauses in union contracts and winning enactment of state and community anti-discrimination legislation.

"We haven't done all that we should have done," Schnitzler observed, but by "harnessing all of your good will, your efforts, we can move on and do the total job that our resolution calls for."

The resolution urged prompt enactment of the omnibus civil rights bill of the House Judiciary committee as "the strongest civil rights measure ever to be reported by a committee of Congress."

Expressing the hope that it will be strengthened in its public accommodations section and in the enforcement powers of the equal employment opportunity commission it would establish, the convention nevertheless declared that the bill "would go far toward achieving the goal of equality."

In other major points, the resolution:

- Called on all affiliates to establish vigorous civil rights programs of their own, to review the practices of their locals to see that all members are fairly represented.
- Called on affiliates "to give their vigorous support" to civil rights legislation in Congress and to state and community legislation to guarantee fair employment practices, fair housing and equal access to public accommodations.
- Called for federal action to wipe out discrimination in hospitals and other health facilities built with federal funds under the Hill-Burton Act.
- Urged the U.S. Employment Service to carry forward its program of eliminating discrimination in employment office operations.
- Pledged to enlist the practical cooperation of all affiliates in the efforts of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity to remove and prevent discrimination in government jobs and under government contracts.
- Urged the establishment of apprenticeship information centers in every community to facilitate access to training for all qualified applicants.
- Reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's civil rights compliance procedure, adopted at its 1961 convention, to establish machinery for dealing with complaints of discrimination by unions or employers and urged that it be widely publicized "to bring it within the reach of anyone who may be aggrieved."
- Endorsed the special task force and called on affiliates to give their full cooperation in its efforts to promote communitywide civil rights action.

A motion was made to add Randolph's speech to the resolution as a preamble and to incorporate its specific recommendations into the body of the resolution. It was turned down by the delegates, however, rather than send the measure back to committee for further drafting.

Meany remarked that Randolph's proposals will "be given consideration by the officers of the federation and by the Executive Council."

Reuther declared that the nation found itself in the midst of two parallel but separate revolutions—the "great social revolution of civil rights" and a technological revolution—which demand a common solution.

Reuther Cites Need of Jobs

"We should not get ourselves boxed in where the discussion will be whether a black American walks the streets unemployed or a white American walks the streets unemployed," he asserted. "The position of the labor movement has got to be that there must be a job for every American, whether he is white or black or brown or yellow, because there is no other answer."

CONGRATULATIONS FOR a stirring address leading the convention's civil rights discussion are extended to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph by Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, as Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and Jacob S. Potofsky join in the standing ovation given Randolph by the delegates.

Randolph Urges Strengthening Historic Negro-Labor Alliance

New York—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, opening the convention's special order of business on civil rights, issued a forceful appeal for strengthening the historic alliance between Negroes and the labor movement in the interests of both.

The Negro looks to the labor movement, Randolph said, for help in escaping from the "economic crisis" that has caught him up. This crisis, he said, finds "the mass of black Americans . . . in the same relative economic position they occupied in the depth of the great depression."

Two out of three Negro families subsist on less than $4,000 a year, the president of the Sleeping Car Porters observed, and the gap between Negro and white median incomes and between Negro and white unemployment rates is widening.

"Thus," Randolph said, "the Negro worker finds that despite progress toward social and political equality, his relative economic position is deteriorating or stagnating.

"The desperation and frustration that this paradoxical situation engenders is responsible for much of the militance and impatience of the current civil rights revolution. And that militance will not abate. For long ago—during reconstruction—the Negro learned the cruel lesson that social and political freedom cannot be sustained in the midst of economic insecurity and exploitation.

"Freedom requires a material foundation.

"Our recent civil rights gains are based largely on the economic progress the Negro Registered, with labor's help, in the 1940s and early 1950s. We are fearful that these gains will be wiped out by the stagnation that has characterized the Negro community since 1953."

Negroes an 'Under-Class'

Randolph said that automation's destruction of tens of thousands of unskilled and semi-skilled jobs to which Negroes have traditionally been relegated has trapped the unemployed Negro worker in what the Swedish economist, Gunnar Myrdal, has described as a vast "under-class" in American society—the "pariahs, the exiles, the untouchables of our economy."

"The Negro's protest today," he continued, "is but the first rumblings of the 'under-class.' As the Negro has taken to the streets, so will the unemployed of all races take to the streets. To discuss the civil rights revolution is therefore to write the agenda of labor's unfinished revolution. The labor movement cannot ignore this under-class. It cannot degenerate into a mere protective association, insulating the 'haves' from the 'have-nots' in the working class.

"And so the Negro looks to the labor movement to lead the struggle for full employment now.

"We cannot accept economic policies which envision 4.5 percent chronic unemployment by 1980, when current trends indicate that most of that 4.5 percent may be black. We certainly need a tax cut, but even more, we need a massive federal works program to put all Americans back to work at decent wages.

"We need higher minimum wages. We need a massive federally-administered training program to prepare unskilled and semi-skilled workers for the new jobs that the coming decade will bring. These are among the most important planks of the March on Washington movement."

Randolph deplored what he saw as signs of strain in the Negro-labor alliance and declared:

"Any alienation of the Negro from organized labor, any breakdown of the natural alliance between the Negro and labor, can only encourage the reactionary currents in American political and cultural life. . . .

Strong Alliance Urged

"The reactionary coalition which denies us medicare, old-age security, higher minimum wages, and other social needs—and which at this very moment is blocking both civil rights and tax-cut legislation—this coalition can be smashed only by a strong Negro-labor alliance, which rests on a new faith and confidence on the part of Negro workers in the AFL-CIO."

He praised the establishment by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany of a special task force on civil rights, of which he is a member, and urged "vigorous support" for it so that "its influence will be felt in every city in the country."

He urged the delegates to give "resounding approval" to the convention civil rights resolution and then to go forth and implement it—"its letter and its spirit"—in every city and town across the country.

300 Foreign Unionists Guests of Convention

New York—Some 300 trade unionists from all over the world attended the AFL-CIO's 5th convention, but one invited guest failed to show.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates he had received this cable:

"Still in jail. Stop. If liberated, will arrive the 14th. If not, sorry. Alphonse Kithima."

Meany explained that Kithima, general secretary of the National Union of Workers of Leopoldville, Congo, was jailed because of union activities.

The union leaders and delegations who did attend, however, were introduced to their American brothers and sisters. Their interest in learning about the role of American labor was recognized with breakfast and luncheon sessions during which they had free-wheeling discussions with officials of local and national unions, free world labor bodies and city and federal governments.

The special programs set up for the visitors were made possible through upwards of $5,000 in contributions from unions.

There were 110 visitors from Latin America, plus another 40 students from the American Institute for Free Labor Development. They hailed from Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Argentina, Ecuador, Colombia, Jamaica, Peru and Panama.

Other visitors represented Japan, Sierra Leone, Turkey, Cyprus, Singapore, the Philippines, Israel, Congo, India, Kenya, Nigeria, Gambia, Senegal, Tunisia, Ireland and Australia.

Labor Pledges Full Support to Johnson

Kennedy is Mourned As Great President

(Continued from Page 1)

by a narrow margin in 1960, as Kennedy was struck down by gunfire.

Kennedy and Connally were riding together in the rear seat of a top-down presidential limousine in the Dallas streets as the assassin fired. Connally, who was wounded, remained in the hospital in a serious but not critical condition. Johnson, in a car behind Kennedy's, was not harmed.

Kennedy died within half an hour of the assault.

Addressed Convention 7 Days Ago

As Meany indicated in his telegram to Mrs. Kennedy, the 46-year-old President had made his last speech to a labor group just seven days before he was killed, addressing the AFL-CIO convention in New York.

He was strongly backed by labor in 1960 when he won the presidency by a most narrow majority over the Republican nominee, former Vice Pres. Nixon.

To the AFL-CIO convention, the late President spoke jestingly of his "landslide" triumph, and acknowledged that the delegates "may have had something to do with" building his slim 116,000 plurality.

In his less than three years as President, Kennedy had pushed Congress for many legislative programs which the AFL-CIO strongly supported—in the fields of civil rights, jobs, social security, education, housing, and tax reduction.

In May of 1961 he signed a new minimum wage bill that, for the first time since the original law was enacted in 1938, raised the minimum and at the same time extended protection of the act to millions of workers not previously covered.

To the convention delegates he seemed grimly serious as he spoke of the nation's 4 million unemployed, the jobless rate of 5.5 percent, and bluntly said that the country's "number one domestic issue" was jobs and economic needs.

Ranging over the accomplishments of his young Administration, he pointed out that the nation was riding the crest of a burst of economic activity, but that our rate of joblessness "in a year of prosperity" was no lower than it had been nine years earlier "in a year of depression."

On his domestic program, Kennedy told the delegates, "I came here to ask your help—not next year but now."

Citing the position of the U.S. as leader of the west, he urgently pushed for enactment of his tax-cut and other domestic measures that have remained hung up in Congress nearly 11 months.

"The forces of freedom are still in the majority around the world because the U.S. has been willing to bear the burden" of leadership in the cold war for 18 years, he told the delegates.

We can maintain the burden, he warned, "only if we provide for a growing and buoyant and progressive economy here."

Johnson Held Key Civil Rights Role

Johnson, the nation's new President, served a long apprenticeship as a member of the House, the Senate and then as Senate Democratic leader before he was personally chosen by Kennedy at the Democratic National Convention in 1960 as his vice presidential running mate. He served nearly 12 years in the House and 12 years in the Senate.

In his two years and 10 months as Vice President, Johnson turned his attention increasingly to the field of civil rights. He operated as chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, pushing both industry and labor to give full implementation to principles of equality in this job field.

Although a Texan, Johnson as majority leader had been able to persuade the Senate in 1957 and 1960 to pass the first civil rights measures cleared through Congress in more than 90 years. They were conceded to be inadequate in guaranteeing voting rights, but they placed Congress on record as sensing the need of reform.

In more recent months he has traveled the country speaking almost continually on civil rights issues. At Gettysburg, Pa., last Memorial Day, he spoke out most bluntly.

"The Negro remains in bondage to the color of his skin" and of his fellow Americans he "asks justice," he said.

Registrar for Each Local Urged to Aid Vote Drive

New York—"Nominations are now open for the office of registrar."

These words are likely to be heard in thousands of union halls as the result of a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

It recommended that affiliates "consider establishing in every local union a post of registrar," or a comparable position, either elective or appointive. The registrar's duty would be to make every effort to see to it "that all members of the union exercise their full rights as citizens by registering and voting in all elections."

MODEL OF workers' housing project in Mexico impressed Pres. Kennedy during his visit to the AFL-CIO convention a week before his death. The AFL-CIO and its affiliates are advancing mortgage funds for the project under an Alliance for Progress program. Shown with Kennedy and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany are William C. Doherty, Jr., left, and Capt. Robert Clay, right, from the social projects department of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Stepped-Up Political Effort by Labor Urged to Meet Far Right Challenge

By Willard Shelton

New York—National and local unions were called to intensified political activity here with a warning that the political battles of 1964 may involve an "outright confrontation" between liberal elements and a highpowered combination of anti-labor and anti-liberal groups.

Three new anti-liberal political groups have emerged since the 1961 AFL-CIO convention, delegates to the sessions of the 5th convention here noted in a resolution urging greater union effort. They are:

- The American Medical Association, entered in the political arena "full force" and through its political arm, AMPAC, "giving substantial financial aid to ultra-conservative candidates and building an effective political apparatus."
- The National Association of Manufacturers, which "has fathered the business-industry political action committee (BIPAC) in behalf of reactionary candidates."
- The forces of right-wing ultra-conservatism, which have "turned to political action as an outlet for energies and spites" and are now "zeroed in on progressive senators from the Rocky Mountain and western states . . . and are concentrating, as well, in marginal congressional districts."

Labor has no alternative to increased political action and education, the convention declared, because in the face of the challenge "the alternative is political failure, which we cannot and will not accept." The convention said:

- There must be more effective educational campaigns, to inform union members of voting records of members of Congress and "provide factual evidence of their convictions and attitudes."
- Labor's registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns, "successful in the past" particularly in some areas, "must be more successful in the future."

The convention had suggestions for each branch of the labor movement.

National and international unions were urged to "accept the responsibility" of a quota in voluntary contributions to COPE and to promote the voluntary dollar drive "with every resource available."

National affiliates were urged also to write into their constitutions provisions for a full-time political registrar in each local to encourage registration and voting by members and their families.

'No Alternative'

They were urged to name at least one full-time staff member to work with locals in building effective COPE campaigns.

Local unions were urged to appoint political committees to coordinate programs with area COPE groups.

In a new venture, the convention authorized the national director of COPE, Al Barkan, to initiate state-level COPE operating committees to meet regularly to implement state political programs.

State and local central bodies were urged to work with and maintain liaison with "allies and potential allies of labor in the community," such as "senior citizens' groups, minority groups, friendly farm organizations."

If right-wingers have a presidential candidate "with whom they share a concert of views," the delegates said, they can be expected to rally around him with enthusiasm.

There would thus be an "outright confrontation between liberal elements and ultra-reactionaries committed to erasing all the social welfare progress of the past 30 years."

11-23-63

Congressional Reform Called Major Necessity

New York—Congress is attempting to meet complex present-day problems with a "horse-and-buggy legislative mechanism," the AFL-CIO convention declared, and called on the Senate and House to give "immediate and intensive" consideration to revision of rules and customs.

The need for modernized rules is so urgent that "congressional reform is an appropriate issue in the 1964 campaign," the delegates said, adding that candidates should be asked their attitude toward rule changes to create a "truly democratic and efficient instrumentality working in the public interest."

Chief among the difficulties faced by Congress is its "cardinal concern" for the seniority system which rewards the elders with power and prerogatives, a convention resolution noted. The effect is to give a majority of committee chairmanships to Senators and House members from rural areas, who can easily win re-election and are hostile to the needs of cities where most Americans live.

The unlimited debate principle of the Senate, which allows a minority to block action on major bills subject only to a cloture vote by two-thirds of the senators on a rollcall, is cited as an "anachronism."

The power of the House Rules Committee to "pass judgment on the work of all [legislative] committees" has often "held up and killed" bills that would have passed could they have been brought to a vote, the convention observed.

Liberals in Congress and eminent observers elsewhere have long proposed certain basic reforms, the convention said, and urged their approval:

- Revision of the Senate debate rule to allow cloture by a majority.
- Adoption of a rule of "germaneness" in the Senate to require all speeches to be "relevant to the bill under debate."
- Revival of the "21-day rule" in the House, under which a legislative committee chairman can call up a committee-approved measure if the Rules Committee fails to act within that period.
- Adoption of uniform rules for regular committee meetings, with a majority given power to overrule a chairman's personal agenda of what he will allow discussed.
- Adoption of a rule for "timely" action by committees on Administration proposals.

Labor Vows to Achieve Kennedy's Goals

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Nov. 30, 1963 | No. 48

Johnson Calls on Congress To Pass Kennedy Program

President Gets Pledge Of Support

By Saul Miller

The labor movement has pledged its "unstinting devotion to the building of the world" of which John F. Kennedy dreamed — "a world in which mankind can be free yet safe, a world in which brotherhood is fact for all men."

The working people of the world, "the voiceless millions bowed with grief" at his death, have lost a leader, champion and friend, the AFL-CIO declared.

But "this grieving nation," the federation's Executive Council said, has been bequeathed a program, a practical dream, whose fulfillment will be the lasting monument to the leader who conceived it."

The council, meeting in emergency session in Washington, pledged to Pres. Lyndon Johnson "on behalf of millions of American workers and their families . . . our complete backing in the dark and dangerous days that lie ahead."

It called on Congress to remain in session "and pass the program that our martyred President proposed," declaring there could be no more "fitting memorial" than to go on "with the business of the republic with a new sense of urgency."

Leaders Asked to Act

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany transmitted to the majority and minority leaders of both houses of Congress the request of the council, noting in his letters that "the Congress, it seems to us, owes it to the new President and to the nation to fulfill its constitutional role in this tragic hour."

The council said the nation and the world "are fortunate" to have

(Continued on Page 2)

PRES. LYNDON B. JOHNSON addresses joint session of Congress shortly after assuming the reins of government. Behind him are House Speaker John McCormack (D-Mass.) and Sen. Carl Hayden (D-Ariz.), president pro tem of the Senate.

Court Contest Due:

Arbiters Give Rails Power to End Jobs

By David L. Perlman

An arbitration board set up by Congress has awarded railroads the right to eliminate—primarily through attrition—tens of thousands of jobs.

Labor members of the arbitration panel sharply dissented and at least two—possibly all five—of the operating unions will challenge the decision in federal court.

Still ahead for both unions and management is a renewal of negotiations on major work rules issues which Congress did not submit to the seven-member arbitration panel. These include management demands for changes in the wage structure and the right to combine the duties of road and yard crews, plus union proposals for improved overtime pay and wage and work guarantees.

If a settlement of these issues is not reached by Feb. 24, either party will be free to act unless Congress passes new legislation.

The arbitration decision was written by the three neutral members—Chairman Ralph T. Seward, Benjamin Aaron and James J. Healy—and concurred in by the two management representatives. Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and Vice Pres. Ray H. McDonald of the Railroad Trainmen, the labor members, refused to sign the report.

Briefly summarized, the arbitration award provides that:

(Continued on Page 7)

Asks Action Now On Taxes, Rights

By Willard Shelton

Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson in his first public declaration of policy pledged his Administration to continue "the forward thrust of America" begun by the assassinated John F. Kennedy.

In an address to a joint session of Congress the new President called on the legislators "to act wisely, vigorously and speedily" on the civil rights and tax bills that in recent months had become Kennedy's chief concern.

In the field of foreign policy he pledged that "this nation will keep its commitments from South Vietnam to West Berlin," and will at the same time "be unceasing in the search for peace."

To a Congress still under the sense of shock that shook the nation at the shooting of Kennedy, Johnson uttered a solemn appeal intended for the nation at large.

"The time has come for Americans of all races and creeds and political beliefs to understand and respect one another," he said.

"Let us put an end to the teaching and preaching of hate and evil and violence. Let us turn away from the fanatics of the far left and the far right, from the apostles of bitterness and bigotry, from those defiant of law, and those who pour venom into our nation's bloodstream.

"I profoundly hope that the tragedy and torment of these terrible days will bind us together in new fellowship, making us one people in our sorrow."

Meany Lauds Message

From AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany came praise for the new President's "excellent" message.

The federation's Executive Council had already declared its "warm, understanding and sympathetic support" to Johnson and to the building of the world of which Kennedy had dreamed—"a program, a practical dream, whose fulfillment" would be Kennedy's "lasting monument."

Of Johnson's keynote message to Congress, Meany said: "He has launched his Administration with words of strength and urgency. We trust the Congress will

(Continued on Page 8)

Major Bills Still Face Congress

Congress, which paused with the rest of the nation for solemn tribute to John F. Kennedy, still has before it most of the major legislative proposals he sent to Capitol Hill.

The tax cut bill, which Kennedy told the AFL-CIO convention a week before his death is needed "now" as "insurance against a recession next year," is still in the unsympathetic hands of the Senate Finance Committee headed by Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.). Byrd announced a slight step-up in his committee's timetable of hearings after Pres. Johnson's summons to Congress for speedy action.

Just a day before Kennedy's assassination, the House Judiciary Committee sent its bipartisan civil rights bill to its next hurdle, the Rules Committee, complete with 121 pages of majority, minority and individual views.

A bipartisan majority described the bill as "a constitutional and desirable means of dealing with the humiliations of racial and other discriminations."

Southerners Protest

A group of southern dissenters labeled it "extreme and vicious."

Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), a foe of civil rights legislation, has said his committee's hearings will be "deliberate," a statement observers take to mean that all possible delaying tactics will be used.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Md.) introduced, on Nov. 27, a resolution setting the stage for a discharge petition to bring the rights bill to

(Continued on Page 8)

Labor Could Call Him Its Own . . .

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was a President labor could call its own—not in an exclusive sense, because like any President he saw himself as servant of all the people, but in the sense of his understanding of the aspirations and needs of those who earn their bread by wages and salaries.

The relationship between Kennedy and labor spokesmen was one of agreement on broad objectives. It was a relationship of mutual respect. It was above all one of communication, of frequent contact and exchange of ideas.

There were differences on specifics, or the timing of specifics, and they were frankly stated: The 35-hour workweek was one of them, and the late President several times said publicly that he believed a reduction in the statutory workweek would be inflationary in its effects.

Yet no man in public life was more sensitive than Kennedy to the overriding threat to national security posed by the country's incapacity to cut the rate of unemployment to less than 5 percent across the last five years.

In his last appearance before a labor convention, his speech to the 5th AFL-CIO convention in New York, he spoke of his distress at the fact that in 1963, a "year of prosperity" the 5.5 percent joblessness rate was no lower than in the "recession" year of 1954, and bluntly expressed his belief that without "the most extraordinary economic progress, we cannot possibly make

(Continued on Page 2)

FLAG-COVERED COFFIN of John F. Kennedy, murdered 35th President, was viewed by an estimated 1 million mourners on last journey to his grave in Arlington, Va., National Cemetery. Seven white horses and an honor guard accompany caisson, followed by bearer of the President's flag, through the streets of Washington.

Kennedy Understood Aspirations of Workers

(Continued from Page 1)

a dent in the 5.5 percent figure."

He could state a fact with vividness—the loss of man hours in 1962 "in terms of those willing but unable to find fulltime work" was a "staggering" loss of 1 billion work days, "equivalent to shutting down the entire country for three weeks with no pay."

Kennedy came with zest and zeal to labor conventions—to the AFL-CIO conventions in 1961 and 1963, to conventions of the Textile Workers Union of America, Steelworkers, Carpenters, Machinists, Ladies' Garment Workers during his campaign year of 1960, to the 75th anniversary dinner of the Machinists in 1963. He sent filmed messages to the Steelworkers and Retail Clerks conventions thereafter when he could not be present personally. He was chief speaker at a dinner commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Dept. of Labor.

Labor Welcomed

Labor groups were welcome at the White House during his term of office: The Executive Council and two other groups for luncheon, the editors of the labor press for a reception, the Women's Activities Division of COPE and delegates to a September 1963 Big Cities COPE conference for receptions in the White House Rose Garden, the first graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development in the Rose Garden. He dedicated the $40 million Ladies' Garment Workers cooperative housing development, in May 1962, as an example of "social responsibility at its best."

He greatly strengthened labor representation in our embassies abroad. In his 1961 speech to the AFL-CIO convention, he stressed the value of labor "ambassadors" to other countries:

"I do not think people who are not in the labor movement realize . . . what a great asset for freedom the American labor movement represents all around the world. . . . I urge you to redouble your efforts. The hope of freedom in these [emerging] countries rests to a great extent with the labor movement.

"We do not want to leave the people of some countries a choice between placing their destiny in the hands of the few who hold most of the property, and on the other side the Communist movement. . . . We want them to have the instruments of freedom themselves and provide for progress in their countries. And a strong free labor movement can do it."

The long list of Kennedy recommendations on legislation paralleled, to a large degree, positions the AFL-CIO had long worked for—not because the federation urged them but because, as a modern man, he believed that this generation had an obligation to develop its own social reforms as a foundation for the future.

He signed the depressed areas bill Pres. Eisenhower had twice vetoed. He signed into law a minimum wage bill that spread federal protections to 3.6 million workers not previously covered and raised the statutory wage to $1.25 an hour. He pushed through a 1961 federal jobless compensation law to bridge the gap for millions left stranded by exhaustion of state benefits.

Signed Equal Pay Bill

He signed a bill requiring equal pay for women doing the same job as men. He signed a bill for accelerated public works, another bill that pioneered in this country for manpower development and training.

Kennedy signed an executive order authorizing exclusive bargaining rights for groups of federal employes who proved their majority and authorized a voluntary dues checkoff. He pushed higher wages and salaries for government workers on the principle of "comparability" with those in private work.

He issued an executive order requiring that equal opportunity to all, regardless of race, creed or country of origin, must be accorded by companies on government contracts. He issued another executive order forbidding racial bias in federal or federally-aided housing.

He sent to Congress the strongest draft legislation on civil rights the country has known from the White House. On housing, school aid, health care, his requests were comprehensive.

His personal relationships with spokesmen of workers were cordial and gracious. The doors of the White House were open to them—as they were, and properly so, to the spokesmen of the business and financial communities. When he went to Germany to encourage the West Berliners under the shadow of the Soviet wall that divides the city, one of his invited guests was AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and one of his speeches was to a union convention of construction workers.

Condolences to Mrs. Kennedy:

Unions Voice Grief at Slaying Of 'Warm Friend' of Labor

Workers through their unions joined the great and small of the world in voicing their grief at the assassination of one they regarded as a firm friend and in extending the warmth of their sympathy to his widow and children.

Their statements gave expression to the esteem they held for Pres. Kennedy, and their telegrams to Mrs. Kennedy reflected the depth of their affection for a lost leader in the never-ending fight for social and economic justice, for common decency and for peace.

"He was a warm friend of the working people of America," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired Mrs. Kennedy immediately after the tragedy, "and only a week ago it was our great honor and privilege to show him in person the warmth and affection in which we held him."

Meany was referring to the slain President's speech before the AFL-CIO convention in New York.

"To you and your children," he continued, "go the heartfelt sympathy of millions of workers who admired and loved your husband and who were the beneficiaries of his wisdom, courage and devotion to freedom."

The executive board of the Texas AFL-CIO, at a meeting in Austin, passed a resolution declaring that the people of the U.S. "and, indeed, of the world, have suffered, in the striking down of Pres. John F. Kennedy, a grievious loss," and said his death "came at the hand of and as the direct result of the indiscriminate sowing of hate and extremism." The board condemned "in the strongest possible terms the peddlers of hate and fear and mistrust."

Other state and local central bodies also joined in the mourning.

'Second Emancipator'

Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters, an AFL-CIO vice president and a leader in the civil rights fight, was deeply moved by the murder.

"One hundred years ago," he said, "the Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, was struck down by an assassin's bullet. He had just then finished the first emancipation of black slaves.

"Today, Pres. John F. Kennedy, who was the second emancipator of black people from the serfdom of racial segregation, has been struck down by an assassin's bullet. Negroes face a challenge to rededicate their lives to complete the unfinished business of American democracy for which two Presidents have died."

General Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions also sent condolences to Mrs. Kennedy expressing the "grief of free trade unionists throughout the world for the loss of the great leader for world freedom and progress," John F. Kennedy.

Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers declared that "the civilized world has been shocked by this brutal and heinous crime."

"All those who yearn for peace have suffered a grievous loss in the death of this gallant champion of human freedom," he said.

The killing was branded "incredible" by Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers.

"The perpetrators of this awful act," he continued, "reflect the sickness of part of our population, a sickness which decent people abhor and which must be stamped out of our national life . . .

"During his short tenure in office, Pres. Kennedy demonstrated on more than one occasion the warmth, humility and innate goodness of a truly decent man; his pathetically few years as President were dedicated to the vision of a world at peace and prosperity for the people of all nations. We, who were close to him and among his most ardent admirers, will particularly mourn him."

The Postal Clerks viewed "with horror the incomprehensible act which caused the death of our beloved President" and called it "extremely difficult to understand how a tragedy such as this could happen in this enlightened age in America."

The Government Employes Council called Kennedy's "tragically brief" tenure in the White House a "memorable" era of progress for the nation's 2 million federal civil service employes.

The council expressed to Mrs. Kennedy "as best we could at a time when words seem hopelessly inadequate, the depth of our sorrow."

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. sent the department's sympathy to Mrs. Kennedy through Johnson, to whom he pledged "full and complete cooperation."

The families of "a million Machinists," IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes wired Mrs. Kennedy, "share with you the pain of this tragic hour."

"We pledge that the fight for his liberal principles will continue," he added.

In another telegram, Pres. James B. Carey and Acting Sec.-Treas. George Collins of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told Mrs. Kennedy they and the members of the union were "heart-sick and terribly saddened."

"We mourn the loss of the President not only as our chief of state but as our friend," they said. "John F. Kennedy knew the needs of our nation and the free world and had the courage and will to lead us. His death is a tragedy for all mankind."

Film to Preserve Convention Speech

Pres. Kennedy's last message to the workers of America—his address to the AFL-CIO convention — will be made into a 16-mm film for distribution in December, the federation announced. Further information on distribution will be available soon, a spokesman said.

AFL-CIO Pledges 'Unstinting' Drive To Achieve Goals Set by Kennedy

(Continued from Page 1)

in Johnson "a man of vast legislative experience," who was given "extraordinary responsibilities" during his service as vice president "and who acquitted himself with distinction in each of these tasks."

And in evaluating the "brutal assassination" of Pres. Kennedy, the council declared flatly that "hatred pulled the trigger."

It warned that "hatred is a clear and present threat to American society," that it is on the rise in America—the hatred of Birmingham, of the John Birch Society, of the followers of Gen. Walker, "the hatred of the fanatical Communists."

The nation's hope, the statement said, is that the people will awaken to this peril of their own making and that the "tragedy which hatred has visited upon our land" will touch the "hearts of those whom hatred has corrupted."

Of Kennedy and his relationship with workers, the council declared that he had "earned their confidence, their trust, their friendship. He gave them courage and a sense of destiny. He led them toward great victories over adversity that only a man of compassion could understand."

The statement noted the late President's leadership in securing a new minimum wage law because he knew "it was milk and bread and shoes for millions of his fellow citizens." It remembered his work to aid people in the depressed areas, to eradicate slums and especially his struggle for civil rights.

"More than any President since Abraham Lincoln, whose fate he shared, John Kennedy brought to America understanding of the struggle, appreciation of the plight of the victims of discrimination and segregation, determination that America must—and would—win this battle against hatred," it said.

Historic Turning Point

His courage when the Soviets challenged the nation with "their Cuban missiles" and their resulting backdown, it noted, "may well go down in history as a turning point in mankind's struggle for peace and freedom."

Testimony to the late President's role as a world leader found "moving confirmation" on the street corners throughout the world, the council said, and in the flood of messages to the AFL-CIO "expressing the most poignant sorrow from trade union organizations throughout the world." It concluded:

"To his memory, we pledge our unstinting devotion to the building of the world of which he dreamed—a world in which mankind can be free yet safe, a world in which brotherhood is fact for all men."

Of Johnson, the council noted that "he is deeply committed to the program of his martyred predecessor and he was clearly a partner in its design and scope." The fulfillment of this program "remains of primary importance to our own country and to the cause of freedom," it added.

"We know," the council statement continued, "Johnson shares these objectives. We know he will prove equal to the problems and challenges which will await him. We extend to him, in this most tragic hour in the history of our great republic, our warm understanding and sympathetic support."

The council commended Johnson for mobilizing the full resources of the government to "uncover and make public the whole truth behind the slaying of his beloved predecessor," but said one fact is clear:

"No matter what the identity or motive of the man who held the gun, hatred pulled the trigger."

The Memories Tumble from the Past

Memories of the vibrant, smiling, confident young man who was our President come tumbling from the past that will never die for labor union members who gave him their affection and their support—waving his hand and grinning at a warm burst of applause from AFL-CIO convention audiences; standing while federation Pres. George Meany pins on a delegate's badge; asking labor's support at a Detroit rally on labor's own day; shaking hands with friendly workers at a construction site; signing a new law with pens he cheerfully gave away; greeting students in the White House Rose Garden; exchanging ideas with officers of AFL-CIO unions and AFL-CIO Executive Council members at White House gatherings.

Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson

TO LYNDON B. JOHNSON has come the awesome responsibility of leading the United States of America and the free world. That this responsibility has come under circumstances which we know are to him, as to us all, unthinkable only multiplies the burdens that are his.

The nation and the world are fortunate indeed to have, in Pres. Johnson, a man of vast legislative experience, who was given extraordinary responsibilities during his service as Vice President and who acquitted himself with distinction in each of these tasks. He is deeply committed to the program of his martyred predecessor and he was clearly a partner in its design and scope.

The fulfillment of this program remains of primary importance to our own country and to the cause of freedom. America must be strong in every way — militarily, economically, socially. America must be generous, wise and prudent. America must above all be true to its destiny.

We know Pres. Johnson shares these objectives. We know he will prove equal to the problems and challenges which will await him.

We extend to him, in this most tragic hour in the history of our great republic, our warm, understanding and sympathetic support.

On behalf of millions of American workers and their families, we pledge to the new President of the United States of America our complete backing in the dark and dangerous days that lie ahead.

Hatred in America

THE BRUTAL ASSASSINATION of Pres. John F. Kennedy came as an overwhelming shock to the American people. Now, as the sense of shock wears off, all of our people are asking, "How? Why was such a thing possible in a civilized society?"

America and the world await an answer. Only through such an answer, complete and beyond dispute, can the American system of justice retain the confidence of the people and its good name throughout the world.

Therefore it is wholly proper that Pres. Johnson has mobilized the full resources of the federal government to uncover and make public the whole truth behind the slaying of his beloved predecessor.

But one fact is already clear. No matter what the identity or motive of the man who held the gun, hatred pulled the trigger.

Hatred—blind, bitter, savage hatred—is on the rise in America. There is the hatred of which Birmingham has become the symbol. There is the hatred exemplified by the John Birch Society and the followers of Gen. Walker. There is the hatred of the fanatical Communists. There is no choice among them; for hatred in any form is evil.

Hatred often seeks to masquerade as a strongly-held belief. But the difference is fundamental. Hatred denies the right of others to hold contrary beliefs; indeed, hatred seeks to destroy other beliefs and those who profess them.

Hatred is a clear and present threat to American society, for hatred is the antithesis of democracy. Hatred murders reason as well as men; and without reason, no free society can survive.

Let us pray that the tragedy which hatred has visited upon our land will awaken the people to this peril of their own making, and touch the hearts of those whom hatred has corrupted.

AFL-CIO Executive Council
Nov. 26, 1963

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the
American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Nov. 30, 1963 No. 48

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Chief Justice's Tribute:

Forces Stimulated by Hatred Seen in Kennedy Assassination

Following are excerpts from two of the tributes paid the late Pres. Kennedy, delivered at the Rotunda of the Capitol where his body lay in state.

Chief Justice Earl Warren

THERE IS NOTHING that adds shock to our sadness as the assassination of our leader, chosen as he is to embody the ideals of our people, the faith we have in our institutions and our belief in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

Such misfortunes have befallen the nation on other occasions, but never more shockingly than two days ago. We are saddened; we are stunned; we are perplexed.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy, a great and good President—the friend of all men of good will—a believer in the dignity and equality of all human beings, a fighter for justice and apostle of peace, has been snatched from our midst by the bullet of an assassin.

What moved some misguided wretch to do this horrible deed may never be known to us, but we do know that such acts are commonly stimulated by forces of hatred and malevolence, such as today are eating their way into the bloodstream of American life.

What a price we pay for this fanaticism! It has been said that the only thing we learn from history is that we do not learn. But surely we can learn if we have the will to do so. Surely there is a lesson to be learned from this tragic event.

If we really love this country; if we truly love justice and mercy; if we fervently want to make this nation better for those who are to follow us, we can at least abjure the hatred that consumes people, the false accusations that divide us and the bitterness that begets violence.

IS IT TOO MUCH to hope that the martyrdom of our beloved President might even soften the hearts of those who would themselves recoil from assassination, but who do not shrink from spreading the venom which kindles thoughts of it in others?

Our nation is bereaved. The whole world is poorer because of his loss. But we can all be better Americans because John Fitzgerald Kennedy has passed our way; because he has been our chosen leader at a time in history when his character, his vision and his quiet courage have enabled him to chart for us a safe course through the shoals of treacherous seas that encompass the world.

And now that he is relieved of the almost superhuman burdens we imposed on him, may he rest in peace.

Sen. Mike Mansfield

THERE WAS A SOUND of laughter; in a moment, it was no more. And so, she took a ring from her finger and placed it in his hands.

There was a wit in a man neither young nor old, but a wit full of an old man's wisdom and of a child's wisdom, and then, in a moment, it was no more. And so she took a ring from her finger and placed it in his hands.

There was a man marked with the scars of his love of country, a body active with the surge of a life far, far from spent and, in a moment, it was no more. And so she took a ring from her finger and placed it in his hands.

There was a father with a little boy, a little girl and a joy of each in the other. In a moment it was no more, and so she took a ring from her finger and placed it in his hands.

There was a husband who asked much and gave much and, out of the giving and the asking, wove with a woman what could not be broken in life, and, in a moment, it was no more. And so she took a ring from her finger and placed it in his hands, and kissed him and closed the lid of a coffin.

A piece of each of us died at that moment. Yet, in death he gave of himself to us. He gave us a good heart from which the laughter came. He gave us of a profound wit, from which a great leadership emerged. He gave us of a kindness and a strength fused into human courage to seek peace without fear.

HE GAVE US of his love that we, too, in turn, might give. He gave that we might give of ourselves, that we might give to one another until there would be no room, no room at all, for the bigotry, the hatred, prejudice and the arrogance which converged in that moment of horror to strike him down.

In leaving us—these gifts, John Fitzgerald Kennedy, President of the United States, leaves with us. Will we take them, Mr. President? Will we have, now, the sense and the responsibility and the courage to take them?

I pray to God that we shall, and under God we will.

Council on Kennedy:

U.S. Has More Than Memories: 'A Program, A Practical Dream'

This is the text of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's statement on the late Pres. John F. Kennedy at an emergency meeting in Washington on Nov. 26, 1963.

THE INCREDIBLE LOSS of Pres. Kennedy has put a stunned world in mourning.

Taken from our midst in madness and violence was a young man of stature and strength, a man with a zest for life, who had gaiety and wit and wisdom beyond his years. And even more, taken from us was a leader of greatness and courage and compassion—a humanitarian whose love of his fellow man was broad beyond belief.

All who love freedom and their fellow man now mourn. Aside from his immediate family, none mourn him more than the working people of this world, the voiceless millions bowed with grief. Only a handful of them knew him personally. But to all he was their leader, their champion, their friend.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy earned their confidence, their trust, their friendship. He gave them courage and a sense of destiny. He led them toward great victories over adversity that only a man of compassion could understand.

Only last September millions of the lowest paid of this land had reason to be thankful to Pres. Kennedy. Through his leadership, millions finally won the protection of the minimum wage law. These and other millions, through improvements in the minimum wage law, had more money to spend.

To the world's cynics, it was a raise of only 10 cents an hour. But Pres. Kennedy knew it was milk and bread and shoes for millions of his fellow citizens, and because he knew, he fought; because he fought, millions were his beneficiaries.

He knew too the misery and hopelessness of people in depressed areas and because he felt their suffering, workers who were once marked obsolete because of technological change today have a new chance for gainful employment.

He brought homes within the grasp of many; deplored and detested the slums that degrade our land; sought the abolition of exploitation and suffering and misery. And those for whom he fought will be eternally grateful.

Most of all, John Kennedy understood the degradation and humiliation that millions of Americans of different race and religious belief know in too many parts of our land. A descendant of immigrants, a communicant of a religious faith that also knew persecution, Pres. Kennedy put his heart and strength into the struggle for civil rights.

More than any President since Abraham Lincoln, whose fate he shared, John Kennedy brought to America understanding of the struggle, appreciation of the plight of the victims of discrimination and segregation, determination that America must —and would—win this battle against hatred.

And never did John Kennedy lapse into the smugness of victory. No success meant relaxation to him. He knew always that there were new goals ahead, new victories needed, new enemies of mankind to be conquered.

The prosperity which marked his 1,031 days in office was only a source of partial satisfaction to him. As he told us only a week before his martyrdom, partial prosperity is not enough; there can be no satisfaction while millions go jobless.

* * *

THAT WAS TYPICAL of John Kennedy for across the whole spectrum of American life—economic and social—John F. Kennedy stood for progress. He had no low horizons. He had faith in the limitless capacity of America and of Americans. He was a realist in both foreign and domestic affairs and he faced the realities without fear.

It was that very courage which, when the Soviets challenged us with their Cuban missiles, brought the world through one of its most perilous periods. The surprised respect which that crucial event won from the Communist world, and from our allies as well, may well go down in history as a turning-point in mankind's struggle for peace and freedom.

For even as we Americans thought of him as our leader, John Kennedy was much more than that. He was not only a national leader but a world leader. He had the respect of presidents, prime ministers and kings; and somehow he had also won the faith and confidence of the world's people, in Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America alike.

The evidence is not merely in the assemblage of heads of state who came here to pay their last respects. Far more moving confirmation has been found on streetcorners throughout the world, from London to Laos, where the people of every race and every nation gathered to mourn a man they knew was wholly devoted to peace, freedom and progress everywhere on earth. The flood of messages expressing the most poignant sorrow from trade union organizations throughout the world which we have received, evidences this fact.

There are few men in any age—men who can combine in themselves the fresh eye of youth with the wisdom of experience; the warmth of instinct with the coldness of necessity; the scholar's grasp with the politician's astuteness—men who dare to dream great dreams and yet dare to be practical as well.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was such a man and, because he was, our sorrow is all the greater.

* * *

A WEEK BEFORE his assassination he spoke these words to us:

"Marshal Lyautey, the great French marshal, went out to his gardener and asked him to plant a tree. The gardener said, 'Why plant it? It won't flower for 100 years.' 'In that case,' the Marshal said, 'plant it this afternoon.'

"That is what we have to do."

That is indeed what John F. Kennedy felt this nation had to do, and he was determined to see that it was done.

This grieving nation is left with more than memories; it has been bequeathed a program, a practical dream, whose fulfillment will be the lasting monument to the leader who conceived it.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council speaks for workers everywhere in mourning the loss of this great and beloved man, a loss all the more terrible for the manner in which it was suffered. We extend to his widow, whose magnificent courage during these tragic days has won the admiration of all; to his children, to his parents and to the other members of his family our most profound condolences.

To his memory, we pledge our unstinting devotion to the building of the world of which he dreamed—a world in which mankind can be free yet safe, a world in which brotherhood is fact for all men.

Continue Session, Congress Urged

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent the following identical letters to the majority and minority leaders of both Houses:

The Executive Council of the AFL-CIO, meeting in an emergency session immediately after the tragic assassination of Pres. Kennedy, has asked me to transmit to you their earnest plea that the Congress of the United States remain in session and pass the program that our martyred President proposed.

It seems to us that there would be no more fitting memorial from the great legislative bodies in which he served with such distinction than to go on with the business of the Republic with a new sense of urgency. The Congress, it seems to us, owes it to the new President and to the nation to fulfill its constitutional role in this tragic hour. The necessities of these times, both at home and abroad, dictate such a decision.

I am sure that John Fitzgerald Kennedy, who loved the democratic process, would want the Congress to continue in operation; would want it to enact a program of good for all the people of the nation; would want it to erect in his memory a monument—not of brick or mortar—but of solid accomplishment for the good of this nation.

The Executive Council has asked me to transmit this message as well to your colleagues in the leadership of both Houses and of both parties.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IT WAS A SHORT TERM for John Fitzgerald Kennedy in the White House—two years, 10 months, two days—but he filled them with legislative proposals that to a lesser man might have seemed enough, or more than enough for two full terms totaling eight years.

So they would have been, except that the country had stood so long almost on dead center, immobilized in its domestic affairs. Mr. Kennedy felt most urgently that this generation had an obligation to the future—an obligation to leave for those of the next generation a social structure as vibrant and sound in its time as Franklin D. Roosevelt had bequeathed to those who came after him.

It was a recurring theme in his speeches, from the acceptance address at the 1960 Democratic National Convention that nominated him through his last appearance before a labor group—his speech to the AFL-CIO convention in New York last Nov. 15.

The country has "steadily increased in wealth and strength" since 1945, he noted, and "it is no accident. It is because of the steps taken in the '30s" that "laid the foundations for progress."

"It is our obligation in the 1960s to do those things in Congress and the various states which will make it possible for others in the 1970s and 1980s to continue to live in prosperity."

We can take pride in our $600 billion economy and our 70 million people at work, he continued, "only when they are underwriting to the fullest extent" programs "to improve our schools, to rebuild our cities, to counsel our youth, to assure our health, to care for our aged and infirm."

* * *

WE HAVE NOT HAD the kind of Congress in the last three years that responds enthusiastically to such an appeal. Any Congress tends to legislate swiftly only in moments of crisis, only when the crisis can be seen quite literally. The machinery of the House and Senate is geared to slow down legislation, not to expedite it, and this nation lives today on two planes—the 70 million who have jobs, fulltime jobs, and may perhaps be called "affluent," and the almost hidden 4 million without jobs and the other millions on part-time jobs or low-paid jobs, who scarcely know the meaning of the word. The American "under-class," Gunnar Myrdal calls the latter.

So Congress slashed or ignored a great many Kennedy proposals—proposals to modernize our health and unemployment insurance programs, to use great chunks of money to upgrade our school systems from the elementary level to graduate college levels, to rescue the cities from traffic snarls.

A President cannot pass the bills; he can merely propose them. Roosevelt had no luck with domestic reform measures after 1938; the original wage-hour bill had to be pried out of House Committee with the same kind of discharge petition that is now being attempted to pry the new civil rights bill out of the Rules Committee. After that there were no more reform bills that Congress would accept, although Roosevelt lived until 1945, although Harry S. Truman had a civil rights program of his own beginning in 1947 that would be creditable if passed today.

* * *

THE 46-YEAR-OLD KENNEDY was a son of affluence but he was sensitive to the "under-class." He was sensitive to the needs of the minorities in American life, to the needs of the dispossessed and of non-owning groups, to our responsibilities for the future.

The manner of his death was brutal and shocking. The hates and passions that produced the deed are even more brutal and shocking.

He said, once, that men in our time may remember well only two dates—where they were and how they heard of the bombing of Pearl Harbor and the death of Roosevelt. We can now add one more date: Few will forget where they were and what they were doing and how they heard of the assassination of John Fitzgerald Kennedy in the streets of Dallas and the terrible events that followed it.

He brought to our national life grace and dignity and wit; he was an unashamed intellectual; he stood for that which is good in our tradition. And if all the bills he urged did not pass in his own days, some of them will most certainly be passed in the Administration of his successor, Pres. Johnson, and the standards of the country will be elevated because of it.

Stevenson Says 'Thanks' For Mrs. Roosevelt Fund

New York—For Adlai Stevenson, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, the AFL-CIO convention here represented "old home week."

Saying "it is good for me to be among old friends—among friends in fair weather and foul," Stevenson extended thanks "for the very encouraging and heartening response to our appeal" for support of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

He said he was grateful to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other leaders of labor for helping carry on through the foundation, especially in the field of the humanities, the work of "that good, great and glorious woman." Mrs. Roosevelt in her lifetime "made perhaps more people mad at her than anybody, including her husband," and yet she died "the most beloved and perhaps the most widely respected woman of this century," he said.

Stevenson is chairman of the foundation, to which the AFL-CIO and affiliates have pledged major financial support.

TWO YOUNG LADIES bowed with exquisite courtesy as the convention applauded when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called the attention of delegates to the presence of many foreign visitors.

Major Effort Sought To Open Jobs to Youth

New York—The AFL-CIO convention, pointing out the harsh impact of unemployment on teenagers and the limited opportunities open to untrained youth, has urged a stepped-up attack on problems facing young people.

About 40 percent of the unemployed today are young people, mostly teenagers, noted a resolution adopted by the delegates. And one of every four Negro youths between the ages of 16 and 21 is jobless, it added.

The resolution warned that the problems of youth unemployment, crime and delinquency are likely to increase as the population "explosion" pours record numbers of young jobseekers into the market during the 1960s.

No realistic or healthy solution is possible, the resolution said, until the nation's underlying social and economic problems are solved. Of these, it added, "the most urgent is the problem of full employment for all—young and old, Negro and white, skilled and unskilled."

In laying out an action program on children and youth, the resolution observed that the individual young person must be helped toward creating motivation within himself, but, it stressed, many environmental factors must be changed in the local community if this motivation is to be sustained.

"It is here that the cycle of poverty, frustration, dependency and defiant behavior must be broken," the resolution declared, adding that community resources so far have been "too little and too late."

The convention reaffirmed labor's support of the proposed Youth Employment Act and also:

- Pledged labor's support of programs to wipe out slums and provide low-rent housing, better schools and health facilities, needed recreational centers and higher welfare standards.
- Commended the work of a presidential Committee on Juvenile Delinquency & Youth Crime, noting the "modest but hopeful start" of anti-delinquency programs in 17 cities.
- Urged special attention to the report of the President's Committee on Youth Employment and its "new and stimulating" proposals for youth education, training and guidance.
- Protested any relaxation of child labor laws.

Merger Probes Urged In Newspaper Industry

New York—Steps to maintain a free and competitive press in the U.S. were urged by the AFL-CIO convention, specifically legislation to delay mergers and suspensions of newspapers and an investigation of possible violations of the anti-trust laws.

The delegates approved a resolution calling on Congress to enact legislation requiring newspaper publishers to give the Dept. of Justice 90 days notice of any contemplated merger, consolidation or acquisition and to make public all pertinent economic information.

It urged also advance notification to unions representing employes so they could exercise their right to bargain on the decision and protect the rights of their members.

Pres. Arthur Rosenstock of the Newspaper Guild, which introduced the resolution, told the convention that "diversity of opinion in the market place" must be kept alive by preventing unnecessary mergers and suspensions. The resolution, he said, is asking for action to prevent an individual publisher, for at least a guaranteed period, from buying up newspapers "and make a chain simply because he has the money."

The resolution noted the trend toward monopoly with the shrinking of the number of cities with competing daily papers from 117 to 61 since the end of World War II.

Mrs. Curran Dies; NMU Head's Wife

New York—Mrs. Retta Toble Curran, wife of Pres. Joseph N. Curran of the National Maritime Union and one of the founding members of the union her husband heads, died here of cancer.

Born in a log cabin built by her pioneer grandfather in Federal Dam, Minn., she was a waitress aboard passenger liners and was the first woman to walk off ship during the 1936 strikes that led to foundation of the NMU the following year.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a telegram of condolence to the NMU president on behalf of the Executive Council. Other survivors include a son, Joseph Paul Curran; two sisters and a brother. Funeral services were private.

Pay Increase Endorsed for U.S. Workers

New York—Legislation to give government employes a "catch-up" pay raise based on comparability with salaries in private industry was endorsed by the AFL-CIO convention here.

The resolution also backed other legislative goals of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, including an improved retirement program, a 35-hour workweek, opposition to the "work measurement system" used by the Post Office, a higher federal contribution to life and health insurance for employes, and a ban on the use of military personnel to fill civilian jobs.

The convention said all levels of government—federal, state, county and municipal—"should set an example for private industry in establishing satisfactory working conditions and modern labor-management techniques."

An amendment was urged to the executive order on employe-management relations in the federal service to provide for runoff elections for choice of a bargaining representative and to specify binding arbitration when negotiations are deadlocked.

The convention also asked elimination of the requirement that 60 percent of the eligible employes must vote in an election to validate the choice of a bargaining representative.

The resolution denounced and called for the repeal of state and local laws "forbidding or discouraging" union organization of public or quasi-public employes and called for state legislation and state and local executive action to affirm the right of collective bargaining.

'Study in Depth' Urged:

Health Needs Draw AFL-CIO Concern

New York—Labor expressed its concern with the quality, availability and financing of health care in a series of resolutions adopted at the AFL-CIO convention.

One called for "a fresh look" at the possibility of establishing a national health program and proposed that labor "join forces with other progressive groups" to "study in depth and design a new program which will make good health not a slogan but a reality for all Americans."

Another resolution cited the advantages of comprehensive prepaid, direct-service medical plans over the more common forms of Blue Cross and commercial hospital insurance.

It noted that in some areas the growth of comprehensive health programs has been slowed because union members are covered under contract by traditional forms of insurance. The resolution welcomed a growing number of "free choice" provisions being written into union-management contracts giving workers the option of choosing coverage under a direct-service plan.

The AFL-CIO urged its affiliates to contract for comprehensive programs covering their members where such programs exist, help in the establishment of direct-service programs in areas which do not have them, and promote the inclusion of free choice plans in all agreements.

In another area of health service, the convention directed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security to make a study of prepaid dental care programs and develop guides and principles in consultation with the dental profession.

'Piracy' Loophole Hit In Areas Program

New York—A loophole in the federal tax laws encouraging "plant piracy" by states and communities should be closed, the AFL-CIO convention declared in a resolution.

The measure attacked the "increasingly spreading" use of revenue from tax-free state and local bonds to build new plants as a "lure" to industrial runaways. The scheme offers a number of financial advantages to the employer, the convention noted, and in some cases the employer himself even buys the bonds and pockets the tax-free interest.

"No federal law or practice should tolerate this vicious use of public funds for private profit," the resolution declared. "It is incomprehensible that the federal government should continue to abet the creation of new distressed areas through tax loopholes on the one hand, while at the same time its Area Redevelopment Administration is seeking to mitigate the tragedy of chronic distress where it already exists."

The convention urged immediate enactment of amendments now awaiting clearance by the House Rules Committee to extend and beef up the ARA's financing. It called on the ARA itself to give "rigorous enforcement" to its mandate from Congress to reject projects that theaten jobs and labor standards, and to turn down any applicant who denies workers their right to form unions and bargain collectively.

CORRECTION

The Roofers have announced that delegates to the union's 16th convention in New York City recently voted 172-77 to raise the per capita tax from $1.50 to $2 a month. The AFL-CIO News reported mistakenly in the Nov. 2 issue that the vote was unanimous.

Quick Action Proposed on Consumer Bills

New York—Progress of consumer legislation in Congress has been "dishearteningly slow," the AFL-CIO said, despite hearings and investigations which have revealed "widespread abuses."

The convention reaffirmed labor's support of pending "truth-in-lending" and "truth-in-packaging" bills and urged their "speedy approval."

It mourned the "untimely death" of Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) as "a grievous blow to the consumer cause" and urged the passage of legislation he advocated to bring down the high price of prescription drugs.

The delegates denounced the pending quality stabilization bill, which would allow manufacturers to set the resale price of brand-name products. If this "anti-consumer legislation" should be passed, the AFL-CIO said, the President should promptly veto it.

The AFL-CIO commended White House establishment of a Consumer Advisory Council, urged that it be supported by an adequate staff and appropriations, and suggested "ultimately" establishment of a cabinet-level Dept. of Consumers.

Reform Urged In 'Archaic' U. S. Budget

New York—Reform of the federal government's annual budget—"the single most important fiscal document in the nation"—to provide clear separation of capital investment and current expense accounting was strongly urged in a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

Terming the present form of the budget "archaic and inadequate," the convention called for appointment by the president of a national commission on budget reform to submit legislative recommendations within a year "to develop a modern, business-like budget."

Lack of a separate capital budget, it went on, makes it "virtually impossible" to use the budget constructively for administrative management, legislative control and adequate economic analysis.

Of added importance, particularly to labor, the measure said, is that without a capital budget it is "extremely difficult to plan and execute needed programs in the public sector, calculated to stimulate job-creation, and on a long-range basis to aid in establishing adequate economic growth and stability for the nation."

The resolution proposed setting up one budget account for "general housekeeping expenses" of government and national security, and another for capital expenditures.

As an interim measure pending a major overhaul, the resolution recommended "continuation of the midyear budget review, the income and product account budget presentation, and amendment to the consolidated cash budget to account for total income and outgo, including the trust funds, and setting up two subsidiary accounts—for current expenses and for capital investments."

$9.2 Million Is Figure for AMC 'Sharing'

Detroit—The Auto Workers and the American Motors Co., announced that $9.2 million is available for the company's 29,538 organized workers under the negotiated "progress sharing" plan.

Under the profit-sharing plan negotiated by the union and the auto manufacturer in 1961, the firm will pay into the fund the equivalent of 16.5 cents per hour per worker, according to Dir. Douglas Fraser of the union's AMC Dept. This brings the combined two-year value of this part of the 1961 agreement to $19 million, Fraser said.

Two-thirds of the "progress sharing" allotment—$6.1 million this year—will be applied to certain costs of the pension and insurance programs for workers, and to build fund reserves to provide additional future benefits. The remaining $3.1 million will be credited, in company stock, to workers' accounts. A union-management committee will meet shortly to work out details for these purposes, the UAW said.

Loans Up to $10 Million:

Mexican Housing Gets AFL-CIO Aid

New York—The AFL-CIO and its affiliates will advance mortgage loans of up to $10 million to finance a workers' housing project in Mexico, Pres. George Meany reported here.

Plans for the housing project were developed by the social projects division of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, backed by U.S. labor and management, and the Agency for Intl. Development of the U.S. Dept. of State. AID Dir. David Bell signed an authorization Nov. 14 for full government guarantee of the financing. He termed the agreement a move pointing the way to new developments in Alliance for Progress operations.

Meany told the AFL-CIO convention the project site will be dedicated Nov. 30 and that an AFL-CIO representative will attend the ceremony. Sponsored by the Graphic Arts Association of Mexico, the project, near Mexico City, will provide condominium-type apartment units for some 18,000 workers and their families.

Construction will start soon, and completion is scheduled for next August. Financing was arranged through FHA-type mortgages providing for full repayment in monthly installments over a 20-year period, at an interest rate of 5.25 percent.

Negotiations with AID and coordination of the financing by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates were handled by Alexander Bookstaver, AFL-CIO investment director.

In his announcement, Meany spoke of the AIFLD as an organization which is "training Latin American unionists in the rudiments of our American trade union operation and also in the basic philosophy of a democratic society."

The social projects division, he pointed out, acts under contract with the U.S. government as the channeling agency between Latin American unions and the Alliance for Progress in developing housing and other social projects sponsored by labor.

The agency in its first year of operation, Meany reported, has built homes for workers in Honduras, and other projects, including the new one in Mexico, have been authorized. Heading the social projects division of the AIFLD as director is William C. Doherty, Jr., who was introduced to the delegates by Meany. He is the son of the U.S. ambassador to Jamaica, former Letter Carriers Pres. William C. Doherty.

Meany stressed that the interest rate on the Mexican housing project makes possible lower monthly payments for the workers occupying the housing units.

NEW OFFICERS of the AFL-CIO national auxiliaries start two-year terms in office at ceremony conducted by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Left to right: Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director; Mrs. Beatrice Warwood, new president; Mrs. Elda Luebbert, secretary-treasurer; and these vice presidents: Mrs. Gertrude Gray, Mrs. Lillian Ehrlich, Mrs. Thelma Cullen, Mrs. Hazel Utter, Mrs. Catherine Gelles, Mrs. Lovella Porter, Mrs. Eleanor Marshick. Not visible behind Keenan is Mrs. Beatrice Weiland, vice president.

2.5 Million Units Seen Annual Need in Homes

New York—The volume of national housing construction must be kept at a minimum annual rate of 2.5 million units per year for the next 12 years to meet the rising need for good housing, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

The resolution reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for a federal department of housing and urban development; improvements in the low-rent, public housing program including relocation payments to families displaced by new projects; an expanded and strengthened urban renewal program; extension of middle-income housing programs for three years; removal of limitations on cooperative housing programs and a special series of programs on housing for the elderly.

The delegates also stressed the need to strengthen and extend coverage of the President's executive order on equal opportunity in housing and the enactment of state and local laws to outlaw all discrimination in housing.

The resolution called also for prevailing wage standards in all housing programs receiving financial assistance from the federal government, a comprehensive program of community facilities and open spaces around new housing projects and continued support for the national housing conference.

Convention Endorses Home Rule for D. C.

New York—Home rule for the District of Columbia was endorsed by the AFL-CIO convention. Delegates also voted support for representation in Congress for residents of the nation's capital.

RECEIPTS FROM DINNER honoring Pres. William J. Pachler of the Utility Workers, totaling $20,000, were turned over to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for the AFL-CIO Committee for the UN, which sponsors the friendship house for labor delegates to the United Nations. Shown left to right are Business Manager Michael Sampson of UWUA Local 1-2; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, chairman of the dinner committee; Meany, and Pres. Harold T. Rigley of Local 1-2.

Private Job Agencies Hit; Probe Asked

New York—A congressional investigation of private, fee-charging employment agencies was proposed by the AFL-CIO convention in a resolution which condemned agency-led attacks on the public employment service.

The attempt to curtail the operations of the U.S. Employment Service, the AFL-CIO charged, is intended "to force workers into private fee-charging agencies."

Unless states strengthen regulation of private agencies "so that excessive fees and misrepresentation of job opportunities will no longer be condoned," the resolution said, the AFL-CIO will urge federal registration and supervision of fee-charging employment agencies.

The convention declared that the national interest demands full utilization of the USES so that "American workers, whether they work for wages or salaries, whether they are employed or unemployed, whether they are physically well or partially disabled, and whether they have had job experience or are just getting out of school, all should be able to choose counseling, guidance and placement help when they need it without having to commit their future earnings."

Local Action Urged to Aid Unemployed

New York—The AFL-CIO convention called on local central bodies in communities hard hit by unemployment to help develop broad programs to ensure that "no unemployed worker or his family will go without food, clothing, shelter and medical care."

A resolution pointed out that the AFL-CIO is attacking the problem of high-level unemployment and technological change by pushing for federal action to bring full employment.

But to relieve the "misery and suffering" of the jobless and their families, the resolution said, the AFL-CIO Community Services Activities should aid local bodies in developing comprehensive service and referral programs.

Labor has an obligation and a responsibility to its unemployed members and the jobless generally, the statement declared, and should act with public and voluntary social welfare agencies to aid them.

Arbiters Give Railroads Authority to End Jobs

(Continued from Page 1)

- Railroads may declare any or all of the estimated 40,000 locomotive firemen jobs in road or yard service unnecessary.
- The union may veto the elimination of 10 percent of the jobs on the management list on the ground that a fireman is necessary for safety; the union's determination is not subject to challenge.
- Regardless of the number of jobs eliminated, fireman-helpers with 10 or more years of service shall retain their jobs under present rules until they quit or retire. Apparently 65 percent of all firemen are in this group.
- Firemen with two to 10 years of seniority retain their job rights but can be transferred by management to comparable jobs elsewhere. with a guarantee of no loss of earnings for a five-year period.
- Firemen with less than two years service prior to the effective date of the arbitration award can be terminated, but will receive a lump sum separation allowance.
- All presently employed trainmen and brakemen (the job terms are used interchangeably), regardless of length of service, will retain their present job rights.
- The standard train crew on mainline freight service, the board declared, consists of a conductor-foreman and two trainmen-brakemen. That can not be reduced. However, either party may move to increase or decrease the number of train crew members in yard service, on branch lines or on main lines where existing practice is to use more or less than the standard crew.
- If the parties cannot agree on changes in the train crew, either side may bring the dispute to binding arbitration. However, a job marked for elimination may be vacated only through attrition.

Under the law passed by Congress last August, the arbitration award stays in effect for two years. What happens thereafter remains unclear.

The arbitration board refused to give an opinion as to whether, at the end of that period, the new rules become the status quo. If this were the case, any proposed change would have to begin afresh the time-consuming procedures of the Railway Labor Act. A contrary interpretation would leave the unions free to strike if they had not, meantime, reached a voluntary settlement with management.

Gilbert, speaking for his union and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, said the award will be contested in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Unconstitutionality Charged

The engine unions contend that the law compelling arbitration is unconstitutional. And in any event, they maintain, the arbitration panel "grossly exceeded its jurisdiction" by disregarding certain areas of tentative agreement between the parties based on proposals made last summer by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The labor members also contended that the board disregarded the instruction from Congress to consider safety factors and instead "left the determination of safe transportation exclusively to railroad management."

McDonald charged that the arbitration panel's decision to allow review of the train crew size for all yard jobs and some road jobs "will bring havoc to the industry." He said the chiefs of the train unions will meet in Washington Dec. 2 to consider future action.

Unless overturned or postponed by the courts, the arbitration award takes effect 60 days from the Nov. 26 date the report was submitted.

Convention 'Best Ever,' ILPA Says

New York—The Intl. Labor Press Association concluded the "best convention" held in the history of the 52-year-old organization, retiring ILPA Pres. Bernard R. Mullady reported to the AFL-CIO convention.

A key development was the decision to expand ILPA services to the labor movement by employment of a full-time field secretary to assist labor papers and to promote the publication of more labor papers in areas where none exist.

Mullady reviewed the stepped-up services program of ILPA, including the sale of 30,000 copies of a union press relations guide produced by the organization and the success of another booklet to help a local union or central body in starting a publication. The ILPA is currently working on a glossary of labor terms to aid labor reporters and a handbook on advertising problems.

Johnson Presses Civil Rights, Tax Bills

Enactment of Kennedy Program Urged as Most Fitting Memorial

(Continued from Page 1)

speedily heed his advice and act in a spirit of national unity."

Johnson, the nation's 36th President, delivered his message to Congress just five days after Kennedy was struck down, two days after the dead President had been buried on a gently sloping hillside in Arlington National Cemetery overlooking the nation's capital.

Trying Period

For the new Chief Executive the period of picking up the reins of government after the shocking circumstance of Kennedy's death had been laborious as well as painful. He asked the cabinet and all U.S. ambassadors abroad to stay at their posts, the staff that Kennedy had assembled at the White House to remain to help him.

Dozens of dignitaries from foreign lands—heads of state and high-ranking officials — came for the Kennedy funeral, and Johnson saw them all to tell them personally that the policies of the U.S. would remain stable and strong.

His message to Congress was interrupted repeatedly with applause —most strikingly when he pledged himself to carry forward Kennedy's civil rights program and when he warned against the forces of "bitterness and bigotry."

"Our most immediate tasks are here on this [Capitol] Hill," he said bluntly.

"No memorial oration or eulogy could more eloquently honor" the dead President, he declared, than swift passage of "the civil rights bill for which he fought."

"We have talked long enough in this country about equal rights," he said. "We have talked for 100 years or more. It is time now to write the next chapter—and to write it in books of law."

No next step by Congress, he continued, "could more fittingly continue" Kennedy's work "than the earliest passage of the tax bill for which he fought," which if passed without delay "means more security for those now working and more jobs for those now without them."

Johnson gave short shrift to suggestions that Congress should now go home, that it should meet the shock of Kennedy's death by a recess or adjournment, by taking a rest before picking up the threads again next January.

Recalls Years in Congress

A respect for the "independence and integrity" of the legislative branch of government "is deep in the marrow of my bones," he told the joint session, reminding the legislators that he had served long in the House and Senate.

"With equal firmness," he said, "I believe in the capacity and the ability of the Congress . . . to act—to act wisely, vigorously and speedily when the need arises.

"The need is here. The need is now. I ask your help. I know we meet in grief but let us also meet in renewed dedication and renewed vigor. Let us meet in action, in tolerance and mutual understanding.

"John Kennedy's death commands what his life conveyed—that America must move forward."

He reminded Congress that less than three years ago Kennedy had given them a creed in his inaugural address — that though the nation's work might not be finished "in the first thousand days nor perhaps even in our lifetime on this planet, let us begin."

"In this moment of new resolve I would say to my fellow Americans, let us continue," said the President.

He struck the theme of action repeatedly.

"This is no time for delay. It is a time for action—strong, forward-looking action on the pending education bills . . . on the pending foreign aid bill . . . on youth employment opportunities . . . on the remaining appropriation bills."

He had "shared many moments of pride" with members of Congress during the years Capitol Hill had been his home, he said again, because of its "ability to act; to meet any crisis; to distill from differences strong programs of national action."

'I Need Your Help'

"An assassin's bullet has thrust upon me the awesome burden of the presidency," he said. "I am here today to say that I need your help; I cannot bear this burden alone. I need the help of all Americans."

Johnson spelled out the nation's obligations in the field of foreign policy: "We will be resourceful in our pursuit of areas of agreement even with those with whom we differ; generous and loyal to those who join with us in common cause."

As there can be "no losers in peace and no victors in war" in our age, he continued, "we must be prepared at one and the same time for both the confrontation of power and the limitation of power. Those who test our courage will find it strong and those who seek our friendship will find it honorable."

And from the chamber of the House—a chamber of representative government, he pointed out—"all the world [must] know and none misunderstand," that "I rededicate this government to the unswerving support of the United Nations" and all our other commitments to our allies, to mutual assistance, to the Alliance for Progress.

Johnson gave with equal firmness a pledge "to carry on the fight against poverty and misery, ignorance and disease—in other lands and in our own."

"We will serve all of the nation, not one section or one sector or one group, but all Americans," he said. "These are the United States —a united people with unity of purpose."

THREE REPRESENTATIVES of local affiliates of the National Council of Senior Citizens are shown as they arrived to testify before the House Ways & Means Committee in support of the King-Anderson hospital care bill. From left: John Fitzpatrick, Detroit Council of Senior Citizens; Mrs. Bessie Gottlieb, representing Chicago area senior citizens associations, and B. F. Jackson, appearing for the New York City Congress of Senior Citizens. They and other senior citizen witnesses waited patiently for 10 hours for the opportunity to tell committee members what passage of the bill would mean to them and the people they represent.

Douglas Urges Fraud Probes Of AMA Disc

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) has asked Congress and the Post Office Dept. to investigate the American Medical Association's distribution of a recording purporting to be a transcription of a speech by a district director of the Steelworkers.

The record, issued by the AMA's Political Action Committee (AMPAC), has been denounced as "an absolute fraud" by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Paul Normile, the USWA director whose name was used, charged in a $400,000 libel suit against the AMA that the record portrays him as "a tough-talking bully" and declared that he never made that speech or any similar speech.

Douglas told the Senate that "independent observers report there is no doubt that this record is pure fabrication," that it is obvious that it is "faked."

Describing the AMA as the "most powerful and best financed lobby in the country in its opposition to health care for the aged," Douglas said Congress "has an obligation to investigate this matter." He also wrote Postmaster Gen. John Gronouski urging an investigation into possible mail fraud in connection with the distribution of the recording.

Labor Sends Check For Mrs. Tippitt

The AFL-CIO has sent a message of sympathy and a check for $1,000 to Mrs. J. D. Tippitt, widow of the Dallas, Tex., policeman who was murdered in a search for the killer of Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO personally will present the check and a letter from Pres. George Meany to the widow.

Job Rise Fails to Dent October Unemployment

Nonfarm payroll employment went up another 100,000 in October while unemployment stayed at 3.5 million and 5.5 per cent of the work force, the Labor Dept. said in its monthly detailed report on the labor force.

The number of workers on nonfarm payrolls rose from 58.2 million in September to 58.3 million in October, a period when there is usually little change. The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics, which issued the report, said the pickup in jobs has continued almost uninterrupted since last December, and the number of employed is 1.4 million above the year-ago figure.

The service industries—transportation, trade, finance, service and government — produced approximately 80 percent of the rise. The remaining 20 percent occurred in the goods-producing industries, the BLS reported.

Most of the rise was attributed to state and local government payrolls, chiefly schools, where 170,000 were added. Partially offsetting these increases, the report said, were seasonal declines of 50,000 jobs in contract construction and 60,000 in manufacturing.

BLS said the drop in factory employment to 17.3 million was primarily because of seasonal reductions in food processing.

The jobless rate for adult men, seasonally adjusted, was 4.1 percent and for adult women 5.4 percent. The unemployment rate for teenagers—15.4 percent—was not significantly changed from September.

The total labor force rose by 300,000 to 76.1 million. Total nonagricultural employment rose seasonally by more than 300,000 to 64.5 million. Farm employment was estimated at 5.4 million, the bureau reported.

Congress Turns to Bills After Pause to Mourn

(Continued from Page 1)

the House floor this year if the Rules Committee fails to act.

The House Ways & Means Committee was expected to resume shortly its hearings on the labor-backed King-Anderson bill providing hospital care for the elderly financed through the social security system. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is scheduled to be an early witness.

Cabinet Members Testify

During hearings before Pres. Kennedy's death, three Cabinet members strongly endorsed the King-Anderson bill—Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman. Testimony supporting the bill was also given by labor witnesses, the Group Health Association of America, National Consumers League and—with particular effectiveness—by a group of elderly men and women representing city and state affiliates of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Two major aid to education bills—providing federal grants and loans to colleges and expanding vocational education—had been passed in differing versions by each house and were awaiting final action.

Also pending was a Senate decision on whether to accept a straight one-year extension of the Mexican farm labor program by the House or insist on a conference to seek to incorporate at least some of the reforms voted by the Senate for the labor-opposed bracero program.

Still ahead also is the second round battle over foreign aid. The $3.7 billion authorization passed by the Senate and the $3.5 billion authorization voted by the House are expected to be reconciled in conference committee. Whatever the final figure, it will be far below the $4.5 billion requested by Kennedy.

Foreign aid opponents are expected to seek to attempt even deeper cuts when the actual appropriations are voted on.

Scheduled to be resumed as Congress turns back to its unfinished business are House subcommittee hearings on shorter work-week proposals and Senate subcommittee hearings on the impact of automation. The congressional future book also lists House hearings on extended coverage under the Wage-Hour Act.

11-30-63

In what might be termed a posthumous victory for the late President and a vote of confidence in Pres. Johnson, the Senate defeated—by tabling—a bill by Sen. Karl E. Mundt (R-S.D.) which would have prohibited federal agencies from guaranteeing loans to finance the sale of wheat to the Soviet Union or any other trade with Communist nations.

Before Kennedy's death, the vote had been expected to be close.

As the Senate met the day after Kennedy's funeral, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) read to a hushed chamber a letter which Kennedy had written him "to urge in the strongest possible terms" that the Senate defeat the bill.

Confidence in Johnson

Earlier Sen. George D. Aiken (Vt.), ranking Republican member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, noted that Johnson had specifically endorsed the wheat sale to Soviet Russia in a speech earlier in the month. He urged the Senate to express its confidence in the new President by defeating the bill.

Echoing this sentiment, Sen. Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) told the Senate he would oppose the Mundt bill because "never was it more essential for us to demonstrate our support for the President in his efforts to carry out the policies initiated by Pres. Kennedy."

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Dec. 7, 1963 | No. 49

75 Million Jobs Key Goal, Johnson Tells U.S. Labor

Rights Vote Signature Drive Set

By David L. Perlman

The House Democratic leadership, after a White House meeting with Pres. Johnson, opened a drive for signatures on a discharge petition to force the civil rights bill out of the Rules Committee and to a floor vote.

Johnson, in his address to a joint session of Congress after assuming the presidency, listed passage of civil rights legislation as the "first" of the "immediate tasks" before Congress. He said no eulogy "could more eloquently honor Pres. Kennedy's memory than the earliest possible passage of the civil rights bill."

Speaker John W. McCormack told newsmen the discharge petition would be filed on Dec. 9 by Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), and that "as far as the leadership of the House is concerned, every effort will be made" to pry the bill out of the Rules Committee.

He said the rarely-used procedure was decided on after he had been unable to obtain an agreement from Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) to call hearings on the rights bill early this month and clear it for floor action in January.

Labor is "going to go out" to get signatures on the discharge petition, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters after the federation's Executive Council met with Johnson at the White House.

The discharge petition, to be successful, must be signed by 218 congressmen—a majority of the

(Continued on Page 3)

PRES. JOHNSON is congratulated by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany after the Chief Executive in a statement in the White House Rose Garden asked labor's help in pushing enactment of the pending civil rights bill, tax bill and King-Anderson hospital care bill. Other members of the federation executive council, who met with Johnson Dec. 4, applaud the President's statement.

$900 Million Program:

Public Works Bill Clears House Unit

A bill to extend the accelerated public works program another year—with an additional $900 million authorized to finance it—won 16-15 approval from the House Public Works Committee.

The committee acted after hearings at which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned that it would be a "tragedy" if the program were permitted to die early next year "in view of America's continued unsolved and dangerous unemployment rate." Meany had urged a $2 billion program geared "to create jobs where they are needed most."

The bill, sponsored by Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), carried by the one-vote margin after a Republican motion to defer action until the Administration makes known its views lost on a 15-15 tie vote. Opponents charged that the measures defied economy pledges by Pres. Johnson and the late Pres. Kennedy. The measure now goes to the Rules Committee.

In Senate action, the labor-opposed "bracero" program under which Mexican farm workers are brought into the United States was extended for one more year. The Senate voted 50-36 to drop an amendment aimed at protecting the interests of domestic farm workers and to accept the House-passed extension bill.

At the start of the debate, however, Agriculture Committee Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) gave assurances to the Senate that he will not seek any further extension of the program.

He said supporters of the program are on notice "that the Senate will not act again on this measure."

Similar statements had been made in the House when that body, reversing an earlier vote killing a two-year extension, approved the one-year continuation. A number of congressmen from both parties told the House during the debate that this was the "last time" they would vote for the bracero program.

Importation of Mexican farm

(Continued on Page 3)

5 Rail Unions File Challenge To Arbitration

Rail operating unions filed a double-edged court challenge to the work rules order of an arbitration board established by Congress and warned that "the future of collective bargaining" is at stake.

The five unions involved in the work rules dispute declared in a joint statement that the arbitration board exceeded the authority given it by Congress and that the arbitration law itself is unconstitutional.

The "compulsion" applied in the rules dispute, the unions said, "would force 200,000 railroad operating employes to work under conditions far inferior to the conditions bought and paid for through collective bargaining." The precedent set, "if allowed to go unchallenged," would encourage management to continue to look to Congress rather than collective bargaining to resolve disputes, they stated.

Under the arbitration award, railroads could eliminate over a period

(Continued on Page 7)

Asks Major Assault on Joblessness

By Willard Shelton

"The goal of this Administration is 75 million jobs," Pres. Johnson declared after a White House meeting with the AFL-CIO Executive Council also attended by cabinet members and other ranking government officials.

In a public statement in the White House Rose Garden, the President said that "more jobs" is "the number one [domestic] issue today and tomorrow."

He called on both labor and business groups to help him spur passage of the tax-cut bill now pending in the Senate Finance Committee, saying that enactment of that bill would be "the most massive single attack we can make" on the problem of chronic high-level joblessness.

The President in his public statement also stressed the pending civil rights bill and the long-delayed medicare (King-Anderson) bill as measures on which he asked the help of labor.

The civil rights bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee has been "denied a hearing in the House Rules Committee," he observed.

"The endless abrasions of delay, neglect and indifference" in the human rights field, he said, "have rubbed raw the national conscience."

The medicare bill, which would establish a social security system of providing hospital and nursing-home care for aged citizens, "cries out for enactment," he said, and added:

"Unless we can enact an adequate medicare program, a large segment of our population will be denuded financially by severe illness."

'Sound, Constructive'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said that Johnson had made a "good, sound, constructive statement" and that the Executive Coun-

(Continued on Page 8)

Labor Backs Proposal For Automation Study

Congress should establish a "broadly representative" commission on automation, the AFL-CIO declared, "to prevent the juggernaut of technological progress from leaving a path of frustrated and defeated human beings in its wake."

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Labor subcommittee that an automation commission—as envisioned by the late Pres. Kennedy—is needed to avert "social havoc" and help bring about "an orderly and socially responsible adjustment to technological change."

Nine senators have joined in a bipartisan resolution authorizing the President to appoint a 25-member commission, with an executive director, to seek to pinpoint the areas of major technological changes during the next 10 years and to make recommendations to deal with the problems and alleviate hardships.

In a message to Congress last July, Kennedy saw such a commission as a "pioneer in the social, political and economic aspects of automation to the same extent that our science and industry have pio-

(Continued on Page 8)

ILGWU Cited in Last Bill Signed by Late President

The last bill signed by the late Pres. Kennedy was one authorizing the striking of medals to commemorate the founding in 1914 of the first union-operated health center in the United States—that of the Ladies' Garment Workers in New York City.

A bill sponsored by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) was passed by Congress and signed into law Nov. 20. It authorizes the striking of silver medals and bronze copies marking the 50th anniversary of the ILGWU centers which now serve 135,000 individuals a year.

SOME PROGRESS in the long struggle of the Musicians for stable wages and longer playing seasons for symphony orchestras was reported at the union's third annual symphony symposium in New York City. Speakers included W. McNeil Lowry, standing, program director of the Ford Foundation's Humanities & Arts Div., who announced the foundation will survey the needs in music and other areas of the arts. AFM officials, from left, are Treas. George V. Clancy, Sec. Stanley Ballard and Pres. Herman Kenin.

Symphony Musicians Report Gains In Struggle for More Job Stability

New York—Contract improvements won by the Musicians for players in six major symphony orchestras "reflect a new public consciousness of the responsibility shared by business, labor and the community for keeping cultural music alive."

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin made that report at the 3rd annual Symphony Symposium here where local and international union representatives reported on progress in the long struggle for stabilized wages and longer playing seasons for symphony musicians. Kenin posed this question:

"If the libraries and museums are necessary to year-around mass education and enjoyment in America, why should symphony music be limited to seasonal presentations?"

The answer is not yet in sight, but some groups, mainly the large symphonies, are pointing the way, he said.

Each local symphony must survive under local ground rules and widely varying budgets, he noted, and no general pattern can be advanced. But, he added, "the exchange of contract provisions, bargaining information and procedures brought to the symposium by spokesmen for the 76 major symphonies each year has proved valuable in terms of wage gains and longer playing seasons."

He pointed out that such problems are essentially a direct local responsibility of union and symphony management. The AFM, he noted, acts as a catalyst and does not intrude in bargaining situations unless invited.

Kenin attributed the recent awakening of public interest in the problems of symphonies to the formula evolved by former Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, now a Supreme Court Justice, for settling a dispute between the New York Metropolitan Opera management and opera musicians.

The Goldberg formula enunciated the principle of shared responsibility in a community to relieve players of the role of "the most consistent subsidizers of cultural music" in America—a subsidy consisting of generally modest wages and short playing seasons, tolerated out of regard for living within the orchestra's budget.

The meeting heard a report on these new gains:

- The Philadelphia Orchestra won a substantial pay increase, fringe benefits, and an extension of the present 37-week season to 41 weeks next year and 52 weeks the following season.
- The Washington, D. C., National Symphony gained an $18.75 weekly increase over a three-year period, with seasonal extensions to 34 weeks.
- The New York Philharmonic Symphony Society increased its season from 40 to 42 weeks, and the Chicago Symphony from 33 to 36 weeks, both with substantial wage gains.
- Contract gains for the Detroit Symphony included extension of the season from 28 weeks to 30 in the third contract year, and three-year wage increases totaling $35 for a minimum scale of $175 a week.

Last year the Boston Symphony season was lengthened from 48 to 50 weeks, with a pay increase. Currently, Cleveland and Los Angeles symphonies are negotiating for improvements. The Cleveland minimum scale is $175 a week for 32 weeks, and Los Angeles pays $147.-50 for 26 weeks.

Price Index For October Hits New High

A "largely seasonal" rise in consumer prices in October sent the Labor Dept.'s index up one-tenth of 1 percent after two months of no change.

The consumer price index for October at 107.2 was 1.1 percent above the level of a year ago and set a new high. The index is based on a market basket of goods and services with average prices in the 1957-59 period as the base. This means that a market basket that cost $10 in the base period cost $10.72 last month.

Lower food prices in October were not enough to offset higher prices for most other goods and services, the Labor Dept. said. Increases in prices were registered for apparel, new cars, gasoline, public transit, rents, fuels, home furnishings and newspapers.

About 42,000 workers, mostly in aerospace and farm equipment, will receive one-cent-an-hour pay increases because of contracts tied to the price index.

Bakery Union Chosen At Portland, Me., Plant

Portland, Me.—Making it three straight in its New England organizing campaign, the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers has been chosen as bargaining agent by employes at the Burnham & Morrill Co. by a vote of 227 for ABC to 157 for no union.

Messages Pour In:

Unions Voice Grief, Rally to Johnson

Expressions of support for new Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and of sympathy for the family of the martyred Pres. John F. Kennedy continued to pour in on Washington from the American labor movement.

The Railway Labor Executives' Association extended "fullest support" to the new President on behalf of railroad employes and their families and expressed "heartfelt condolences" to Mrs. Kennedy and the late President's family.

The Machinists pledged "the wholehearted support of the IAM for your efforts to carry out the principles for which John F. Kennedy died." Earlier the union had tendered sympathy to the Kennedy family.

Johnson's address to Congress, Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers, said in a message, left no room for doubt that he is "irrevocably committed to carry on the policies and programs of the New Frontier so vigorously pursued by the late Pres. Kennedy." The UAW, Reuther said, "offers complete and unqualified support to Pres. Johnson in his efforts to fulfill the pledges he made" to the American people in his congressional message.

Pres. James B. Carey and Acting Sec.-Treas. George Collins of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers extended their "unqualified pledge of fidelity and support for the months ahead."

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters declared that "the cowardly blow that fell . . . in Dallas robbed the world of freedom's champion," and assured Johnson of the support of all officers and members of the union "as you enter upon the tremendous responsibilities of the presidency."

'New Sense of Unity'

Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO said that Kennedy's assassination "clearly, cruelly and crushingly demonstrates the impossible price that fanaticism in any form may extract from the nation." In a message he told Johnson that California workers "share with the nation a keen and new sense of unity, fully confident in your leadership, your ability and, above all, your dedication to the same human aspirations that endeared" Kennedy to the people.

Officers of the Michigan AFL-CIO in a joint statement called Kennedy's murder "one of the world's most terrible tragedies" and predicted that "his great efforts to gain peace, social justice and economic progress will live on and will wield influence on events yet to come."

The executive board of the Texas AFL-CIO in a resolution that mourned Kennedy's death, expressed sympathy to the family and condemned "peddlers of hate and fear and mistrust," also sent its best wishes to Johnson and pledged support.

Shock and bewilderment were expressed by officers of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO in a message of sympathy to Mrs. Kennedy.

"We who represent workers in the plants, factories and job sites considered him a true and faithful friend," they said, adding that the death of the slain President was "a grievous loss to all America and the entire world."

The Montana State AFL-CIO, through Pres. Joseph Crosswhite and Executive Sec. James S. Umber, extended "deepest sympathy" to the Kennedy family and pledged support of the state's union members to Pres. Johnson.

Pres. Darrell H. Dorman of the Idaho State AFL-CIO, in a telegram to Mrs. Kennedy, expressed the "shock and grief shared by all Americans" and particularly by workers "who owe so much to Pres. Kennedy." He offered Johnson the "full support" of the state labor organization.

A message to Mrs. Kennedy from Pres. B. J. Rickey and Vice Pres. John Holaday of the Wyoming State AFL-CIO gave voice to the "sense of loss shared by union members in our state" along with all other Americans. The Wyoming labor officials told Johnson that working people of the state joined in supporting his Administration.

The New Mexico State AFL-CIO sent a similar pledge to the new President and, in a message signed by Mrs. Billie Bonseller, president of the state central body, assured Mrs. Kennedy that "we share with you the grief you feel and want you to know the working men and women" of the state are also "shocked by your incalculable loss."

The Oregon AFL-CIO scheduled a public memorial service Dec. 11 at the Portland Labor Temple and urged local central bodies remote from Portland to hold their own services.

House to Resume King-Anderson Hearings

The House Ways & Means Committee will resume its interrupted hearings on the King-Anderson hospital care bill in late January, committee sources indicated. The hearings were suspended at the halfway mark in the aftermath of Pres. Kennedy's assassination.

Pres. Johnson strongly reaffirmed his support of the hospital care for the aged legislation in his address to the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

"Before Congress is a medicare bill that cries out for enactment," the President declared.

Citing the steady rise in health care costs, Johnson warned: "The peril is plain. Unless we can enact an adequate medicare program, a large segment of our population will be denuded financially by severe illness."

Financing the program through employe-employer contributions—the social security system—would enable workers to meet the problem of health care costs after retirement "with dignity and not disaster," the President said.

Earlier, at the committee hearings, three Cabinet officers opened the case for passage of the King-Anderson bill.

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze said social security financing is necessary to "protect the dignity and independence of older people."

Other government officials testifying for the King-Anderson bill included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who stressed that the cost of private hospital insurance premiums is "too high" for most retired persons to pay, and Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman.

The primary spokesman for opponents of the social security hospital care bill, American Medical Association Pres. Edward Annis, received a tongue-lashing from Rep. Cecil R. King, chief House sponsor of the bill. King accused Annis of describing congressional supporters of the King-Anderson bill as "political charlatans, quacks and frauds." Annis contended that he hadn't meant to attack congressmen. He said his remarks were aimed at "certain labor leaders."

Seniors Most Effective

Among the most effective witnesses for the bill, observers commented, were a group of elderly men and women who had waited all day and on into the night for the opportunity to testify on behalf of senior citizen organizations.

When they were eventually reached on the long list of witnesses, they discarded prepared testimony and described to the committee in simple, personal terms their own experiences and those of their friends as evidence of the need for a federal health-care-for-the-aged program.

The first of a group of union spokesmen to testify for the bill included Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas State AFL-CIO, who said the Kerr-Mills program had not met medical needs in his state; Louis Rolnick, director of the Ladies' Garment Workers health program, and Sec.-Treas Joseph C. Bober of the Connecticut State Labor Council.

The Group Health Association of America and the National Consumers League were among the other groups supporting the King-Anderson bill. A spokesman for the American Hospital Association said his group does not favor a social security program, but wants the government to subsidize a national Blue Cross program for all persons aged 65 and over.

Auto Workers Local Backs Flag Day Bill

Allentown, Pa.—Auto Workers Local 677 has formally endorsed a bill sponsored by Rep. Willard S. Curtain (R-Pa.) that would make Flag Day—June 14—a national legal holiday.

Hails 'Task Force':

Civil Rights Program Praised by Randolph

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Philip Randolph has hailed, in a radio interview, the "comprehensive" civil rights program adopted by the federation's convention and the "task force" set up by the AFL-CIO to spur community action against race discrimination.

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and a national leader of the civil rights movement, said the convention action, if "properly implemented," will "do much" to root out all forms of discrimination and segregation from the trade union movement.

Both full employment and fair employment must be equal goals, Randolph said, emphasizing that the AFL-CIO is committed to both. Part of labor's job, he said, is to mount "a broad educational program" to eliminate "lingering" fears "that equal opportunity for employment of Negro workers may endanger the security of jobs for white workers." This, Randolph said, "is entirely erroneous" but "nevertheless this fear exists."

The AFL-CIO's civil rights task force, Randolph said "is a very splendid invention" which, working through local central bodies, "will be able to arouse, awaken, inform and advise" on the community struggle against bias and form a coalition with church and Negro groups.

This approach, he said, "can't fail" because it is based on achieving "God-given" human rights.

Randolph suggested that top AFL-CIO leaders go into "sensitive" troubled communities in the South to talk to central bodies stressing that "no white worker is secure in his rights until black workers are secure in their rights, because of the indivisibility of liberty."

Business Lags

Inviting business and industry cooperation on civil rights, Randolph noted that "while we are concerned about the elimination of discrimination in the unions," the business interests "have lagged behind in the struggle against racial bias."

He said, in his interview on the Mutual network's Labor News Conference, that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's personal leadership in labor's civil rights drive is "bound to achieve effective, positive and constructive results" because of Meany's "inimitable ability for getting things done."

Randolph said "preferential" economic treatment—a domestic "Marshall Plan"—is justified not for Negroes alone "but in the interest of poor people, people who are in distress, people who are at the bottom of the economic totem pole."

COPE AWARD for meeting full quota in voluntary $1 contributions is presented by COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan, right, to Sec.-Treas. Matthew Guinan, Transport Workers, which has met its quota for five years. Waiting to receive another five-year award is AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan, left, president, Marine & Shipbuilding Workers. Ceremony was held during AFL-CIO convention.

House Leaders Drive For Vote on Rights Bill

(Continued from Page 1)

House—or approach that figure closely enough so that the Rules Committee abandons delaying tactics.

House Republican leaders, after a party conference, threw a damper on the discharge petition drive. GOP Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) and Republican Conference Chairman Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) said the "consensus" of Republicans was against supporting the discharge petition at this time.

Republicans, they said, favored giving the Rules Committee a "reasonable" time to hold hearings on the measure. After that, they said, the five GOP members of the Rules Committee would join with northern Democrats to vote to send the bill to the floor.

The civil rights bill, hailed by the AFL-CIO convention as "the strongest civil rights measure ever to be reported by a committee of Congress," won a bipartisan 23-11 endorsement from the Judiciary Committee in late October. Rules Committee Chairman Smith, an avowed opponent of the bill, said hearings on it would be "deliberate" but gave no indication how long they would continue.

The bill would strengthen voting rights, outlaw discrimination in many categories of public accommodations, bar racial and religious discrimination in employment, speed school desegregation and prohibit bias in federally aided programs.

Halleck, at a White House meeting with the late Pres. Kennedy, had pledged Republican support for the bill both in the Rules Committee and on the floor.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), himself a member of the Rules Committee, set the stage for the discharge petition on Nov. 27 by introducing a resolution in effect serving notice that a petition would be filed.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of Negro, labor, church and other groups combatting discrimination, declared in a statement:

"Because it is the most immediate and practical course open to us, we commit the resources of our more than 70 organizations to the effort to force the bill out of the Rules Committee through the use of a discharge petition."

At the same time, the conference said, "we urge the House leadership to undertake alternative ways of expediting the legislation." With bipartisan support, the statement noted, eight of the 15 members of the Rules Committee could force a meeting and a vote.

Under the rigid procedures for discharge petitions, after 218 signatures are obtained, the bill can be called up only on the second or fourth Mondays of each month.

This would make Dec. 23 the earliest possible date for beginning the four days of debate authorized under the rule—providing the signatures were obtained by Dec. 13. But, as Bolling pointed out in a talk to the Leadership Conference, Congress would normally be in Christmas recess on Dec. 23. The next possible date would be Jan. 13.

1960 Action Recalled

In recent years, discharge petitions have been successful only on postal pay raise bills. However, in 1960, in a similar situation, the Rules Committee had bottled up a civil rights bill but abruptly cleared it after 209 congressmen had signed a discharge petition.

An historic case of a successful discharge petition occurred in 1938 during the Administration of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt when the wage-hour bill — a presidential "must"—was bottled up. In a record 2 hours and 22 minutes after the discharge petition was filed, the required 218 signatures were obtained.

One of those who stood in line to sign was a young freshman congressman from Texas named Lyndon B. Johnson.

House Unit Approves Added Public Works

(Continued from Page 1)

workers was begun in 1952 as a wartime emergency measure under an executive agreement. In 1951, during the Korean war, the program was codified as Public Law 78. Opposition to the program in Congress has mounted steadily in recent years.

In other congressional developments:

- Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) told newsmen that he has promised Pres. Johnson that the Senate will act "early next year" on the tax bill and that Republicans would support making it retroactive to Jan. 1, 1964.
- The House passed an Administration-supported bill designed to lower the cost of cotton purchased by U.S. manufacturers. At present, American cotton is sold for 8.5 cents a pound less on the world market than the price charged U.S. manfacturers. The vote was 216-182.
- House and Senate conferees narrowed their differences on legislation which—in both versions—would greatly expand and modernize federal aid to vocational education. Senate action on a conference agreement on a college aid bill has been held up pending agreement on vocational education.
- A long-stalled bill to expand the manpower training program won tentative approval from the Rules Committee, but a motion to reconsider was pending when the AFL-CIO News went to press.

IUOE Names N. J. Carman As Secretary

Newell J. Carman, 51-year-old San Franciscan, has been named secretary-treasurer of the Operating Engineers to fill a vacancy created by the resignation of Frank P. Converse of Cleveland, O.

Converse served for about a year in the secretary-treasurer's post after former Pres. Joseph J. Delany died and Hunter P. Wharton moved from the secretary's post to president. Converse recently asked to be relieved, Wharton said, to devote full time to his other duties as business manager of state-wide Local 18 in Ohio, IUOE regional director and 6th vice president.

Carman has been a member of IUOE Local 39 in San Francisco, representing stationary engineers, since 1940. He took a Harvard University trade union training course in 1951, and has vigorously promoted labor education courses for more than 10 years.

Born in Virginia, Minn., Carman served in the Navy from 1929 to 1935, mainly on the aircraft carrier U.S.S. Langley. He moved to California in 1940, married there and joined Local 39.

Carman worked at his trade until 1946, when he was elected recording and financial secretary of his local. He became an international union representative in 1948, and IUOE trustee in 1956, and was elected a vice president and executive board member in 1957.

He has served also as a California AFL-CIO vice president.

Machinists Set Strike Date in Airline Talks

Nearly 13,000 members of the Machinists have voted to walk out on strike against United Air Lines at 12:01 a.m. Dec. 19 unless agreement on a new contract is reached before the deadline.

The IAM, reporting no progress on 22 major issues including wages, health and welfare provisions, bidding rights and subcontracting, said UAL management has shown no willingness to meet and negotiate.

"Our members are determined," a spokesman said. "Unless some substantial progress is made in the near future, they will walk off their jobs as scheduled."

Negotiations also slowed to a crawl for another 18,000 IAM members employed by six other airlines. Strikes have been authorized by majorities of 93 to 98 percent by Machinists working as ground crewmen for TWA, Eastern, Northwest, Braniff, National and Continental Air Lines, but no walkout dates were set pending further developments.

Negotiators for the Machinists had set Oct. 9 for a walkout at United but the date was postponed because of the appointment of a Presidential Emergency Board. The board made a report to the White House Nov. 19 recommending union members accept with minor changes a settlement offer they had turned down in August by a vote of 7,828 to 2,068.

The IAM said the recommendations were rejected because they "virtually ignored" the major issues still in dispute. After the turndown the parties met with representatives of the National Mediation Board and reported no further progress in settling the stalemate.

Labor's Bond Fee Cut Aids Fraternal Groups

The AFL-CIO's vigorous—and successful—campaign to reduce the cost of special "faithful performance of duty" bonds required under the Landrum-Griffin Act for union officers has proved a boon for the nation's fraternal organizations.

Testimony before a House subcommittee revealed that the reduced rates obtained by the trade union movement have been passed on to fraternal associations by the rate-setting Surety Association of America.

When the Landrum-Griffin Act compelled unions to supplement the customary honesty bonds used to protect union funds with the "faithful performance" coverage, the bonding premiums shot up 50 percent.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and a committee of secretary-treasurers from affiliated unions strongly protested this high surcharge. They backed up their arguments with surveys showing that bonding companies had experienced few if any losses which would not have been covered under the ordinary honesty bonds.

As a result of the AFL-CIO's documented protest, the bonding surcharge for unions was cut in half—from 50 to 25 percent—effective in October 1961.

Recent hearings before a House Labor subcommittee, headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), disclosed that the surety association subsequently made a similar cut in its rate for fraternal groups, which for years had been paying the 50 percent surcharge.

Roosevelt put into the Congressional Record a transcript of an exchange between John F. Fitzgerald, secretary of the Surety Association of America, and Rep. Thomas P. Gill (D-Hawaii), a member of the subcommittee.

Gill asked why the bonding surcharge for fraternal organizations had not been reduced until after the AFL-CIO had raised the question of excessive charges. Gill said to the witness:

"The sharp fact of the matter is that the question was never pressed with you in any serious fashion until the unions came in and said it should be lowered. Isn't that correct?"

Fitzgerald replied: "Substantially, that is correct."

Gill then asked: "So it took a nationwide organization, which was heavily hit by this requirement financially, to come in with certain facts and figures . . . and say, 'Look, you are charging us too much; drop it.' You agreed with them, at least up to a point. Isn't that correct?"

Fitzgerald: "In point of fact, that is the way it happened."

Gill: "After you had dropped the surcharge from 50 to 25 percent, you decided it probably was not fair to leave the fraternals at 50 percent, so you dropped their rates down too. Is that correct?"

Fitzgerald: "We try to be consistent."

Gill: "But if the unions had never complained, the fraternals would still be at 50 percent."

At a later stage, Gill asked if the surety association had any specific examples of losses in the union field which would not have been covered under the less costly honesty bonds.

The surety association official replied: "No, sir, I have no specific examples."

The Torch Is Passed

IN THE FIRST TWO WEEKS of his presidency, Lyndon Johnson has given new force and meaning to the continuity of American government in the face of disaster.

For a few hours on that tragic Nov. 22 between the death of the late Pres. Kennedy and the arrival of Pres. Johnson at the White House, there was a stunned and uncomprehending break. But within moments of Pres. Johnson's arrival the wheels started to turn again and the pace of government has since been strong and steady and purposeful.

A distraught and grieving nation has turned to the tasks before it, still sorrowing, but immeasurably strengthened by Pres. Johnson's leadership, by his complete and unswerving support of the Kennedy program.

In international affairs and on the domestic scene the new President has spoken clearly and unequivocally to the specifics of the Kennedy program. There have been no hesitations, no generalizations or hazy phrases. The result has been to strengthen the fabric of American democracy, to give the nation a certain knowledge that there is a continuity in the affairs of men that is stronger than the disruptive force of hatred and brutality and violence.

The Never-Ending Struggle

IN THE WEEK starting Dec. 10 the nation and the world will mark the anniversary of two great documents that are the foundation of democratic government and freedom—the UN Declaration of Human Rights and the Bill of Rights of the U.S. Constitution.

The 172d anniversary of the adoption of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution on Dec. 15 comes at a time when a major and determined effort is being made to translate into reality the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Bill of Rights without distinction as to race, color or creed.

America's heritage of justice under law is at stake in the current struggle to win civil rights legislation that will afford a meaningful opportunity to all Americans to enjoy the rights and benefits of American democracy.

The 15th anniversary of the UN Declaration of Human Rights on Dec. 10 occurs at a time when this document, enunciating for the first time on a worldwide basis the inherent rights of man, is still to be universally observed.

In our own country, the Senate has still to ratify the United Nations Genocide Convention adopted 15 years ago and since ratified by 64 countries. The AFL-CIO fifth convention, recently concluded in New York, strongly urged the Senate to act on this important document as part of the continuing struggle for freedom and justice.

The convention, noting the strong support by the AFL-CIO for the UN and the Declaration of Human Rights, stressed that the unceasing anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union is in fact a violation of the UN document and called on the free world labor movement and democratic governments everywhere to protest the discrimination against and persecution of Jews by the USSR.

The struggle for human rights is a never-ending struggle. Human Rights Week is a time for rededication to this struggle both at home and around the world.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the
American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Dec. 7, 1963 No. 49

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

'Let Us Continue'

New President To Congress:

'This Is a Time for Action—Strong, Forward-Looking . . .'

On Nov. 27, 1963, two days after the late Pres. John F. Kennedy was laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery, the 36th President of the United States, Lyndon B. Johnson, addressed a joint session of Congress, in effect making his first State of the Union address. The following is excerpted from that widely praised speech.

AN ASSASSIN'S BULLET has thrust upon me the awesome burden of the presidency. I am here today to say that I need your help; I cannot bear this burden alone. I need the help of all Americans. This nation has experienced a profound shock and in this critical moment it is our duty—yours and mine—as the government of the United States—to do away with uncertainty and to show that we are capable of decisive action—that from the brutal loss of our leader we will derive not weakness but strength—that we can and will act, and act now.

From the chamber of representative government let all the world know, and none misunderstand, that I rededicate this government to the unswerving support of the United Nations—to the honorable and determined execution of our commitments to our allies—to the maintenance of military strength second to none—to the defense of the strength and stability of the dollar—to the expansion of our foreign trade—to the re-enforcement of our programs of mutual assistance and cooperation in Asia and Africa—and to our Alliance for Progress in this hemisphere.

On the 20th of January, in 1961, John F. Kennedy told his countrymen that our national work would not be finished "in the first one thousand days, nor in the life of this Administration, nor even perhaps in our lifetime on this planet." But—he said—"let us begin."

Today, in this moment of new resolve, I would say to my fellow Americans, let us continue.

This is our challenge—not to hesitate, not to pause, not to turn about and linger over this evil moment but to continue on our course so that we may fulfill the destiny history has set for us. Our most immediate tasks are here on this Hill.

First, no memorial oration or eulogy could more eloquently honor Pres. Kennedy's memory than the earliest possible passage of the civil rights bill for which he fought. We have talked long enough in this country about equal rights. We have talked for 100 years or more. Yes, it is time now to write the next chapter—and to write it in books of law.

I urge you again, as I did in 1957 and again in 1960, to enact a civil rights law so that we can move forward to eliminate from this nation every trace of discrimination and oppression based upon race or color. There could be no greater source of strength to this nation.

And second, no act of ours could more fittingly continue the work of Pres. Kennedy than the earliest passage of the tax bill for which he fought—a bill designed to increase our national income, our federal revenues, and our insurance against recession. That bill, if passed without delay, means more security for those now working and more jobs for those now without them.

IN SHORT, this is no time for delay. It is a time for action—strong, forward-looking action on the pending education bills to help bring the light of learning to every home and hamlet in America—strong, forward-looking action on youth employment opportunities, strong forward-looking action on the pending foreign aid bill, making clear that we are not forfeiting our responsibilities to this hemisphere or to the world, nor erasing executive flexibility in the conduct of foreign affairs.

In this new spirit of action the Congress can expect the full cooperation and support of the Executive Branch. And in particular I pledge that the expenditures of the government will be administered with the utmost thrift and frugality. I will insist that the government get a dollar's value for a dollar spent. The government will set an example of prudence and economy. This does not mean we will not meet our unfilled needs or that we will not honor our commitments. We will do both.

As one who has long served in both houses of the Congress, I firmly believe in the independence and integrity of the Legislative Branch. I promise you that I shall always respect this. It is deep in the marrow of my bones. With equal firmness, I believe in the capacity and the ability of the Congress, despite the divisions of opinion which characterize our nation, to act—to act wisely, vigorously and speedily when the need arises.

The need is here. The need is now. I ask your help.

I know we meet in grief; but let us also meet in renewed dedication and renewed vigor. Let us meet in action, in tolerance and mutual understanding.

Morgan Says:

Now Is the Time for America To Seek to Understand Itself

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THERE IS, OF COURSE, A RISK of belaboring to the point of utter boredom and immobility an examination of the nation's mental and emotional state in the wake of the president's assassination. But there is a larger danger, I think, of chucking away prematurely the biggest opportunity we have had since Pearl Harbor of measuring our strengths and weaknesses against the backdrop of catastrophe. As a matter of fact our exercise of searching within ourselves for answers can be even more meaningful now. The blow that hit us in Hawaii 22 years ago was delivered from the outside and it shoved us so fast into the cauldron of World War II that we had little time to think of anything but fighting and winning. The bullet that hit us Nov. 22 was fired from inside the house, as it were, and as our eardrums recover from the deafening noise, our minds stop reeling and our heartbeats swing back slowly toward normal, we have some time to think and we should use it.

Morgan

A couple of points should be made, or remade, at the outset. We should have the sense to realize that we have neither justification nor the right to single out Dallas or Texas or right-wing extremists or left-wing extremists as the principal criminals in this crime. To do this would be to buy what Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and others have aptly called the "villain theory" of history. It was this theory which so many vindictive scareheads bought with such extravagant and blind emotion some 15 years ago when they blamed Gen. George Marshall, Dean Acheson and others for a "sellout" of China to the Communists.

Nor is there much point in hysterically beating our collective breasts and accusing the country as a whole of being guilty of murder. "Collective guilt," said a perceptive letter to the New York Herald Tribune last week, "is always a potentially dangerous doctrine, and the fashionable prolonged wallow in our own generalized and imagined uncleanliness could too easily lead us to overlook blots closer to our lives for which we are actually responsible."

I wish it were somehow possible to persuade those who hated Pres. Kennedy with a cold passion to regard the ghastliness of their hatred but perhaps the revulsion of their own neighbors is the only hopeful curb to their savage extremism. A friend of mine who had been visiting in South Carolina asked one of his hosts if he could watch the president's funeral on television. The man shrugged his acquiescence and then added with obscene contempt, "I reckon they're about to toss him into his hole."

The existence of such loathing must be recognized, but only to hasten the nation in its search to understand itself and compose its differences, not in bland or stifled unanimity, but in more mature moderation than an alley brawl.

The best diagnosis of our illness that I have seen so far comes from the noted American historian, Henry Steele Commager, in an article published recently in the Washington Post.

"What we have here," Commager wrote, "is deeply ingrained vanity and arrogance—vanity and arrogance fed by isolation; by school histories which teach that we are indeed a peculiar people; by filiopietistic societies which insist that we are somehow superior to all other nations, morally and politically; by a thousand editorials, a hundred thousand radio and television programs which play up the villainy of our enemies—the Russians, the Chinese, the Cubans—and our own morality and nobility."

TO THAT LIST of institutions feeding our arrogance and vanity, Prof. Commager might have added the syndicated "comic strip." As for "filiopietistic" I looked it up. "Pertaining to, or qualified by," says Webster's, "veneration of ancestors or tradition."

Our sickness is fed too, the historian goes on, "by histories which exalt everything American; which brush aside our wars of extermination against the Indians but cheerfully contrast our treatment of the Indians with their treatment by the Spanish; which paint slavery as a kind of fortunate accident for the African Negro; which pretend that we have never had class conflict in the United States; which assure us that our melting pot really melted.

"Out of all this," Commager concludes, has come "that bigotry and arrogance and vanity and violence which so deeply shocks us today."

These are the things we must study and understand, not in order to breed a nation of paragons, but a citizenry at once diverse and cohesive enough to sustain the violent tests of world leadership ahead of us. Maturity is what we should be reaching for. John F. Kennedy grasped it. Lee Oswald did not.

Washington Reports:

Extreme Left, Far Right Scored For Arousing Hatred in Nation

SEN. PAUL H. DOUGLAS (D-Ill.) and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) in radio interviews denounced both the extreme left and the extreme right for arousing hatred in the nation.

Douglas said that the hatred the radical right has been preaching for some years has helped "create a climate of opinion and feeling under which slightly disordered persons feel it is perfectly proper for them to take the law into their own hands and kill those of whom they disapprove."

He and Case were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

Case pointed out that it is reason which differentiates man from the beast "and when things like this happen (the assassination of Pres. Kennedy), you get discouraged and are tempted to think we haven't gotten very far."

"We must," he said, "make decisions based upon reason, compassion and understanding. . . . It is differences of opinion that make America great in its diversity, but we must learn not to treat those who differ with us as enemies or traitors."

He expressed the hope that "this unfortunate tragedy may help us to be better members of our society and better citizens. If this is not so, the President will have died in vain. That would be intolerable. We cannot let this be."

Douglas suggested that "we need to return to what I would call religion, to respect for others."

The Illinois Democrat said that the responsibility for the restoration of reason depends not only on religious leaders, but also on the press, the radio, television, educators, politicians.

"IT IS ALSO not only necessary that we ourselves should not hate," he asserted, "but we must speak out and act out against hate. When we hear derogatory remarks made against Jews as a group. Protestants as a group, or Catholics, or conservatives, or Negroes, when their basic character and patriotism are questioned, I think we ought to speak out."

At the same time, he added, "I don't think we can interfere with freedom of speech. Nor do I think we can wall up our presidents. . . . In a democracy, people want to see their president and he wants to see them. This is one of the risks we run."

Douglas said he was heartened by a news report that half the audience at a White Citizens Council meeting in Nashville walked out when a speaker said that "Pres. Kennedy died a tyrant's death."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

REPUBLICANS AND DEMOCRATS on Capitol Hill agree that Pres. Johnson's drive for the pending civil rights and tax-reduction bills will result in major legislative victories—not this year but by February and March of next year.

The foundation for success was laid by Pres. Kennedy; the spadework had been done, the seemingly endless tactics of delay had been dragged out to the point of near-exhaustion, one nonpolitical observer commented. Mr. Kennedy, too, would have been rewarded with victory in the two key bills.

Nevertheless, there are somewhat different factors at play with Mr. Johnson in the White House. There are likely to be some differences in the new President's style in dealing with Congress, observers anticipate.

In no sense is this judgment based on the assumption that a President who has served in Congress automatically "gets along" well. A good many people felt that former Pres. Truman would "get along" with Congress because of his 10 years in the Senate; actually he was soon embroiled in as fierce struggles with the legislators as any Franklin D. Roosevelt ever had.

The President and Congress are coordinate branches of our government, and a Chief Executive who exercises his powers with strength inevitably will run into challenges from Capitol Hill. A weak President, on the other hand, becomes the captive of Congress.

Mr. Johnson proved abundantly in his first days in the White House that he would function as a strong president, conscious of his responsibilities and fully aware of his role as party leader and spur to legislative action as well as Chief Executive representing all the people. No one who watched him in the Senate had the slightest doubt that this was the way he would move.

* * *

BOTH HIS BACKGROUND and the forcefulness he instantly displayed, one key Democrat points out, probably will dilute the massive southern opposition—from Texas members, for example—to Administration bills that Mr. Kennedy constantly had to face.

This is true, the Democratic source estimates, even on the pending civil rights bill in the House, and may also be true on other measures later.

An equally competent Republican source somewhat sardonically agrees, commenting, "Some of the Texas Democrats who find themselves voting for Johnson bills are Democrats who would have been knocked out of their seats next year and they will hang on to Johnson, all right."

On the Senate side, both Republican and Democratic experts suggest that Johnson's long experience in the leadership ranks will prove enormously useful.

As Vice President, Mr. Johnson had no role to play directly with the Senate; he had to step aside and leave the tasks to his successors. But when he was the Democratic floor leader for eight years he was unquestionably the most effective within this century.

His knowledge of individual senators and of Senate processes is encyclopedic, his relationships with the seniors intimate—although by no means always a matter of sweetness and light. There will be no way in which Mr. Johnson can avoid a massive struggle to break a full-scale southern filibuster against a civil rights bill, for example.

There is at least a chance, however, that the conservative coalition that has ruled the House so long can be weakened by the extraction of some southern Democrats from the pants pockets of Chairman Howard W. Smith of the Rules Committee.

There is a chance, if Mr. Johnson is wise and moves on nationally important affairs in a clear demonstration of nonpartisanship, that the slippage in potential available Republican liberal votes can be checked, a chance that the deterioration of Administration influence in the Senate can be arrested.

This is the opinion, at least, of highly qualified experts of both parties. The opinion, of course, is subject to the test of the rollcalls of the next session.

THE ASSASSINATION of Pres. Kennedy should awaken us to the threat of the "apostles of hate" and return the nation to understanding and reason, Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), left, and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) asserted in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Scenes from 5th AFL-CIO Convention

GENERAL VIEW of the 5th AFL-CIO convention shows most of the delegates and some of the visitors, as well as officers and members of the Executive Council on the stage and television cameramen on their tower during one of the sessions.

"SOPHISTICATED AND MATURE" bargaining was urged by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, on whom Pres. George Meany is pinning a visitor's badge.

SOME 300 VISITORS from trade unions all over the world attended the convention. Several from Europe, Asia and Africa are shown here with Meany and Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph. Special programs for them were made possible through contributions from affiliates totaling more than $5,000.

MOST POPULAR exhibits included one sponsored by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity with its message of job equality reflecting the policy of the AFL-CIO.

DEEP IN DISCUSSION during a break in the proceedings are, from left to right, Sec.-Treas. William C. O'Neill and Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. Delegates put in long hours on and off the floor.

CONVENTION SPEAKERS included notables from the ranks of labor, government and industry. Among them were, from left, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. John Livingston; Pres. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions; National Commander Daniel F. Foley of the American Legion and Sec. of the Interior Stewart L. Udall. Right, Conrad Nagel, Screen Actors Guild, reciting Lincoln's Gettysburg Address on centennial of its delivery.

TWUA Plans Appeal:

Mill Closing Upheld In Darlington Case

Charlotte, N. C.—A 3-2 decision by a federal appeals court that an employer has an absolute right to go out of business permanently, without further obligations for unfair labor practices and backpay to ousted workers, signaled continuance of the seven-year fight of Darlington textile mill workers for their jobs and the right to organize without employer reprisal.

A spokesman for the Textile Workers Union of America announced here that the decision will be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. The union has long anticipated, he said, that the "final decision in this historic case" would be made by the nation's highest court.

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, refusing to enforce a 1962 decision of the National Labor Relations Board, ruled that the Darlington Mfg. Co., Darlington, S. C., did not violate the National Labor Relations Act in 1956 when it went out of business as the TWUA was seeking a contract covering 500 employes who had chosen the union as their bargaining agent.

Reversing the labor board decision that the law had been violated, the court also eliminated a finding that Darlington and its parent firm, Deering, Milliken & Co., constituted a single employer and that Deering, Milliken bore the backpay obligation.

The appeals court majority, asserting that "Darlington is no longer alive," found that "power to command an employer to stay in business indefinitely, or to assess him for damages for permanently going out of business, is not an NLRB prerogative."

Judge Albert V. Bryan wrote that "even if Darlington was a division of Milliken, the transfer of Darlington's liability to Milliken is precluded" because "a part, like the whole, of a business may be abolished when the extinction is consummated in circumstances like the present."

Business 'Prerogative'

To go out of business in toto, the court wrote, "or to discontinue in part, permanently at any time, we think was Darlington's absolute prerogative."

In a dissenting opinion, Judge J. Spencer Bell held there was an "abundance of evidence" to support the board's findings that Darlington and its parent firm constituted a single employer for the purposes of the law; that closing the mill under the circumstances was an unfair labor practice; that the NLRB was justified in ordering Deering, Milliken to provide backpay until the discharged employes were able to obtain "substantially equivalent employment."

Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff concurred in the minority opinion, which said in part:

"The question . . . is whether an employer commits an unfair labor practice when he closes down a part of his business . . . to discourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and to retaliate against his employes for exercising their freedom of self-organization under the National Labor Relations Act.

"Not only does such conduct violate the basic policies" of the act, Judge Bell wrote, but it is specifically and literally forbidden by the act.

Pre-Apprentice Program Sponsored by Carpenters

One hundred unemployed Washington youths will undergo special training to ready them for carpenter apprenticeships as part of a program initiated by the AFL-CIO, sponsored by the Carpenters and developed in conjunction with the Dept. of Labor.

Announcing the new program, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said the majority of trainees will be out-of-school, out-of-work Negro youths ranging in age from 17 to 21.

"None of these youngsters would be able to qualify as apprentices without the type of training they will receive in this program," he stated.

The untrained and inexperienced youths will be prepared for skilled jobs through work experience, training opportunities and special counseling programs. They will work alongside union journeymen carpenters and will carry union cards. Three evenings a week they will receive related classroom instruction in public schools.

The Washington program is the first in a series of pilot projects to be carried out by the National Institute for Labor Education in a youth employment program financed jointly by the AFL-CIO and the Dept. of Labor.

'Work' Laws Ruled Enforceable by States

The Supreme Court has ruled that state so-called "right-to-work" laws are properly enforceable by state courts rather than the National Labor Relations Board.

The Retail Clerks, supported in a brief filed by the AFL-CIO, had argued in a case arising under Florida's "work" law that the NLRB is the appropriate enforcement agency. The RCIA pointed out that there is a wide variety among the states in the scope of R-T-W statutes adopted under the permission of the Taft-Hartley Act's Sec. 14b, and that an equally wide variety might arise in the penalties imposed in state courts.

The effect of state court enforcement, it was argued, would be to undermine the application of a uniformly understood national labor policy on collective bargaining.

The Supreme Court turned down this arguement, ruling unanimously that a state which exercises its option under the Taft-Hartley Act to adopt a "work" law prohibiting either the union shop or the agency shop or both may also use its own courts to punish or enjoin violations.

Congress in the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 gave legality to a union-shop agreement meeting certain standards, wrote Justice William O. Douglas for the court, but specifically provided that this was not intended to authorize such a union-security agreement where it "is prohibited" under the laws of an individual state.

Congress Intent Cited

"Where Congress gives state policy that degree of overriding authority," said Douglas, "we are reluctant to conclude that it is nonetheless enforceable by the federal agency in Washington."

Congress "chose to abandon any search for uniformity in dealing with state laws" barring union shop or agency shop agreements, Douglas continued, "and decided to suffer a medley of attitudes and philosophies on the subject.

"There will arise a wide variety of situations presenting problems of the accommodation of state and federal jurisdiction in the union-security field," his opinion conceded.

NLRB's Role

He pointed out, however, that mere efforts by a union to obtain an employer's consent to a union-security clause—efforts such as picketing—would be "conduct arguably an unfair labor practice" and thus "a matter for the National Labor Relations Board."

State power in the union-security clause field, he said, "begins only with actual negotiation and execution" of an agreement that the state may claim is illegal under a "right-to-work" statute.

The court's decision came in an 8-0 vote. Associate Justice Arthur J. Goldberg, the opinion noted, took no part in the case. Goldberg prior to his appointment to the court had been counsel for many unions and his law firm had filed a brief in an earlier phase of the Florida case involving the Retail Clerks.

The Supreme Court ruled last spring that the Taft-Hartley Act's Sec. 14b gave states the right to prohibit both the union shop and the lesser form of union security called the agency shop. It set aside for further argument only the question of where such prohibitory laws should be enforced. The present decision closes the issue unless Congress chooses to amend or repeal Sec. 14b.

Book Details Job-Pay Data For 54 Years

A comprehensive data book entitled "Employment and Earnings Statistics for the United States, 1909-62," has been issued by the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

The 654-page volume provides basic information on the nation's past economic growth.

Monthly and annual figures for more than 350 non-farm industries are listed on the following subjects, based on March 1962 benchmarks: employment, production, workers, weekly hours and earnings, hourly earnings, overtime hours, employment of women and labor turnover rates.

The bulletin shows that:

- While half the non-farm jobs in 1919 were in goods-producing, two of every three jobs today are in the service sector.
- Earnings of factory workers averaged $9.74 a week in 1909 and neared the $100 a week mark in May 1963.
- The workweek dropped from 51 hours in 1909 to the present 40 hours while average hourly earnings were rising from less than 20 cents to $2.45.

A companion volume, "Employment and Earnings Statistics for States and Areas, 1939-62" (Bulletin 1370), providing data for the states and 146 major areas, also is available.

Bulletins 1312-1 and 1370 cost $3.50 each per copy. They are available from the Supt. of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402, or from Bureau of Labor Statistics offices in Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York and San Francisco.

Westinghouse Pacts Settle IBEW Strikes

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has announced settlement of strikes at eight Westinghouse Electric Corp. plants that began Nov. 1 in protest against a proposed company-wide seniority plan.

The strikes involved 12,000 workers who have accepted new three-year contracts providing wage increases of 6.5 cents an hour the first 18 months, plus 2.5 percent in the next 18 months; and hikes in pensions, vacations, insurance and layoff income benefits.

Wages were not a major issue. The union said the settlements preserve plant-wide seniority at several locations and permit application of a new seniority plan at other locations limited to 1 percent of the bargaining unit during the first 18 months and no more than an additional 1 percent in the next 18 months.

The new pacts cover plants in Athens, Ga.; Blairsville, Cheswick, Vanport and Youngwood, Pa.; Dover, N. J.; Elmira, N. Y., and San Lorenzo, Calif.

The IBEW also announced ratification of a nationwide agreement covering some 1,000 other Westinghouse workers in about 20 service centers and shops.

Mrs. Phillips Dies, Wife of UPP Leader

Albany, N. Y.—Funeral services for Fannie Simmons Phillips, wife of Pres. Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, were held Nov. 30 in Camden, Ark. She died Nov. 26 in Schenectady after a long illness.

A special memorial service was conducted at Voorheesville, N. Y., where the family resided for 17 years. Survivors include her husband and a son, Joseph N. Phillips of Abbeville, La. They requested that the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund be the recipient of memorials.

Rail Unions Challenge Rules Arbitration Law

(Continued from Page 1)

of years most firemen's jobs and require local-level arbitration of proposals to reduce the number of brakemen.

The five unions announcing filing of federal district court suits are the Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen, Switchmen, Locomotive Engineers, and Conductors.

In other rail labor developments:

- The operating unions and the railroads resumed direct negotiations on other issues in the work rules dispute. If no agreement is reached by Feb. 24, the unions would be free to strike.
- The Locomotive Firemen, hardest-hit of all unions by the work rules arbitration award, served a new demand for a 25 percent wage increase, supplemental pensions and company-paid health insurance. Wages were not directly involved in the work rules fight. Under the Railway Labor Act procedures, however, it will be several months before wage negotiations move up to the national bargaining level.
- The Justice Dept. asked a federal court order to restrain the struck Florida East Coast Railway from unilaterally putting drastic work rules changes into effect. The government contends that the railroad, which withdrew from national negotiations, is nevertheless bound by the congressional law requiring the status quo to be maintained until Feb. 24.

Larger Issue Unsettled

On the larger issue, however—the question of whether the railroad must rehire its striking employes as the result of appointment of a presidential emergency board—the Justice Dept. has not yet acted. The emergency board is currently holding hearings on the issue which led to the strike by non-operating employes last January—refusal of management to grant the 10.3-cent increase given by all other railroads the previous year. Members of operating unions observed the picket lines and the railroad has maintained limited operation by hiring strikebreakers. It has defied the National Mediation Board by refusing to rehire the strikers after the appointment of the emergency board.

- The Sleeping Car Porters agreed to put off strike action to back up their demands for a shorter workweek to permit new efforts by the mediation board to resolve the dispute. All rail unions and the AFL-CIO have pledged to back the Porters if they are forced to strike.

'Cheap' Firms Held Result Of 'Work' Bait

The type of runaway industry lured by so-called "right-to-work" and similar laws "is hardly worth having," Dr. Charles N. Kimball, president of the Midwest Research Institute of Kansas City, warned the Arkansas Chamber of Commerce in a recent speech.

Kimball's institute does industrial research for private industry and government. Arkansas has a so-called "work" law and a per capita income nearly $900 under the national average.

The speaker recalled that a number of poorer states and communities had tried to "bait" industry with promises of cheap labor, tax exemptions, free rent and similar inducements.

"The fallacy of these inducements is that the kind of industry which would snap at such bait is hardly worth having," he said. New growth industries are not interested in cheap labor but "want highly-skilled men at almost any price," Kimball asserted.

"These industries are not interested in low taxes," he continued, "because this in turn means poor schools and such schools won't turn out the kind of brains these industries need. Furthermore, the high-priced, skilled labor doesn't want to live in a community where their children will be doomed to a second-rate education."

The most effective formula for attracting wealth and industry to an area, he said, is a combination of pleasant environment and centers of learning. This combination, he pointed out, has attracted growth industries to areas such as Boston, southern California, Denver, Minneapolis, Dallas and Houston—and not low-wage incentives or tax exemptions.

At Meeting with AFL-CIO Leaders:

Johnson Sets 75 Million Jobs As Key Goal of Administration

(Continued from Page 1)

cil session with the President and his top advisers had been a "very good meeting."

Taking note of Johnson's emphasis on civil rights legislation and of the impending petition in the House to discharge the Rules Committee and force the bill to the floor for a vote, Meany told reporters what labor hoped to do about it.

"I'll tell you what we're going to do," he said as he was leaving the White House. "We're going to go out and help get 218 signatures on the discharge petition if we can't get two Republicans on the Rules Committee to vote to hold hearings." (Related story on Page 1.)

Six Democrats of the 10 on the powerful Rules Committee are understood to be committed to prompt hearings on the rights measure. Two of the five Republicans would be sufficient to furnish a committee majority despite the announced opposition of Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.). Thus far none of the Republicans has agreed to commit himself to hearings.

Under House rules 218 signatures (a majority of the full House membership of 435) are required to discharge the Rules Committee and give the civil rights bill floor priority.

The day before the Executive Council met with Johnson, Meany drove with the President from the latter's northwestern Washington home to the White House for discussions that continued in Johnson's office.

Meany greeted Democratic legislative leaders as they assembled for their weekly conference with the President. He told reporters later that he and Johnson had discussed pending depressed areas and job retraining legislation as well as civil rights and the tax bill.

"I assured the President that organized labor will back his efforts to enact a civil rights bill, which we think is a matter of simple justice" and also "a memorial to Pres. Kennedy," Meany said.

The tax cut, depressed areas and job retraining bills, he said, "are all part of a long-range program our people have been interested in for a long time," he commented in telling newsmen that organized labor would back the President on the measures.

1st Wage-Hour Bill Aided by Johnson

Pres. Johnson reminded the AFL-CIO Executive Council that as a first-term member of the House back in 1938 he had signed a discharge petition that successfully pried the first wage-hour bill out of a hostile Rules Committee and got it to the floor for passage.

"Only two other congressmen from my state supported the petition to bring up the bill," Johnson said in a Rose Garden statement. "They were both defeated in the next election."

Johnson called in Executive Council members, he told them, because he wanted to hear what was on the mind of labor in regard to the nation's problems and wanted his cabinet members also to hear what labor had to say.

The meeting was held in the White House cabinet room with 20 of the council's 29 members present. Six cabinet members attended —Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon, Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall and Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman—plus Walter W. Heller, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

The discussion for half an hour ranged across a wide area of economic proposals, with the President mostly listening, before the session recessed for Johnson's public statement before reporters in the Rose Garden. The new Chief Executive had begun the private discussions with a moment of silent prayer for the late Pres. Kennedy.

Meany told the President specifically that he thought it was time business, labor and the government together made a really broad study of the impact of automation on workers' jobs.

Referring to his AFL-CIO convention statement that automation might become a "curse" to workers, the federation president pointed out that he was no "Luddite" and wasn't about to get a "sledgehammer" to smash up machines and emphasized that such a broad study of automation and the 35-hour workweek as a solution might result in a general agreement that labor was right.

Johnson, concluding a busy first week in the White House picking up the reins of government, saw some 80 members of the Business Advisory Council immediately after his session with the AFL-CIO Executive Council and asked business, too, to back the tax-cut bill, "to take up arms against stagnation and delay."

"We are not pro-labor, or pro-business, or pro-any-special-sector" of American life, he said, "We are pro-what-is-best-for-America."

"I am the only President you have," he pointed out. "If you would have me fail, then you fail, for the country fails."

In his Rose Garden statement flanked by AFL-CIO leaders and government officials, Johnson cited gains recorded by workers since January 1961 and publicly laid out his program of tax reduction, civil rights, and King-Anderson bill priorities and "a compassionate program to help those in our society who cannot take full part in the competitive race."

"We can do none of this, or only a tiny part of it," he said, unless those surrounding him rolled up their sleeves and let it be known they were with him to the finish.

"I am the President, but I can do nothing without the people," he said.

"You represent the people. I need you and I believe you should be standing by my side in this fight as you are today. The nation will be grateful—and so will I."

The significance of the 75 million jobs announced by Johnson as an Administration goal is that it would provide sufficient employment opportunities for the 3.5 million jobless reported for October. plus the 69.9 million already employed, and the hundreds of thousands of young men and women joining the work force annually.

"I am dissatisfied with the persistence of high unemployment" despite the country's continuing economic growth, the President stated, and it is "a vile and shameful thing" that poverty, the "ancient enemy, should thrive and fatten in this abundant land."

The tax bill has "lain unenacted when it ought to be alive and working for everyone of us," he declared. It is "our modern weapon against unemployment" breeding poverty and ignorance.

"I don't intend to sit idly by while this problem of unemployment swells and coarsens," he said.

On the civil rights bill, the President renewed the theme of his Nov. 27 address to Congress: "We've talked too long, done too little, and all of it too late."

Commending labor leadership for its "enlightenment" in "moving to abolishing discrimination" in union ranks, he added, "Even as I compliment you, I ask you to hurry even faster."

On the King-Anderson bill, which is in the process of interrupted hearings in the House Ways & Means Committee, he flatly endorsed the social approach embodied in that measure as contrasted with the public assistance of the existing Kerr-Mills Act.

He spelled it out:

"Is it too much to ask the national community to agree to a simple, low-cost program—in which a worker puts in $1 a month of his own money, and his employer puts in $1 a month of his company's money, which is tax-deductible, and the government puts in nothing—so that the worker can solve his medical costs problem with dignity and not disaster?"

Study of Automation Urged by AFL-CIO

(Continued from Page 1)

neered in its physical aspects."

Biemiller, quoting these words of the late President in his testimony, declared that in labor's view, "this is the approach" which will give "the greatest significance" to the proposed commission.

He told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), that most Americans still "are not conscious of the serious problems" caused by automation.

The rapid pace of technological advance, he said, has contributed to the nation's "chronically high unemployment and under-employment."

Noting the "terribly uneven development of American life in recent years," Biemiller said the government's concern for promoting technological advances "has not been matched by an equal concern for protecting the victims of technological change."

The burden has fallen heaviest on Negroes and young people, Biemiller pointed out, where joblessness has reached a "depression-like level."

He told the subcommittee that delegates to the AFL-CIO convention last month called for establishment of a commission on automation. He added:

"That action was an expression of their profound concern for growing displacement of men by machines and the lack of adequate job opportunities for the victims of such displacement, as well as for the increasing number of new entrants into the labor force."

Earlier the Clark subcommittee heard from Gunnar Myrdal, internationally known Swedish economist, at luncheon session.

Myrdal urged that a tax cut be accompanied by heavy government spending for public works so as to speed economic growth and reduce unemployment.

HERBERT H. LEHMAN

Earth Broken For Mexican Union Housing

Mexico City — Ground-breaking ceremonies were held here for a workers' housing project financed by the AFL-CIO under the Alliance for Progress program, with the U.S. government guaranteeing the mortgage. The development was planned by the social projects division of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and is being sponsored by the Graphic Arts Workers of Mexico.

Suffridge Present

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, representing federation Pres. George Meany, attended the Mexico City ground-breaking. He was accompanied by Alexander Bookstaver, AFL-CIO investment director, and Robert Mayer of the AFL-CIO general counsel's office, who are completing arrangements for the mortgage financing.

The AFL-CIO and some affiliates have agreed to provide mortgage loans of up to $10 million to finance the project, which will provide apartments for some 18,000 workers and their families. Repayment will be made in monthly installments over 20 years, with interest at 5.25 percent.

Completion is scheduled for August 1964. The Mexican government made available for the construction more than 50 acres of land valued at $3.4 million.

The groundbreaking ceremonies were conducted by the Confederation of Mexican Workers and the Mexican Government Housing Agency.

Research Group Elects Goldfinger to Board

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger has been elected to a three-year term on the executive board of the Industrial Relations Research Association.

Labor Role Praised In Venezuelan Vote

Pres. George Meany has expressed the AFL-CIO's "deep admiration" for the role played by the Venezuelan labor movement—the CTV—in preserving that nation's democratic institutions and ideals "in the face of Communist harassment and criminal acts" during the recent election.

In a radiogram to CTV Sec. Gen. Augusto Malave Villalba, Meany lauded Venezuelan labor for its "strong and courageous" resistance to the Communist tactics. He also praised government and civic leaders for aiding the labor movement in maintaining a free and democratic soicety "not only in Venezuela, but throughout the hemisphere."

Lehman Dies; Meany, Patton Mourn Loss

New York—Herbert H. Lehman, a lifelong leader of liberal causes and closely identified with organized labor during his years as governor of New York and a senator from the state, died at his home here of a heart attack. He was 85.

Lehman, recipient of the first AFL-CIO Murray-Green Award for outstanding service to labor and the nation, had been active as a liberal leader of the Democratic Party in New York since his retirement from the Senate in 1957.

He had been, since its formation, co-chairman with the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt of the National Council for Industrial Peace, a citizens organization which has waged a continuing campaign against "right-to-work" laws.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired Mrs. Lehman that "all of us in the labor movement . . . share your grief." He described Lehman as exemplifying "the man of means who was wholly a man of the people," who "never faltered in his total dedication to the advancement of mankind's well-being."

"He was my close and valued friend," Meany said, "and I shall miss his counsel and his support in the battles still ahead."

James G. Patton, co-chairman with Lehman of the National Council for Industrial Peace and president of the National Farmers Union, said the American people have suffered "a grievous and irreparable loss." Patton added that Lehman "was a friend and champion of the laboring man" and devoted his life to advancing the dignity and freedom of mankind.

Lehman entered public life in 1928 after service in World War I and a career in the banking business as lieutenant governor of New York, serving under Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt. When FDR was elected to the presidency in 1932, Lehman won the first of four unprecedented terms as governor of the state.

As governor he worked closely with organized labor helping secure passage of a wide range of liberal and labor legislation.

Appointed in 1942 to head up foreign relief and rehabilitation for the U.S., in the following year he was elected first director-general of the United Nations Relief & Rehabilitation Administration, a post he held until 1946.

In 1949 he was elected to the Senate to fill the unexpired term of the late Sen. Robert F. Wagner, and in 1950 he was re-elected for a full six-year term.

He had been awarded honorary degrees by a score of leading colleges and universities and was a member of a host of liberal and humanitarian organizations.

On Dec. 11, 1956 when he became the first recipient of the Murray-Green Award of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, Meany declared:

"The American labor movement is proud to call Sen. Lehman its friend. We feel honored that he has so consistently championed our cause. For Sen. Lehman is one of those rare figures in public life to whom right and justice always have come first and political considerations last."

12-7-63

November Unemployment Up 500,000

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Dec. 14, 1963 | No. 50

House Told 35-Hour Week 'Urgent Need' to Build Jobs

AFL-CIO PRES. GEORGE MEANY is congratulated by Pres. Johnson after he is honored with the Presidential Medal of Freedom in ceremonies previously scheduled by the late Pres. Kennedy. At left is Ambassador Angier Biddle Duke, who hung the ribboned medals on those attending the event in the White House state dining room. In background, carved on the mantel, is the famous John Adams prayer: "I pray Heaven to bestow the best of blessings on this House . . . May none but honest and wise men" inhabit it as servants of the people. (See story Page 2).

Sharp Hike Asked In Overtime Pay

By David L. Perlman

A shorter workweek, coupled with higher penalty pay for overtime, is "urgently needed" to bring about full employment, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller outlined labor's program for a 35-hour week without loss of pay as the government's latest job statistics showed a new surge of unemployment—to 5.9 percent of the workforce.

Full employment under a 40-hour week "is becoming an increasingly remote dream," Biemiller told a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.). He warned that unless the nation can make "real progress" in creating jobs the unemployment problem "will grow to the point where it will eat away at the very fabric of our society."

The AFL-CIO spokesman urged Congress to open up immediate job opportunities for a million unemployed by requiring employers to pay double-time for overtime work, rather than time-and-one-half, and by simultaneously extending the coverage of the federal wage-hour law.

He said the basic workweek should be cut to 35 hours—over a period of years, if necessary—to put additional millions to work.

No "single solution" can bring about full employment, Biemiller said. A tax cut, stepped-up public works and a liberal monetary policy all are needed to "lift economic activity and create jobs," the AFL-CIO spokesman declared. But he stressed that "additional measures are essential," and that "without them, unemployment will continue to linger and to fester."

Biemiller noted that many employers find it cheaper to schedule overtime work at time-

(Continued on Page 12)

Joblessness Rate Hits 5.9 Percent

By Eugene A. Kelly

A rise of nearly half a million in the ranks of the jobless boosted the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in November to 5.9 percent, a rate exceeded in only two other months since December 1961, the Labor Dept. has reported.

All the major indices of unemployment—for men, women, teenagers, married men and experienced workers—pointed upward in November, the department said.

The number of civilians out of work and actively seeking jobs was 3.9 million or 5.9 percent, up from October's 3.4 million or 5.5 percent, the report said.

The one positive note in the figures was a decline of 55,000 in the number of long-term unemployed—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—to cut the November total to 864,000.

In releasing November unemployment estimates by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Labor Dept. attributed much of the increase to

(Continued on Page 12)

Congress Begins to Move:

Aid-to-Education Bills Passed As Legislative Logjam Breaks

Two big aid-to-education bills—hailed by Pres. Johnson as the most important in 100 years—moved towards the White House as the congressional logjam began to break in a drive for pre-Christmas adjournment.

Sent to the President's desk was a $1.2 billion college aid bill, carrying federal grants and loans to help public and private institutions—from junior colleges to graduate schools—build and equip the classrooms, laboratories and libraries needed to accommodate a soaring enrollment.

Passed by the House, and on the verge of final Senate approval, was another billion-dollar-plus school aid package—including a massive upgrading of vocational education long urged by labor. It will enable youngsters to be trained for jobs needed now and in the future, rather than in farm skills and other outmoded courses.

Along with the educational bills, the House gave quick approval to a labor-backed measure to expand the manpower training program and continue full federal financing for an additional year.

The manpower bill cleared the House by voice vote after defeat of a substitute proposed by Rep. Robert Taft (R-O.), 168-122. Similar legislation had been passed by the Senate early in September.

The Rules Committee turned loose another long-delayed measure — a fringe benefits amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act. This bill, strongly supported by the AFL-CIO and its building trades affiliates, would include the cash value of fringe benefits in government determinations of area "prevailing wages" which must be paid on construction financed with federal funds. Floor action is expected in January.

A group of Republicans and southern Democrats headed by Rep. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) has served notice that it will seek to force the bill back to the Labor

(Continued on Page 12)

Johnson Hails Union Efforts In Americas

"Warmest congratulations" to the fifth graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development were expressed by Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson in a message asserting his "deeply-founded belief in the need for strong, democratic trade unions to buttress freedom in the Americas."

Labor unions can provide a "strong, articulate and responsible leadership," the new President said in a message to the 31 graduates

(Continued on Page 12)

UAW Quickly Rallies to Seek Jobs For Victims of Studebaker Closing

South Bend, Ind.—The Auto Workers moved quickly to rally maximum possible aid for more than 7,000 workers hit by the Studebaker Corp.'s decision to stop producing autos here.

With workers and the community still numb from the firm's announcement that it intends, before Christmas, to move Lark production to Canada, officers of the UAW and its Local 5 enlisted the aid of congressmen, senators, federal agencies, state and local governments and the community to help cushion the blow of pending unemployment.

For 111 years Studebaker has produced farm wagons, then autos, in its sprawling plant here.

At a directors' meeting in New York City, the firm said its auto division had losses of $40 million since 1959, of which $9.8 million was in the first nine months of 1963. Other divisions earn about $12 million a year before taxes, and will be continued, but not in South Bend. Production of Larks at the Hamilton, Ont., plant will be stepped up from 8,000 to 30,000 cars a year if business warrants, Pres. Byers A. Burlingame said.

The UAW began marshaling the machinery needed to get jobs for employable workers and pensions, insurance, social security benefits, and supplemental un-

(Continued on Page 3)

PRES. JOHNSON asks for labor's help in expediting passage of the pending civil rights bill and the House-passed tax bill. The nation's Chief Executive is shown speaking from the steps leading to the White House Rose Garden, flanked by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Executive Council members who had previously given the President their views on the country's economic situation. Doors behind lead to the Cabinet Room where meeting was held with Johnson and members of his cabinet.

Presidential Medal of Freedom Awarded Meany, 30 Other Leaders

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was among 31 persons honored by Pres. Johnson with presentation of Presidential Medals of Freedom, the nation's highest award for distinguished service in a civilian capacity.

The awards were conferred at a White House ceremony on Dec. 5, a date previously set by the late Pres. Kennedy, who had announced last January that Medals of Freedom would be issued annually and that the presentations would constitute a "civilian honors list."

Kennedy and the former first lady, Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy, had personally redesigned the Medal of Freedom which previously had been awarded to civilians on an irregular basis. The late President also had personally approved the list of nominees recommended for his first honors list by a committee headed by Under Sec. of State George Ball.

Johnson added two names to the list of 31, presenting posthumous awards to the assassinated President, John F. Kennedy, and to the late Pope John XXIII. The Kennedy medal was received by his brother, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, while Mrs. Kennedy was standing in a small anteroom off the White House state dining room. The medal awarded to the late Pope will be delivered to the Vatican.

The citations to Meany and others were read by Pres. Johnson as each came forward at the ceremonies. The medal, with its royal blue ribbon edged in white, was placed about the necks of recipients by Ambassador Angier Biddle Duke, State Dept. chief of protocol.

The citation to Meany read as follows:

"GEORGE MEANY—Citizen and national leader, in serving the cause of labor, he has greatly served the cause of his nation and of freedom in the world."

Accompanying, Meany at the ceremonies were Mrs. Meany, two of their daughters, Mrs. Eileen Lee and Mrs. Regina Mayer, and Virginia Tehas, Meany's secretary.

The list of those on the Kennedy honors list constituted a roster of some of the most famed servants of the nation—retired Associate Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, former Pres. James B. Conant of Harvard University, the late Sen. Herbert H. Lehman, four-term governor of New York who died the day before the ceremonies, and Thornton Wilder and E. B. White, writers.

It included Ellsworth Bunker, "citizen diplomat;" Robert A. Lovett, former cabinet member and "servant of the Republic;" and John J. McCloy, "godfather to German freedom."

It included, as well, some who were known in relatively narrow circles but who had performed remarkable services in their fields—a newspaperman, Mark S. Watson of the Baltimore Sun, whose career has been marked by distinguished coverage of U.S. military affairs. and Annie Dodge Wauneka, first woman elected to the Navajo Tribal Council, whose crusade for improved health standards has helped "dramatically to lessen" disease among her people.

Marian Anderson Honored

It included Marian Anderson, the deep-voiced singer, and Ralph J. Bunche of the United Nations; George W. Taylor, labor arbitrator and economist, and Clarence B. Randall, former head of Inland Steel Co.

It also included Alexander Meiklejohn, one of the nation's most creative educators, former president of Amherst College and chairman of the Experimental College of the University of Wisconsin, who was cited as "educator and libertarian, teacher by example and philosopher in practice."

Meiklejohn, who is 91, was accompanied by his son, Kenneth, who is a legislative representative of the AFL-CIO in Washington, and the latter's wife.

Also included were Gov. Luis Munoz-Marin of Puerto Rico, who has played a major part in the forward thrust of that commonwealth's people, and creative spokesmen of other countries. These included Pablo Casals, the cellist, whose long self-exile from his native Spain has symbolized unbroken resistance to the dictatorship of Francisco Franco, and France's Jean Monnet, "architect" of western Europe's moves toward unity and statesman of the Atlantic Alliance.

The Medal of Freedom as redesigned by the late President and Mrs. Kennedy shows 13 white stars on a round blue field superimposed on a five-pointed white star and a shield of red, with a gold background of eagles with interlocking spread wings.

The medal is worn on formal occasions, a miniature at less ceremonial events. There are also a blue bar and a lapel insignia—a blue ribbon with silver eagle—for other occasions.

After the White House ceremonies there was a reception followed by luncheon at the State Dept. Mrs Johnson, the new first lady, and Sec. of State Dean Rusk were in the reception line.

Hotel Union Wins Wichita Foothold

Wichita, Kans.—A newly chartered local of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes has signed the first contract between the union and a Wichita restaurant in seven years and has won its first National Labor Relations Board election.

Chartered last January after a former local expired, Local 747 launched an intensive organizing campaign and petitioned for elections at six leading hotels. The first election, at the Lassen Hotel of the Schimmel chain, was won 72-28 but management made two appeals which the NLRB rejected and has been charged by the union with refusing to bargain.

A first contract with the Restaurant, a cafeteria, provides wage increases for all employes, six paid holidays, vacations with pay, overtime after eight hours, four hours call-in pay, meals during working hours and uniforms provided by the employer.

In House Battle:

Discharge Petition Spurs Rights Drive

More than 150 members of the House signed a discharge petition, designed to force the civil rights bill to an early floor vote in January, as cracks began to show in the roadblocks posed by Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) of the Rules Committee.

Partisan wrangling erupted on the floor as Republicans charged Democrats with lack of advance consultation on filing of the discharge petition.

The petition — a seldom-used parliamentary device allowing 218 members, a flat majority of the House, to pry a bill out of a hostile committee—was offered after Smith had announced he would use his power as committee chairman to delay consideration of the civil rights measure.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), with the announced backing of the House Democratic leadership, offered a resolution paving the way for a discharge petition. The petition itself was filed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee that cleared the bill with a bipartisan majority.

The appearance of the petition produced almost instant results in softening Smith's announced hostility. The chairman of the Rules Committee refused to yield to Administration pressure for immediate hearings on the bill, clearing the way for floor action when Congress reconvenes in January, but he issued a statement pledging hearings "reasonably soon in January" without specifying a terminal date.

Rep. Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.), the GOP floor leader, threw his weight against the discharge petition but said, after breakfast with Pres. Johnson, that the hearings would not take more than two weeks, and that Republican members of the Rules unit would vote to clear the bill thereafter.

'Insincerity' Charged

Party wrangling on the tactics of forcing the bill to a vote included Republican charges of insincerity against the Democratic leadership as well as complaints of lack of advance consultation.

GOP spokesmen suggested that another parliamentary device, the so-called Calendar Wednesday procedure, would have allowed quicker action. Bolling previously had pointed out that the so-called "calendar" operation, lasting for only one day, was subject to filibuster by opponents of the bill and might result in three or four months of delay thereafter.

Rep. Carl Albert (D-Okla.), the Democratic floor leader, said that the debate limitations imposed would be "the one way to beat a bill of such dimensions."

In the past the House has seldom passed controversial bills by the "calendar" procedure. The appearance of a discharge petition, even though it falls short of the required 218 signatures for a few days, poses a threat of taking the bill away from a committee and puts committee opponents under pressure.

A discharge petition had exactly this effect in forcing through the civil rights bill of 1960. When signatures mounted above 200, Smith and Halleck surrendered and cleared the bill for a floor vote.

Steel Unionists Rally to Aid Petition Drive

The drive to pry the pending civil rights bill out of the House Rules Committee is being backed by 45 legislative representatives of the Steelworkers, called in by the union's Legislative Dept. from all over the country, to assist labor's support of the discharge petition filed in the House.

In a two-week period the 45 USWA spokesmen, representing every state in the Union, discussed the discharge petition and the importance of the civil rights bill with 351 members of the House. They reported that 171 members had said they intend to sign the petition and 21 said they "leaned" toward signing; 128 said they would not sign, 31 leaned against signing.

Frank N. (Nordy) Hoffman, USWA legislative director, said that the union's drive "was launched by direct orders of Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald." The representatives, he said, had done a "terrific job."

Year-Around Program

The union's legislative program, he pointed out, has been expanding as a year-round operation in both political and legislative fields.

The 1958 union convention authorized state legislative education committees "to take appropriate action" toward expanding "into a fuller, more mature program of legislative participation in the decisions of the federal and state legislatures."

Since then, Hoffmann said, many districts have officially set up legislative education committees, and activities have been intensified by legislative conferences and planning sessions.

STEELWORKER REPRESENTATIVES, brought to Washington by their union from every section of the nation to push the civil rights bill, report on their progress in getting commitments from congressmen to sign the discharge petition. Addressing the group is Frank N. Hoffman, the union's legislative director. Seated beside him is USWA Legislative Rep. Joseph McDonald.

NLRB Ruling Hit:

Court Brief Supports 'Don't Buy' Pickets

The Supreme Court has been asked by the AFL-CIO to uphold an appellate court decision vindicating the right of unions to engage in purely informational picketing urging consumers not to buy a non-union product.

The National Labor Relations Board, which has validated leaflet distribution to inform the public of the existence of a labor dispute, drew a line of distinction between "handbilling" and the appearance of "pickets" wearing signs. The board ruled in a unanimous decision that the Landrum-Griffin Act's provision protecting the right of unions to "publicize" disputes carried a specific exception when "picketing" was involved.

The board was reversed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which held that it had to show economic loss to the company that was picketed and had failed to do so.

The AFL-CIO, intervening in the Supreme Court, pointed out that "the right of working people to advertise" a labor dispute and "seek the voluntary assistance" of consumers "by the most effective means available" is of "vital concern" to unions.

The federation brief argued that the NLRB had misread the intent of Congress in applying the Landrum-Griffin Act and that, in any case, peaceful informational picketing directed at consumers is protected by constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression.

The case involves a Washington State apple-packing employers association, Tree Fruits Labor Relations Committee, Inc., and Fruit & Vegetable Packers Local 760. The union struck and the employers hired strikebreakers.

The union placed pickets in front of Safeway retail stores in Seattle wearing signs addressed "to the consumer" and reading, "Non-union Washington state apples are being sold at this store. Please do not purchase such apples. Thank you."

There was no effort to block deliveries, to block access to the stores, to interfere with Safeway operations or sales. The picketing was wholly peaceful. The NLRB nevertheless ruled that the Landrum-Griffin Act clearly intended to outlaw "hot cargo" operations and secondary boycotts by unions and held that the picketing fell outside the protected freedom of unions to "publicize" disputes.

The AFL-CIO brief said the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act showed that picketing of a "secondary" employer was barred only if the intent was to "coerce" that employer.

On the constitutional issue, the federation conceded that the courts had ruled out picketing of various kinds when the "objective" or "end" was unlawful. But in the absence of an unlawful objective, the brief argued, "picketing is free speech" as a means of communication, and "is entitled to every constitutional protection afforded any other form of expression." It continued:

When picketing is uesd "simply to publicize the facts," and to request "the voluntary support of individual consumers, acting wholly on their own without the pressure of group discipline," the picketing "is free speech as much as any other form of expression, and cannot constitutionally be forbidden."

It is "disquieting," the federation said, to find the Dept. of Justice upholding the NLRB argument that "picketing as such, even in the form of a consumer appeal, is not the equivalent of speech" protected by the Constitution.

The AFL-CIO brief was filed by J. Albert Woll, federation general counsel, Robert C. Mayer, Theodore J. St. Antoine, and by Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris.

Union Label Buying Urged For Yule

Union-earned dollars that keep cash registers ringing during the Christmas shopping season should be spent with fair employers, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has pointed out in its annual campaign to assure purchasers of the best in quality products and services.

Appealing for the fullest support of the department's annual drive to channel workers' spending in a direction that will help other unionized workers, Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the department asked the aid of all national and international unions, state and local central bodies, local union label and service trades councils, and affiliates of the National Auxiliaries.

"All union members and their families and friends," he said, "should add the symbols of organized labor—the union label, the shop card, the store card and the service button—to their shopping lists during this holiday buying season.

"This way we know that we are not only giving our loved ones and friends gifts which are of the highest quality; we are also helping bring job security and a measure of prosperity to the worker behind the gift for months and years to come."

SHOCKED AND SADDENED by news stories saying the Studebaker Corp. will close most of its South Bend, Ind., manufacturing operations and move them to Hamilton, Ont., Thomas B. Carter and his wife, Frances, said they had plans for a happy Christmas but don't know what will happen now. Carter, 46, has been a Studebaker worker since 1938. He is one of 6,000 in the South Bend area who face loss of their jobs.

UAW Rallies to Aid Idled at Studebaker

(Continued from Page 1)

employment benefits for other eligibles.

The union called on Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to "mobilize the full resources of the government" and to set up a special "task force" from various government agencies. Wirtz sent Harold Montross, job placement expert, as his personal representative in South Bend.

In Washington, UAW Rep. Dan Bedell and Hobert Butler, Indiana state employment commissioner, discussed plans for job retraining programs with Area Redevelopment Administrator William L. Batt, Jr.

'Most Shocking'

UAW officials knew that Studebaker was struggling to get a larger share of the auto market and, in contract negotiations last year, aimed for an agreement that both workers and management could "live with." But news of the plant shutdown nevertheless was, in the words of a UAW staff man, "probably the most shocking thing that ever happened here."

The "big bump" to community morale is expected the week before Christmas, when assembly lines stop auto production. The plant here will produce engines and parts for the Canadian plant. Some workers will be retained to fill dealer service orders, to run the parts warehouse, possibly to finish an $80 million contract to build trucks for the government.

The truck contract may take a year to complete, but no more than 1,000 to 1,500 workers in all are likely to remain in the main plant.

In Canada, the firm's wholly owned subsidiary, Studebaker of Canada, operates an assembly plant in the steel city of Hamilton, on Lake Ontario with ready access to the St. Lawrence Seaway. It has 725 workers and an agreement with UAW Local 525.

UAW Local 5 scheduled two meetings for Dec. 12 to report to members. One of the reports was that 2,170 local members have been drawing retirement pay from the union-management pension trust fund and that another 800 to 1,000 workers may count on drawing some pension benefits.

City Seeks to Aid

Mayor Frank J. Bruggner of South Bend named a civic committee to launch an action program aimed at getting aid for the jobless. He said the committee will try to persuade Studebaker to keep building cars here or, failing that, to intensify the city's campaign to bring in new industry and to keep skilled workers on the job at other plants in the area.

Unemployment here was 2.4 percent of the work force in September, lowest in the state and lowest for South Bend in the last 10 years. Studebaker, once the largest employer in the area, now is second to the Bendix Corp., which has 11,000 workers in four plants.

Sales Down

Dir. Ray Berndt of the UAW's Studebaker Dept. said the news of the closing is "tragic information" for workers whose plans for celebrating Christmas have been knocked askew.

It was no secret, Berndt said, that Studebaker has "been in trouble for years, caught in the cycle of lower sales, a 'vicious spiral' which raised costs per unit to an unprofitable point. Despite the failure in autos, however, other Studebaker divisions are operating profitably," said Berndt. He added:

"It is our principal concern that Studebaker hourly and salaried workers and their families receive every assistance possible. We are therefore calling on Studebaker management to cooperate with the UAW to see to it that these workers, their families and the community are protected to the maximum extent possible."

In announcing its plans Studebaker said its decision to stop auto production in South Bend was not based on wages. Its payroll here ran to about $50 million a year, but the firm said it had never considered asking the UAW for wage concessions to keep the U.S. plant open.

Overall Studebaker operations should show a 1964 profit, the company president said, because the firm will take a one-shot tax loss on South Bend operations. Value of all Studebaker buildings and property was put at $39 million, about half of it here.

$300 Monthly Pensions Won By Ship Union

New York—Members of the Masters, Mates & Pilots will be eligible effective Jan. 1 for pensions of $300 monthly after 20 years' service regardless of age.

The increase was included in a new schedule of benefits approved at a recent meeting of the joint union-employer board of trustees of the MM&P Pension Plan, Pres. Charles M. Crooks of the union announced. Other improvements included:

- Raising and pro rating all present pension benefits to a level of $200 a month.
- Raising and pro rating all present disability pension benefits to a level of $300 a month.
- Raising other categories of pensions, such as early retirement and reduced benefits, to double the amounts presently paid.

"The shipowners understand," Crooks said, "that our immediate goal is a $500 monthly pension which would virtually insure the earlier retirement of older officers on pensions more closely approximating their sea earnings and the rising cost of living."

Beginning Jan. 1 the employers will pay $5.20 per man-day into the benefits program funds, which includes a welfare plan that covers in addition to union members and their wives, children, students and dependent parents, and pensioners. The pension fund had assets of more than $11.3 million on Oct. 1.

Board Named, IAM Airline Strikes Off

Pres. Johnson, moving to head off a walkout of 18,000 Machinists employed by six airlines, named an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act to investigate a dispute over contract terms.

Appointment of the board blocks for at least 60 days strikes against Braniff, Continental, Eastern, National, Northwest and Trans World Airlines. Work stoppages had been authorized by union members by margins of 93 to 98 percent, the IAM said. The workers are mechanics and ground crewmen.

The union reported it had made no progres toward an acceptable settlement in contract talks with managements of the six air carriers.

Still unsettled also was a dispute between United Airlines and the IAM, representing nearly 13,000 workers. The IAM set Dec. 19 for a strike deadline after members turned down an emergency board recommendation.

Justice Dept. Moves for Injunction To Compel Rehiring by FEC Line

Jacksonville, Fla.—The Justice Dept. has asked a federal district court here for an injunction ending the 46-week strike on the Florida East Coast Railway and compelling the company to rehire the strikers and restore pre-strike working conditions.

Both the government and the rail unions contend that appointment of a Presidential Emergency Board last month required both parties to return to the conditions which existed prior to Jan. 23, when non-operating unions struck for a 10.3 cent increase previously negotiated with other railroads.

Operating unions—representing train and engine crews—respected the non-op picket lines. They have since become directly involved in the strike as a result of the company's announcement of drastic unilateral work rules changes.

The unions have made it clear that they are prepared to call off the strike and return to work under the Railway Labor Act procedure reguiring maintenance of the status quo during the period the Emergency Board is in session and for 30 days thereafter. The board's report is due Dec. 19.

The railroad has balked at rehiring the strikers, maintaining this would require dismissal of some 500 recently-hired strikebreakers, which it refuses to do.

Two suits were filed by rail operating unions asking a federal district court in Washington, D.C., to set aside the work rules decision handed down by an arbitration board established by Congress. The Locomotive Firemen, Trainmen, and Switchmen joined in one suit; the Locomotive Engineers filed a companion suit.

Meany Voices Hope For U.S. Hostages

The "fervent hope" of AFL-CIO members for the safety and freedom of U.S. citizens held as hostages by Bolivian Communists was expressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a cable to Pres. Paz Estenssoro.

Addressed to the President at La Paz, Meany's cable read:

"AFL-CIO appreciates your grave concern for the lives of U.S. citizen hostages held by Communist activists at Siglo Viente mines. It is the fervent hope of all members of the AFL-CIO that every means possible will be utilized to secure their safe release."

THREE HARVARD SOPHOMORES, attending college with the help of AFL-CIO merit scholarships, met with Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler on his arrival to address two groups at the university. Left to right: John D. Ferrell, Walnut Ridge, Ark.; Paul C. Jefferson, Chicago; Schnitzler; Harvard Prof. Alva Kindall, and Paul I. Meyer, St. Louis.

Shun Cynicism, Schnitzler Tells Harvard Trade Union Graduates

Cambridge, Mass.—The labor movement is "moving forward faster" on many fronts than in any period in history, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the graduating class of Harvard University's Trade Union Program.

Schnitzler noted that academic critics of labor look back to the "good old days" of the Thirties and mourn the supposed loss of labor's "idealism."

Today, he pointed out, labor is "a long way down the road" to solving the problem of racial discrimination within the labor movement—which it wasn't in the "idealistic" old days.

'Squabbles' Acknowledged

There are "squabbles" among unions, Schnitzler acknowledged. But, he stressed, in the Thirties "we didn't have squabbles; we had civil war."

He urged the graduates, staff members of unions who attended the 13-week course plus a group of overseas trade unionists, to reject "cynicism or pessimism" about the labor movement, "just as we reject any feeling of self-satisfaction."

In his speech to the trade union group and in a talk the same day to Harvard's Labor-Management Relations Club, Schnitzler stressed the need for a "peacetime mobilization" of the nation's resources to create a full employment economy.

He told the Labor-Management Club that higher wages—and a higher rate of wage increases—are needed "not just to increase the living standards of workers, but to maintain and increase the prosperity of business, and to extend the general economic well-being of the American people to those who are not sharing in it."

Profit Need Recognized

Labor, Schnitzler said, has "always recognized the need for profits." But, he added, "contrary to the opinions of some businessmen," profits "do not create prosperity.

"Prosperity depends upon buying power—mass buying power," he said. "The great lack in our economy today is not capital but customers."

He pointed out that the nation's progress on many fronts, including civil rights, depends on the availability of "good jobs at decent wages." He added:

"That is why the labor movement's collective bargaining program will be keyed to bigger wage increases and shorter hours. That is why our legislative program will be keyed to job-creating projects—all of them worthy by other standards as well; to a higher minimum wage, universally applied, and a shorter statutory workweek; to a stronger unemployment compensation system; to hospital insurance for the aged, and to a host of other programs designed to raise the buying power of the American people."

This, he declared, is "the practical approach."

Supreme Court Rejects Attack on C&O-B&O Tie

The Supreme Court in a one-line unanimous opinion rejected a rail brotherhoods' attack on an Interstate Commerce Commission decision approving financial control of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co.

The Maintenance of Way Employes and the Railway Labor Executives' Association asked the court to consider major questions in review of the ICC decision and a decision of a special three-judge lower federal court upholding the ICC.

The rail brotherhoods urged that there would be substantial hardship on employes, that several thousand would be displaced, and that the ICC had failed to consider the financial hookup of the C&O and B&O in the light of other pending realignments of eastern railroads.

The Supreme Court's rejection of review apparently cleared the way for the financial agreement to be implemented. The Dept. of Justice had previously withdrawn opposition to the C&O agreement with the B&O but announced objections to the more sweeping proposed merger of the Pennsylvania Railroad with the New York Central System.

In other actions affecting labor the court:

- Refused review of an appellate court decision that a local union is prohibited under the Landrum-Griffin Act from expelling, after trial, an officer who allegedly slandered or libeled another officer by charging financial irregularities. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had held that the law protects the right of a member to make such charges and that union disciplinary codes prohibiting such conduct are unenforceable.
- Refused review of a decision granting some 70 orchestra leaders a permanent injunction against a Musicians' Union requirement that the leaders deduct union dues from salaries and forward the dues to the union. The 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals had held that the orchestra leaders are employers, for purposes of the Taft-Hartley Act, and may not tax employes on behalf of a union.
- Refused review of a Missouri Supreme Court decision denying severance pay to 154 members of the Typographical Union who lost their jobs when the St. Louis Globe-Democrat sold its equipment to a competitor newspaper. Severance pay was provided in the contract, the Missouri court had held, only in the event of "merger, consolidation, or permanent suspension" of the Globe-Democrat, and sale of "part of the assets" is not a "merger or consolidation."
- Upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision by refusing review of a 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that the Cone Brothers Contracting Co. and others had committed an unfair labor practice by firing truck drivers who refused to cross a picket line set up by a union of which the drivers were not members. The labor board had ordered reinstatement with backpay for lost time.

Union Scholarships Exceed $1 Million

Cambridge, Mass. — The AFL-CIO and its affiliates have spent more than $1 million this year to help send 842 young men and women to college.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler announced these figures in an address at Harvard University here. In the audience were three students attending Harvard on AFL-CIO merit scholarships.

Federal Standards Urged:

State Benefit Levels 'Disgrace' to Nation

Reappraisal of the workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance systems with a view toward removing them from "interstate competition" and achieving basic minimum benefit levels has been urged by an AFL-CIO spokesman.

"The state of disrepair in which both these programs find themselves is a disgrace to any modern industrial nation," declared Dir. Nelson Cruikshank of the Dept. of Social Security in an address to the biennial conference of the American Public Welfare Association.

Cruikshank observed that early workmen's compensation laws were designed to provide injured workers benefits equal to about two-thirds of their pay. While this goal was achieved between 1910 and 1916, he observed, today "the average state benefit is seldom better than 35 percent of the average wage in industry."

He noted that benefits amount to little more than 60 cents of each premium dollar and a large portion of that is spent to cover litigation costs. One of every five workers is still without the protection of workmen's compensation, he added, and benefits vary so widely from state to state that they are "related more to the accident of residence than to the loss suffered by the individual worker."

State unemployment compensation laws present "even a more dismal record of inadequacy," Cruikshank went on. Here too, he observed, the original benefit goal of two-thirds of average wages has been eroded over the years so that now only one state provides jobless benefits approaching that level and 14 provide benefits of less than 40 percent of average pay.

Lack of coverage for three out of 10 unemployed workers, denial of benefits through arbitrary eligibility and qualifying regulations, and expiration of benefits during long periods of joblessness severely limit the effectiveness of state unemployment insurance programs for millions of unemployed workers, he said.

"One of the basic things that we most certainly have learned," Cruikshank declared, "is that we cannot leave programs of this kind to the states . . . so long as there is no basic federal requirement as to the level of benefits or to the method of financing."

Regarding other programs to prevent and alleviate human need and suffering, he said that the nation had failed to apply the lessons to be drawn from its successful "experiment" with social insurance through the Old-Age, Survivors & Disability program—the social security system—"even with all its obvious shortcomings."

He cited the example of income loss through disability and noted that in 1956 Congress, finally realizing that public assistance alone could not meet the problem, added disability insurance to OASI.

Yet in 1960, he said, Congress made "the same mistake all over again," relying solely on the public assistance Kerr-Mills program, rather than social insurance, to relieve the financial burden of health care on older persons.

The Kerr-Mills program has a place in supplementing social insurance, he said, "but it is not the primary fuel of the machinery of social welfare. Sooner or later Congress is going to have to face up to that fact and meet this distressing problem of financing health care for the aged through the sound and proven principle of social insurance."

16 Area Conferences Scheduled by COPE

Sixteen area conferences covering every part of the United States have been scheduled by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education for the first four months of 1964, National Dir. Alexander E. Barkan has announced.

Each will be confined to a single day, thus allowing an additional day for national COPE leaders to meet with state officers for the discussion of current problems.

All union leaders and members interested in political activity, and full time staff members of international, national and local unions and central bodies—along with their wives or husbands—have been u-ged to attend.

The schedule:

Jan. 8, Andrew Johnson Hotel, Knoxville, Tenn., for Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina and Kentucky.

Jan. 11, Dinkler-Plaza Hotel, Atlanta, for Georgia, Florida and South Carolina.

Jan. 14, Marion Hotel, Little Rock, for Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi.

Feb. 12, Inn of the Sixth Flag, Arlington, Tex., for Texas and Oklahoma.

Feb. 28, Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia, for Pennsylvania and Delaware.

Mar. 6, El Rancho, Sacramento, for California, Hawaii and Nevada.

Mar. 9, Bannock Hotel, Pocatello, Idaho, for Montana and Wyoming.

Mar. 12, Olympic Hotel, Seattle, for Washington, Oregon and Alaska.

Mar. 15, Savery Hotel, Des Moines, for Iowa, Missouri and Kansas.

Mar. 17, Sheraton-Fontenelle Hotel, Omaha, for Nebraska and North and South Dakota.

Mar. 20, Cole Hotel, Albuquerque, N. Mex., for New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and Utah.

Apr. 11, Golden Triangle, Norfolk, Va., for Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland and the District of Columbia.

Apr. 14, Pick-Fort Shelby Hotel, Detroit, for Michigan and Ohio.

Apr. 19, Morrison Hotel, Chicago, for Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Indiana.

Apr. 21, Hilton Hotel, Boston, for Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Apr. 24, Statler-Hilton Hotel, New York City, for New York and New Jersey.

College Rolls Hit New Peak

Enrollment of college and university students broke all records this fall for the 12th consecutive year, the U.S. Office of Education has announced.

The total of 4,529,000 who matriculated in 2,140 institutions is 7.7 percent higher than than the 4,207,000 enrolled last year and more than double the 2,116,000 who entered in 1951.

Coast Musicians Turn to Another Art

SMASH SUCCESS, judging from attendance and public mention, was third annual art show featuring 300 paintings, sculptures, other objets d'art created by Los Angeles Musicians and family members. During three-day showing in union hall on Vine St., Hollywood, members of Local 47 played "live" music in background. Attesting quality of exhibits, Los Angeles County supervisors passed resolution in appreciation.

12-YEAR-OLD ARTIST Frank A. Paul, son of Musician Eddie Paul, is pleased to pose with four paintings accepted for show. Titles are, from left, top row: Indian Paint; The Old Lighthouse; below, Fantastique; The Spaghetti Eater. Other exhibits were by husbands and wives, daughters, mothers, one father-in-law.

HOST AT SHOW'S OPENING was Pres. John V. Tranchitella, left, of Local 47, shown with Frank Worth, exhibit chairman. Volunteer committee of members arranged show, hung paintings.

METICULOUS pen and ink design by Musician K. Vrouyr has musical motif—border of bass viols. He called it "Graphic on a Musical Theme." Most show entries were in oils, watercolors, inks, filled all available space.

SCULPTURES were shown this year for the first time. Here is section of show, which utilized big auditorium and patio, showing some of the works entered in wood, marble, metal. Next year's show will be expanded, union promises.

AMONG PAINTINGS on musical theme was this one by Rolly Furnas, called Trombone Man. Art show is one of Local 47 enterprises winning public favor. Others include park concerts, "Jazz at the Beach," Latin music concerts.

The Shorter Workweek

LABOR'S DRIVE for a shorter workweek is essentially a drive to preserve the American economic system. It is not a fight against exploitation of workers under a 40-hour week nor is it tied to the inhumanities of other years, when cruelly long and exhausting workweeks were the target.

The target today is jobs, critically needed jobs if the American economy is to survive and move ahead. Pres. Johnson has made the goal of his Administration 75 million jobs, 5 million more than the current level of employment.

Given the growth of the labor force and the sharp impact of automation, the country must find 4 million jobs a year for the remaining years of the Sixties.

In calling for a shorter workweek, the AFL-CIO is not talking about less production or fewer total hours. The economy needs more production sustained by greater purchasing power stemming from higher employment. The economy needs more total hours of work, not less.

A substantial cut in working hours, without loss of weekly earnings, would have a profound and beneficial effect on the nation's greatest domestic problem—unemployment.

For example, using the formula that a one-hour reduction in the workweek adds 750,000 more jobs, a reduction in the week to 35 hours would create 3.8 million jobs, bringing additional purchasing power and stimulation to the economy.

Such a cut in the workweek would go a long way toward giving the country the 4 million jobs a year it needs and will need for the rest of this decade.

The impact of automation and technology on the rising rate of productivity—and the still sharper impact to come—will be a factor in offsetting the higher hourly wage costs that would result from a shorter workweek without reduction in take-home pay.

In recent years the increase in output per manhour has been greater than increases in wages and fringe benefits, with a resulting decline in unit labor costs and a rise in profits. This trend is likely to continue and accelerate.

Coupled with other job-expanding programs, the shorter workweek holds the promise of preserving and revitalizing the economy.

Whistling in the Dark

THE GENERALLY optimistic tone of the 1964 economic forecasts have a quality of a youngster whistling while he walks past a graveyard. There is a feeling that if the economists whistle loud enough, maybe the unemployment problem will lose some of its haunting qualities.

The high, persistent rate of unemployment is neither ghostlike nor imaginary. It is casting a very real shadow over the economy and raises some real questions as to the forecasts for next year.

The latest government report shows the unemployment rate rising to 5.9 percent of the labor force, the highest level except for two months in the past two years. The Labor Dept. notes that the increase in November is "somewhat larger than seasonal." While it is true that month-to-month changes are subject to statistical and other interpretations, it is difficult to wash out the fact that the 5.9 rate is slightly higher than the November 1962 rate.

Of even greater impact is the Labor Dept.'s figure that labor force lost through unemployment and part-time work was 6.9 percent last month, the same percentage as a year ago.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President

WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller

Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:

John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.

Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year; 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Dec. 14, 1963 No. 50

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

He Needs Direction

To Enrich Society:

Senate Unit Seeks Peaceful Uses For Military Research Findings

EVERY YEAR the United States spends billions of dollars on space research. That research has enabled us to put men into orbit and even to dream of reaching the moon. It has given us electronic computers that enable us to do the arithmetic for immensely complicated military missiles and other weapons. Thanks to research we have possibly the world's most awesome and modern military machine.

Why can't we use the results of that research to enrich our peacetime society?

Why can't we use it to create new industries that will provide the jobs we so desperately need in this age of automation?

These are questions that are being studied by a Senate Subcommittee on Employment & Manpower which has just finished hearings under the chairmanship of Sen. Joseph Clark (D-Pa.).

During the past decade possibly a score of congressional hearings have been held on the effects of automation and technological change on the economy and on jobs. Most of these hearings have produced highly important evidence on the gravity of the employment problems posed by automation. Few have produced any positive suggestions on how to solve these problems.

The Clark subcommittee hopes to make at least a beginning in the search for positive answers.

One foundation on which it hopes to build is a number of proposals before it on what kind of machinery ought to be set up to explore the possibility of doing something about automation instead of sitting back, as industry is largely doing, and making vague promises that things will straighten themselves out if they're left alone.

An important proposal on which the subcommittee has just concluded hearings was one made by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), who comes from one of the most industrialized states in the union and has had much experience with the effects of new technologies on jobs and workers.

Hart wants to harness military and particularly space research to peacetime uses. His own study of the research programs of many leading industries has led him to the conclusion that there is a huge untapped fund of knowledge now being devoted almost exclusively to space and military purposes that could be used to improve American life and even to create new industries.

One research chief has told him that great avenues could be opened, for example, in the medical field: greatly improved devices for studying heart and brain diseases through delicate instruments now being developed through military electronic research; use of computers to assemble huge quantities of data on the physiological processes of the sick; the translation of sound vibrations into sight vibrations for the blind; "ultrasonic ranging" to detect the size and growth of tumors in cancer.

OTHER AREAS where space and military research could contribute to peacetime uses are the development of short range rapid transit; the planning of the housing of the future; control of water pollution and waste disposal systems; the development of new fibers, new industrial uses for agricultural products. The range is enormous.

Industrialists have told the Clark subcommittee that they are capable of developing an endless number of new products and new services, but that the need to show a profit in a free enterprise society prevents them from making the necessary plunge. Some kind of government impetus will be necessary.

Hart has introduced legislation that would set up a 14-member commission to prepare a program for bringing modern technology "to bear on serving the collective needs of our people." Four members would come from federal agencies; four members from the fields of labor, industry, local government and higher education; two appointed by the president of the National Academy of Sciences; two senators and two representatives.

The subcommittee is studying this proposal in addition to other legislation now before it. This includes creation of an automation commission proposed by Senators Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and Jacob Javits (R-N. Y.), and establishment of a commission to prepare for the economic shock that would accompany a cutback in military spending proposed by Sen. George McGovern (D-S. D.).

The subcommittee hopes to make its report and its own recommendations by mid-January. What is expected is a modification of the proposals now before it in the light of the testimony it has taken from labor, industrial and scientific sources.

Above all, the subcommittee hopes to break through the negativism and inertia that have marked so much of today's approach to the human and economic problems created by automation and technological change.

Morgan Says:

Lehman Embellished Politics 'With Courage and Intelligence'

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ANOTHER GREAT LIBERAL, in the real, enduring sense of the word, is dead. But though a heart attack felled Herbert H. Lehman in New York City, he had lived his 85 years fully, fruitfully and selflessly and the country is the better off for this rich and remarkable man's long span of public service. So is the art of politics, which he embellished with courage and intelligence.

Morgan

Although Thomas E. Dewey served longer because of a change in terms from two years to four, Lehman's record of being elected governor of New York four successive times has never been equalled. He served with distinction as U.S. senator for eight years until he retired from that office in 1957.

He was nominated for but did not win the Nobel Peace Prize in 1946 for his work as director general of the United Nations Relief & Rehabilitation Administration. At the moment he died, he had been eagerly preparing for the trip to Washington where he was to have been among the 31 distinguished Americans decorated with the Freedom Medal at the White House.

Interestingly enough, Lehman considered those accomplishments secondary to what he had been doing since his retirement from the Senate—toiling in the tangled vineyard of New York state Democratic politics, trying with all his might to reform the party and unify its desperately dissipated strength. Not long ago, an intimate friend asked why he had not been content to become a kind of pope of world peace in his retirement and deal in gentle generalities. "You may be surprised," Lehman replied, "but I consider this work at the grass roots of politics one of the most important things I have done."

A partner in the Wall Street banking firm of Lehman Brothers, he was one of the wealthiest men in the land but instead of living a life of leisure he entered politics in 1928 at the age of 50. He became Franklin Roosevelt's lieutenant governor and Roosevelt once called him "my strong right arm" but their relationship was ruptured in the mid-30s when Lehman, now governor, succeeded in persuading the New York congressional delegation to oppose Pres. Roosevelt's Supreme Court packing plan, so-called.

Lehman repeatedly startled and exasperated the political pros by standing for what he thought was right, not what was expedient. His sweeping liberal reforms in New York, which his close and admiring friend State AFL Pres. George Meany helped him achieve, the first state public housing program in the country, a labor relations act and state unemployment insurance among others—these proved good politics.

HE WAS DEFEATED only once in 10 election races. But he never feared to stand alone. In the beginning he was the only U.S. senator to speak out in bold denunciation of the methods of the late Sen. McCarthy and the fearful miasma of McCarthyism but he voted for appropriations for the Wisconsin senator's investigating committee because he believed in the functions of congressional committees. Once during an acrid battle over legislation involving parochial and public schools, New York's Cardinal Spellman was moved to question Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt's example of motherhood. "The whole country," one observer recalls, "suddenly got lockjaw but Sen. Lehman broke the silence with a rebuke to the cardinal and gallant defense of the former first lady."

Early in 1955 when crisis quivered over the Chinese offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu, Congress, in a swirl of passionate patriotism, passed a joint resolution authorizing Pres. Eisenhower to "employ the armed forces of the U.S. as he deems necessary" for the protection of Formosa against Communist attack. The only three Senators voting nay were North Dakota's late William Langer, Oregon's Wayne Morse and Lehman, who said "the President is actually asking for unlimited reserve powers, the use of which we cannot foresee but which could lead to an act of war." It was for the courage of his beliefs in these and other stands —popular or unpopular—that moved Illinois' senior senator, Paul Douglas, to describe him as a "political saint."

This reporter best remembers this gentle man, whose speeches were delivered in monotone but whose convictions were never muted, as a citizen who believed human rights were somehow more important than property rights.

The citation on his Freedom Medal, awarded posthumously, read: "Citizen and statesman, he has used wisdom and compassion as the tools of government and has made politics the highest form of public service."

As a British critic noted, how aware the world has been of death this year. What brilliance has gone with the loss of a probable British prime minister, Hugh Gaitskell, Pope John, John Kennedy and now Herbert Lehman.

Washington Reports:

Speedy Completion Predicted For Kennedy Memorial Center

THE JOHN FITZGERALD KENNEDY Memorial Center should be completed and ready for use within two to two-and-a-half years, Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.) said in a radio interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on nearly 700 radio stations.

Thompson, who first proposed the cultural center nine years ago with Sen. J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) as sponsor on the Senate side, has now introduced a resolution, along with Rep. Bradford Morse (R-Mass.) and others, to name the center after the late President.

"I can think of no more appropriate memorial to the memory of Pres. Kennedy," Morse said on the program. "Certainly Mr. Kennedy and his wife have done more than anyone else to advance the interest of the U.S. people in the arts."

The $25 million center, located on the bank of the Potomac River in Washington near the Jefferson and Lincoln memorials, would be financed through contributions from "private sources, foundations, individuals," Thompson explained.

"We hope that the gifts will range from the pennies of school children to thousands of dollars from our wealthier citizens who can afford it," he said.

THOMPSON SAID that it is proposed that the government match the private contributions. He added that it was appropriate that the center be named for the late President not only because of his and Mrs. Kennedy's interest in the arts, but also because they had given new life to the idea of the center.

Morse reported that Italy has agreed to donate the marble, and that $13 million has already been raised. The Rockefeller Foundation has given $1 million and the Ford Foundation has pledged $5 million.

The center, he said, will have three auditoriums, including a 2,750-seat symphony hall, a 2,500-seat theater for opera, ballet and other musical productions, and a 1,200-seat auditorium for the theatrical productions.

"We are the only nation in the civilized world that does not have a cultural center," Thompson declared. He pointed out that Italy, Germany, France, Russia, Britain, Spain and other nations also subsidize the arts—although that is not proposed here.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE LEGISLATIVE blockades began to crack quickly as Congress sensed that the Administration would consent to an early adjournment, giving the members a chance for two weeks at home before returning to the Capitol for the second session.

Agreement was reached between Senate and House conferees on the vocational aid educational bill after long wranglings had previously blocked action. Judge Howard W. Smith of the House Rules Committee, pressured by a discharge petition backed by Democratic leaders, agreed to hearings on the civil rights bill, and his long-time ally in running the conservative House coalition, Republican Floor Leader Halleck, offered the hope of floor action "early" in January.

The Rules Committee cleared the manpower training bill and a bill to add fringe benefits in calculating Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage rates on government construction.

The 88th Congress, first session thereof, had managed in its long sit-down strike to stall action even on appropriation bills, so that many agencies were still operating on the equivalent of last year's money by temporary extensions while nearly six months of the 1964 fiscal year went by.

It managed to string out action on the civil rights bill and the tax reduction bill, frustrating all the urgency of the late Pres. Kennedy to move them through.

Even on the tax bill, however, the administration sidestepped Sen. Harry F. Byrd's insistence on "looking at next year's budget" before allowing the Senate Finance Committee to report out a tax-reduction measure. Pres. Johnson offered Byrd an advance look at the summary budget figures and Byrd closed hearings and began committee work on a bill.

* * *

THE RECORD after more than 11 months in session is sparse enough to give strength to demand for reform in the rules of the House and Senate, and the last has not been heard.

To say that reform is desperately needed is not to deny the tremendous values of the exhaustive study of bills by House committees or the precious minority values preserved by the Senate's tradition of full and free debate.

But democracy is not served by a system in which an elected administration cannot get a House majority of its own party to send its principal proposals to the floor. It is not served by the virtual dictatorship of the Rules Committee and a conservative chairman determined to use his power to frustrate the policies offered by the elected administration.

The last "reform" of Congress, expressed in the La Follette-Monroney Act of 1946, did not touch the nagging weaknesses of the seniority system and the Senate filibuster rule. Before that, the George Norris "revolt" against "Czar" Reed as House Speaker got rid of one-man dictatorship only by depriving the Speaker too sweepingly of leadership authority and by substituting the seniority system that itself has grown into an evil.

Every observer can claim to be his own political scientist, and the proposals for reform may be either relatively limited or exceedingly broad. The public demand, in any case, is sufficiently widespread and significant to suggest that Congress cannot afford to ignore it.

* * *

THE PRESUMPTION must be that next year Democrats will feel under greater pressure to build an affirmative record in preparation for the November elections.

But they still are going to have to handle appropriation bills all over again, in addition to any left hanging from this session. They may well get involved in clashes about "big spending" while taxes are cut, despite Pres. Johnson's early emphasis on "frugality" and economy. And the civil rights and other bills must be passed.

They will have little over six months if adjournment is planned in time for the Republican presidential nominating convention in July.

THE UNITED STATES is the only civilized country in the world without a cultural center, Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.), left, declared as he was interviewed with Rep. Bradford Morse (R-Mass.) in a discussion of the proposed John Fitzgerald Kennedy Memorial Center on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Christmas Buying Boobytraps And Advice on How to Duck 'em

By Sidney Margolius

THE CHRISTMAS RAIDERS are back. They have two ways to trap you in this season of good cheer. One is to sell you high-priced toys that have only temporary interest and often advertised deceptively. The other is to get you to buy gifts on installments, or borrow for Christmas, at high finance charges.

In addition to the deceptive TV ads for Thumbelina dolls, the Robot Commando and others previously reported, the Federal Trade Commission recently also cited Colorforms for deceptive TV commercials. If you got the impression that the "Miss Ballerina Dress-up Kits" provided three Ballerina dolls for only 98 cents, note that what buyers actually got at this price was one doll plus several changes of clothing.

You also have to watch out for big sets of toy soldiers advertised at what seem like low prices. In sets advertised by one firm, Lucky Products, the figures were found to be not three-dimensional, as you might expect, but merely flat plastic pieces.

Parents and other gift buyers need to shop thoughtfully for toys and avoid the novelty or mechanical playthings coming to be known as "10-minute toys." Frank Caplan, a leading consultant on play materials, advises that in selecting a toy, consider that it is something the child will play with all year. Toys need to be selected for potential interest not only now, but six months from now.

Here are pointers on gift ideas and sources for playthings of lasting interest, including a number offered by labor and other community organizations:

Pete the Union Label Pup: Stuffed toys are standard for small children, and the bargain of the year is Pete the Union Label Pup, offered for $2 plus 50 cents for postage and handling, by the Union Label & Service Trades Council of Greater New York, 673 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10012. In dozen lots, postage is prepaid. Pete is a bulldog type, covered in rayon plush, machine washable, stuffed with kapok and cotton, with hand-sewn eyes for extra safety. He is 12 inches long. Lowest price at which this department has found comparable stuffed toys is $4.

Pete is a companion to the Miss Union Maid Doll which 25,000 families bought last year. This miniature doll, dressed in a satin ballroom gown, has movable arms and is still available from the Union Label Council for $1 plus 35 cents for mailing, or postage prepaid in dozen lots.

Books: Science and hobby books make gifts of lasting value for both youngsters and adults. Some discount and department stores, as well as several regional cooperatives, now offer standard books at reduced prices. Some of these also are offered by mail at reduced prices, by Hobbyshelf, P.O. Box 721, New Rochelle, N.Y. Among other standard titles, Hobbyshelf offers "Here Is Your Hobby . . . Science Equipment," by Moore, at $2.50; "Figure Skating," by Lindsay, $2.35; "Drawing and Sketching, Step-by-Step," by Williams, $4.50; "Expert Skiing," Bradley, Miller and Merrill, $5.35; "Greenhouse Plants from Seeds," by Genders, $1.20; "Dolls," by Antonia Fraser, $4.20.

Another reduced-price value offered by Hobbyshelf is Funk & Wagnalls Standard College Dictionary, thumb-indexed, at $6.75. These prices are postage prepaid.

An inexpensive little extra gift for hobbyists is the booklet "How to Make Useful Articles for the Home from Glass Bottles," published by AFL-CIO Glass Bottle Blowers, and distributed by Hobbyshelf at 25 cents a copy.

Folk Song Album: The Auto Workers have produced an album of labor songs, "Songs for A Better Tomorrow." It includes "Solidarity Forever," "We Shall Not Be Moved," "It Could Be A Wonderful World" and others. The album features such well-known folk singers as Ronnie Gilbert, Tommy Makem and the Tarriers. It is available for $2 from the UAW Educational Dept., 8000 E. Jefferson, Detroit 14, Mich.

Creative Playthings: One of the major suppliers of standard play materials and toys for schools also sells directly to the public. This is Creative Playthings, Inc., an organization which not only manufactures standard play materials classified by ages, but has done a praiseworthy job of keeping down prices in this era of expensive toys.

Its catalog can be secured without cost by writing to Creative Playthings, Princeton, N. J.

Copyright 1963 by Sidney Margolius

PETE THE UNION LABEL PUP is now available to delight the youngest set. The new good will ambassador of the label trades is a companion to the Miss Union Maid Doll and may be ordered from the Union Label & Service Trades Council of Greater New York & Long Island, 673 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10012. He sells for $2 plus 50 cents for mailing, but the council picks up the mailing tab on orders of one dozen or more.

For Public Recreation:

Citizen Action Urged On Outdoor Needs

A CALL FOR greatly increased citizen action to meet public outdoor recreation needs has been issued by the Citizens Committee for the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission Report.

Citing outdoor recreation gains around the country since the commission published its last report, the citizens committee said the document "has helped increase understanding of the importance of outdoor recreation in American life and the wisdom of prompt action to meet rapidly growing outdoor recreation needs."

"As a result," it said, "we are now at a stage where a lot more can be done. The time is right."

The call for citizens to seize opportunities in their own communities and states is contained in a booklet, titled "Action for Outdoor Recreation for America," which in effect is a handbook for such action. Single copies of the booklet are available free from the Citizens Committee for the ORRRC Report, 1001 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C., 20036.

The booklet illustrates with case histories what can be accomplished through citizen leadership of vigorous community, county and state outdoor recreation programs.

Community "success stories" are reported from Huntington, N. Y.; Sacramento County, Calif.; Front Royal, Va.; Plain Dealing, La., and Hingham, Mass.

STATES CITED as having taken pioneering steps toward adequate outdoor recreation financing programs include New York, New Jersey, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Connecticut. Major outdoor recreation bonding measures approved by Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida voters also are noted, as are bond issues which California and Washington state voters will be called upon to approve in November 1964.

From the "success stories" the citizens committee has selected specific actions which have brought about the securing of land and water areas for the many kinds of outdoor recreation and for protection and development of those resources already available. Interested citizens are advised to:

- Consider the broad public interest.
- Work from the beginning with local and state public officials.
- Work with those most directly affected, including landowners.
- Join with others—by forming temporary, joint inter-organization citizens committees representing civic, service, women's, veterans, business and labor groups as well as sportsmen's and garden clubs.
- Seek help from those who are able and ready to give it—including private organizations and government agencies.
- Propose programs big enough to do what should be done.

On the last point, the citizens committee said:

Bold, imaginative proposals have succeeded where timid, stopgap ones have failed. A comprehensive program that takes account of future needs will change the climate of public opinion as soon as it is proposed."

"Action for Outdoor Recreation for America" also summarizes the key findings and recommendations of ORRRC, a temporary federal commission which went out of existence following the submission of its report.

The ORRRC report made some 50 recommendations for more effective use of existing outdoor recreation resources and acquisition of new areas to meet future needs while the areas are still available and before land costs become prohibitive. It emphasized that outdoor recreation demand is increasing faster than population growth.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Come Fellas, the Good Old Days Couldn't Have Been THAT Good

By Jane Goodsell

SOME PEOPLE are forever sighing wistfully over the good old days. They don't always agree on just when the best old days were—or what made them so good—but whenever they were, those were the days, all right!

To some people, the good old days were back a few decades ago when they were young. Everything was better then. The songs were catchier, the girls were prettier, the eggs were fresher and hamburger was 15 cents a pound. These people haven't much use for anything that's happening now. They're mad at Congress, suspicious of electric toothbrushes, disgruntled at the weather and aghast at the way young people carry on.

Other people think that the best days were the good old-fashioned ones when everything was as quaint and cozy as a scene on a Christmas card. There were always apple pies cooling on the windowsill. Christmases were always white, and there was usually an old oaken bucket around.

But if anybody ever lived in a Grandma Moses world like that (which I doubt), they probably didn't think it was such great shakes. Their handmade butter churns, real pine rockers and linsey-woolsy dresses didn't seem any more quaint and charming to them than we find stainless steel and 30 percent dacron.

And I'll bet that the people who keep sighing for those oh-so-quaint-and-charming days wouldn't have found them so delightful either. Milk glass and hand-loomed fabrics lose some of their charm when all the neighbors have them, too. And if aureomycin and plastics lack old world charm, they're still pretty handy.

THEN THERE ARE the people who suffer from historical homesickness, who yearn to have lived in the romantic days of yore when men were men, and women wore beautiful costumes.

Well, they may be costumes to you and me, but they were just old clothes to 16th century housewives.

As for the men—well, even in those swashbuckling times, there were probably quite a few men who made out lists and looked both ways before crossing the street. They didn't sail the seas on the Golden Hind or tear around with the Three Musketeers. They didn't even swashbuckle.

The dear, dead days of yore wouldn't look nearly so romantic if they weren't dead and yore, and times never were as good as they used to be.

'Not Likely' to Add Jobs:

Government Policies Under Fire by CLC

Ottawa, Ont.—The year just ending has been marked "by some improvement" in Canada's economy and a "modest" reduction in joblessness, but measures taken by the Liberal Party government are not "likely to achieve" the economic spurt essential to improve living standards and "satisfy the need for jobs," the Canadian Labor Congress declared in a representation to the government.

"We disagree with your budgetary policies" and tax policies, the CLC said, warning that economic projections for 1964 indicate a "somewhat lower rate" of growth, which implies a continuation of high-level unemployment as a principal problem.

On other issues the statement, submitted as a formal comment on policies of Liberal Party Prime Minister Lester Pearson, declared:

- The government should "participate" in industry decisions to transfer plants from one locality to another, to prevent "far-reaching effects" on communities and employes and to lay down "criteria" for such transfers.
- Government aid to underdeveloped countries should be raised at least to the 1 percent of gross national product recommended as a minimum by the United Nations.
- Canada's railways should accept responsibility for workers displaced through technological change. It is inequitable that "the cost of improved efficiency" should be borne by workers rather than the rails that "created" the problem of "surplus" workers by hiring them in the first place.
- The government should take "early action" toward a nationwide pension system for workers, despite the "insurance industry lobby's" efforts to block a Canada Pension Plan.
- The CLC supports sections of a special commission report recommending universal coverage of workers by unemployment insurance and an increase in the ratio of benefits to previous earnings. It opposes a proposed reduction in the maximum benefit period from 51 to 26 weeks and changes in the eligibility formula.
- The CLC was "pleased" that the Pearson government recognized the right of longshoremen to strike for an improved contract even though "inconvenience, annoyance and misgivings" were experienced because the strike occurred when Canadian wheat shipments to the Soviet Union were being "rushed." Such events are "one of the calculated risks" a free society takes, and the strike was settled by voluntary and orderly procedures.

In its statement on the economic situation the CLC spelled out recommendations for new policies, including "substantial expansion" of investment in the "public sector," a program of "planned deficit financing" to stimulate purchasing power and growth, and increased social security benefits and decreased taxes for those in the low-income brackets.

The statement welcomed creation of a new Economic Council of Canada, which is equipped to consult with industry, labor and agricultural groups on economic questions, but pointed out that its relationship with the government in purely advisory.

"We consider it imperative" for the government to move toward comprehensive and integrated policies on monetary, fiscal and economic issues, the CLC declared. "In short, we favor economic planning."

DC Labor, CORE Join In Registration Drive

A joint voter-registration campaign has been announced by District of Columbia labor and the local Congress of Racial Equality in an effort to register at least 75 percent of eligible citizens for the presidential election in November 1964.

District of Columbia residents will be eligible to cast ballots for the presidency and vice presidency next year for the first time in history. Washington citizens have had certain periods of local home rule, with elected municipal officials, but are now governed by appointed commissioners authorized by Congress.

A constitutional amendment proposed by Congress in 1960 and promptly ratified by the states allowed passage in 1961 of a District of Columbia voting statue granting presidential election suffrage to residents 21 years of age or older, with one year of residence, who do not vote as absentee citizens in other jurisdictions. The District will have three votes in the Electoral College.

The joint labor and CORE voter-registration campaign was announced by Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO and Chairman Julius Hobson of the Washington CORE chapter.

It will be, they said, a "cooperative, nonpartisan drive," bringing together the extensive drives planned previously by the separate organizations in order "to increase the effectiveness of both and avoid duplication of effort."

Washington COPE officials said they and CORE spokesmen will urge the District commissioners to increase the scheduled dates and available registration locations to aid the campaign. They also plan a training institute for volunteer workers the first weekend in January.

5-Year Effort Wins for Union In Mississippi

Booneville, Miss. — Workers at the Brown Shoe Co. here made a bit of local history when they voted for the Boot & Shoe Workers, 238-161, in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The plant went union, in a non-union area of northeast Mississippi, after a five-year organizing effort and the fierce opposition of the Prentiss County Industrial Development Council, the County Retail Merchants' Association and the Booneville Banner-Independent, the town's only newspaper.

Twice before the union had been defeated by the same forces. Brown Shoe Co. management took no part in the anti-union campaign since it enjoys business-like relations with the union in other Brown plants.

This year the newspaper conducted "relentless editorial attack," as the union put it, on all unions.

MEXICAN HOUSING PROJECT financed by loans from AFL-CIO and affiliates was named in memory of the late Pres. Kennedy at the ground-breaking ceremonies. At left, putting the cornerstone into place, are (left to right) Mexico's Sec. of the Treasury Antonio Ortiz Mena; Gen. Sec. Antonio Vera Jiminez of the Graphic Arts Workers Union, which is sponsoring the $14 million, 3,100-unit project, and Pres. Armando Henero of the sponsoring union. At right is AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, who represented the AFL-CIO.

Labor-Backed Mexican Houses Named in Memory of Kennedy

Mexico City—The forging of another link in the chain of friendship that binds the Mexican and U.S. labor movements was completed here when a huge housing project sponsored by a Mexican union and largely financed by American unions was dedicated, at the groundbreaking ceremonies, to the memory of an assassinated U.S. president.

The project was given the name of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy following a unanimous vote of the Mexican union members. The project was initiated by the American Institute for Free Labor Development through its Social Projects Dept., directed by William C. Doherty, Jr.

When completed in August 1964, it will consist of 97 four-story buildings, spread over less than half of a 50-acre tract, which will contain 3,100 dwelling units for 18,000 workers and family members.

The sponsor is the Graphic Arts Workers Union. The AFL-CIO and some of its affiliates are putting up $10 million of the $14 million cost in the form of mortgage loans repayable over 20 years. The Mexican government assisted in providing the site, which is on a main thoroughfare between the downtown of Mexico City and the airport.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, represented American workers at the dedication ceremonies. Finance Minister Antonio Ortiz Mena, who helped guide the cornerstone of the first building into place, announced that the project would bear Kennedy's name and emphasized that the Mexican government was "in complete and full agreement" with the union's decision to honor the late U.S. President.

The homes, he said, not only will help to perpetuate Kennedy's memory, but in addition will symbolize the deep ties of friendship between the labor movement of the two countries.

In his address to the more than 2,000 persons who attended the opening ceremonies, Suffridge said the occasion was the first in history that the trade union movement of any country has provided direct financial and technical assistance of this type to organized labor in an other nation.

He praised the "high principles" of Kennedy and his desire to help the people of all countries achieve social progress.

George L-P Weaver, assistant secretary of labor for international affairs, who represented the U.S. government, called the project an important achievement of the Mexican Revolution and said it offered to the world an example of how democracy and freedom can help men to better lives.

In addition to the 94 apartment buildings, the project will include two schools, five kindergartens and a commercial zone that will offer medical facilities and a theater.

The units in each building will vary from two to three bedrooms and each will include a living room, kitchen, bath and laundry facilities. Payments will range from $22 to $48 monthly, but in no case will exceed 25 percent of a family's income, and will give the resident ownership in 20 years.

Others who attended the groundbreaking rites included Alexander Bookstaver, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment, who assisted in arranging the financing; Robert Mayer of the AFL-CIO general counsel's office; U.S. Ambassador Thomas C. Mann; Undersec. of the Treasury Jesus Rodriquez, of Mexico, and Pres. Armando Henero and Gen. Sec. Antonio Vera Jiminez of the Graphic Arts union.

Church Unit Backs Youth Job Moves

Philadelphia—The General Assembly of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. has called for support of legislation and other public and private programs "for the education, training, motivation and other employment needs of youth in general and of Negro youth in particular."

Member-churches and related state and local councils were urged to study proposals expected to result from a consultation on "The Church and Youth Employment," with special emphasis on Negro youth, to be convened next month at Warwick, N. Y., by the council's Dept. of Church & Economic Life of the Division of Christian Life & Work.

Unfair Practice Charge Filed in Mirror Closing

New York—The National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint asserting that the New York Mirror committed an unfair labor practice when it went out of business suddenly Oct. 16 without any consultation with or advance notice to three unions with which it has bargained for 39 years.

NLRB Reg. Dir. Ivan C. McLeod issued the complaint by authorization of NLRB Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman and set Jan. 20 as a date for a public hearing on the refusal to bargain charges.

After the New York Mirror Div. of the Hearst Corp. sold the Mirror's name, good will and other assets to the New York Daily News, three unions filed charges which were investigated by the labor board. The unions were the Pressmen's Local 2, Stereotypers' Local 1 and Newspaper Guild Local 3.

Ordman said in a statement that Mirror management reached a decision to shut down the paper, and did shut it down, "without having consulted with the certified bargaining representatives" of the three charging unions. That appears to have been a refusal to bargain, he said, citing an NLRB decision of last January in which the board ruled that the Star Baby Co. had violated the labor relations act by "unilaterally terminating business operations" without consulting with a union of Star Baby employes.

Another case involving union charges against an employer who went out of business will be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court by the Textile Workers Union of America, the union has announced. The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled recently, in a case involving the Darlington Mfg. Co., that the NLRB does not have the right to prevent a closedown or to order the payment of damages to laid-off workers.

SOME OF THE FACTORS in the AFL-CIO's goal of a better America are detailed in this back cover of the 44-page New York Times magazine supplement, "The Hands that Build America," which tells the story of the AFL-CIO. The supplement was distributed as part of the Times Sunday edition for Nov. 17, during the AFL-CIO convention. It also was distributed with the paper's West Coast edition the following day and with the international edition of the newspaper on Nov. 25. Single copies of the supplement are available without charge from the Pamphlet Div. of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Quantity prices: 10 cents each in lots less than 1,000 and $75 per 1,000.

'Partnership' Concept Urged on NAM

New York—Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers told the 68th Congress of American Industry sponsored by the National Association of Manufacturers that the majority of the American people have profited in the past and stand to profit in the future through the partnership of organized labor, industry and government.

Industry leaders and business educators addressing the conference declared, however, that industry cannot earn the profit to which it is entitled so long as it faces intervention by the federal government and its agencies.

Cites Own Union

McDonald, who spoke on the role of labor-management relations in economic growth, pointed to his own union as a prime example of one which had achieved an extended period of labor-management peace through stressing human relations and mutual trusteeship.

He suggested that the human relations concept as applied to industrial affairs could help to find equitable solutions to unemployment, automation and accelerated economic growth.

"I submit simply that we cannot attain those things unless we face our problems in mutual good faith," he declared. "We must be motivated by a high sense of responsibility to discharge our obligations to our nation, not as pressure groups, not as self-seekers, but in the interest of the common good."

McDonald protested the assertion by industry spokesmen that unions favor government intervention and controls over labor-management relations.

"We recognize that the government interest can and must be asserted at times for, in fact, this is in the public interest," he said. "But we prefer and will fight for cooperation, rather than coercive force. Any other position would be alien to our American beliefs."

U.S. Must Stay Ahead

Discussing automation, the USWA leader, an AFL-CIO vice president, held that if this country hopes to keep pace with nations it faces in the cold war it must remain far ahead.

Most of the other speakers took sharp issue with him on the subject of the government's role in labor-management relations. Dr. Herbert R. Northrup, University of Pennsylvania professor of industry, called for less government activity as a means of securing improved collective bargaining and the preservation of free enterprise.

Accusing the National Labor Relations Board of making decisions that are "enhancing union power", he urged stricter enforcement of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts as well as repeal of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which restricts federal court injunctions in labor-management disputes.

NAM Pres. W. F. Gullander predicted that the nation's economy under the leadership of Pres. Johnson would recover from the shock of Pres. Kennedy's assassination, resume its climb and pass the $600 billion mark in gross national product, although failing to reduce unemployment.

Arthur H. Mottley, president of Parade Publications, pointing to plans of the AFL-CIO for its Committee on Political Education, urged an all-out drive by individual NAM members to build their Business-Industry Political Action Committee.

L. A. Mashburn Of Lathers Dies at 66

Pres. Lloyd A. Mashburn of the Lathers, who served as an undersecretary of labor during the Eisenhower Administration, died of a heart attack while attending the union's Midwest Conference in Chicago.

He had held the "little cabinet" post briefly, resigning in 1953 when Sec. of Labor Martin P. Durkin quit in a disagreement with Administration policy but remaining in office until the next year and serving for several months as acting secretary. He then became assistant to the president of the Lathers, and in 1955 assumed the top post.

In a telegram to Mrs. Mashburn, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas William F. Schnitzler expressed "sincere sorrow" at his death.

"His many years of work in public life both in his home state and at the national level mark him as truly a man of the working people," they said in offering their condolences. They designated Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO to represent them at the burial, which was in Los Angeles.

Mashburn was born in Greeley, Colo., learned his trade there and moved to California after serving in the Marines in World War I. He joined the union in 1922 and 10 years later took an important part in the merger of two locals. He acted as business manager of the combined Local 42 until 1939, and then became assistant secretary and later secretary of the Los Angeles Building & Construction Trades Council.

Between 1939 and 1951, when the then Gov. Earl Warren appointed him state labor commissioner, he also held a number of posts with state and district bodies of the Lathers and the building trades as well as a wide variety of civic and community posts.

Jesse McGlon Dies, IAM Vice President

Atlanta, Ga.—Vice Pres. Jesse C. McGlon of the Machinists died of a heart attack in Georgia Baptist Hospital a few hours before he was to have attended a Washington meeting of the National Labor-Management Panel appointed by the late Pres. Kennedy earlier this year.

Other members of the panel, composed of six representatives each of labor and management charged with advising the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service on how to avoid industrial disputes, issued a statement mourning the death of their "valued and constructive" colleague and calling him a "labor statesman who never permitted partisan interests to rise above his overriding exercise of responsible citizenship."

IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes, a longtime associate, said he served the union with "distinction" and said he "will be missed as an officer and as a friend."

Born in Jacksonvile, Fla., where funeral services were held, he would have been 61 on Dec. 29. He became an active union member while an apprentice on the Seaboard Railroad, was elected a local officer and served as IAM general chairman on the Seaboard prior to his election as vice president in 1949. He also held other labor posts and during World War II was a member of the Regional Manpower Board and the Regional War Labor Board.

Surviving are the widow, the former LaVerne Weeks, two sons and a daughter.

To Change Public Attitude:

AFL-CIO to Open Drive for Disabled

New York—A nationwide program of health education will be initiated in January by AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, Dir. Leo Perlis announced at the National Labor Conference on Rehabilitation here.

Perlis said the program would involve organized labor, government and private health agencies in an effort to "change the attitude of the public so that it will accept and adjust to persons who are disabled."

"The total health of the total person is our primary concern," he added.

Perlis listed five areas in which organized labor could contribute to rehabilitation:

- Education — by raising the level of public understanding of rehabilitation problems, needs and services.
- Collective bargaining—by considering the problems of handicapped workers in contracts.
- Case finding and referral—by developing relationships with rehabilitation agencies.
- Political and legislative action —by supporting legislation to provide better workman compensation laws, grants for rehabilitation and more adequate public welfare laws.
- Special projects—by taking part in pilot projects and demonstrations to develop new ways to rehabilitate the handicapped.

Perlis noted that in the past rehabilitation projects have been primarily for the physically disabled and pointed out that "mentally and emotionally disturbed persons also need rehabilitation."

In all, he said, about 19.5 million adults and 8.5 million children are in need of rehabilitation services.

"The labor movement has for years been in the forefront in the battle for workmen's compensation," Perlis continued, "but workmen's compensation is only part of rehabilitation. No amount of money will rehabilitate a person and make him a useful member of his community."

Dr. Howard A. Rusk, director of the Institute of Physical Medicine & Rehabilitation of New York University and an associate editor of the New York Times, said much progress has been made in a short time.

Discussing new methods in this field, Rusk noted that high pressure oxygen chambers are now being used to rehabilitate persons with heart disease as well as those with other handicaps.

"I am glad to see the interest shown by labor in the field of rehabilitation," he said. "Labor-sponsored projects in this field will give a new insight into solving the problems of rehabilitation."

Rusk also called for a public education program to show the positive results of rehabilitation programs.

Mary E. Switzer, director of the U.S. Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, said that in some respects the age of automation will benefit physically handicapped Americans who need employment. For one thing, she said, jobs in automated plants will be less physically demanding, since machines will do so much of the heavy work.

"On the other hand," Miss Switzer said, "the readjustment of the job structure in a newly automated plant can work to the disadvantage of a handicapped worker. Usually, he will have less union seniority than a non-disabled worker."

Meany Warns of Extremist Forces

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sees observance of "Human Rights Day" this year as serving to encourage Americans to overcome the forces of extremism which seek to destroy the "dignity of man and his inalienable rights."

Marking the 15th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights on Dec. 10, Meany noted that there are those who will not recognize that all men are created equal and who believe that "democracy is theoretical."

The American labor movement, he emphasized, "more than any other sector of free society . . . has understood and reacted strongly against the unnatural and dictatorial power of extremists seeking to restrict and deny human rights."

Meany urged that efforts to effectively overcome these forces be undertaken in the community, the nation and the world.

NATIONWIDE PROGRAM of health education will be undertaken by the AFL-CIO, Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities announced at the National Labor Conference on Rehabilitation held in New York. Perlis, left, is shown with Dr. Howard Rusk, director of the Institute of Physical Medicine & Rehabilitation at the New York Medical Center.

A WREATH WAS LAID at the grave of Pres. John F. Kennedy, in Arlington Cemetery, by members of the Intl. Solidarity Committee of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions during their meeting in Washington. ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu is shown placing the wreath at the grave. Behind him, from left to right between the uniformed officers, are A. Hargreaves, international affairs director for the British Trades Union Congress; ICFTU Assistant Gen. Sec. H. A. Tulatz; ICFTU Pres. Arne Geijer; TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock, and, partly hidden behind the saluting officer's hand, ICFTU Asian Regional Sec. G. Mapara and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

10-Year Public Works Program Proposed by New York Mayor

San Juan, P. R.—New York Mayor Robert F. Wagner has proposed a 10-year, government-financed public works program to provide jobs for workers now considered unemployable because they lack essential skills, training and education or their skills "have been automated out of usefulness."

Wagner addressed a two-day conference here sponsored by the American Foundation on Automation & Employment and the Latin American Institute of Labor-Management Relations. The foundation co-chairmen are John I. Snyder, head of U.S. Industries, and Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists. The institute is supported by the Seafarers and Puerto Rican industrialists.

The cost of the public works program, said Wagner, would be high and "will have to be shared at all levels—federal, state and local—but it will have to be done."

"I fear that the cost of not doing it," he said, "will in the end overwhelm us."

The mayor said the proposed public works program could incorporate "socially constructive" projects like those undertaken during the New Deal under the Public Works Administration.

The Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962, was criticized for its "inadequacies" by Acting Labor Commissioner James L. McFadden of New York City, who urged "drastic revision" of the law if workers unemployed due to technological change are to obtain adequate upgrading instruction, or if unskilled young people now entering the labor market are to be helped.

Law Applied 'Too Narrowly'

Sixteen months experience with the law in New York City, McFadden said, had demonstrated that both federal and state authorities are applying it much too narrowly. The act, he asserted, is not reaching the least educated workers or those without marketable skills.

The problem of workers with little education received particular attention. Prof. Charles C. Killingsworth of Michigan State University charged that the President's Council of Economic Advisers had adopted what he called "unrealistic assumptions on the size of unemployment" and had failed to recognize its "full magnitude."

A frequent witness at senatorial hearings, the Michigan economist disputed the argument of Dr. Walter Heller, CEA chairman, that a lagging growth rate in the economy rather than automation is responsible for the present 5.9 percent jobless figure. Killingsworth said that spreading automation has reduced the demand for blue-collar workers with low education levels while increasing the demand for white-collar workers with high education and skills.

Snyder, in his address, proposed establishment of a "Caribbean Common Market" with a potential of 15 million customers to start the area on the road to economic development.

Other participants in the conference were SIU Pres. Paul Hall; Keith Terpe, head of the SIU's Latin American division; Theodore W. Kheel, foundation secretary-treasurer; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council; Vice Pres. Anthony Scotto of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.; Sec. of Labor Frank Zorrilla of Puerto Rico; Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League; Pres. Hipolito Marcano of the Puerto Rican AFL-CIO; New York Welfare Commissioner James R. Dumpson; Dr. Candido Oliveras, secretary of education of Puerto Rico, and Martin E. Segal.

Survey of Union Rolls Shows 487,000 Drop

United States unions had 17.6 million members in 1962, a drop of 487,000 from the 1960 total, with the bulk of the decline in manufacturing industries, the Labor Dept. reported in its biennial survey of union membership.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said a drop of 627,000 in union members on manufacturing and nonmanufacturing payrolls was offset by a gain of 155,000 members in public employment.

The loss in manufacturing was 541,000, in nonmanufacturing 86,000. A significant factor, the BLS noted, was the "steady decline in production workers jobs" in manufacturing. In 1962 there were about 250,000 fewer production workers in U.S. manufacturing industries than in 1960, it noted.

Other highlights of the report:

Union membership in the U.S. declined from 17,049,000 in 1960 to 16,586,000 in 1962, a loss of 463,000; in Canada, from 1,068,000 to 1,044,000, down 24,000 in the two-year period.

About 8.1 million union members were employed in manufacturing jobs in 1962. Another 8.3 million were in private nonmanufacturing jobs, and 1.2 million in government service—federal, state and local.

Some 3.3 million women were union members in 1962. The number of white collar workers—professional, clerical and sales — in unions was 2.3 million, a gain of about 93,000 since 1960.

In 1962, AFL-CIO affiliates accounted for 14.8 million union members as against 15.1 million in 1960. National unaffiliated unions reported 2.8 million in 1962 as against 3 million in 1960. The decline was 237,000 for AFL-CIO unions, 251,000 for others.

As a percentage of the U.S. nonfarm labor force, union membership dropped from 31.4 percent to 30 percent in the two-year period while the nonfarm labor force itself was rising from 54.3 million to 55.3 million, BLS said.

Membership figures in the report were obtainable by means of a questionnaire and will be printed in the bureau's 1963 union directory, to be published next April. The report will include data on national government unions holding exclusive bargaining rights.

Congressional Logjam Starts to Break

College Aid Passed, Other Bills Moving

(Continued from Page 1)

Committee until legislation making employer-demanded "reforms" in administration of the Davis-Bacon Act is brought to the floor.

In other legislative developments:

- Appropriations bills, carrying money for the fiscal year which began last July 1, began to move through Congress.
- The House approved the $3.6 billion foreign aid authorization bill worked out by a conference committee, which deleted several restrictions on the President's use of aid funds. If the Senate concurs, the money must still be appropriated.
- A "clean air" bill, providing a three-year program of research and grants to reduce air pollution, was sent to the White House after the House approved a conference report, 273-109.
- The House formally confirmed a Democratic leadership decision to give the Rules Committee seat being vacated by Rep. Homer Thornberry (D-Tex.) to his fellow Texan, Rep. John Young. Thornberry is leaving Congress to take a federal judgeship. The Appropriations Committee vacancy left by Rep. John F. Shelley, mayor-elect of San Francisco, was filled by another California Democrat, John J. McFall.

The college aid bill was the first new aid to education measure enacted by Congress since the National Defense Education Act of 1958 and Johnson hailed it as the most significant in the past century.

"This Congress is well on its way to doing more for education than any Congress since the Land-Grant College Act was passed 100 years ago," the President declared.

The Senate voted 54-27 for final passage, with opposition coming primarily from members who objected to deletion of a provision inviting a court test of the constitutionality of aid to religious-supported colleges.

The bill contains these major provisions:

- Federal grants totaling $690 million over three years are authorized to help finance specified classrooms, libraries, laboratories and other academic facilities in both public and private colleges. Twenty-two percent of these funds would be earmarked for public junior colleges and technical institutions.
- A separate grant program for graduate school construction, totaling $145 million over three years.
- Long-term, low-interest loans to finance up to 75 percent of the cost of construction of academic facilities. The three-year loan authorization would total $360 million.

Early in November, the House had approved the college aid conference report, 258-92. The Senate held up action until conferees reached agreement on the separate vocational education bill.

Included in the vocational bill is an extension of two existing programs—the National Defense Education Act, which includes scholarships and fellowships to students, and the aid to school districts in areas crowded by federal military and civilian employes.

The vocational education bill provides an immediate jump in federal grants from the present $58 million level to $103 million, with the amounts rising in future years. It emphasizes modern training for today's jobs and decreased stress on farm work and home skills. The funds would be allocated on a formula which considers both the per capita income of a state and its population.

LABOR'S CASE for a shorter workweek is discussed with Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), right, by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, left, and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

35-Hour Week Urged As Vital to Create Jobs

(Continued from Page 1)

and-one-half rates than to hire or recall additional employes and take on added fringe benefit expenses. This, he said, has largely nullified the original purpose of premium pay — to discourage overtime work and spread employment.

"This has created the paradox of substantial overtime in a period when millions of workers are jobless and when millions more are compelled to work part-time because full-time jobs are not available," he added.

The AFL-CIO spokesman acknowledged that an immediate substantial reduction in the workweek without a cut in weekly wages would boost labor costs for employers, since hourly wages would have to be raised. He made these points, however:

- If the workweek were cut back gradually and productivity were to continue to rise at its present rate, wage increases could be absorbed without a rise in unit labor costs and without higher prices.
- Full employment would lift consumer demand, leading to increased production and lower unit labor costs.
- Unemployment is not without economic and social cost—to business as well as to other segments of the community. To the extent that shorter hours reduce unemployment, they will also reduce the economic burden of joblessness.

It is "nonsense," Biemiller said, to contend that a 35-hour week would cut down the nation's productive power.

"We are not talking about less production," he told the subcommittee. "We are talking about more production, sustained by greater purchasing power stemming from higher employment."

Labor does not consider the 40-hour week "unreasonable" or "exhausting" and "we wish everyone could work 40 hours," he said.

He stressed that in a period when the labor force is growing, automation is reducing opportunities for employment. Most of the increase in employment during the past 10 years has been in state and local government jobs, he pointed out, while some economists estimate that the number of full-time jobs in the private sector of the economy has actually declined.

Labor's fight for a shorter workweek, Biemiller declared, is not a battle against "exploitation or inhumanity. We are fighting for the preservation of the American economic system."

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, who joined in presenting the testimony, reminded the subcommittee that the workweek was slashed during the period of the nation's greatest technological progress, in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. During this period, the United States was being transformed into the world's greatest industrial power, he noted.

Spokesmen for two AFL-CIO affiliates joined in opening labor's case for a shorter workweek before Congress, with a number of other unions scheduled to testify during the week beginning Dec. 16 and in a continuation of the hearings in January.

Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers reminded the subcommittee that labor first hailed automation as a means of liberating man "from the drudgery of the machine." Instead, he said, "we have the sick spectacle of a United States with 6 million continuously unemployed or underemployed."

He suggested that, to discourage "moonlighting," penalty pay be required after 35 hours of work by an employe. This would require the second employer to pay premium rates to hire a person who already has a full-time job.

Ben B. Seligman, research director of the Retail Clerks, noted that store clerks at one time were required to work "fantastically long hours" and that the reduction to present hours was accomplished without "harmful effects.

"Only a multi-pronged attack on the disease of unemployment will succeed," the RCIA spokesman declared. But he stressed that "the shorter workweek is one of those prongs."

Jobless Rate Mounts To 5.9% in November

(Continued from Page 1)

cutbacks in outdoor work and a greater number of teenagers looking for part-time jobs. The BLS said it could not account for the sharp rise in joblessness but agreed it was "larger than seasonal."

A spokesman suggested the increase might be due to "statistical aberrations" and, if so, the picture would be clarified in the detailed monthly report on the labor force, to be issued Dec. 17, or in next month's preliminary estimates of employment and unemployment.

Asked when Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson's goal of 75 million jobs for U.S. workers might be reached at the present rate of growth, he said it might take about three more years.

"I take it the goal of the Administration is to get unemployment lower," said Harold C. Goldstein, BLS assistant commissioner for manpower and employment statistics.

"If you assume an unemployment rate of 4 percent, the goal could be reached in 1966," Goldstein said. "With 3 percent, it could be a little earlier."

At the present rate—5.9 percent—it would be later than 1966, he said.

Other highlights:

- The number of persons out of work in mid-November, 3.9 million, was 483,000 higher than in mid-October.
- Jobless rates for workers aged 20 years or more climbed from 4.1 percent to 4.3 percent for men, and from 5.4 percent to 5.7 percent for women.
- For teenagers (14-19) the rise was from 15.4 percent in October to 17.2 percent in November, close to the record figure of May 1963. For this group unemployment through 1963 has continued "substantially higher" than the year-earlier figures, BLS reported.

The total civilian labor force declined slightly but still was 1.4 million ahead of the November 1962 total.

The BLS added that the number of nonagricultural workers on part time for economic reasons held steady in November at 2.1 million but was down by 218,000 from the year-ago report.

Film Presents Last Words Of Pres. Kennedy to Labor

"John F. Kennedy's Last Words to Labor," a 16 mm. film of the late President's address to the 1963 AFL-CIO convention a week before his assassination, will be available for sale or rental from the Dept. of Education Jan. 1.

The film, which runs 28.5 minutes, may be purchased for $35 a copy. The figure is the actual cost of printing in accordance with a directive from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to encourage the widest possible distribution by keeping the price to a minimum.

The rental price is $3 per showing. Reservations should be made two weeks in advance with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Unions Upheld On Legal Aid For Members

Lansing, Mich.—The Michigan Supreme Court has unanimously upheld the right of a labor union to act in behalf of its members in appealing an adverse unemployment compensation ruling.

The court acted in a challenge by the Ford Motor Co. of the right of the Auto Workers to appeal through an attorney on behalf of several thousand Michigan members. They were laid off by Ford because of what the company called a "parts shortage" growing out of a strike at the firm's plant in Canton, O., in 1958. The Michigan high court, the following year, upheld unemployment benefits for the Michigan workers.

The action instituted by Ford was disposed of in a decision that changed court procedural rules so as to spell out clearly a union's right to involve itself in a so-called "class action," or one involving many claimants.

The key provisions were:

- A "class action" is authorized to be brought on behalf of all employes involved in a common issue appeal to the circuit court from rulings of the Michigan Employment Security Commission.
- Unions are specifically authorized to retain attorneys in behalf of all persons involved in such a "class action."
- Appeals from MESC appeal board decisions are greatly simplified.

12-14-63

Johnson Hails Union Efforts In Americas

(Continued from Page 1)

from 10 Latin American lands read at exercises in the AFL-CIO Bldg. by Federation Pres. George Meany.

Pointing out that unions are an organism through which workers can take an active, progressive role in national development, Johnson said they "can aid all men to unite in dignity while seeking a better life."

"The young men you are graduating today," the message went on, "will shortly return to their native lands to teach and lead their countrymen.

"Their training here has perhaps been more complete" than that of preceding classes because "they have witnessed a bitter harvest reaped from the seeds of irresponsibility and the fruits of extremism."

The Alliance for Progress, Johnson said, will continue to grow and develop but its success will rely in large measure on the students' ability, together with other Latin American elements of society, "to pull together under a banner of enlightenment to eliminate poverty, disease and other blights of mankind."

During the ceremony the graduates stood at attention in memory of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII — Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year — Saturday, Dec. 21, 1963 — No. 51

Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C.

Vocational School, Manpower Aid OK

Thanks to Unions:

Kingsport Children Assured Happy Yule

Kingsport, Tenn.—Christmas will be a lot brighter than anyone expected this year for the children of 1,400 Kingsport Press strikers, thanks to people with a heart.

By that special touch of wizardry best practiced by those working people who are willing to share their little with those who have less, Santa's big bag was stretched to the bursting point the week before the holiday.

With $10,000 donated by the Bookbinders, and other contributions by labor donors around the nation, the Allied Kingsport Press Unions dispatched a shopping expedition to New York and with the help of the needle trades there, brought back enough to give every striker's child a pair of new shoes, a blouse, shirt, pair of pants or a warm sweater.

But the best way to make a child's eyes shine and his face to glow is a Christmas party—so the five union locals, on strike for a decent contract since last Mar. 11, have reserved the biggest hall in town, the Kingsport Civic Auditorium, for a party Dec. 23 with toys and candy, carols and Yule trees and, of course, Santa Claus.

Entertainment, including carol singing and a magician, has been donated by persons determined to see that the strikers' children have a happy party.

By careful shopping, and skilled guidance from New York unions, Kingsport representatives stretched their $10,000 fund to bring back apparel that might have cost $25,000 at full retail rates—1,535 pairs of shoes; 783 boys' and girls' sweaters; 725 boys' shirts; 581 boys' pants; 278 skirt and blouse sets; and 258 blouses for girls.

Label Council Helped

The union delegation, headed by Robert Munson of the Bookbinders and Pres. Joseph Hellman of the union's Local 119 in New York, found the way smoothed by Sec.-Treas. Harry Avrutin of the New York Union Label & Service Trades Council.

Among those who helped were the Shirtmakers' Joint Board of the Clothing Workers, who assisted in buying a supply of boys' shirts and donated $350. Dist. 65, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, gave $500. ACWA officers gave their services and the Ladies' Garment Workers donated shopping bags for easy handling of garments. The bags carry the admonition "Don't Buy Judy Bond" in line with the union's fight against a runaway clothing manufacturer.

The Kingsport unions have tried in every way possible, spokesmen say, to get a prompt settlement of the strike against Kingsport Press, without success. They are continuing the fight for a just contract and have asked all consumers to refrain from buying books produced at the

(Continued on Page 6)

Studebaker Job Prospects Termed Grim

South Bend, Ind.—The Studebaker shutdown scheduled for Dec. 20 will result in the permanent unemployment of more than 4,000 Auto Workers whose average age is 54 and who have no special skills.

That's the picture being drawn by senior UAW officials on the scene. Reg. Dir. Ray Berndt of Indianapolis explained it this way:

"Studebaker Local 5 has 7,200 active and 2,170 retired members. Of the active members, about 1,100 are between 60 and 65 years of age and will be eligible for early or normal retirement benefits. About 700 skilled and 500 semi-skilled members, if they're lucky, will find employment elsewhere. Another 700 to 800 may continue to work, at least for a while, at those operations Studebaker is continuing here.

"That leaves a hard core of more than 4,000 older, unskilled production and maintenance

(Continued on Page 6)

Won With Labor's Aid:

1963 Rights Gains Called Substantial

New York—The labor movement contributed to substantial and significant advances in civil rights legislation and integration made during 1963 despite "shameful events" that cost the lives of at least six persons, according to a year-long survey by the American Jewish Committee.

Findings of the study were published in the 15th edition of "The People Take the Lead," the committee's annual civil rights roundup which appears each year on Human Rights Day, Dec. 15.

Not all Americans have been on the "right side of the struggle," AJC Pres. A. M. Sonnabend of Boston noted.

"The wanton murders of Medgar Evers in Mississippi and William Moore in Alabama, and the killing of four children by a hate bomb in Birmingham are an inescapable part of the record," he said.

"So is the vandal-wrecked home of the Philadelphia couple who exercised their right to live where they pleased, and the bomb-closed parochial school in Louisiana which opened its classrooms to all God's children. So are the fire hoses, the police dogs, the electric cattle prods and the jail terms that countered many demonstrations for the right to vote, to attend desegregated schools, to be served in public restaurants, to be considered for non-menial jobs, and all the other essential freedoms guaranteed, in the abstract, to every citizen.

"Yet these shameful events, which so rightly rack the American conscience, are part of a much wider record—a record of progress and hope which this survey can only begin to highlight."

Significant events of the last 12 months covered in the report were:

- The last color bar in the constitution of any AFL-CIO union was removed, and scores of formerly segregated white and Negro locals were merged.
- The AFL-CIO set up a special "task force" to work in key major cities toward the elimination of discrimination "wherever it exists—on the job, in the schools, in the voting booth, in housing developments, stores, theaters or recreation areas."
- The AFL-CIO urged the establishment of apprenticeship information centers to encourage minority group youth to enter the skilled trades.
- Actors' Equity prohibited performances by members in any theater with a policy of racial segregation "in front of or behind the footlights." Six southern theaters ended segregation.
- Thirty-six states ratified a proposed constitutional amendment outlawing the poll tax as a requirement for voting in federal elections.
- In the South, 161 additional school districts were desegregated, raising the total to 1,141 districts where children of all races occupy the same classrooms.
- Drives to bar job discrimination and to open apprenticeship training to all qualified young persons were pushed by the federal government and many state and local governments.
- Indiana and Hawaii adopted enforceable fair employment laws, making the total 22 states; Iowa and Vermont joined Idaho in subjecting job discrimination to criminal penalties.
- Discrimination in private housing was barred in California, the 11th state to take such action; similar laws already in existence were strengthened in Connecticut, Massachusetts and several cities.
- Maryland and South Dakota joined 28 other states with laws

(Continued on Page 2)

Congress To Adjourn Until Jan. 7

An expanded manpower training program and a billion-dollar-plus upgrading of vocational education were signed into law as the first session of the 88th Congress moved toward adjournment.

The final days of the year-long session were marked by the traditional battle over appropriation of foreign aid funds as other key measures, including tax reduction and civil rights, were put over until the new session opening Jan. 7.

Final passage of the manpower training and vocational education bills by the Senate topped a flurry of activity in the closing days of the session which witnessed approval also of a $1.2 billion college aid bill carrying federal grants and loans to help private and public institutions to build and equip classrooms, laboratories and libraries.

Pres. Johnson termed the measure the "most significant education bill" in history as he affixed his signature at the White House. He noted that it contained the first broad assistance program for colleges since the Land Grant Act of a century ago. He added that federal aid to public schools was still pending and constituted important unfinished business for the nation.

The President also signed the vocational education measure, the manpower training expansion and a bill setting up a three-year program of research and grants to reduce air pollution as the adjournment-headed Congress stepped up the legislative pace.

3 Major Bills Enacted

Presidential signatures on the the college aid and vocational education programs gave the first session a record of three major education bills adopted. Previously a measure providing federal aid for medical,

(Continued on Page 8)

Strike Off as Sleeping Car Porters Win Major Goals in New Contract

The Sleeping Car Porters have reached agreement with 53 railroads and the Pullman Co. on a new contract achieving three of the union's major goals and averting a strike scheduled for Dec. 20.

Pres. A. Philip Randolph called the settlement a "notable victory" giving union members the 40-hour workweek, a wage increase and a "measure of job protection."

The new contract, Randolph said, is "full achievement of our goal of the 40-hour week or 173-hour work month; a 5.14-cent hourly wage increase, and protection of jobs" where sleeping car operations are taken over by railroads from the Pullman Co. He added:

"We achieved what has long been our right, and what is now enjoyed by 95 percent of other railroad workers, thanks to the determination of our members, the personal participation of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and support by the Railway Labor Executives' Association."

The settlement will be the basis, the AFL-CIO vice president said, for securing similar gains for attendants represented by the union on 25 other railroads. Negotiations on these roads will "begin promptly," he announced.

The settlement was achieved without any curtailment of holiday season service as a result of union members' determination to strike if necessary, along with management officials' realization that they had "no honorable basis for denying our demands," the brotherhood president said.

Union negotiators included Randolph and Vice Presidents M. P. Webster, Chicago; Bennie Smith, Detroit; and T. T. McNeal, St. Louis, assisted by officers of the Labor Bureau of the Midwest,

(Continued on Page 7)

LATIN AMERICAN labor unionists were saluted by a battery of speakers at fifth graduating exercises of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. Among the speakers were, from the left: AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Antonio Carrillo Flores, Mexico's ambassador to the U.S.; Ben S. Stephansky, deputy assistant secretary of state for social development; and Emilio Salgado Zubiaga, who spoke for the 31 graduates.

Meany Pledges Fight For Kennedy Ideals

The American labor movement will carry on the fight to achieve the ideals of peace and freedom to which John F. Kennedy devoted his life, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at graduation exercises for the fifth group of Latin American union labor leaders trained by the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"We shall not forget him," Meany told the 31 students from 10 countries after expressing appreciation for condolences extended by the class and by the ambassador from Mexico, Antonio Carrillo Flores.

Saying "more real tears were shed" for the late President than for "any other in my lifetime," Meany pledged that "we will preserve and carry on the work he so nobly advanced" to make a better land "in a happier and more peaceful world."

The graduates, who were nearing the end of their three-month course when Kennedy was assassinated Nov. 22, not only expressed their sorrow at his loss but went in a body to view the late President's grave in Arlington National Cemetery.

Solemn Note

The death of the U.S. President gave a solemn tone to the graduation exercises and the luncheon that followed. The tragedy, and Kennedy's work for peace and inter-American friendship, were noted by all the speakers.

Besides Meany and Ambassador Carrillo, they included Emilio Salgado Zubiaga of Mexico, the class speaker; Humberto Silva Villacorta of Peru, class president; Deputy Assistant Sec. of State Ben S. Stephansky, and Assistant Labor Sec. George L-P Weaver.

Meany is AIFLD president. Another representative at the graduation luncheon was Henry S. Woodbridge, board chairman of the True Temper Corp., who stressed the dependence of the free enterprise system and free labor upon each other.

Representatives of 13 nations attended the luncheon at which the graduates presented a plaque to Meany in appreciation for the work of AIFLD. The institute, founded by the AFL-CIO, draws support from labor, U.S. business, foundations and the government through its Alliance for Progress funds.

More than 180 potential Latin leaders have been trained at the AIFLD school in Washington. An additional 1,700 have attended institute programs in Latin America.

Members of the latest class will return to Mexico, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Dominica, Honduras, Panama, Peru, Venezuela and Paraguay—the latter represented by two exiles living in Argentina.

At the graduation, Meany presented certificates to the students and read a message from Pres. Johnson wishing them well and asserting that unions can "aid all men to unite in dignity while seeking a better life." Meany told the class he hoped they will use their knowledge "for the benefit of the country you live in, and for the entire world."

16 Education Projects Aided by ILO in 1963

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization has assisted and participated during 1963 in 16 worker education seminars and courses organized by trade union bodies in all parts of the world, Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse reported.

'Substantial' Rights Gains Made in 1963

(Continued from Page 1)

against discrimination in public accommodations.

- The U.S. Supreme Court repeatedly ruled that all public facilities must be desegregated and that sit-in demonstrations seeking this end do not constitute breaches of the peace.

Sonnabend recalled that the Rev. Martin Luther King, in his address to the March on Washington observed that "when the architects of our republic wrote the magnificent words of the constitution and the Declaration of Independence, they were signing a promissory note to which every American would fall heir." The AJC president continued:

"Nineteen-sixty-three—the 100th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation and the 15th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights—was the year in which the American people decided, in overwhelming numbers, that the promissory note had come due."

Wirtz Looks Ahead:

'The Future Belongs To Trained, Skilled'

"The future belongs almost entirely to the educated, the trained and the skilled," Sec. W. Willard Wirtz declared in releasing a new issue of the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Handbook covering some 700 occupations in 30 major industries.

Wirtz told a press conference that "although there is unemployment, there is also opportunity." But, he added:

"The uneducated are going to have a very hard time being employed in the future with new machines and automation moving in. To even think about competing with the machines with less than a sound high school education, at the very least, is to delude oneself."

The handbook is a guide to the necessary qualifications, conditions, earnings and employment prospects of a vast range of American jobs. Except for a decline in farmers and farm laborers and no growth in mining jobs, it predicts slight to sharp expansion in every segment of our economy. It expects the labor force to grow from 73 million to 93 million between 1960 and 1975.

The volume projects the principal occupational changes expected in the 15 years between 1960 and 1975. The highlights of the outlook, based on the assumption of full employment, are:

- A continuing rapid growth in white-collar jobs, particularly in the professional and technical categories.
- An average growth in skilled blue-collar occupations but a slower-than-average expansion in semi-skilled work and no change at the unskilled level.
- A somewhat faster-than-average growth among service workers.
- A further decline in the number of farmers and farm laborers.

By far the most rapid rise in employment will be in the professional and technical group—particularly among engineers, scientists and technicians. The number of classroom teachers, nurses, and accountants will also grow, but at a slower rate.

Despite the increasing use of automatic data-processing equipment and other mechanical devices, the demand for clerical workers is expected to increase. Also expanding in number are salaried managerial positions.

New Regulations Issued For Apprenticeships

The Labor Dept. has issued final regulations to insure equal opportunity in apprenticeship training programs to take effect Jan. 17, 1964.

The regulations will apply directly in the 22 states where the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training registers apprenticeship programs. Twenty-eight other states with state apprenticeship programs recognized by the federal government will be affected indirectly.

The final draft of the regulations came after their publication in October with comments invited from interested persons. The Labor Dept. said 17 comments were received and that "the views expressed in all of them were taken into consideration in drafting the language of the document as adopted."

Enforcement of the new reglations is in the hands of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training, which is to conduct periodic reviews to determine if equal opportunity is established in all federally-registered programs.

The new standards set up a definition of discrimination to cover race, creed, color, national origin, sex "or occupationally irrelevant physical requirements." They specifically disclaim any intention of requiring selection of candidates for apprentice training on the basis of racial proportion in the total population or any other quota basis.

If there is any evidence of discrimination in drawing up lists of applicants, the new regulations require that the lists be revised to eliminate any effects of discrimination.

Selection of candidates will be based on qualifications for the specific training area in accordance with objective standards and provision for full review, or in any manner in which equality of opportunity is demonstrated.

There are about 160,000 apprentices in programs with the federal bureau or the states with agencies approved by the bureau. There are 7,000 group programs and 20,000 single employer programs.

Democratic Unions in Bolivia Bolt, Isolate Reds in Old Labor Center

La Paz, Bolivia—Democratic forces constituting a majority of the labor movement have pulled out of the Bolivian Confederation of Labor (COB), isolating Communist-led elements centered on the partitioned Miners Federation and its chief, Vice Pres. Juan Lechin.

The split was the culmination of months of preparation and was touched off by the Miners' kidnapping of 19 hostages they held for 10 days in a dynamite-girded prison to enforce demands that the government of Pres. Victor Paz Estenssoro release two leftist mine union leaders, Irineo Pimentel and Federico Escobar. The hostages were freed after the government had ringed the camp where they were held with troops. The jailed union officials are still in prison.

The new federation is known as the "New COB" and is composed of 22 unions representing about 100,000 members. Left in the old labor center are some of the miners, mainly at Siglo Viente, where the hostages were held, and Catavi, numbering 12,000 to 13,000. With other small unions, observers agree, the old COB represents no more than 15,000 workers. The rest of the miners joined the new COB.

Elected provisional general secretary of the New COB was Hugo Paz Torres, a young railroad worker who, last spring, studied for three months at the Institute for Advanced Trade Union Studies in Mexico City sponsored by the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), and then visited the United States under a State Dept. leadership grant.

First reaction of the government was to cancel its recognition of the Miners Federation as bargaining agent for employes of the nationalized tin mines, depriving the union of its legal personality and blocking its access to the courts as well as to the bargaining table.

Observers called the bolt democracy's most significant victory in South America in recent years. It was seen as destroying not only the domination of the labor movement by the Red-tinged Miners Federation, but also as a major political setback for Lechin, leader of the ultra-left wing of Estenssoro's National Revolutionary Movement (MNR).

The first aim of the new central body, as spelled out in its provisional constitution, is the "democratization" of the labor movement.

The hostages whose capture led to the showdown between democratic and Communist-dominated elements in the old COB included four Americans. One was Bernard Rifkin, a labor adviser to the Agency for Intl. Development who formerly was an international representative for the Auto Workers.

Berlin Wall Opening Recalls Meany Plea

The agreement to open the Berlin Wall for a two-week period over the Christmas holidays to allow West Berliners to visit their East Berlin relatives for the first time in over two years has recalled a similar plea by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In July 1962, in a speech to the Congress of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions in West Berlin, Meany called on the UN Human Rights Commission to arrange for opening the wall for a trial period of one month "as an experiment in humanitarianism" to allow for the reunion of families.

Factory Hiring Rate Shows Seasonal Drop

The factory hiring rate declined seasonally from 48 to 38 per 1,000 employes in October while layoffs remained virtually unchanged, moving from 18 to 19 per 1,000 workers, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported.

The seasonally adjusted rate for hirings has remained at about the same level throughout 1963.

New President an Old Friend of Labor

GET AMERICA BACK TO WORK was theme of 1962 legislative and economic conference addressed by then Vice-Pres. Johnson, one of a number of occasions that brought him together with labor during his career.

RETAIL CLERKS' PIN is placed in Johnson's lapel by RCIA Pres. James Suffridge at the union's convention last summer.

WHEN A. PHILIP RANDOLPH received the Urban League's Equal Opportunity Day award in 1962, the AFL-CIO vice president was congratulated by Johnson. In center is manufacturer John I. Snyder, Jr., and at right is Whitney Young, Jr., the league's executive director.

JOHNSON WIELDED the spade at the groundbreaking ceremonies back in 1958 for the new Washington, D. C., headquarters of the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

AT THE WHITE HOUSE, following his succession to the presidency, Johnson discussed the problems ahead with the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Right, presidential aides and Cabinet members.

LABOR'S ECONOMIC PROGRAM is presented to Johnson at the 1960 Democratic Party convention in Los Angeles by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Mrs. Johnson and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller (left) look on.

JOHNSON RECEIVED hearty welcome at Letter Carriers' 1960 convention. Right, union's then president, William C. Doherty, Sr.

LEADERS OF LOCAL 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, listen to Johnson in a meeting in the vice president's office last April.

Toward Peace and Freedom

THIS CHRISTMAS 1963 is the eighteenth since the end of World War II and the peace of the world is still to be won and with it the good will to men that is a condition of peace.

It is as clear on this Christmas, as it was in 1945 and has been every Christmas since, that there is no alternative to peace. In this age of intercontinental missiles and space satellites peace is a condition of survival.

A lasting peace can be achieved if the free world has faith and belief in its own institutions. The subversion of the Communist conspiracy can only take in those who put a cheap price on freedom, liberty and human dignity. The terror of nuclear bombs can only intimidate the weak and those of feeble faith.

The free world has the resources, the manpower, the desire to rid the world of hunger and disease, to provide the basis of social justice in which all men can taste of bread and freedom.

★ ★ ★

IN THE UNITED STATES this Christmas finds a nation still in mourning for Pres. John F. Kennedy, the young, vigorous, history-steeped leader who gave voice to the generation that fought and bled in World War II and had perhaps the greatest stake in the realities of peace and freedom in the atomic-space era.

In the great tradition of American democracy the nation has moved on, rallying to the words of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, "Let us continue."

Continue we must, for there is a host of problems to be faced if the essential strength of America as leader of the free world is to be maintained and expanded, if the paradoxes of our economy are to be resolved.

Pres. Kennedy awoke the nation to the needs of a modern economy, to the moral issue of civil rights, to the need for an assault on poverty. Precisely and eloquently he did the basic spadework, educating, recruiting and creating the atmosphere and tone for the action stage. Now we must continue.

★ ★ ★

THIS CHRISTMAS, the financial press reports, will set a new sales record. More money will be spent this holiday season than ever before in the nation's history. And looking on from the sidelines will be 4 million unemployed, millions more partially employed, and the one-fifth of the nation ekeing out a bare existence, caught in the web of poverty spun by discrimination, illiteracy and age.

The spirit of the holiday season may reach these for a fleeting moment or two, and then they will return to the grim, despairing world they know too well.

If America is to lead the world to peace and freedom it must first of all turn to with a will and vigor and create the programs and plans that will forever abolish poverty and want in the most prosperous nation in the world.

If there is to be peace and freedom, America must step up its efforts also to do final battle with the hunger, disease, illiteracy that dominate large areas of the globe.

This Christmas 1963 must bring not only the traditional hope that first shone forth in Bethlehem, but a new dedication that the hope shall become a reality before too many more Christmases pass.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President
WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther, Wm. C. Birthright, David J. McDonald, Joseph Curran, Joseph D. Keenan, Richard F. Walsh, James A. Suffridge, Paul L. Phillips, Paul Hall, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Emil Rieve, M. A. Hutcheson, Jacob S. Potofsky, Lee W. Minton, O. A. Knight, Peter T. Schoemann, Herman D. Kenin, Harry C. Bates, David Dubinsky, Wm. L. McFetridge, A. J. Hayes, A. Philip Randolph, Joseph A. Beirne, Karl F. Feller, L. M. Raftery, John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller
Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year: 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Dec. 21, 1963 No. 51

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Reduction 'Overdue':

Shorter Basic Workweek Held 'Essential Step' to Create Jobs

The AFL-CIO case for a shorter workweek was spelled out in great detail before a House Labor subcommittee. The following is excerpted from the testimony of AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller to the subcommittee.

WE IN THE AFL-CIO have a deep feeling about the nature of the society our forefathers created on these shores. We believe that our government, our society in all its forms, exists solely to advance the general welfare. It was not established to perpetuate any preconceived pattern of life, except the maximum degree of freedom and independence for the individual person.

Therefore we believe that automation, like every development of whatever kind that may arise, must be measured by those standards. Does it serve the general welfare? Does it contribute to the pursuit of happiness—not just of those who own the machines, but of all? If it fails these tests it is indefensible.

Automation need not and should not fail. But if it is to avoid that failure, American society—including Congress—must adapt to the realities.

The No. 1 reality, in our view, is the need for jobs; and one essential step is to shorten the basic workweek by a substantial degree.

There are two points that ought to be made now.

FIRST, there is nothing sacrosanct about the 40-hour week. It has been enshrined as one of the New Deal's achievements; that is true enough, and it deserves its position in history.

But the 40-hour week had no such aura of sanctity when it first came along. From the days of the NRA to the passage of the original Fair Labor Standards Act, the 40-hour week was simply regarded as an improvement over the 50-hour week or the 44-hour week which were then so common. As a matter of fact, there were some very distinguished Americans, some of whom are still in public life, who thought, even 30 years ago, that 40 hours was too conservative a goal. I am sure you remember the bill introduced by the distinguished associate justice of the Supreme Court, then a senator, calling for the 30-hour week.

If you will look at the history of the American workweek you will find that on the basis of past performance another reduction is already overdue. For example, from 1900 to 1940, the average workweek shrank four or five hours a decade. Since 1940 it has been cut only three hours, even allowing for paid vacations and holidays.

True, as I said at the start, this time is different. We wish everyone could work 40 hours; we wouldn't worry about their health or their leisure time. Yet if a reduction to 40 hours was justifiable for those reasons—for better health and adequate leisure—why isn't a further reduction justifiable for the well-being of the nation?

SECOND, the argument has been made—even by some who ought to know better—that a 35-hour week would cut down the nation's productive power at a time when it is most needed. This is nonsense.

We are not talking about less production; we are talking about more production, sustained by greater purchasing power stemming from higher employment in America.

In calling for a shorter workweek, we are calling for more total hours of work, not less. That is the whole idea.

We want to make it perfectly clear that we do not regard a cut in the workweek, alone, as a panacea for our unemployment problem. But neither is a tax cut alone, or public works programs alone, or a more liberal monetary policy alone.

The present unemployment problem—and the dangerous rise in joblessness on the horizon—can be effectively tackled only by simultaneous actions on a variety of fronts. And spreading job opportunities through a reduction of working hours is one of them.

Only if Congress were to enact quickly a program of job-creating legislation, far beyond anything presently being contemplated, would the current need for a cut in hours be reduced or eliminated for the present. For our current need is jobs—millions of jobs each year for the unemployed, for those displaced by automation and for our rapidly growing labor force.

Our goal is full employment and in keeping with the obligations of the Employment Act of 1946, it should be the goal of the government as well. It is obvious, however, that full employment, within the framework of the present 40-hour workweek, is becoming an increasingly remote dream.

And workers cannot live on dreams alone.

Morgan Says:

Broader Industry Aid to Schools Sought to Meet New Job Needs

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

YEARS AGO, somebody made the doleful observation that "drink is the curse of the working class." Be that as it may, it is not so topical today as an admonition to the effect that the curse of "non-think" threatens to create a permanent underclass that can't work. The prospect of this could drive a number of people to drink.

Morgan

More than 150 corporation executives, union leaders and educators have been meeting in New York City under the auspices of the National Committee for Support of the Public Schools in an effort to do something about the problem of educating Americans for a meaningful, productive life in a society whose technology is revolutionizing it almost before our very eyes.

In preparation for this conference the committee, headed by Mrs. Agnes Meyer of Washington, sent a memo to the delegates which politely but sharply accused business of taking a highly unrealistic attitude toward education.

"The fate of schools," the memo said, "does not disturb the average businessman in his capacity as a man in business—only as a father, and possibly as a fanatic alumnus, is he concerned."

The committee deplored the "ingrained attitude of a certain type of businessman, who brackets schools with charities unrelated to practical management duties" unconnected with making profits.

"But if he takes a vigilant look ahead, he might find that the competitive position of his company, his industry and his own standing as an executive is directly involved with the schools. If he isn't hit by the knowledge explosion (in new theories, new techniques, new approaches) directly, the fallout will get him."

One of the committee's basic complaints is that while industry has been relatively generous in supporting higher education, it has all but completely neglected primary and secondary education.

Indeed it has not been uncommon for a corporation to evade a share of support for public schools in a factory community by pressuring local authorities for "liberal treatment" on real estate taxes—from which schools get their basic revenue.

How firmly business has been committed to support higher education to the exclusion of public grade and high schools was revealed in returns from a questionnaire circulated at the conference, which representatives of such blue-chip corporations as Ford, IBM, Zerox, Prudential Life, McGraw-Hill, Shell Oil, Allied Chemical, AT&T and Colgate Palmolive attended.

About 70 percent of the companies polled invest their scholarships at the college level only. Of the remaining 30 percent, higher level scholarships far outweight the lower levels in nearly every case. Only one company reported a 50-50 division.

However, 79 percent of these firms do have their own educational training programs and over 85 percent have company officials who are active in educational matters in their communities.

THE ESSENTIAL commitment of business to higher education is hardly strange; it is in this area that corporations can see the quickest dividends for their investment—a computer specialist, an engineer, a physicist—trained on a scholarship.

But as Mrs. Meyer emphasized in urging business leaders to broaden their support of education, "there can be no roof without a good foundation."

David Scoll, secretary-treasurer of the committee, dramatized the tilt in our sense of educational values this way: We think nothing, he said, of paying $3 to $5 an hour for music lessons, dancing lessons and other special tutelage for our children. The public schools give them reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, physical education and many other courses at an average state-by-state cost across the nation of 45 cents an hour. A bargain, one might add, that has been neglected.

Neglected especially in the light of radical technological changes in our life. One estimate, for instance, has it that automation is causing the disemployment of people at the rate of 40,000 a week. By 1975 the "blue collar" class, the semi-skilled, service workers, laborers and farmers—people who work primarily with their hands—will comprise less than 40 percent of the work force, while skilled, white collar and especially technical and professional workers will increase at an astonishing rate, according to committee figures.

The vital requirement now is to both broaden and intensify the training of blue collar workers so their skills will be refined and adapted to new and different jobs. If they continue to be half-educated, with preparations for manual labor in jobs that no longer exist, they will indeed form a permanent "underclass."

There are indications that the delegates to the New York conference got this point and that industry may now begin to get more solidly behind public education. The time is long overdue.

Washington Reports:

Action on Rights Bill in January Predicted by House Leaders

HOUSE MAJORITY LEADER Carl Albert (D-Okla.) and Minority Whip Leslie C. Arends (R-Ill.) both predicted the House will pass the Administration's civil rights bill before the end of January in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on some 700 radio stations.

Albert said he expects the bill to be reported out of the Rules Committee in January. (A discharge petition to force it out was signed by more than 160 House members.) Albert asserted that five Republicans on the committee had pledged to vote for passage.

"It will come up the very next week," he said. "It will take four to five days to dispose of it, in my opinion."

Arends also said "the votes are there . . . there will be no dilatory tactics so far as I can learn."

Both men said they were sure the bill will pass with bipartisan support.

"We have about 95 members [southern Democrats] who feel they can't vote for this bill," Albert said. "That leaves only 162 and it takes 218 to pass a bill, so obviously we are going to need Republicans . . . I am sure that the bill will pass. I don't think there is any question about it."

Arends agreed that the bill will get Republican support on the floor and expressed the view that the provision which protects voting rights is one of the most important features of the measure. He also voiced "one man's opinion" that the Senate will pass the bill "with some kind of compromise—shall we call it an adjustment?—with some of the Southerners after they have debated it a long time."

ALBERT PREDICTED "attempts to amend," but suggested that the bill "is before the House and the country in a form I think will pretty much go through the House."

Assessing the first session of the 88th Congress, the House majority leader said it "must stand out as one of great significance" for its approval of such educational improvements as aid to colleges, vocational education, medical schools and impacted areas.

"The complete 88th Congress will go down in the field of education, tax reform, civil rights and in other areas as the most significant Congress since World War II," he predicted.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IT IS OKAY with the American people, one guesses, for Congress to go home for the holidays—to quit, to skedaddle, to adjourn until Jan. 7—rather than hang around under the three-day recess rule with token meetings of three or four members pending the new session.

It is not than anyone has the feeling expressed by Oliver Cromwell, the Puritan dictator, when he dismissed the Long Parliament with the brutal words, "You have sat too long already in this place. In God's name, Go."

Speaking strictly personally, I have had a 20-year love affair with the institution of Congress, first with the Senate, more latterly with that unruly and very mixed bag of 435 designated representatives called the House. Taken together they make up one of the coordinate and equal branches of the ingeniously designed American system.

Some of the members work harder than others, some are more able, and the seniors are an awesome sight—rich in years, replete with idiosyncrasies and jealousies, conscious of the durability and strength of long-established rules and traditions, and as stubborn as other sinners at any threat to their prerogatives and pride.

The two houses represent much that is good, much that is petty and mean in our life, because they are a true mirror of the people. They are capable of rising without hesitation to a commonly recognized threat to the nation. We simply couldn't get along without Congress.

Still, enough is enough—at least for one year. Eleven and a half months is enough for 1963.

* * *

THE SENATE'S GREAT PRIDE is in its freedom of debate, its tradition that not a wheel shall turn legislatively until the last lone dissenter acknowledges that everything has been said that can be said, and accepts a unanimous consent agreement for voting at a certain hour on a certain day.

Not infrequently the long, deliberate debate has served to illuminate issues, to change the minds of senators, to check most unwise action. It was use of the Senate's rule of unanimous consent that blocked hasty approval of the draft-the-strikers bill which Pres. Truman injudiciously hoped to whip through during the 1946 railroad strike. (The opposite side of the coin, of course, is that the rule can be abused to block any action whatsoever; it is the rule which makes a filibuster possible.)

The prideful claim of the House—and, oddly, it is little known—is that its committee work is more thorough, more detailed and more useful than the Senate's, that the thrust and direction of most legislation are formulated by House hearings, that the House committees clear away the errors of imprecise language and make the bills read as they should to reach the objective sought.

Let this be as it may be. It is one of the great merits of the House that it is large enough, with all those hundreds of members, to tolerate a few eccentrics, a few sports who deviate from the norm. One of the fascinations in the House 15 years ago was the head-to-head confrontations on the floor between John Rankin of Mississippi and the late Vito Marcantonio of New York, two members who could not possibly have been more different in ideology, background and purposes—but who tangled with zest and high good humor.

The principle of comity is observed most strictly between the two branches of Congress—that is, until something comes up that makes comity seem less important than prestige. The 1962 battle for prestige and influence between two ancients of the Appropriation Committees—Chairman Cannon of the House unit, Chairman Hayden of the Senate committee—raged for months, and members spoke rudely and openly on the floor about members of the "other body." To those who cover the routine sessions it became a diverting episode, by no means without a deeper meaning.

* * *

A MERRY CHRISTMAS, a Happy New Year to the gentlemen. May they return refreshed—ready to pass some legislation as well as talk about it.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL will get sufficient bipartisan support in the House to be enacted in January, House Majority Leader Carl Albert (D-Okla.), left, and Minority Whip Leslie Arends (R-Ill.) agreed in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

STUDEBAKER WORKERS end a shift at South Bend, Ind., plant whose auto production will be transferred to newer plant in Hamilton, Ont. The shutdown, announced shortly before Christmas, will send most of plant's 6,000 workers looking for new jobs, some after lifetime of working for Studebaker. The Auto Workers, aided by federal, state and local governments, have launched a massive effort to help stranded employes.

Victims of Studebaker Shutdown Face Grim Search for New Jobs

(Continued from Page 1)

workers who will be condemned to join the ranks of the permanently unemployed."

These people have little more to look forward to than $36 in unemployment insurance benefits for the next 26 weeks.

"They will not be able to draw SUB or severance pay," explained UAW Int. Rep. J. D. Hill, "because the local's SUB fund has been depleted by previous frequent layoffs."

Local 5 Pres. Woodrow Frick pointed out that those under 60 will not be able to draw pension benefits when they reach retirement age because the negotiated pension was not to be fully vested until 1989.

'Not Enough Time'

"There just wasn't enough time to build the fund up," he said. "There's enough in it now to take care of those already retired and all those 60 and over, but that's all. This fund was never meant to take care of a catastrophic situation like this one."

There was some bitterness among rank-and-file members. Said Harry Swartz, a worker in the machine shop with 21 years of seniority:

"They robbed me of my seniority, they robbed me of my pension, they robbed me of my SUB money, they robbed me of my $97 a week paycheck and they robbed me of 21 years of my life. It's a dirty shame. The big money boys got theirs, and we're left holding the bag."

Others were more sad than mad. Ed Driver, father of nine, was mostly concerned about his family. "How will I take care of nine kids on $36 a week?" he asked. "I spend $50 a week on food alone."

Action Came Quickly

Harry Delsinski, 47, a gun welder with 27 years seniority, said he would have to pull his daughter out of college. "After this, I won't be able to spend the $1,500 a year it costs me to keep her in school," he said. "I just hope she'll be able to finish the semester."

Foundry worker William Robinson, 45, who described himself as "a loyal Studebaker worker," said he couldn't understand why the corporation hadn't offered to transfer some of the laid-off automotive division workers to its many other profitable divisions. "Where is their moral responsibility?" he asked. There was no answer.

Announcement that Studebaker was shutting down car production here brought a quick reaction in Washington.

Urgent, fast action came from Indiana's two Democratic senators, R. Vance Hartke and Birch Bayh, and Democratic Rep. John Brademas (D), who represents the district in which most of the workers live.

The legislators, aware of the Studebaker problem for several weeks, already had been at work—mostly behind the scenes—to try to do something about it.

As soon as the company's announcement was confirmed they moved as a team, enlisting the support of Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Sec. of Defense Robert McNamara, Sec. of Commerce Luther Hodges and Postmaster Gen. John Gronouski.

Meetings to coordinate activity of federal departments and agencies to meet the South Bend disaster were quickly pulled together.

Two days after the announcement, Brademas, spokesman for the group, was making public concrete steps to be put into operation immediately. They included:

- Close cooperation of state and federal employment services to speed recruitment of workers in South Bend by other firms.
- Assignment of extra staff and specialized experts from Washington to get Studebaker workers registered quickly for unemployment compensation.
- Increased efforts to encourage other industrial firms to come into the area and take over government contracts held by Studebaker.
- Immediate retraining programs under the Manpower Development & Training Act to train displaced workers for other jobs.
- Agreement from the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration to approve forbearance agreements proposed by mortgage holders if the homeowner is unemployed because of the shutdown.
- Prompt action by the Area Redevelopment Administration to determine if the area would qualify for ARA aid to develop job-creating opportunities.

Surplus Food Sought

Named to coordinate federal activity was Dr. Harold L. Sheppard, formerly with ARA and now of the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research. UAW Intl. Rep. Dan Bedell, assigned to the Washington office, participated in the meetings.

In South Bend, the UAW sought a change in surplus food regulations and asked for establishment of a federal food stamp plan to aid jobless workers.

The Indiana State AFL-CIO assigned Harland Noel, state Community Service Activities representative, to coordinate the work of 27 union counsellors who are members of UAW Local 5 here.

British to Raise Funds For Apartheid Victims

London—The British Trades Union Congress is seeking to raise money among its affiliates for the Defense & Aid Fund in South Africa. The money will be used to help provide legal aid for union members held without trial under apartheid and to relieve distress among their families.

Airline Strike Deferred:

New United Offer Goes to IAM Vote

The Machinists have deferred a Dec. 19 strike deadline at United Air Lines installations to permit 13,000 union members to vote approval or rejection of a last-minute management proposal on new contract terms.

The new offer, containing what the union called "substantial improvements" over previous proposals in negotiations that started 20 months ago, was submitted to a secret ballot vote to be completed by Dec. 22.

Earlier the union had moved closer to a settlement with Braniff Airways, one of six major airlines where a dispute over contract terms resulted in the setting up of an emergency board Dec. 11 by Pres. Johnson.

Some 1,300 Braniff ground service employes are voting on the latest proposal, which includes wage increases raising the rates for mechanics to $3.52 an hour by Jan. 1, 1965.

The UAL dispute had been referred to a separate presidential board whose recommendations were turned down. Union negotiators did not recommend acceptance or rejection of the new UAL offer but IAM Vice Pres. George L. Watkins advised union leaders at 38 stations that the offer was being submitted to referendum.

The new proposal, the union said, calls for wage hikes of 39 cents an hour in stages, with the final increase on Jan. 1, 1965. At that time, United mechanics would receive $3.52 an hour, the same rate offered by Braniff. The proposed contract would run to Dec. 31, 1965.

Other improvements in the UAL "package" include improvements in occupational injury leave and in accident and surgical insurance.

At Braniff, IAM members balloted on across-the-board wage increases of 34 cents an hour; in-grade adjustments of 2 to 8 cents an hour, retroactive to last Jan. 1, for lead mechanics, auto mechanics and plant maintenance mechanics; full company payment of premiums on accident and surgical insurance; and shift premiums of 11 to 18 cents an hour. Other improvements had been agreed to in earlier talks.

Negotiations will continue, the IAM said, at the five other airlines where the emergency board has intervened. They are Continental, Eastern, National, Northwest and TWA.

Gay Christmas Certain For Kingsport Children

(Continued from Page 1)

plant here with the help of supervisors and strikebreakers.

The firm has continued to produce books for Encyclopedia Britannica, Inc.; Grolier, Inc., and Field Enterprises Educational Corp. Union members and others have been urged not to buy the struck products, including Britannica, Jr.; Great Books of the Western World, a 54-volume set; the Book of Knowledge; World Book encyclopedia, and Childcraft books.

The "don't buy" campaign has been extended to Latin America, where the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers has notified all affiliated unions that Barsa, a Spanish-language encyclopedia, is being produced under non-union conditions by Kingsport Press.

The Latin labor movement was informed Nov. 1 by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that unfair Kingsport products should not be purchased by those in sympathy with the striking press unions.

The request has been passed on to ORIT affiliates, Sec. General Arturo Jauregui notified Meany, and a notice to that effect printed in the organization's Noticiario Obrero Inter-Americano.

SHOES AND CLOTHING for children of 1,400 Kingsport Press strikers were distributed from this donated center in Kingsport, Tenn., just before Christmas. The Allied Kingsport Press Unions, out since Mar. 11, bought 1,535 pairs of shoes and 2,500 different items of wearing apparel from money donated by unions around the country. Left to right: seated, Christine Blankenship, Clothing Chairman Roy L. Nichols; standing, Shelby Stamper, Dorothy Donelson, Barbara Meade, Eleanor Hawkins, Eva Neely, Joyce Dotson.

'Work' Issue Defeat Seen In Oklahoma

The National Council for Industrial Peace has predicted that Oklahoma voters will reject a so-called "right-to-work" law proposal if the issue reaches a statewide vote next year.

The council noted that the measure to outlaw union shop agreements had been rejected by overwhelming majorities in California, Ohio, Washington, Colorado and Idaho when it was last on the ballot in the 1958 elections.

An Oklahoma vote on the "work" proposal was indicated when the State Supreme Court ruled that enough valid signatures had been obtained on an initiative petition to force the issue to a statewide ballot. About 104,000 of 212,000 signatures had been challenged as fraudulent or otherwise invalid.

Attorneys for the public groups challenging the petition's validity announced they would seek a rehearing from the court within the next two weeks. They also said they were exploring constitutional grounds for a possible appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, citizens groups defending against the attack of right-wing elements on the collective bargaining process, gave notice they will continue their fight to keep a "work" law off the state's statute books.

"We mean to knock on every door, talk to every citizen who will listen," declared Chairman Charles Schwoerke of the Oklahoma Committee for Free Marketing & Bargaining.

NLRB Orders Backpay:

Lockout Held Illegal As Offensive Tactic

Employers may not use a lockout as an offensive weapon to force a change in an existing bargaining pattern, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled in a case involving food stores in the Syracuse, N.Y., area and three unions.

A three-member NLRB panel rejected the argument of the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. and the P &C Food Markets, Inc., the employers, that their lockout of employes in a 1961 strike by the Meat Cutters was lawful under the NLRB's "Buffalo Linen" doctrine, upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The panel said the two lockouts were dissimilar—in Buffalo Linen, the employers locked out their workers as a defensive measure to prevent a union from breaking up a multi-employer bargaining unit by striking first one employer, then another, in a "whipsaw" tactic; whereas in Syracuse the lockout was intended to force the union to change from single-employer to multi-employer bargaining.

Meanwhile another lockout case was started through the NLRB hearing procedures when the board's Seattle regional director charged four forest products firms with illegally locking out several thousand employes last June in reprisal for strikes against two other firms. A hearing was set for Feb. 17.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown participated in the Syracuse ruling. They decided, reversing a trial examiner, that the two food chains must pay lost wages to employes in two unions who lost almost three weeks' pay because of the lockout—members of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Members of the Meat Cutters were not entitled to lost pay, the panel ruled in another reversal of the examiner, because that union agreed in contract settlements in April 1961 to withdraw unfair labor practice charges against the employers in recognition of improved wages and other contract benefits.

The panel wrote that the wage increase was to compensate Meat Cutters for their wage losses and therefore, if the board made its usual backpay awards, "employes would be made whole more than once." That would not "effectuate the policies" of the labor-management act, the board ruled.

The Seattle lockout complaints were filed against the Weyerhaeuser Co., Crown-Zellerbach Corp., Rayonier, Inc., and the Intl. Paper Co. They shut down their operations last summer, claiming "a strike against one is a strike against all" when two unions struck the U.S. Plywood Corp. and the St. Regis Paper Co.

The complaint pointed out that the six employers formed a bargaining association about Apr. 20, more than two weeks after contract reopening notices had been served by the Woodworkers and the Lumber & Sawmill Workers, affiliated with the Carpenters. Thereafter the employers refused to give the association the power to negotiate pensions and other mandatory bargaining subjects, and four of them locked out their workers when two other firms were struck, it was asserted.

The four firms violated the law, the complaint charged, when they imposed a lockout "at a time when a valid multi-employer unit had not been established."

FEC Strike Board Report Due Dec. 24

Jacksonville, Fla.—Florida East Coast Railway strikers awaited a Presidential Emergency Board recommendation for settlement of their 11-month strike in the wake of a refusal by a U.S. District Court judge here to order the railroad to restore pre-strike working conditions.

District Judge Bryan Simpson did, however, issue an injunction requested by the Justice Dept. forbidding management from making changes in work rules involving "operating" employes, since any arbitrary rules changes are forbidden until next Feb. 24 under a national arbitration law passed recently by Congress.

The emergency board was given an extension to Dec. 24 to report to Pres. Johnson. FEC employes struck last Jan. 23 for the same pay increase of 10.28 cents an hour given on all other U.S. railroads.

Last week the railroad slightly eased the financial strain on strikers and their families at Christmas by distributing $514,000 in vacation pay due under union contracts.

Meanwhile AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to Florida unionists, urged "utmost support" for the strikers in their "courageous struggle." Citing a resolution passed unanimously by the AFL-CIO convention last month, Meany observed in a letter to State AFL-CIO Pres. Charlie Harris that FEC management "not only refuses to meet and refuses to arbitrate, but has substituted its will for all previous contracts and has replaced regular employes with strikebreakers."

Job Injury Rate Up in 3rd Quarter

The work-injury frequency rate in all manufacturing rose 11 percent, or from 10.8 to 12 per million man-hours worked, during third quarter 1963, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported. The increase was somewhat more than seasonal.

The cumulative rate for the first three quarters of 1963 was 11.3, compared to 11.4 for the comparable period of 1962. The frequency rate during the first and second quarters of this year were 5 percent and 4 percent, respectively, under the figures for the same period last year.

Mrs. Raftery Dies of Stroke

St. Louis—Mrs. Enid V. Raftery, wife of Pres. L. M. Raftery of the Painters, an AFL-CIO vice president, died of a stroke at St. Joseph's Hospital, Kirkwood.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, in a telegram extending condolences to Raftery, expressed "deep shock" at the death of Mrs. Raftery, who had accompanied her husband to the recent AFL-CIO convention in New York.

Mrs. Raftery is also survived by five sons, S. Frank, John, Lawrence K., Eugene and Donald Raftery, and four daughters, Mrs. Josephine Monroe, Mrs. Mary Thebau, Mrs. Linda Bratton and Mrs. Eloise March.

Funeral services were held in St. Peter's Catholic Church, Kirkwood, with burial in Calvary Cemetery, St. Louis.

A SERIES OF SPOT ANNOUNCEMENTS aimed at interesting Mexican-American workers in joining an AFL-CIO union has been started over Station KMEX-TV in Los Angeles as part of the pilot organizing drive. The first broadcast, during the Sunday evening bullfight program from Mexico City, showed Sec.-Treas. J. J. Rodriguez (left) of Butchers Local 563, a leader in the Spanish-speaking community and a vice president of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, with Mike Fierro, his wife Evelia and their children Elizabeth and Silvana. Fierro went to Los Angeles from Mexico nine years ago, joined Local 563, has a good job, is buying his own home and maintains that "every Mexican-American owes it to himself to join a union."

Circuit Court Bars NLRB Role In Dispute Involving Grievance

New York—A National Labor Relations Board decision that a union and an employer were guilty of an unfair labor practice by dropping a worker to the bottom of a seniority list is an unwarranted extension of board authority, the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals declared here.

The court, in a 2 to 1 decision, refused to enforce an NLRB order in the case, involving the Miranda Fuel Co. which decided the case by a 3-2 vote.

The minority NLRB viewpoint voiced by Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and John H. Fanning was that the action of the employer and the union in dropping the worker to the bottom of the seniority list, under a union interpretation of a leave of absence clause in the contract, was not an unfair labor practice in the absence of evidence that the action was motivated by the employe's union membership activities.

In his opinion, Judge Harold R. Medina declared that the board "conceived the ingenious, but we think wholly erroneous, theory that any sort of discrimination, unfairness, or injustice to an employe by the union and acquiesced in by the employer constituted a breach by the union" of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Judge J. Edward Lumbard concurred in denying enforcement of the board's order, but primarily on the ground that there was no evidence that the union acted arbitrarily in seeking reduction of the employe's seniority. Judge Henry J. Friendly, dissenting, would have enforced the board's order in part.

The AFL-CIO filed a brief with the court urging it to deny enforcement of the order on the ground that the board was becoming involved in grievances, real or fancied, that had no relation to a worker's membership or nonmembership in a union.

Thomas E. Harris, federation associate general counsel, told the court in his brief that a union has "a duty to represent all employes in the bargaining unit fairly and impartially and that this obligation has been and can be enforced in the courts but not by the NLRB" unless it involved an unfair labor practice.

Noting that the case involved principles that could be applied to questions of racial discrimination in employment even though there was no race issue in the specific case, the AFL-CIO brief noted that "in the long run more harm than good would come from twisting the National Labor Relations Act so as to permit the federal labor board a task far different from the specific role assigned it by Congress."

Fire Fighters Urge Extra Yule Safety

The Fire Fighters have urged "more than usual" fire safety precautions around the home during and immediately after the holidays to avoid tragedy in the traditional season of happiness.

IAFF Pres. William D. Buck pointed out that Christmas trees and decorations bring unusual fire hazards into the household, warranting special precautions.

"Fires claim approximately 1,000 lives in the United States every month," he said. "This terrible toll is doubly saddening when it comes during the Christmas season."

Christmas trees, Buck said, should be kept in water before and during their period of display and only electrically safe tree decorations should be used, never actual candles.

"When the tree begins to dry out and shed its needles, get it down and to a safe place outdoors," he said. "A dried-out Christmas tree is as potentially dangerous as a haystack in the family living room."

The Fire Fighters official cautioned against overloading electrical circuits and urged quick disposal of gift wrappings that accumulate.

"If a fire should start," Buck advised, "get everybody out of the house immediately. Call the fire department from a street fire alarm box or a neighbor's phone. Don't battle the fire yourself; leave that job for trained professionals who have the skill and equipment."

Democrat Wins In Texas Election

Austin, Tex.—J. J. (Jake) Pickle swept to victory over conservative Republican Jim Dobbs in a special congressional runoff election which kept Pres. Johnson's home district in the Democratic column.

The House seat was formerly held by Homer Thornberry, who resigned to become U.S. District Court judge at El Paso.

Democrat Jack Ritter, who was eliminated in the first special election, had urged his supporters to back Pickle in the runoff. Nearly complete but unofficial returns gave Pickle 27,206 votes to 16,039 for Dobbs.

Sleeping Car Porters Win Major Goals

(Continued from Page 1)

O. David Zimring, Isadore Gromfine and Eli Oliver.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced the settlement less than 24 hours before the strike deadline. He said the negotiators, headed by Randolph and J. E. Wolfe of railroad management, came to terms on a settlement that will reduce porters' present 205-hour monthly work schedule to 173 hours in stages beginning next Jan. 1 and ending July 1, 1965.

The negotiators, Wirtz said, also agreed on terms affecting the seniority of Pullman employes when other lines take over sleeping car service. Wage increases retroactive in part to Feb. 1, 1962, and in part to May 1, 1962, will bring average wages, excluding tips, from approximately $2.09 an hour under the 205-hour month to $2.53 under the 173-hour month, Wirtz announced.

Union members had voted to strike by a 98 percent margin if their workweek was not shortened, and a walkout set first for July 1 was called off when the late Pres. Kennedy named a special panel of mediators.

The Porters were assured by Meany of the AFL-CIO's full support in their fight for shorter hours, higher pay and greater job security in the face of job slashes and declining passenger service.

In November:

JobPictureStagnant, Factory Earnings Up

The general job picture remained stagnant in November, according to the Labor Dept.'s detailed report, with factory employment slipping even while those holding down factory jobs averaged over $100 a week for the third straight month.

The detailed report, based on payroll data, showed an expected seasonal decline of 100,000 over the month to 58.3 million on nonfarm payrolls. This was 1.5 million higher than a year ago.

The largest job cuts came in construction and manufacturing, the report said, with the decline partially offset by the pre-Christmas pickup in trade and a large hike in state and local government.

In an earlier summary report, based on census surveys, the Labor Dept. reported that unemployment took a larger than seasonal jump of a half a million to 3.9 million. The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate swung upward to 5.9 percent from October's 5.5 percent, that report noted.

The detailed report showed a drop of 120,000 to 17.2 million in factory jobs for November. All the decline was in the soft goods sector and mainly in food processing, the report, prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, noted.

The report said total manufacturing employment was 218,000 higher than a year earlier, "but, on a seasonally adjusted basis, has remained virtually unchanged for the last six months."

Both the factory workweek and overtime remained high. The workweek, at 40.6 hours in November, was 12 minutes above a year ago; seasonally adjusted, average hours of production workers were reported "at a very high level for the past three months." Factory overtime continued at 3 hours.

"Average hourly earnings of factory production workers increased by 2 cents over the month to $2.49 in November, a record high . . . ," the report noted.

"As a result, weekly earnings also rose to a new peak of $101.09 . . . November marked the third consecutive month that earnings have averaged more than $100 a week."

On the unemployment side of the picture, there were 900,000 longterm unemployed — those seeking jobs without success for 15 weeks or longer. Of this group, half a million have been jobless six months or more. These totals remain unchanged over the month and the year, the report said.

Of the groups included among the 3.9 million unemployed, by far the highest rate was suffered by teen-agers, whose jobless rate rose to 17.2 percent, "substantially higher than a year earlier," the report said. The jobless rates of 4.3 percent for men and 5.7 percent for women were slightly higher than a month earlier, the report added.

Of the 1.8 million adult men without jobs, the Labor Dept. said, about two-thirds are family breadwinners.

The farm employment total showed its expected substantial drop for this time of year, declining by 500,000 to 4.8 million, the report said. The total labor force stood at 76 million, about 1.5 million higher than a year earlier.

CEREMONY AT SIGNING of vocational education bill by Pres. Johnson drew, from left, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, who is chairman of the federation's Committee on Education; Senators Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.); Pres. James Patton of the National Farmers Union; Senators Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.) and Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

AMA Accepts Responsibility For AMPAC

The American Medical Association and the American Medical Political Action Committee now agree that they belong to each other.

When the AMA was sued for $400,000 on a libel charge by a Steelworkers' official last month, AMA Pres. Edward Annis said the suit was "misdirected" and should have been filed against AMPAC.

Now the AMA, in a stipulation filed with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, has agreed that for purposes of the suit no distinction will be made between the AMA and AMPAC and that the AMA is "responsible for any actions of AMPAC."

The plaintiff, Paul Normile, director of USWA Dist. 16 in Allegheny County, Pa., stipulated that suits over the same matters would not be directed against AMPAC or individual members of either the AMA or its political arm.

Normile charged that the AMA had libeled him and invaded his privacy by distributing through AMPAC a fraudulent recording purporting to present his voice and depicting him as a "tough-talking bully and extortionist." He seeks $400,000 in damages and an injunction barring further distribution of the recording.

At the AFL-CIO convention in New York last month, where the filing of the suit was announced, Federation Pres. George Meany labeled the recording "an absolute fraud."

Manpower Training, Vocational Aid Voted

(Continued from Page 1)

dental and allied education proposed by Pres. Kennedy had become law.

The AFL-CIO has strongly supported the federal aid-to-education program, initially the Kennedy omnibus measure, and as they came up for separate consideration, the separate bills. The federation participated in the initial studies and helped set the guidelines for the vocational aid bill under the direction of Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Education.

Senate action on the manpower training bill came after the House had adopted by voice vote a measure differing from two earlier bills passed by the Senate. Instead of sending the measures to conference, the Senate adopted the House bill.

Appropriation in January

The measure sent to the White House would continue full federal financing of the manpower training program for an additional year, authorizing $527 million to finance the operation. Actual appropriations are expected to be made in January.

The present law requires matching grants by the states to begin July 1, 1964. The congressionally-approved bill would extend this to July 1, 1965, add 20 weeks of literacy training, lower the eligible age to 17 if a youth is out of school for one year and make other changes to allow increases in weekly training allowances and part-time work. The program has involved over 100,000 trainees so far.

The vocational education bill constitutes a massive upgrading of the existing vocational program which will enable youngsters to be trained for jobs needed now and in the future rather than in outmoded skills.

The bill provides for an immediate jump in federal grants from the present $58 million to $103 million, with the amounts rising in future years. The funds would be allocated by a formula based on a state's per capita income and population. Included is an extension of two existing programs—aid to school districts in areas crowded by federal employes and the National Defense Education Act, which includes scholarship aid to college students.

The traditional session-end controversy over foreign aid funds was touched off by a deep slash proposed by the House Appropriations subcommittee handling the bill, which voted $800 million less than the $3.6 billion actually authorized by Congress earlier.

The Senate Appropriations Committee, acting a day later, approved a $3.3 billion bill which would restore $500 million of the $800 million cut by the House. The final foreign aid funds bill was expected to be settled in a Senate-House conference committee.

Despite a plea from Johnson that the cuts constitute a setback for the nation, the House approved its committee's recommendations. The Administration looked to the Senate for help in restoring some or all of the slashed funds and to increase the actual $2.8 billion voted by the House.

The House action represented a sharp cutback from Pres. Kennedy's proposals for military and economic aid.

Votes on Tax Bill

While the aid funds fight dominated the closing days, the Senate Finance Committee began voting on various sections of the tax reduction measure. All votes taken are subject to final consideration. The bill is expected to be reported to the Senate floor early in the second session.

In the House, meanwhile, the drive to secure signatures for a petition to discharge the House Rules Committee from further consideration of the civil rights measure passed by the House Judiciary Committee neared 170. A flat majority—218 signatures—is required to spring the bill loose from the Rules Committee.

Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), Rules Committee chairman, indicated when the discharge petition was filed that his committee would hold hearings on the civil rights measure. Last week he announced that they would start on Jan. 9 and said he would not encourage deliberate efforts to slow them down.

12-21-63

Fallout Shelter Program Pressed by Schnitzler

The AFL-CIO has called on the Senate to approve House-passed legislation designed "to stimulate a nationwide effort to create additional civil defense fallout shelter space."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, testifying before a Senate Armed Services subcommittee, said fallout shelters can save more lives than any other feasible measure in a nuclear attack, but such preparations are "still far from adequate."

Schnitzler said legislation passed by the House last August recognizes the primary responsibility of the federal government to assure an adequate civil defense program.

That legislation, he said, requires the construction of shelters in all civilian and military buildings or structures owned or occupied by the federal government and authorized $15.6 million for this purpose.

Schnitzler also observed that the House bill does not authorize a full-scale, federally-financed program, but "is simply a low-cost expansion of available shelter space."

He noted that the House bill would authorize $175 million in incentive payments to state governments and their subdivisions and to non-profit institutions to modify present structures and provide for shelter space in new structures. This would produce an estimated 10 million shelter spaces.

Major progress already has been achieved in civil defense shelter marking and stocking and in utilizing existing facilities, he said. There are some 100 million public fallout shelter spaces in existing buildings, he noted.

Labor's policy, he told the committee, follows principles laid down by the 1961 and 1963 AFL-CIO conventions. These are:

Total federal responsibility since civil defense is a national rather than a family problem; group shelters, recognizing that the millions of families in cities could not build their own; adequate information and training; government action at every level to assure full use of facilities such as schools, hospitals and offices.

Schnitzler said the House-passed bill is in line with labor's policy and, additionally, it endorses labor's position in broadening the civil defense program to include disaster relief activities.

LABOR STRONGLY URGES the Senate to pass a House-approved bill which would stimulate the low-cost expansion of existing fallout shelter space, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told a Senate Armed Services subcommittee. At right is AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Jack Curran.

AFL-CIO News

Vol. VIII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, Dec. 28, 1963 | No. 52

Congress Runs Out Clock, Big Issues Remain for '64

Easier Registration Urged:

Presidential Panel Raps Voting Laws

By Willard Shelton

A blue-ribbon commission named by the late Pres. Kennedy has recommended sweeping changes in state registration and voting laws to increase citizen participation in the country's elections.

The 11-member commission, which transmitted its report to Pres. Johnson, pointed out that in other democratic nations the citizen turnout in elections is substantially higher than in the United States.

Voter turnout, it emphasized, in Italy "has topped 92 percent" in the last four elections, in West Germany has ranged between 78.5 percent to 87.8 percent during the last 15 years, in Canada has surpassed 80 percent in the last three general elections. But in the U.S., voter participation since the turn of the century has seldom exceeded 60 percent in presidential elections, and has ranged from a low of 30.1 percent to a high of 48.9 percent in mid-term elections.

Pres. Johnson in receiving the report called upon "both political parties, Republicans and Democrats, the governors and officials of each state, and all citizens to join in the effort to secure the right to vote for all who wish it."

Roy L. Reuther, registration director of COPE and a member of the commission, commented that "it was easier to buy a gun at a neighborhood hardware store than to register and vote." Johnson expressed the hope that in the election next year "three out of every three eligible citizens will vote for their President."

Chairman of the commission was Richard M. Scammon, director of the Bureau of the Census and a recognized expert in voting trends and patterns.

The commission reported that nonvoting could be attributed to "voluntary" and "involuntary" causes, and that failure of citizens to vote could be attacked effectively no matter what the reasons for non-participation.

The group split widely on the issue of whether Congress could and should override restrictions of state registration and residency requirements to make possible wider voter participation in elections. It reached a clear consensus, nevertheless, on what the states and local communities should do.

The cure for nonvoting that arises from sheer apathy, the commission reported, is "a register-and-vote campaign" carried on by "political parties, civic, business and labor groups, public bodies and officials" employing tested techniques of publicity and persuasion.

It cited the example of Davenport, Ia., where in 1956 one-third of the city's non-registrants were added to the registration rolls in a single week in block-by-block coverage, backed up by publicity

(Continued on Page 8)

IAM Ratifies Airline Pact, Strike Averted

Last-minute bargaining produced an improved new contract, including wage increases totaling as much as 39 cents an hour, to end the threat of a Christmas week strike by Machinists against United Air Lines.

Pointing out that the agreement climaxed 20 months of negotiations, IAM Pres. Albert J. Hayes said it provided "substantial improvements in conditions" on UAL, and promised "we will do everything in our power to make UAL a better place to work. We sincerely trust the company will do likewise."

The agreement was ratified in secret-ballot votes by a nearly 2 to 1 margin. Previously mem-

(Continued on Page 2)

"HI MOM" PROGRAM of the Communications Workers is brightening the holiday season for more than 1,000 servicemen and women stationed overseas by providing them with free telephone calls home. Typical is T/Sgt. Thomas H. Breese of the Air Force, shown above at his station in Viet Nam awaiting completion of his call to his mother, Mrs. Edna Breese, in San Luis Obispo, Calif.

Fire Replacements:

Board Urges FEC To Rehire Strikers

A Presidential Emergency Board has called on the Florida East Coast Railway to rehire its striking employes and make room for them by discharging the strikebreakers it hired as replacements.

The board also recommended that the railroad grant its non-operating employes the 10.3-cent hourly wage increase negotiated with virtually every other railroad in 1962. It was the FEC's refusal to match the national wage pattern which led to the strike by 11 non-operating unions on Jan. 23, 1963. Members of operating unions—the engine and train crews—have been respecting the non-op picket lines.

Sidestepping the legal issue of whether the railroad is bound under the Railway Labor Act to reinstate the strikers, the presidential board declared that the reinstatement would "contribute to an equitable and lasting settlement of this dispute."

"It is universally recognized as a matter of sound labor relations," the board said, "that seniority provides the employe with an equitable interest in continued employment."

Rejecting the management argument that "the strikers do not deserve any special consideration for their years of service because they elected to strike," the board declared:

"We are unable to agree that the employes' seniority can be discounted in this fashion simply be-

(Continued on Page 3)

Education Bills Mark 1st Session

By David L. Perlman

The clock ran out on the first session of the 88th Congress with key goals of both labor and the Administration still listed under unfinished business, but with several notable accomplishments on the credit side of the ledger.

Formal adjournment was delayed by a last-minute battle over the foreign aid appropriations bill, but no other business was scheduled before the start of the second session on Jan. 7. (See story, Page 7.)

The tax cut bill, which the late Pres. Kennedy had described as "the one step above all" needed to take up "the persistent slack" in employment, remained in the hands of the Senate Finance Committee three months after having been approved by the House by an impressive 271-155 margin.

Civil rights legislation, which Pres. Johnson called the "first" of the "immediate tasks" before Congress, lay in the House Rules Committee as the session ended, but action was promised for January.

Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith agreed to begin hearings Jan. 9, and Republican members pledged to vote with northern Democrats to send the bill to the floor without undue delay. The pledges of action at the start of the second session came after a discharge petition was filed in an effort to dislodge the bill.

The showdown battle over health care for the aged through the social security system was another major goal deferred until the election year session of Congress.

There was solid progress, however, as Congress broke new ground in aid to education and the corollary areas of vocational training and retraining. Historic breakthroughs were made in assistance to higher education, from junior college through the university graduate school level. The amount authorized in federal grants

(Continued on Page 7)

TRAINEES IN MEAT CUTTING in a Detroit class set up under the Manpower Development & Training Act look on as Vice Pres. Alex Fuller of the Wayne County AFL-CIO, in dark suit, discusses operations with the instructors, Hiram Depuis and Merrill Prall. Training for the industry is being given 120 unemployed.

Studebaker Plant Closing Swells List of 'Substantial' Jobless Areas

Studebaker's decision to close its plant has put South Bend, Ind., on the list of major job centers suffering "substantial unemployment," the Labor Dept. has reported.

South Bend was one of 37 major job areas with 6 percent or higher unemployment in November, according to the department's monthly survey of 150 major centers.

The total of 37 for November is the fourth straight month this figure has remained unchanged. The major major areas with substantial unemployment totaled 40 a year ago, 60 in November 1961 and were down to 32 in November 1959 in a period between recessions.

There were six reclassifications in the November listing, four of them reflecting an improvement in job conditions.

South Bend moved out of the "moderate unemployment"—3 to 6 percent jobless—category and onto the 6 to 9 percent jobless list. Atlantic City, N. J., with the seasonal curtailment of resort activities, was reclassified into the 9 to 12 percent jobless category.

Of the areas showing improvement, Durham, N. C., was taken off the substantial unemployment list "largely because of a new non-electrical machinery plant," the report noted.

Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton, Pa., improved into the 6 to 9 percent grouping. Greensboro-High Point, N. C., and Davenport-Rock Island-Moline, Ill., were shifted into the 1.5 to 2.9 percent grouping as job conditions improved.

The list of smaller areas suffering substantial unemployment rose to 162 with the addition of Gadsden, Ala., and Oneonta, N. Y., the report said. The smaller areas with 6 percent or more jobless totaled 160 in October. A year ago, there were 170 such areas; in November 1959, this group totaled 112.

Overall, the Labor Dept. said, there are now 579 areas—17 major job centers, 100 "smaller" areas and 462 "very small" areas—officially classified as "areas of substantial and persistent unemployment." All of these have been recommended to the Dept. of Commerce for designation as "redevelopment areas," the report added.

In a separate report, the Labor Dept. said one major industrial area—Waterbury, Conn.—has been added to the list of areas eligible for aid under the Public Works Acceleration Act.

One "smaller" area—Oneonta, N. Y.—and six "very small" areas were also added. Nine "smaller" and 11 "very small" areas were removed.

These changes left at 313 the total areas eligible for such public works aid.

Union on Strike Wins Votes at Nearby Plants

Cambridge, Md.—Two NLRB election victories have been scored by the Packinghouse Workers in this Eastern Shore community over an incumbent unaffiliated union at a pair of canneries despite a long-continuing strike at another food processing plant nearby.

UPWA Dist. 6 Dir. Don Smith said "nothing has changed" in the strike at the Trappe Frozen Foods Co. in Trappe, Md., a few miles away. A "don't buy" campaign has been instituted against about 20 brands of frozen food products processed at the plant where 150 UPWA members struck Aug. 17 for a first contract.

Workers at the Coastal Foods Co. here cast 95 votes for UPWA and only 70 for the incumbent Dorco Workers Union. Dorco is a contraction for Dorchester County, of which Cambridge is the county seat. The victory had special significance for UPWA which had tried unsuccessfully to organize the plant several times since 1937.

The second victory came at the Maryland Tuna Co., where the UPWA defeated Dorco, 118 to 13.

Workers at both plants had 80 cents a week checked off as their dues for Dorco membership but got nothing for their money—since there was no grievance procedure and no formal seniority system, and only a small number received paid vacations.

Smith said the next target on the Eastern Shore, long a holdout against organizing efforts, will be the Chung King canning plant, where Chinese food specialties are packed.

Christmas was made a little brighter for the Trappe strikers and their families through complete turkey dinners supplied by the union. Picketing continues at the plant, Smith said, and the vicious police dogs and the heavily armed private guard force much in evidence in the early months of the strike have been removed.

The Trappe concern packs frozen vegetables under many brand names. Officials at the Birds Eye frozen food line discontinued purchases from it at the urging of the union.

A "don't-buy" campaign has been launched against Trappe by UPWA with the support of the Maryland-D. C. AFL-CIO and the Baltimore central labor body. The following frozen food brand names are on the "don't buy" list: Fine Line, Quik-Frozen, F. & F., Simplot, Top Mark, Snow Crop, Sno-Fresh, Snow Chef, Minute Maid, Little Susan, Orchard Park, Shop-Rite, Associated, Golden, Lassie, Ideal, Green Dark, Garden Grown, Winter Garden and Seabrook.

Tobacco Workers 100% Integrated

The Tobacco Workers have announced achievement of their goal of a 100 percent integrated union.

The last of the TWIU's racially segregated locals have merged or are in the process of merging, Pres. John O'Hare and Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Petree reported.

Members of former Negro and white locals have approved merger agreements at four Richmond, Va., plants — American Tobacco Co., U.S. Tobacco Co., Larus Brothers, and Liggett & Meyers Tobacco Co.

Locals at the Brown & Williamson Corp. plant at Louisville, Ky., and the American Tobacco plant at Reidville, N. C., also voted to merge, the union announced.

Pamphlet Surveys U.S. Health Needs

A comprehensive survey of America's health needs and the government's role in helping to meet these needs is contained in a new AFL-CIO pamphlet.

The publication surveys the economic barriers to health needs, the problem of increasing professional personnel and health facilities and the improvement in the organization of medical services.

"America's Health Needs—The Government's Role—," Publication No. 131 is a 20-page, illustrated, two-color pamphlet. It is available from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Single copies are free; up to 100 the cost is 10 cents each; orders for over 100 will be billed at $7.50 per hundred.

With 'Substantial Improvements':

Machinists Ratify New Airline Pact

(Continued from Page 1)

bers had rejected a less-satisfactory proposal and they had shown no observable interest in the company's unilateral announcement that it would try to keep its planes flying by putting into effect working terms recommended by a presidential emergency board and inviting members of the Machinists to continue work.

The emergency board, named after the workers voted down the first offer, improved this offer "slightly," the IAM said, and the terms were "improved more substantially" in direct negotiations culminating in an all-night bargaining session.

Hayes said that provisions on seniority, complicated by a merger between UAL and Capital Airlines, were "substantially improved" in the new contract and that the issue of overtime distribution would be handled by a joint committee set up for the purpose of "tailoring corrections."

A special arbitration procedure was set up to process United's dismissal of several union officials for an alleged offense that occurred months earlier, Hayes said.

More than 75 percent of United's IAM employes, Hayes said, will benefit from the 39-cent hourly wage increases the contract provides, with 12 cents per hour retroactive to June 1, 1962, and an additional 8 cents retroactive to June 1, 1963. There will be a 10-cent increase June 1 next year and another 9-cent boost beginning Jan. 1, 1965.

For those employes not receiving the maximum, increases total 31 cents, with 9 cents retroactive to June 1, 1962, and 8 cents retroactive to June 1, 1963.

Hayes pointed out that retroactive pay will amount to no less than $493 in a lump sum to the larger group of IAM members and no less than $393 for the second group.

The new contract provides severance pay at the rate of two weeks for employes with one year of service who are laid off through no fault of their own, increasing to one week for each year to a maximum of 10 weeks.

Shift differentials are increased, the UAL will pay the total premium on accident and sickness insurance, and provision is made for sick leave to a maximum of 60 days for occupational illness or injury.

Union Aides 'Vacation' at Labor School

Brooklyn, N. Y.—One hundred and thirty-seven officers and shop stewards spent three days of their annual vacation leave at the New York Naval Shipyard here learning how to bargain collectively with the federal government and how to "build the union."

The students attended a trade union seminar sponsored by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. for members of 15 unions affiliated with the Brooklyn Metal Trades Council. Subjects included grievance handling, stewards' responsibilities, contract negotiations under the executive order issued a year ago by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, and union administration.

Dept. Pres. B. A. Gritta addressed the opening session and conducted classes on organizing the unorganized, and checkoff of union dues. Other teachers included Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Research Dir. Paul Hutchings of the MTD; John Brumm and Leo Sammon, Machinists; Reese Hammond, Operating Engineers; and George Knaley, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The final seminar session featured a joint labor-management panel discussion by Rear Adm. Ernest C. Holtzworth, shipyard commander, and Pres. Grover C. Carlsen of the Metal Trades Council.

The course was the second in a nationwide training effort at all 11 U.S. naval shipyards. Other courses have been given by labor educators for other groups of federal employes, Pragan said.

Metal Trades Recognized at 2 More Bases

AFL-CIO metal trades councils have won exclusive recognition as bargaining agents for workers at wo more Navy installations to bring total federal "blue collar" workers covered by exclusive metal trades recognition grants to 85,000.

Announcing these additions to membership, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the federation's Metal Trades Dept. said more than 9,000 workers are now represented by metal trades councils at the Mare Island Naval Shipyard, Vallejo, Calif., and the Oceana Naval Air Station at Virginia Beach, Va.

That means councils have won recognition at 10 of 11 naval shipyards as well as at 11 other federal installations, Gritta said. The 11th shipyard is the Boston Naval Shipyard, where an election is scheduled for Jan. 8 and 9 among the 7,500 employes. Earlier the Charlestown MTC was awarded a unit of wage board employes at the Boston yard in an advisory opinion by an arbitrator and moved to establish its rights in such a unit by an election.

Exclusive recognition was won by the metal trades at 10 of the 11 yards when a majority of eligible workers signed authorization cards which were accepted without the need of an election.

Gritta reported also that councils are in the process of preparing agreements and will start negotiations with yard managements in the near future.

Office Units At 4 Plants Join UAW

Detroit—The Auto Workers have organized three new groups of white collar workers at Midwest industrial plants plus a majority of office and technical workers at a plant in Canada.

Douglas Fraser, recently named director of the union's Technical, Office & Professional Dept., announced that the UAW had signed 65 office workers at the Harnischfeger Corp., Escanaba, Mich.; 29 at the American Foundry Div. of Chrysler Corp., Indianapolis; and 30 at the Central Specialty Div. of the King-Seely Corp., Ypsilanti, Mich.

At Hays Steel Products Ltd., St. Catharines, Ont., the UAW represents a "large majority" of the office force and the union has applied for bargaining rights. Under Ontario law, Fraser said, such a showing of employe interest usually results in union certification.

Board Asks FEC To Rehire Strikers

(Continued from Page 1)

cause they chose to exercise their traditional prerogative to engage in a lawful strike."

Considering the relative job claims of the strikers and the strikebreakers, it commented:

Relative Claims Analyzed

"The men who were newly hired during the strike have worked only a few weeks or months for the carrier. It is true that many of these individuals may have taken their jobs with the hope that they might remain permanently in the employ of the railroad. Nevertheless, in view of the experience in many strikes over a long period of years, these employes must be deemed to have accepted employment subject to the risk that their services might be terminated upon the settlement of the dispute.

"Hence the board is inclined to believe that the interest of the strikers in regaining their jobs outweighs any claim that these new employes may have acquired as a result of their brief period of service."

The board rejected the railroad's argument that it could not afford to pay the 10.3-cent increase. However, it recommended that the unions drop a demand for retroactivity.

Recommendations of the three-member board are not binding but the Railway Labor Act requires both sides to consider its findings as a basis for future negotiations.

The situation is unique in railway labor history since normally emergency boards are set up when a strike is threatened or within a few days after one takes place.

When the strike was several months old, after mediation efforts failed, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz proposed that the issues in dispute be submitted to arbitration. The unions agreed, but management refused.

After interruption of rail deliveries to Florida space installations, the late Pres. Kennedy named a Board of Inquiry in September which reported, after hearings, that continuation of the dispute would harm defense and space programs.

Kennedy then named an emergency board consisting of Harry H. Platt as chairman, and Derek Bok and Paul N. Guthrie. Because of a recess following the death of Kennedy, the board was granted an extension of time for its report.

Meanwhile the issue arose as to whether the Railway Labor Act required rehiring the strikers to restore the pre-strike status quo while the Emergency Board met and for 30 days thereafter.

The government maintained it did and sought an injunction to compel the reinstatements. A federal district judge in Florida denied the request, however.

United Shoe Workers Win Long Drive at Bata

Baltimore, Md.—The United Shoe Workers overcame a massive management "smear" campaign against unions at the big Bata Shoe Co. plant at Belcamp, Md., near here to come out on top in a National Labor Relations Board election—the fifth in 10 years.

Bata workers at the fenced-in plant on U.S. Route 40 east of Baltimore voted, 1,043-1,030, for the union, with 18 challenged votes not expected to change the results, according to union Pres. George Fecteau. Four previous election attempts were beaten back by Bata management.

The firm, with 68 factories around the world, makes leather and rubber footwear at the biggest U.S. shoe plant under one roof. Almost 2,100 of 2,267 eligible workers cast ballots.

The election result, Fecteau said, was "wonderful testimony to the intelligence of the workers and the committee that represented the union."

During the final weeks of the union campaign, Bata management conducted what Fecteau called a "vicious" campaign depicting the AFL-CIO as a shrinking organization, picturing closed factories and others on strike, and intimating that union dues totaled $102 a year.

The closed factories, according to the antiunion campaigners, were under contract to the union, but Fecteau said the "hint" was untrue.

Fecteau said workers at the Belcamp plant are underpaid and promised that, with the cooperation of the employes, the union would seek to gain union wages and improved working conditions for them after certification.

Unit to Study Shoe Industry Trade Impact

A nine-member labor-management advisory committee has been named to help study the impact of the shoe imports on the domestic shoe industry.

Shoe unions and industry spokesmen have charged that severe import competition following the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 has caused financial losses to the industry and cost workers the equivalent of 25,000 full-time jobs. An application for relief under the trade adjustment section of the 1962 law is pending before the U.S. Tariff Commission.

The Interagency Shoe Committee, a group drawn from the State, Commerce and Labor Depts., will be the advisory committee's point of contact. The advisory unit was named by Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges.

Members include Pres. George Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers and Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers and seven spokesmen of shoe producers and their trade association.

Store Clerks Win $5-$9 Increases

Newark, N. J.—A new 3-year contract giving 2,500 employes of 1,400 Acme Stores wage increases of $5 to $9 a week was approved by a 96 percent vote of some 1,400 members of Retail Clerks Local 1245 at a meeting here.

The stores are spread from Point Pleasant, N. J., to Middletown, N. Y., and include outlets on Staten Island and Long Island.

Grocery clerks and feminine meat department employes will receive $3 weekly during the first half of the contract and $2 during the second; male meat department workers will get $3 each time, and journeymen meat cutters will receive $4 in the first half and $5 in the second. Parttime employes will receive 5 cents an hour for the first half and another 7.5 cents in the second half.

R. J. Thomas Retires as Meany Aide

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced the retirement of R. J. Thomas as his administrative assistant, effective Jan. 1. Thomas has filled the post since the AFL-CIO merger, but has been in ill health for the last year.

Thomas, 63, was one of the pioneer leaders of the Auto Workers. As an employe of the Chrysler Corp. in Detroit, he was in the forefront of the sitdown strike in 1937 which brought about the company's recognition of the union. He became a UAW vice president the same year.

After Homer Martin was ousted as president of the union, Thomas was elected to succeed him and remained at the union's helm until 1946. He was later named assistant director of organization of the former CIO, a post he held until merger.

Colorful and aggressive, Thomas—known widely as "R. J." or "Tommy"—also proved to be an effective peacemaker. He represented Meany in the successful settlement of many intra-union disputes, working harmoniously and effectively with officials of the former AFL unions as well as those from the CIO. He has served on a wide range of government boards and advisory committees.

Meany announced that Thomas will be succeeded by James Gildea, who has worked on the president's personal staff for several years.

Advisory Role Stressed Under Training Act

The aims of the new Vocational Education Act will be carried out only if labor and industry take an active part on the national and state advisory councils to be named, it was agreed at a conference of AFL-CIO labor educators and representatives of the U.S. Office of Education.

The parley was held in AFL-CIO headquarters two days after Pres. Johnson signed the act, which is the first modernization of federal vocational education legislation in several decades. The measure provides training opportunities not only for high school students but also for the unemployed and underemployed of any age in any occupation.

The act was analyzed section by section and its impact on job training was discussed from all angles.

Twenty-one representatives of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, international and national unions, trade and industrial departments and state central bodies attended from labor. The Office of Education was represented by Commissioner Francis Keppel, Assistant Commissioners Walter M. Arnold and Arthur L. Harris, and members of their staffs.

Keenan Testifies:

1,000 New Jobs Laid To Workweek Slash

Nearly 1,000 new jobs—a 10 percent increase—were created when New York construction electricians lopped five hours off their basic workweek, Sec.-Treas. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told a House subcommittee.

Keenan strongly urged amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act to reduce the workweek—"with effective controls to assure that the workweek is actually reduced, rather than creating additional overtime."

This should be "coupled with other action programs" to create jobs, Keenan emphasized.

The IBEW spokesman told the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), that many of the unions's locals have negotiated reductions in hours and others have made shorter hours a major collective bargaining goal.

He stressed, however, that the advantage of amending the wage-hour law "is that the reduction will apply to every plant in every industry and in every state. . . . It is not a program that applies only to a selected few workers in a few locations. It will create jobs for the unskilled as well as for the skilled, the young as well as the old, in West Virginia as well as California and in manufacturing as well as in white collar occupations."

Keenan said that economic growth is not the full answer to reducing unemployment. Various branches of the electrical industry, he said, have had annual growth rates far above the national average but have been able to turn out the increased output with few if any additional employes.

Quoting the late Samuel Gompers, Keenan said the IBEW agrees that "as long as there is a man out of work, the hours of labor are too long."

ICFTU Protests Aden 'Persecution'

Brussels—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has filed a second protest over the persecution of striking union members of Aden with Duncan Sandys, British undersecretary of state for commonwealth relations and colonies, and Sir Kennery Trevaskis, high commissioner for Aden.

The entire executive council of the Aden Trades Union Congress and the ICFTU affiliate's general secretary, Abdullah Alasnag, have been arrested and according to reports from Aden are being detained outside Aden, are being ill-treated and were forced to go on a hunger strike. In addition, use of the congress' headquarters has been forbidden.

ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu protested to Sir Kennedy that indiscriminate persecution violates trade union rights and urged him to safeguard the due process of law. He asked Sandys for a speedy investigation to assure trade union functioning and industrial relations.

Retirement Age Study Mapped by AFL-CIO

Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security has reminded officers of state central bodies that his department is preparing to embark on an examination of social and economic factors that relate to the retirement age.

The department was charged with this task in a resolution No. 243, passed by the recent AFL-CIO convention which directed it to report to the Executive Council.

Cruikshank recalled that a number of resolutions relating to the retirement age were before the convention and that those dealing with its reduction, were re-phrased in Resolution No. 243 which, he said, "is the official action of the convention on the subjects" covered in the original resolutions.

"I am sure it is not necessary to point out," he added, "that the AFL-CIO is not against liberalization of the social security program. The convention did, in fact, unanimously adopt Resolution No. 245, which calls for major improvements in the program and reemphasizes the support of the AFL-CIO for hospital insurance for the aged under social security, giving it first priority."

Cruickshank sent copies of Resolution No. 243 with his letter. It cites the "dramatic increase" in the nation's productive capacity as making it possible to meet current and potential demands by cutting the total work hours of the total work force. This has given rise to demands for an earlier retirement age which have grown more insistent as unemployment has persisted, the resolution says.

"Age 65 has been considered the normal age of eligibility for retirement on pension for many decades," it continues. "It is, however, an arbitrary figure and its appropriateness is subject always to re-evaluation in the light of changing circumstances. But the simple reduction of the retirement age cannot be accepted as an economic panacea.

"There are many economic and social values that must be weighed in connection with any re-evaluation of the normal age of retirement.. Among them are the consideration of the need for longer training periods at the lower end of the span of working years, the final eradication of all child labor, the costs of earlier retirement in both public and private plans, the effect on seniority provisions of collective bargaining agreements, the relationship of the normal retirement age to the policy of voluntary as against compulsory retirement, and the social values of productive activity on the part of older people.

"Alternative methods of reducing the total working time must also be taken into account in any re-assessment of the retirement age. These include increased vacation time, sabbatical years for wage earners and the shorter workweek."

Seafarers Repel Teamsters' Raid

Philadelphia—The ousted Teamsters were defeated in a bid to take over bargaining rights from the Seafarers' industrial division at the Huffman Refrigeration Co., Woodcrest, N. J. Huffman workers voted 183 to 30 for the SIU in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The plant produces refrigeration equipment. The SIU has represented some 235 workers for several years. Teamsters Local 158 petitioned for an election just before the current SIU contract expired.

On the 'Must' List

FOR ALL THE DAWDLING and delay, the 12-month first session of the 88th Congress came up with three major education measures that may well constitute a landmark.

Some months back Congress enacted federal aid for medical, dental and allied education, a breakthrough in this area. In the closing weeks of the session federal aid for higher education and a highly important upgrading and revision of federal aid for vocational education won approval of both houses and presidential signatures.

The nation's great concern with its educational system, the need to upgrade schools all along the line and provide them with substantial operating funds in the form of loans or grants, broke through the general indifference and contrived controversies apparent in Congress earlier in the year.

While Congress deserves a "well done" in the education area, the original program presented in omnibus form by Pres. Kennedy contained a number of other important proposals which are still pending in various committees. Most important, is federal aid to elementary and secondary schools, a need as intense and critical in terms of government support as medical, college and vocational schooling.

A Congress that has been able to work out the problems of federal aid to education in the three areas noted above should be able to draft legislation to meet the nation's school needs. It should be somewhere near the top of the "must" list for 1964, no matter how imposing the rest of the agenda.

Early in 1963 the AFL-CIO Executive Council, after an analysis of the Kennedy program, declared the battle for federal aid to education "must be won if truly equal opportunity is to be achieved for all Americans and if America is to develop adequately the human resources upon which the survival of liberty depends."

The council noted "cynics would have the nation believe that the present battle is a sham; that results are neither expected nor sincerely sought; that aid to education will again be tethered by the Gordian knot of religious controversy. We do not accept that view. The need is too great . . ."

In 1964 the need is greater and the necessary precedents have been set. By giving its approval to meaningful federal aid to schools the 88th Congress will truly go down in the history books as the "Education Congress."

A Year of Decision

A NEW YEAR is a time for calendar perusal and marking and the most important date of all is Tuesday, Nov. 3, the day Americans will elect a president, vice president, the entire House and one-third of the Senate.

Nov. 3, 1964, will mark one of the truly critical elections in American history and yet if past records hold up, about one-third of the eligible voters will forfeit their rights to participate in the decision.

The first job in 1964 is to red-circle Nov. 3 and all the pertinent state and local dates dealing with registration and primary elections. The second step is an incessant drumfire on "register and vote" until the message gets through that 1964 is a year of decision, a decision to be made by all Americans.

AFL-CIO News

Official Weekly Publication of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations

GEORGE MEANY, President
WILLIAM F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Executive Council

Walter P. Reuther	George M. Harrison	Harry C. Bates
Wm. C. Birthright	James B. Carey	David Dubinsky
David J. McDonald	Emil Rieve	Wm. L. McFetridge
Joseph Curran	M. A. Hutcheson	A. J. Hayes
Joseph D. Keenan	Jacob S. Potofsky	A. Philip Randolph
Richard F. Walsh	Lee W. Minton	Joseph A. Beirne
James A. Suffridge	O. A. Knight	Karl F. Feller
Paul L. Phillips	Peter T. Schoemann	L. M. Raftery
Paul Hall	Herman D. Kenin	John J. Grogan

Executive Committee: George Meany, Walter P. Reuther, George M. Harrison, James B. Carey, Harry C. Bates, David J. McDonald, David Dubinsky, William F. Schnitzler

Director of Publications: Saul Miller
Managing Editor: Willard Shelton

Assistant Editors:
John M. Barry, Eugene A. Kelly, Gervase N. Love, David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Headquarters: 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.
Telephone: NAtional 8-3870

Subscriptions: $2 a year: 10 or more, $1.50 a year

Vol. VIII Saturday, Dec. 28, 1963 No. 52

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations does not accept paid advertising in any of its official publications. No one is authorized to solicit advertising for any publication in the name of the AFL-CIO.

Weathervane

Meany Says:

Leaders' Deaths Tell Difference Between U.S. and Soviet Systems

The following editorial "We and They," by Pres. George Meany, is excerpted from the December 1963 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

FOR YEARS TO COME there will be evaluations of the role of our late President in the history of our country and his impact on humanity. But, given the tense international situation, the current official Soviet interpretation of the why and wherefore of this unspeakable crime takes on special importance. In the eyes of the Soviet rulers, the assassination of Kennedy reflects and confirms what they call the deep-going crisis of our democratic system and way of life.

For the Soviet people—no less than for the American and other free peoples—it would be rewarding to compare the situation in the USSR after the death of Stalin, at the age of 73, with the situation in the U.S. after the assassination of our young President at an age when he was only approaching the height of his career. An examination of the American and Soviet ways of meeting the problem of succession would shed valuable light on the comparative viability and vitality of the diametrically opposite systems.

The moment Stalin died, a fierce struggle began among the surviving Soviet leaders over the problem of who would succeed him. At first, their limitless personal ambition was tempered by fear that without Stalin's "invincible leadership," the very existence of the Soviet system might be gravely jeopardized. They were plagued by a terrible uncertainty as to how the people might react to Stalin's death.

The powerful clique that created and was in turn sheltered by the cult of Stalin correctly saw in the Soviet people some of their own fears, disorder and panic. In its spirit and substance, the above appeal was identical with the one made by Stalin after the initial disastrous defeats suffered by the Red Army at the hands of Hitler's hordes. Khrushchev and his fear-ridden colleagues were just as panicky on Mar. 7, 1953, after the death of Stalin, as the latter himself was on July 3, 1941, when he spoke of the Soviet "motherland" being in "grave danger" in consequence of the Nazi Wehrmacht having swept more than 450 miles into Russia in less than a month.

Brutality and bloodshed, total political elimination and murder, as well as panic, featured the years of bitter fighting among Stalin's closest and most servile associates over who was to succeed him. No political system could be guilty of a grimmer crime than the cold-blooded murder of Lavrenti Beria by the very comrades with whom he was co-existing and competing over succession to Stalin. The finally triumphant Khrushchev could never dare appoint a highly authoritative Soviet commission to inquire thoroughly into the assassination of Beria and to report fully to the people of the USSR.

LET US NOW EXAMINE how the problem of succession was met in our democratic society upon the assassination of Kennedy. Our government and people were not gripped by fear or panic. We were acutely shocked, but we were not confused, panicked or paralyzed. The "powers and duties" of our late President were immediately and peacefully transferred to the vice president. The process of transfer of power worked smoothly, just as the Constitution provided. Even in the hours of our deepest grief, our people sincerely regretted the fact that the accused murderer of our beloved President was himself assassinated and thus lost his legal right to a fair trial.

The criminal assassination of John F. Kennedy drew our people closer together. The country rallied in support of our form of government which neither failed nor faltered for even a moment in our hour of darkest tragedy. The people answered Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson's plea for renewed dedication and renewed vigor . . . in action, in tolerance, in mutual understanding" with a world-resounding "yes."

In the nightmarish weekend of Nov. 22, 1963, we did not give vent to hate. We heeded the stirring plea of Chief Justice Warren to shun "the hatred that consumes people." What a revealing contrast with Nikita Khrushchev's plea, before the CPSU Central Committee, on June 21, 1963, for "hatred for the class enemy . . . since one cannot be a good fighter for the people, for communism, if one does not know how to hate the enemy."

Our democratic society met the problem of succession with orderly continuity, without chaos or conflict. Their dictatorial system met their problems of succession in an atmosphere of panic, fear of disorder and violence, and deadly conflict.

Mankind can learn much from this contrast.

Morgan Says:

New Style Industrial Revolution Demands New, 'Total' Solutions

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

WHILE WE WERE HAVING our hands full with the British in the War of 1812, the British were busy at home trying to subdue the violent fringe of the working class which had rebelled against the industrial revolution.

Roving bands of workers called Luddites, after a poor chap named Ned Lud who about three decades earlier had begun the protest by breaking stocking frames, invaded factories and smashed the new machinery they thought would rob them of their jobs. There was painful dislocation and shameless exploitation, but out of this mechanization emerged the incredible material strength and wealth of the western world.

Morgan

Today we have a new kind of industrial revolution on our hands which may well have a sharper, deeper influence on civilization than the first. It is the automation of industry, which is already revolutionizing the American society and doing it so swiftly that we hardly are aware of what is happening. I haven't heard of a worker chopping down an IBM machine or shooting holes in the operations console of a push-button factory.

Organized labor uses more sophisticated tactics to protect jobs now, though some of these have been severely criticized as "irresponsible" featherbedding. Responsible union leaders, however, know that needless work artificially preserved is both unsound and degrading. The more thoughtful ones are searching for more lasting and realistic solutions. But they are deeply concerned.

It was such concern that led AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the convention in New York last month to warn that automation is becoming a "real curse." Then he invited one of the country's leading experts on automation, John I. Snyder, Jr., president of U.S. Industries, Inc., to address the convention on the subject.

Like it or not, Snyder said, automation is here to stay. He denied it was an evil but indicated it could be if we insisted on developing a kind of mythology about its "magic" instead of recognizing the upheaval it was causing. Then he proceeded to shoot down five "fallacies" that have concealed automation's shattering impact.

FALLACY NO. ONE: Automation is not really going to eliminate many jobs. Fact: Already it is gobbling them up at a rate of 40,000 a week and this is just whetting its appetite.

FALLACY NO. TWO: Automation will create new jobs in the building, running and maintenance of new machines. Fact: In the building of them, maybe, but if it took a big battery of men to run and maintain them, why automate?

FALLACY NO. THREE: Those displaced can be rapidly retrained and immediately replaced in other jobs. Fact: By present techniques many workers are simply not retrainable.

FALLACY NO. FOUR: Workers displaced in one area can easily be assimilated somewhere else. Fact: Those who lose their jobs are usually just those least able to move in the first place.

FALLACY NO. FIVE: There is no relationship between the automation revolution and the Negro revolution. Fact: "This is patent nonsense." Actually, the technological upheaval has intensified the drive for civil rights because the Negro, always the "last hired and first fired," is suffering the most from unemployment.

Solutions? A partial one, Snyder said, might just be a 35-hour-workweek, which organized labor advocates. But total solutions, he added, depend on total planning toward, first, creation of new industries and second, creation of new markets for our products.

"Planning" has been a dirty word in the American vocabulary but when a distinguished industrialist uses the phrase "total planning," what in the world are we coming to? To our senses maybe, with the realization that our economy is no longer free, in the licentious 19th Century meaning.

Two Democratic Senators, Minnesota's Hubert Humphrey and Michigan's Philip Hart, have introduced a bill to create a governmental commission to examine every aspect of technological change. From such continuing study, the impacts of automation could be more clearly anticipated.

This is the kind of work the so-called "think factories" like the Rand Corp. do for the Defense Dept. If this helps military planning why can't a government agency make similar use of brains and machines to enhance economic development, asked Pres. Joseph Beirne of the Communications Workers. The answer is, it can, if Congress will listen to it.

Letter to John-John Transcript Available

More than 1,300 copies of Edward P. Morgan's broadcast, "Letter to John-John," have been distributed upon requests to listeners who had heard it broadcast on his AFL-CIO-sponsored radio program.

Additional copies are available and may be had without charge by writing AFL-CIO Radio, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Washington Reports:

Nation's Military Might Held Chief Deterrent to Aggression

THE UNITED STATES military machine—"the strongest military machine in the history of the world"—is in itself a major deterrent to attacks by other nations. Sen. Stuart Symington (D-Mo.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program, heard on nearly 700 radio stations.

Another member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R-Mass.) agreed, declaring that the U.S. is stronger than the Soviet Union and "adequately defended at the present time."

He warned that no nation can ever be "fully satisfied," and that "we have to keep improving our equipment, providing better training for our manpower."

Saltonstall, who was chairman of the conference that agreed on the original bill for unification of the armed services, said such unification has now been fairly well achieved. He praised Defense Sec. Robert McNamara for eliminating duplications.

Symington said the U.S. is making progress in working out a more powerful rocket booster for the space program, cutting into the lead of the Soviet Union in the development of "thrust."

"THRUST," he said, "is vitally connected with defense. . . . We had sworn testimony that the Apollo project (the moon shot) would cost $20 billion, but that probably 90 to 95 percent of that cost is necessary for other programs, including the defense potential even if we decide not to go to the moon."

Discussing the nuclear test ban treaty, Saltonstall suggested that the next step "will be a great deal more difficult of accomplishment, but we have made a first step."

Both senators called the Polaris submarine program "perhaps the most important development in the defense program in the last five years."

Symington said that these submarines "which range our oceans with tremendous lethal power in megatons . . . would be very difficult for any nation which attacked our country to defend against."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN THE COMPILED RECORD of Lyndon B. Johnson in the Senate and as Vice President, the authoritative reference publication, Congressional Quarterly, includes these quotations:

In 1959, writing on his personal philosophy in the Texas Quarterly, Johnson declared:

"Some who equate personal philosophies with popular dogmas might inquire, endlessly, as to my 'position' on this or that issue. Philosophies, however, are not made of answers to issues but of approaches more enduring or encompassing. . . .

"I am a free man, an American, a United States Senator and a Democrat, in that order."

Again in 1959, when he was answering attacks that as Senate majority leader he had become "too powerful" individually and that he didn't call enough Democratic policy conferences, he said on the floor:

"This one-man rule stuff is a myth . . . I do not know how one can force a senator to do anything. I have never tried to do so. . . .

"There is not anything the leadership on either side can do to require a member of the Senate to change his convictions on any bill . . . When I was elected by my caucus . . . I said that I did not propose to sacrifice my conviction in order to have the title of leader, and I did not expect any other senator to sacrifice his conviction in order to find himself aligned with me.

"Our policy is what each individual senator's conviction tells him is good for America . . . I have no illusion that there is any super policy committee or super caucus which could have the slightest influence . . . on any of the other senators, to make them act contrary to their convictions."

* * *

ON FOREIGN POLICY, Johnson expressed an approach in a speech to the Governors' Conference last July in Miami Beach:

"On the basis of present evidence, no man can responsibly imply that the millenium is at hand between East and West or in the success of freedom's cause. But no responsible man will insist that we keep the door closed against the opportunities which seem to be opening.

"It is a tragic perversion of American leadership—and a perversion of American character—to ask the people to greet with suspicion any talk of peace and to greet with applause all talk of war."

On civil rights, the then Vice President spoke at Gettysburg, Pa., on Memorial Day this year:

"One hundred years ago the slave was freed. One hundred years later the Negro remains in bondage to the color of his skin. The Negro today asks justice. We do not answer him, we do not answer those who lie beneath this soil, when we reply to the Negro by asking 'Patience.'"

* * *

AGAIN HE STRUCK the civil rights theme at the July Governors' Conference, when the chief executives of the states were involved in a fierce battle about what stand to take if any. Said Johnson:

"Whatver the legalisms or traditions, it is wrong that tax-paying, arms-bearing, vote-casting Americans should be unable to find a bed for the night or meals for their children along the highways of our free and decent society.

"Whatever the reasons, it is wrong that Americans who fight alongside other Americans in war should not be able to work alongside the same Americans, wash up alongside them, eat alongside them, win promotions alongside them, or send their children to sit in schools alongside children of other Americans.

"I know of no valid right in our system which is jeopardized or compromised or weakened by correcting the wrongs which we know exist among us . . . I would suggest that the human rights and property rights of all of us will be strengthened and protected by ending the corrosion of these wrongs."

U.S. DEFENSES are strong enough to deter attack from any other nation in the world, two members of the Senate Armed Forces Committee, Sen. Stuart Symington (D-Mo.), left, and Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R-Mich.), agreed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Kennedy Slaying Leaves Stain on 1963

Rally to Johnson and Convention Mark Year for Organized Labor

By Harry Conn

Trade unionists, with all other American citizens, will carry memories of the year 1963 as long as they live.

They will remember it as a year when they saw the first faint rays of hope this planet would not be exterminated by thermonuclear war. This came with the signing of the test ban treaty.

They will remember it as a period when almost 4 million unemployed looked for work and automation devoured jobs while first the Kennedy Administration and then the Johnson Administration pleaded for remedial legislation.

They will remember it as the period of the civil rights revolution when Negroes, joined by whites, decided that no longer would they be second class citizens.

They will remember it as the time when the radical right, richly financed, preached bigotry, dissension and hatred for our top government officials.

And, most of all, they will remember it as the year that Pres. Kennedy was the victim of a sniper's bullet—and the sniper's life was taken by an assassin. A mourning nation saw a new chief executive, Pres. Lyndon Baines Johnson, sworn into office 98 minutes after Kennedy's death, and heard Johnson pledge to follow the Kennedy policies.

Following are the events of 1963, month by month, from the files of Press Associates, Inc.:

January

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany calls for repeal of Sec. 14b of Taft-Hartley—the provisions which make state "right-to-work" laws possible—in his New Year's message . . . Charles Luna becomes president of the Railroad Trainmen . . . Lockout-caused news blackout continues in New York City . . . Communication Workers win key Western Electric vote . . . Dark unemployment picture spurs Administration worry . . . Vice Pres. Johnson hails union leadership in Detroit . . . No immediate job relief forecast by Administration . . . UAW says overtime cost 60,000 jobs in auto plants . . . Machinists reject Boeing offer; Kennedy names panel . . . Sen. Morse's intervention helps settle dock strike.

February

AFL-CIO fears jobless boost in 1963 despite proposed tax program . . . Kennedy offers programs for school construction, higher teachers' pay . . . Industrial unions detail plans for mass organizing campaigns . . . Jobless rate reaches 5.8 percent . . . Transport Workers win Philly strike settlement . . . Kennedy urges action on medicare . . . Area Redevelopment Administration reports having more than $1 billion in unfilled public works projets . . . Steel's McDonald hails Human Relations Committee record . . . Building Trades Dept. calls for fight on "work" laws . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council demands end to job discrimination . . . Wirtz, AFL-CIO agree job problem is critical . . . John Brophy dies at 79 . . . Musicians' Kenin elected to AFL-CIO Executive Council . . . Council pays tribute to Eleanor Roosevelt.

March

Apprenticeship advisory committee set up by Labor Dept. . . . Kennedy, Meany lead celebration of Labor Dept.'s 50th anniversary . . . Kefauver seeks moratorium on rail mergers . . . Rail unions call for constructive negotiations on work rules . . . Agreement reached in New York press dispute . . . AFL-CIO urges minimum wage for 4 million more workers . . .Municipal Workers name "ethics" umpire . . . Strike boycott credited with winning Sheet Metal strike at Hotpoint . . . Automation job loss protection negotiated by Railway Clerks . . . COPE's James McDevitt dies suddenly of stroke in Oklahoma City . . . Six postal unions sign pact winning U.S. recognition.

April

Rolvaag finally acclaimed Minnesota governor; quashes anti-labor legislation . . . New Jersey leads in local "anti-scab" laws . . . AFL-CIO asks "honest packaging" . . . New York Typos, in second vote, accept new pact . . . Meany dissents on Clay report downgrading U.S. foreign aid . . . IUE asks benefits for workers hit by trade expansion bill . . . Senior Citizens say AMA spent $7 million fighting medicare . . . Emergency board named in rail dispute . . . Kennedy, Wirtz, Meany speak at Machinists' 75th anniversary dinner . . . "Work" law defeated in Maine . . . IBEW's Keenan, IUE's Carey welcome British electrical union official who led fight against Communists . . . . . Pioneer Amalgamated Bank of New York reaches 40th birthday . . . AFL-CIO scholarships go to six students . . . Kennedy lashes "econo-mizers"; defends welfare programs . . . Supreme Court upholds IBEW discipline authority . . . Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation signed into law . . . "Fruits of Progress" nets USW-Kaiser workers $80 first month.

May

Fair employment bill gets strong AFL-CIO support . . . 38,000 get training under Manpower Act . . . IUD condemns use of police dogs in Birmingham . . . AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show opens in St. Louis . . . NLRB Chairman McCulloch scorches phony film, "And Women Must Weep" . . . Trade unions given major roles in Alliance for Progress at labor ministers' conference in Colombia . . . 125,000 Clothing Workers win 17.5 cents, other benefits . . . Use of union dues money restricted by high court . . . Right-wing campaign exposed by AFL-CIO . . . Successes in Los Angeles organizing drive reported . . . Ordman becomes NLRB general counsel . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council stresses jobs, civil rights . . . Les Dennis elected president of Railway Clerks, Harrison become chief executive officer . . . Retail-Wholesale union wins major New York hospital vote . . . Kennedy greets members of ILPA at White House . . . Meany renews battle against crippling foreign aid.

June

Kennedy names labor-management panel to advise U.S. Mediation Service . . . ICFTU condemns violence against Alabama Negroes . . . Schnitzler reports unions' record of honesty is outstanding . . . Job openings for Negroes become focal point of drive in North . . . Pope John dies; Meany, other labor officials express sorrow . . . Unions show gains in bargaining rights victories in 1962 . . . Congressional hearings open on cut in workweek . . . U.S. labor represented at ILO conference by Meany, Faupl, C. J. Haggerty, Jacob S. Potofsky, Joseph D. Keenan, William J. Pachler, David Sullivan, Bert Seidman . . . Labor unions play key role in emerging African nations . . . Missouri anti-strike utility law thrown out by Supreme Court . . . Court ruling opens door for Insurance Workers organizing . . . 300 unionists at White House back President's civil rights program in "this summer of determined effort" . . . African walkout splits ILO meeting . . . President urges sweeping civil rights legislation.

July

Eighteen building trades unions sign anti-bias statement . . . American Bakery Workers win four elections in deep South . . . Minimum wage law to boost wages by $500 million . . . Wirtz praises labor cooperation in fight against discrimination . . . Michigan AFL-CIO files suit on state reapportionment in Supreme Court . . . Kennedy, Meany hail German unionists in West Berlin . . . Swedish experts tell Senate probe how they achieved full employment . . . Vermont stops "work" law . . . IBEW pledges equal apprentice opportunities for Negroes . . . Rev. Martin Luther King praises labor for anti-bias fight . . . AFL-CIO gives strong support to Manpower Act . . . Reuther urges strong civil rights legislation . . . President asks Congress to let ICC settle heated rail dispute . . . Meany, Randolph stress full employment at FEPC hearings.

August

Living costs hit new high . . . Corporate profits surge to highest level in history . . . Low strike record continues . . . AFL-CIO opposes extension of Mexican farm labor program . . . Conservative businessmen set up own political action committee . . . U.S. statistics blast AMA claim that elderly are "well off" . . . 38 Latin, Central American unionists graduate from American Institute for Free Labor Development . . . OCAW settles lengthy Shell strike . . . Sen. Estes Kefauver, friend of labor, dies . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council hits denial of aid to workers hurt by trade expansion, praises test ban treaty, urges economic growth, not hard money . . . Al Barkan named by Meany to head COPE . . . 50,000 unionists among 250,000 who march in Washington for jobs and freedom.

September

IBEW's Rourke named deputy COPE director . . . Nation marks Labor Day with parades, speeches, festivities . . . Congress passes compulsory railroad arbitration involving five ops; unions regret it but promise to cooperate . . . Jenkins takes post as first Negro member of NLRB . . . TWUA's John W. Edelman, veteran lobbyist, retires . . . Minimum wage rate hits $1.25 for 2.6 million additional workers . . . Printing unions launch boycott against struck Kingsport Press in Tennessee . . . Rail panel named; BRT's McDonald and BLFE's Gilbert members . . . Experts label "states' rights" plan as "time bomb" at IUD meet . . . New York City Teachers' contract hailed as setting national pattern; major gains won . . . AFL-CIO wants stronger laws for radiation protection . . . Maritime Trades Dept. hits Canadian Labor Congress support of maritime trusteeship plan . . . Negro doctors back medicare . . . DePaola elected Barber's president . . . Kennedy praises labor movement for devotion to public interest . . . Senate approves test ban treaty.

October

Labor-supported tax bill passes House, 271 to 155 . . . IUE-GE reach agreement . . . Social security fund sound, say trustees . . . Most hard-core unemployed found still looking for jobs . . . Rep. Ryan proposes commission to study automation's "threats, promises" . . . Farmers Union Pres. Jim Patton named co-chairman of National Council for Industrial Peace to fill post left vacant by death of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt . . . Kennedy concerned over price boosts with profits at peak . . . Wirtz, AFL-CIO to stand by SIU in Canadian shipping dispute . . . Shipbuilders' John Grogan named to AFL-CIO Executive Council . . . Rockefeller, Nixon hit Goldwater's stand on compulsory open shop . . . Labor Dept. asks court to force "work" group to comply with Landrum-Griffin . . . Hearings on rail firemen end; crew consist question opens . . . Canada sets up maritime trusteeships . . . Norfolk Naval Yard recognizes four AFL-CIO unions.

November

Senate report discloses that less than 1 percent of aged are helped by Kerr-Mills . . . National Association of Letter Carriers marks 100th anniversary of home delivery . . . Kennedy says automation should be made man's servant, not his master . . . Wirtz opposes quotas in apprenticeship programs . . . Reuther, at IUD convention, sounds call for militant and liberal labor movement . . . Meany again stresses plight of jobless . . . Meany praises labor press at ILPA convention . . . Michael Ross, director of international affairs for AFL-CIO, dies . . . Metal Trades Dept. reports organizing 100,000 workers under Kennedy order . . . Maritime Trades lash Canadian trusteeship law . . . Union label given new stress at convention . . . ILGWU's Stein elected to head ILPA . . . Clothing Workers celebrate 40 years of Amalgamated Bank . . . Wirtz says jobs are first order of U.S. business . . . Meany, in convention keynote, calls automation a "curse" . . . Kennedy tells AFL-CIO of progress of his Administration . . . AFL-CIO delegates pledge all energies in civil rights struggle . . . Full scale organizing mapped by federation . . . Steel unionists sues AMA over alleged recording . . . World shocked, stunned over slaying of Pres. Kennedy in Dallas . . . AFL-CIO pledges support to Johnson . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council says no one mourns assassinated President more than workers.

December

Five operating rail unions reject arbitration job award . . . UAW urges national peace planning board . . . Living costs hit new high . . . Supreme Court "agency shop" ruling focuses attention on Taft-Hartley's 14b . . . Four ops file suits to have rail arbitration award set aside . . . Labor-supported housing project in Mexico named for Pres. Kennedy . . . Herbert H. Lehman, liberal leader, dies suddenly of heart attack in New York . . . Unemployment up 500,000 in November to 5.9 percent of labor force . . . Meany gets Presidential Medal of Freedom . . . Studebaker to move production from South Bend to Canada at cost of 6,000 jobs . . . AFL-CIO Executive Council meets with Pres. Johnson, pledges him full support . . . Key education bills passed by Congress as session drives toward year-end adjournment with final votes scheduled Dec. 30.

Specter at the Gate

Education Aid Highlights Session:

Clock Runs Out on Congress With Key Bills Still Pending

(Continued from Page 1)

and loans over a three-year period totaled $1.2 billion.

Earlier a separate $175 million program of grants to medical, dental and other health professional schools was signed into law, along with a low-cost student loan program enacted over the opposition of the American Medical Association.

The labor movement played an important role in formulating a third education aid measure which became law this year—a massive upgrading and expansion of vocational education. Coupled with an extension and enlargement of the manpower training program, it will gear the nation's educational apparatus to more effective job preparation for a technological age.

While hailing the enactment of the series of pioneering education bills, Pres. Johnson called the attention of Congress to the "unfinished portion" of the Administration's school aid requests, "particularly those programs which will assist elementary and secondary schools."

The year 1963 will also go on the record books as the year when a federal Equal-Pay-for-Women bill became law, culminating a campaign of many years' duration. Effective June 10, 1964, employers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act may not discriminate in pay scales on the basis of sex—nor may they lower the wages of male workers to achieve "equality."

The session, which sputtered towards an exhausted year-end adjournment, began on an inconclusive note with battles over rules—the internal machinery of Congress—in both the House and Senate.

The House fight was a rematch of the 1961 session, when the new Kennedy Administration narrowly won a vote to enlarge the Rules Committee temporarily from 12 to 15 members. This enabled the Administration to gain an essential, although shaky, one-vote margin over the Republican-conservative Democratic coalition on most issues. The battle to continue the enlargement another two years was won by a safe 39-vote margin, as compared with the five-vote victory of 1961.

In the Senate, however, a liberal attempt to amend the Senate rules so as to make it somewhat easier to break filibusters went down to defeat—in the face of a filibuster which prevented the Senate from ever voting on the merits of the issue. With civil rights legislation high on the Senate's agenda for the second session, the filibuster remains a potent weapon of the southern bloc.

In other areas of legislative activity, there were these significant first session developments:

Accelerated Public Works. The 87th Congress, in 1962, had authorized a $900 million program of short-term, job-creating public works projects to be concentrated in areas of heavy unemployment, but appropriated only $400 million of that amount. The House Appropriations Committee, early in 1963, killed an Administration request for the balance of the money, but the House, in a rare reversal of committee action, restored $450 million by a 228-184 vote and the Senate concurred. Later in the session, another $30 million was appropriated.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council strongly urged continuation and expansion of the program, which will soon run out of funds, and Pres. George Meany presented the federation's position to the House Public Works Committee. The committee, by a single-vote margin, recently approved a bill authorizing a new $900 million program which is now before the House Rules Committee.

Youth Employment. The Senate, in April, approved the Administration's Youth Employment bill to set up a conservation corps similar to the New Deal's CCC and a hometown youth corps to give work experience to jobless, out-of-school youngsters. The vote was 50-34. A similar bill was approved by the House Labor Committee but has not cleared the Rules Committee.

Mass Transportation. The Senate passed, 52-41, an Administration bill to provide federal grants to help states and cities improve mass transit facilities, after adding amendments proposed by the AFL-CIO to safeguard worker job and bargaining rights. A companion bill, without many of these safeguards, was approved by the House Banking Committee but has not reached the floor.

Rail Arbitration. In an unprecedented peacetime action, Congress stepped into the railroad work rules dispute to avert a shutdown and directed arbitration of two key issues and continued negotiation of other matters in dispute.

Bracero Program. Congress, over the protests of labor and religious groups, extended for one additional year the program under which Mexican farm laborers are brought into the United States for seasonal work. The House first defeated a proposed two-year extension and many members of both parties who supported the one-year bill served notice that they would vote against any future continuation of the program.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty. The Administration won a major foreign policy victory when the Senate, 80-19, ratified the limited test ban treaty negotiated by the U.S., Soviet Russia and Great Britain.

National Service Corps. The Administration's proposal for a domestic version of the peace corps to spur social service projects narrowly passed the Senate, 47-44. A trimmed-down version has House subcommittee approval, but no early action is foreseen.

Mental Health. Congress enacted two pioneering bills providing federal grants for construction of community mental health centers and research into causes and treatment of both mental illness and mental retardation.

Area Redevelopment. The conservative coalition showed its strength when the House defeated, by a 5-vote margin, a bill to authorize an additional $455 million for loans and grants to areas of heavy, chronic unemployment. The Senate revived the measure, passing a companion bill by a 65-30 vote, but the House Rules Committee has blocked further action.

Federal Pay Raises. The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee brought out a labor-supported pay raise bill for federal employes, presidential appointees and members of Congress, but it remained in the Rules Committee as the session ended.

Committees of both House and Senate were active throughout the long session, holding extended hearings on a number of issues including such labor-priority subjects as automation and the shorter workweek. Floor action, however, was sluggish through most of the session, with periodic spurts of activity.

Most appropriations bills, carrying money to operate the federal government and programs authorized by Congress, did not move until late in the session, nearly halfway past the start of the fiscal year.

TWO NEW DIRECTORS of the United Community Funds & Councils look over some of the organization's material. They are Sec.-Treas. Barney Hopkins (left) of the Michigan AFL-CIO, and Gerald Rideout, public relations director of the General Motors Corp.'s Buick Div.

House Ends Aid Fight, Reverses Vote on Wheat

The Administration won a foreign aid appropriations fight which had become transformed into a battle to preserve presidential authority in dealings with other nations as Congress abandoned hopes for a pre-Christmas adjournment.

To reverse a 5-vote defeat on the issue of financing the sale of surplus U.S. wheat to the Soviet Union, Democratic leaders summoned back to the capital scores of congressmen who had begun a premature Christmas vacation.

During the controversy, fought largely along party lines, the House remained in session until 5 a.m. on Dec. 21 and convened before sunrise on Dec. 24 to back the Administration by a 189-158 vote.

Because Senate concurrence is required, final adjournment was put off at least until Dec. 30, although the House left only a corporal's guard behind to go through the closing formalities.

Although the Administration won on the issue of permitting the Export-Import Bank to extend routine commercial credit on transactions with Soviet Russia, the money portion of the foreign aid bill represented a sharp cutback from the budget request of the late Pres. Kennedy.

The bill, in final form, appropriates $3 billion for U.S. military and economic aid abroad. It represents a compromise between the $2.8 billion voted by the House and the $3.3 billion contained in the Senate's appropriation bill.

The total is $700 million less than the amount authorized earlier by Congress which, in turn, was a sharp drop from the original White House request. Last January, Kennedy called for a $4.5 billion program, but pared the figure to $4.2 billion after the report of a committee headed by retired Gen. Lucius D. Clay.

The House, which twice voted to bar extension of government risk insurance in dealings with the Soviets, receded from its opposition as the issue became one of confidence in Pres. Johnson.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) warned against tying the President's hands in the first foreign policy test of his Administration.

"The real issue," he told the House, "is whether the new President is to look strong to other nations or to look weak."

On the final showdown, 187 Democrats and two Republicans voted for the Administration position; 113 Republicans and 25 Democrats opposed the measure.

Although the Senate had twice previously backed the Administration on the wheat sale credit issue, plans for immediate routine approval of the conference report were blocked when Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) served notice that he would insist in a live quorum of 51 members present for the final vote. The leadership then put off Senate action until Dec. 30.

PRES. JOHNSON SIGNS the expanded and extended Manpower Development & Training Act of 1963 in ceremonies attended by congressmen and others. Left to right are Stanley Ruttenberg, special assistant for economic policy to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller; Rep. Peter Frelinghuysen, Jr. (R-N. J.); Chairman Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), of the subcommittee that developed the bill; Rep. Robert Taft, Jr. (R-Ohio).

Lovestone Heads Intl. Affairs Dept.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has appointed Jay Lovestone as director of the federation's Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Lovestone succeeds the late Michael Ross, who died in early November. Prior to his appointment, Lovestone had been assistant director of the department and had been in charge of international publications, a post he had held since 1958. Earlier he had been executive secretary of the Free Trade Union Committee.

Canada to Study Curbs on Usury

Ottawa, Ont. — All parties in the House of Commons, spurred by growing concern about unethical credit practices, have agreed to set up a joint Commons-Senate committee to consider legal curbs on high interest rates and rapacious loan sharks.

David Orlikow, New Democrat from Winnipeg North, reported that an immigrant got a $1,051 loan by signing a note for $2,350. After paying $35 a month for three years, or $1,260, he still owed $1,580 because the alleged interest rate of 7 percent turned out to be 30 percent.

An Ontario legislative committee heard in hearings last year of cases where interest charges were 80, 90 or even 100 percent.

In Succession to Office:

Democracy's Vitality Stressed by Meany

American and Soviet methods of providing a successor to a dead national leader provide a clear comparison of the "viability and vitality" of democracy over totalitarian dictatorship, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in an editorial in the American Federationist.

In the Soviet Union, the death of Stalin created an atmosphere of "panic, fear of disorder and violence, and deadly conflict," while in America Pres. Kennedy's murder was met with "orderly continuity, without chaos or conflict," Meany said in the December issue of the official AFL-CIO magazine. (Excerpts from the editorial appear on Page 4.)

"The moment Stalin died," the editorial declared, "a fierce struggle began among the surviving Soviet leaders over the problem of who would succeed him. At first the limitless personal ambition was tempered by fear that without Stalin's 'invincible leadership' the very existence of the Soviet system might be gravely jeopardized. They were plagued by a terrible uncertainty as to how the people might react to Stalin's death."

Stalin's successor required several years to emerge victorious from a power struggle marked by "brutality and bloodshed, total political elimination and murder," including the execution of top-ranking job-seeker Lavrenti Beria, Meany declared.

"Triumphant Khrushchev could never dare appoint a highly authoritative Soviet commission to inquire thoroughly into the assassination of Beria and to report fully to the people of the USSR," Meany noted.

Current attempts by the Soviet press and Premier Khrushchev to portray post-Kennedy America as "a land of turmoil" is the wishful thinking of men whose evaluations are colored by their experiences in the era following Stalin's death, he said.

In America, struck without warning by Kennedy's murder, neither the government nor the people was gripped by fear or panic, Meany declared.

"We were acutely shocked, but we were not confused, panicked or paralyzed," he stated. "The 'powers and duties' of our late President were immediately and peacefully transferred to the vice president. The process of transfer of power worked smoothly, just as the Constitution provided.

"The country rallied in support of our form of government which neither failed nor faltered for even a moment in our hour of darkest tragedy.

"Mankind can learn much from this contrast."

Radical Right Studied by COPE Staff

Area directors of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education took part in a two-day educational program at the federation's headquarters dealing with the radical right-wing movement in America.

The program was designed to help the COPE directors utilize a new filmstrip on the extreme right as a basis for group discussions in connection with COPE area conferences early in 1964.

Discussions and workshops were conducted by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin, Assistant Dir. George Guernsey and by Bernard Albert and Mary Zon of the COPE staff.

The second day of the conference was spent in "practice discussions" led by the COPE area directors, with the Dept. of Education staff evaluating the techniques.

Henning Receives Medal from Israel

Los Angeles — Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning was honored at a dinner here for his "exceptional service to, and friendship for, the people and state of Israel."

He was one of 10 notables who received the bronze Medallion of Valor from Ambassador Avraham Harman at a program sponsored by the Los Angeles Committee for Israel Bonds.

MARCH OF DIMES poster child for 1964, 5-year-old Mary Lou Graves of Flint, Mich., gets a button and a contribution from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and pins button on Meany in ceremony signifying start of annual appeal for public support. Mary Lou, born with an open spine, is representative of thousands of birth defect sufferers receiving direct aid from the March of Dimes or medical care at 40 March of Dimes centers.

Voting Reform Urged By Presidential Panel

(Continued from Page 1)

through newspapers, churches, radio and television.

In Wausau, Wis., and Highland Park, Ill., the commission said, an inter-community competition resulted in more than 99 percent of potential registration, and a follow-up "get-out-the-vote" campaign in Wausau resulted in a voter turnout of 90.7 percent.

So far as "involuntary" failure to vote is concerned, the commission blamed highly restrictive state laws that impose unduly harsh residency requirements, unjustified literacy tests and "complicated and inaccessible" registration procedures.

Three commission members members split from the majority on the literacy-test issue, arguing in two separate opinions that a "bona fide" test is not unreasonable, and that a state should not be deprived of the right to require voters to "demonstrate ability to read the language of our ballot, upon which so much depends in this most critical and challenging period in our history."

A separate opinion was filed, signed by six members, rejecting the doctrine that an incapacity to read and write is a valid reason for barring a citizen from the polls.

"Literate men are not equally well-informed, nor equally rational, nor equally moral, nor equally rich, nor equally devoted to their country," wrote Commissioner Evron M. Kirkpatrick for this group of six. "Neither are the illiterate."

"Who would argue that the political judgment of a literate man of doubtful morality or patriotism is better than that of an honest but illiterate patriot?

"Literacy tests are remnant of class discrimination. They discriminate against the poor, the aged, and rural inhabitants. It is not the wealthy who can neither read nor write. It is the poor and the dispossessed. Literacy tests have no more place in a modern democracy than property tests."

The commission made these other major recommendations to the states on revision of their election laws:

- Registration should be made easily available to all citizens, through house-to-house canvass procedures, deputy registrars, precinct and mobile registration, extension of the time of registration until three or four weeks before an election, and absentee registration.
- State residence requirements should not exceed six months and local residence requirements not more than 30 days, while a new state resident should be allowed to vote for President if he would have been qualified under the laws of his previous state of residence.
- Polling places should be equipped to eliminate long wating periods and they should be open throughout the day and at least until 9 P.M.
- Every possible protection against election fraud should be offered, candidacy should be open to all, the right to vote should be extended to persons living on government reservations, the poll tax should be eliminated.
- Election day should be proclaimed a national day of dedication to our American democracy so that "the privilege of a free ballot would be underscored," and absentee voting as well as absentee registration should be legalized.

Pennsylvania's Rep. Green Dead at 53

Philadelphia — Rep. William J. Green, Jr., leading figure in the Pennsylvania Democratic delegation in the House, died here after a sudden illness at the age of 53. He had been stricken in New York, where he planned to attend the funeral of Herbert H. Lehman.

Credited with helping build a 331,000 plurality in Philadelphia for the late Pres. Kennedy in 1960, Green had the satisfaction of seeing the city's vote swing Pennsylvania's 29 electoral votes into the Democratic column. Earlier he had helped put together the alliance of ward leaders and reform elements that overthrew 68 years of Republican rule, electing first Joseph S. Clark and then Richardson Dilworth as mayor.

Clark is now serving his second term in the U.S. Senate.

Often called by enemies one of the last of the "old-time city bosses," Green in fact operated in an entirely different way, maintaining an effective alliance with "good government" groups.

Pres. Johnson, who with Mrs. Johnson attended the funeral services here, praised Green as "my personal friend" and "an effective and able leader in the halls of Congress." At the 1961 Inaugural Ball, Kennedy had made a point of leaving his box to greet Green and Mrs. Green, seated nearby as his personal guests.

Funeral services were conducted by Archbishop John J. Krol, who celebrated a pontifical requiem mass in the Cathedral of SS. Peter & Paul. Burial was in Holy Sepulchre Cemetery in Chestnut Hill.

12-28-63

J. C. Maiden, Union Rights Leader, Dies

Birmingham, Ala.—Funeral services were held in Bethel Baptist Church here for J. Cornelius Maiden, seasoned fighter for civil rights and a veteran union organizer in the South, who died in Mt. Sinai Hospital, Chicago, after a year-long battle with cancer.

In a telegram to Mrs. Dorothy Maiden, his widow, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler voiced their sorrow and said that "his long association with the labor movement won him many friends who will grieve, along with us, at his passing."

Pres. William Mitchell of the Chemical Workers, on whose staff he had served since 1948, mourned the death of "an important figure in American labor and particularly in the growth of the ICWU."

Born in New Orleans in 1909, he worked as an organizer for the former AFL from 1937 to 1940 and from 1941 to 1946 under the direction of George Googe, secretary-treasurer of the Pressmen who directed AFL organizational activities in the South.

He was several times a vice president of the Alabama State Federation of Labor, was a vice president of the Negro-American Labor Council and a key member of the ICWU Civil Rights Committee.

Exploitation of Farm Workers Seen Subsidy to Handful of Big Growers

New York—The American farm worker, unorganized and unprotected by the law, continues to be exploited and thereby subsidizes the growth and profits of a handful of huge corporate growers, according to a new report issued here.

In the report, titled "Agribusiness and Its Workers," the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor charged that the present system pits the family farmer against the exploited farm worker and so continues the decline of the family farm.

Fay Bennett, executive secretary of the NACFL, said the 48-page report points out that over two-thirds of the total farm wage bill is paid by less than 9 percent of the nation's farmers. This tiny group of big growers owns nearly 40 percent of all the farmland and accounts for more than 30 percent of all cropland harvested and nearly 50 percent of farm sales.

The trend towards concentration of control in agriculture continued during the 1950s, the report said. The number of farms dropped from 5.4 million in 1950 to 3.7 million by 1960.

But the average annual income for farm workers continues to be meager, the report noted, adding:

"Their income from both farm and non-farm work was $1,125 in 1960; in 1961, it had dropped to $1,054; and, in 1962, it rose again to $1,164. The average earnings of migrants in 1962 were $874 from farm work and $1,123 if non-farm work is included."

The NACFL pointed out that the worker's lot has remained unimproved despite the great increases in productivity, over both the long and short runs.

A farm worker in 1910 supplied the food and fiber needs of only seven persons; by 1960 he was meeting the greatly increased needs of 24 persons, the report noted.

"In the decade of the 1950s," it added, "total farm output rose nearly 85 percent on almost one-third fewer farms; yet wages and living and working conditions improved virtually not at all."

The report pointed out that the farm worker continues to lack the legal right to organize and bargain collectively; he remains exempt from the federal wage-hour law, employment compensation coverage and most other social legislation.

It observed that a proposed minimum wage of 75 cents an hour, rising to $1.25 in four years, has been opposed by growers even though its limited coverage would affect only three-fifths of one percent of all farms.

The big growers, the report said, also are the primary beneficiaries of cheap labor imported from Mexico by the U.S. Government. It cited the example of Mississippi County, Arkansas—in the district of Rep. E. C. Gathings, a member of the House Agriculture Committee—where, the NACFL charged, the surplus food relief rolls were slashed to force some 17,000 people back into the fields to work at 30 cents an hour. Gathings strongly backs the Mexican import program, the report said.